BALLOU'S MONTHLY MAGAZINE

VOL. XXXI.—No. 1. JANUARY, 1870. WHOLE No. 181.

THE SEWING CIRCLE.

BY B. P. SHILLABER.

Never was pleasanter scene nor time,
Told in story, or sung in rhyme,
Than the Sewing Circle, that common thing,
Where glad amenities grow and spring,
Neath Charity's light and loving sway,
And the magic of joy is felt alway.

Spirits of good, in concert sweet,
Mingle therein on noiseless feet,
And speak from warm lips rosy-bright,
And smile from eyes of beaming light,
And gleam along the subtle wires
With feeling that the scene inspires.

Ah, grand the circle thus combined,
For usefulness and pleasure joined!
And, gathering from life's passing hours,
A handful of its cheerful flowers,
They feel, the while, the blessed sense
Of genuine benevolence.

The nimble fingers deftly stray
Over their task in busy way,
While the glad tongue and brimming heart
Take in the busy scene a part;
But there, beside the active show,
Another scene occurs, I trow.

For unseen fingers dextrous move,
In industry and tender love,
To weave, in texture of the soul,
Those stitches wrought in generous dole,
To form a garb the ones to bless
Who labor in unselfishness.

Thus every thought that's given the poor
Shall to the thinker's good inure;
For every tear of pity shed,
A gem shall reappear instead;
And every stitch that's woven in love,
A triple bond of grace shall prove.

We all "build better than we know,"
And though things humble seem and slow,
They all may bear a good immense
In the grand scheme of Providence;
And e'en a simple heart-blest stitch
May be endowed with province rich.

Toil, stitchers, then, in cheerful task;
The poor will in your kindness bask.
Ye little know the blessing wrought
Upon the loom of loving thought,
And this fair scene to pity given
May prove an antepast of heaven.

THE NEW VOLUME.

The present number commences the 31st volume of BALLOU'S MONTHLY, on the rising tide of success, and with the promise of a continuance of public favor that is truly encouraging. Press and people have combined to give our Magazine the most hearty approval; and with this endorsement, backed by substantial evidence of sincerity, the publishers meet their friends at the threshold of a new year with assurances of thankfulness and hope. BALLOU is undoubtedly the cheapest magazine published, and it would not be complimentary to its readers to intimate for a moment that it was not the best. This, however, we leave for our eighty thousand patrons to say, endeavoring, in the meantime, by our earnest exertion to make it all that they or we could hope or wish. The same contributors, as far as possible, have been secured, and the closest editorial supervision will be exerted to render its pages instructive and entertaining, in harmony with the better spirit of the time, avoiding the mawkishly sentimental and the ultra sensational, and endeavoring for a healthful and substantial literature, that shall elevate the reader by its perusal. Under circumstances so favorable, our Magazine commences its thirty-first volume with ability and will to redeem its promises, and with every assurance of popular approval.

We present another series of pictures representing the ancient modes of arranging the hair, that are curious and interesting to our lady readers, showing to what a ridiculous extent fashion will lead its votaries, and likewise intimating what, perhaps, some magazinist in the far future may do in depicting their own peculiarity. Her hair is the glory of a woman, and to enhance its beauty is her study, though the study run to extremes. Custom softens the hideousness of any fashion, and the mind runs through the phrases that Pope imputes to the contemplation of vice; at first hideous, but, familiar grown, we endure, pity and embrace. Long hair was greatly valued in the early days, by Britons and Anglo-Saxons. The Saxons themselves had beautiful hair. France was anciently called "Long-haired Gaul," for the reason of the long and luxuriant hair of her females. It was considered in those days a degradation to have the hair shorn off, except as evidence, on entering a nunnery, of abjuration of the vanity of the world, and its loss by sickness was regarded as a great calamity. We occasionally, indeed frequently, at the present day, see heads that have been shorn of their pride, but it is to secure greater in a more healthy growth; and the effect is not bad, the feminine glory vindicating itself very speedily, cropping out in a natural form as graceful as one of studied art.

During the tenth century in France, ladies wore their hair arranged in very good taste, and in a manner which probably they had borrowed from the Romans, who had conquered and colonized Germany, Gaul, Spain and Britain. Illustrations of these fashions (Figs. 10 and 11) will give some notion of the style of the times. The second head is that of the Queen Tredegonde. Another, and simpler way of arranging the hair than that frequently adopted, was the still popular and constantly recurring "Empress" style—the hair merely rolled back from the face without artificial aid, and at the back of the head wound into a knot.

church at Canterbury, about a mile's walk from the cathedral, and erected on the side of the original church raised in her memory over her tomb. This queen, who lived at the end of the sixth and beginning of the seventh century, must have arranged her hair in one used to cover the head, and the former was often ornamented with borders of different colors. A later introduction was the cap we have already noticed, and which is illustrated in Fig. 12. It was made of velvet, surrounded by a coronet for state occasions, and is the

of the two simple but dignified fashions which continued in vogue until the thirteenth century. One of these was to leave the hair hanging loose behind, straight or waving as it inclined by nature, or to weave it in two long thick plaits which hung over each shoulder, nearly to the feet, and were adorned at the ends by pendant jewels. A veil or hood was same cap still retained by nobles in their armorial bearings.

In pictured coronets, the cap is represented as of loose velvet, and more in the style of that worn by gentlemen in the reign of Henry the Eighth. At this period it seems to have been firmly blocked. This cap was worn higher on the head than it appears in Fig 12 and just permitted the parting on the brow of the fair owner to remain visible. The veil attached behind was usually of a fine white gauze-like tissue—at least, amongst the French ladies, and latterly with the English. The Saxons were not partial to white, or to garments of one color, but preferred gay mixtures, and in these the great people indulged, leaving less gay clothing to their inferiors. Many of the caps were adorned with ostrich feathers.

The mode of arranging hair in two long plaits requires special notice. It is equally distinctive, and still more general than the "Empress" rolls and knot at the back of the head. The origin of plaits seems to have been Oriental. Chinese maidens at the present day wear a single plait at the back of the head, which reaches to the ground. The Turkish ladies wear the two plaits precisely as we have described them as worn from the tenth to the thirteenth century. They also wear in winter a thick cap of velvet, embroidered with pearls, not altogether unlike the cap we described above, which is changed in summer for a similar one made of silver tissue. The difference is that it is placed on one side of the head, towards the back; the veil also floats from it; on the opposite side, a plume of feathers, or a group of flowers, is tastefully adjusted. The favorite Turkish ornament is a bouquet of flowers, imitated in precious stones of the natural colors. At a recent banker's ball in Paris, the most remarkable ornaments of the evening, in an assembly where the rarest jewels were seen in utmost profusion, was a wreath of flowers represented in their natural colors by jewels.

About the thirteenth century, bands of ermine or fur were used around the caps shown in Fig. 12, having the crown only of velvet. Matrons and maidens assumed veils and bands of linen, such as nuns wear. Some of the young damsels wore their hair loose, and garlanded with flowers, or covered with veils for walking. Coronets remained in reserve for such occasions, and fur caps for full dress.

Nets were introduced in England and France during the thirteenth century by Beatrice de Bourgoigne. It is supposed that the Crusaders had brought them from the East, where they had long been in requisition. They were worn in very early times by the Jews and the Assyrians. At the period of the Crusades they were common among the Saracens. Greeks and Romans, however, had made use of them. The Hindoos had worn them, and continue so to do at the present day; and with Italians and Spaniards they have long been a national ornament. The nets worn in the thirteenth century were sometimes placed simply over the hair; at other times (as in Fig. 13) they were woven of gold thread, and lined with silk. The plait across the face was not of hair, but of gold wire, solid and stiff. The fur caps continued more in fashion than ever, and were frequently tied under the chin by a band of linen placed over them.

In the fourteenth century good taste was entirely ignored, and the hair was concealed by a variety of headdresses of the most ridiculous and preposterous kind. One of these resembled in form a dunce's cap. It was made of colored velvet; the revers was of ermine. The back sometimes continued in a flat square piece over the shoulders, and was cut in three stripes or tails by way of termination. Fig. 14 illustrates a kind of bonnet of the period, where breadth instead of altitude is the aim.

In the fifteenth century bad taste continued in the ascendant. Moon-shaped headdresses, with veils suspended across their great projecting horns (Fig. 15), were thought exceedingly stylish. To vie with them in eccentricity, a cap like an ordinary extinguisher came into vogue, and rose at least two feet in height (Fig. 16). A short veil of black, lined with yellow or other colors, rested across the head, and a fine veil of muslin or lace hung from the point of the cap nearly to the ground. Another curious tire, depicted in Fig. 17, was brought into use by Isabeau de Baviere. Several varieties of ugly headdresses of similar form made their appearance, and the hair was concealed by most of them. The consequence was a general alteration of doorways, which had to be raised in height to admit the ladies.

The hair was still very generally covered in the sixteenth century. The ridiculous headgear of the last epoch was abandoned. Ugly modes and caprices of fashion rarely last long; they die out of themselves a natural death. Still there was no true exercise of taste. The hair was most perfectly hidden, and the head ornaments were not particularly becoming, with the exception of the Marie Stuart bonnet, so well known, and supported by tresses rolled back over pads, as in Fig. 18. Before the introduction of this style, hoods were in general requisition, such as were worn by Elizabeth of York, queen of Henry the Seventh, at the close of the previous century, and afterwards by Anne Boleyn and Lady Jane Grey. These hoods were very simple, neat and modest-looking; but other fashions less desirable prevailed in Elizabeth's reign.

In the days of "Good Queen Bess," the hair was drawn from the face in front in a way that all who are familiar with pictures of the virgin queen will readily call to mind. At the back of the head the hair was similarly drawn up. It was supported all round over a cushion, depressed in the centre, so as to give it the shape of a royal crown. A string of gems, studded with medallions, encircled the mass of distorted tresses, and the ruff spread its well-starched folds jealously round the fair throat. Fig. 19 is not an exaggeration, but a fair outline of the appearance of the back of a lady contemporary with the courtly Leicester. We smile upon the quaint and ungraceful fashion as we look at it now, but had our ladies lived in those days, and possessed the entree to elite society, that is undoubtedly how they would have attired themselves, and regarded the whole thing as comme il faut.

ALPINE SCENES.

LA MER DE GLACE, VALLEY OF CHAMOUNI.

The reader can readily find the geographical position of the Alps (White Mountains) of Central Europe, and needs no description beyond the fact that they are in three divisions—Low, Middle and High. In the first are included all from 2000 to 5500 feet high, in the second those from 5500 to 8000 feet, where the snow line commences, and in the third those from 8000 to 15,000 feet, whose summits are covered with perpetual snow. The Alps are divided into ten great ranges, dividing and distinguishing many of the European States. The Pennine Alps include the highest peaks of all the ranges, Mt. Blanc 15,782 feet, Monte Rosa 15,152 feet, and Mont Cervin or Matterhorn, 14,837 feet. On this range, also, are found the greatest glaciers in Europe. One of these, La Mer de Glace (Sea of Ice), in the valley of Chamouni, is a source of perpetual curiosity and of interest. Glaciers consist of masses of snow-ice, formed in valleys above the lines of perpetual congelation, whose prolongations extend to those lower down, reaching frequently to the borders of cultivation. They present the appearance of a frozen torrent, frequently several miles in length—the Mer de Glace being seven miles—traversed by deep rents called crevasses, and are composed of snow melted by solar heat, and frozen into granular ice, constituting a compound of ice and water, more or less yielding according to the state of wetness or infiltration. Glaciers are subject to the laws of fluids, and are not stationary, except during the winter, the motion of Mer de Glace being about 18.24 inches in twenty-four hours, though the speed may differ in cases where the glacier is nearer horizontal. They bear on their surface down to the valleys, immense stones, confirming the glacier theory of modern science regarding the world's history. Glaciers at times unite, like streams, and merge in one. In thickness, glaciers vary from a few feet to several hundred feet, lessening in summer and increasing in winter. In the winter of 1818-19, some Swiss glaciers increased so greatly, and came so far down into the lower valleys, as to sweep away whole villages. During the heat of summer their upper surface is melted, and the waters tumble down the crevasses and mingle with waters below, formed by the melting of the under-surface glacier, in consequence of the higher temperature of earth on which it rests. These waters flow to the lower end of the glacier, where they form an arch and escape, in a muddy stream, owing to the weight of ice grinding the limestone over which it passes. Such an arch is to be seen at the termination of the Mer de Glace, in the valley of Chamouni. This glacier is the easiest of access of any in the Alps, and is the most visited. It seldom extends two-thirds of a mile in width, and is often less. Its last slope into the valley has a vertical height of 1800 feet, and, in appearance, it is as if an enormous cataract or rapid had been suddenly congealed. The barrenness and sterile grandeur presented by this glacier fills one with awe to look upon it. The combination of ice, pile upon pile, as it rises up the valley, flanked by green pastures, beautiful flowering plants, lofty snowy peaks, and enormous bare monoliths with perpendicular sides many thousands of feet high, forms the most striking panorama of contrasts imaginable. In the valleys above the glaciers deep lakes are sometimes formed, which, at times bursting their barriers, rush down the gorge and lower valleys with destructive fury.

The passes of the Alps, or depressions, are the roads by which communications are effected between different sections of the Alpine regions. These passes are for carriages, single horses and mules, and foot-passengers. Some of these, as at Mont Cenis—which is now about to have another and more extensive tunnel—are cut, as galleries, through the solid rock, and have been executed at great expense and trouble. While some of these galleries are of great extent, and present to the traveller pictures of savage wildness and sublime grandeur, others are little more than simple archways of rock, forming highly picturesque features in the route. Of this class is the gallery of Isella, the last but one on the Italian side. The Stelvio, which is a military road constructed by the Austrian government, completed in 1824, is the highest pass in Europe practicable for carriages, being 3174 feet above the level of the sea, and is a remarkable specimen of human industry and skill. This road is seldom passable except from June to October, owing to the fearful ravages committed by storms and avalanches. The passes for pedestrians and single horses are of various kinds. Some of these are cut along ledges of rock, having enormous cliffs above and yawning gulfs beneath; or they are in the form of rough stairs, to the unpractised eye, apparently more suitable to be climbed by monkeys than by four-footed animals. Such passes are always picturesque and seldom dangerous, though those unaccustomed to them are at times apt to have their nerves severely tried when wending their way along the giddy brink of a huge precipice. Of this description of pass the accompanying cut gives a good idea. Of the third class there are many, a large part of which are known to only natives, never to be travelled except in the summer season, and some are not passable for years. Those least frequented are used by contraband traders and outlaws. Some of them rise far above the line of perpetual congelation, ascending the valley of torrents, and crossing ravines hundreds of feet deep.

The traveller in the Alps is frequently exposed to dangers of no ordinary description. The electric currents, attracted and moved in every direction by the innumerable lofty peaks, which render the winds at once fickle and violent, the melting of the snow, or its accumulation upon declivities, or on the edge of precipices which do not allow of its resting, all contribute to the perils that beset him; besides which, his progress is often interrupted by the tempests called tourmentes by the French, and guxen by the Germans, and the still more destructive avalanche. The former arise suddenly and with great violence, often accompanied by thunder and lightning, and tossing the snow in eddy clouds around the traveller, blinding his eyes, irritating his skin, and compelling him to seek shelter. The avalanches sometimes accompany the tourmentes, to which, in that case, they owe their formation; but they occur, also, at different seasons, unaccompanied by tempests. They may, in general, be described as enormous masses of snow, which, detached by various causes from their original position, roll with tremendous noise and force over rock and precipice, down to the plains below, overwhelming man and beast, forest and dwelling, in one common destruction. A touch of the foot, or the slightest motion of the air, even that produced by the sound of a small bell or other instrument, is often sufficient to set the avalanche in motion; firearms are sometimes used to ascertain the distance or nearness of such danger. The most destructive are those which are composed of hardened snow, and which, rolling or sliding down from the mountains, carry all before them. From the frequent occurrence of avalanches, some parts of the Alps are entirely uninhabited; and in others, large patches of the tallest and strongest trees are left standing. In order to arrest their progress, houses are built under the shelter of rocks, and all other available means adopted, to avoid the effects of these destructive visitants. A friend of ours, the last year, journeying through the Alps, was greatly disturbed by the frequent occurrence of these avalanches, some of which came unpleasantly near him, one of immense size dashing across the path immediately in front of him, and then rolled, and thundered, and crashed down into the valley below.

The climate of the Alps is varied, every mile in the ascent showing changes in vegetation until it dies out in the snowy region. At different altitudes are to be met the vine, the walnut, the chestnut; of flowers, the rhododendron, the campanula, the salix, succeeding which are heaths and rich pastures up to the snow line, 8000 feet above the sea. But lichens are found much above this, on the highest rocks, and specimens of the saxifrage, on Mt. Cervin, at 11,500 feet. At this great elevation are found two species of quadrupeds, the bouquetin or wild goat, and the chamois, which delights in heights inaccessible to man. The bouquetin, which has become very rare, scales the most elevated peaks, while the chamois is generally found rather lower, but is never seen in the plains. In summer, the high mountain pastures are covered with large flocks of cattle, sheep and goats, which are, in winter, removed to a lower and warmer level. The marmot and white or Alpine hare inhabit both the snowy and the woody regions. Lower down are found the mole, the wild cat, the fox, the lynx, the bear and the wolf; but the last two are now extremely rare. The vulture, eagle, and other birds of prey, frequent the rugged Alpine rocks, and the "snowy ptarmigan" seeks food and shelter among the diminutive plants that border upon the snow line. Other kinds of game, including the moorfowl, woodcock and partridge, abound in their usual localities, from the upper limit of the wood to the more level and habitable parts below. Several kinds of water fowl frequent the higher lakes, where excellent trout and other fish are found; but those situated at the greatest elevation are, from their low temperature, entirely destitute of fish.

A MAIDEN'S WOOING.

A maiden sat at her window wide,
 Pretty enough for a prince's bride,
 Yet nobody came to claim her;
 She sat like a beautiful picture there,
 With pretty blue-bells and roses fair,
 And jasmine leaves to frame her.
 And why she sat there nobody knows,
 But thus she sang as she plucked a rose,
 The leaves around her strewing,
 "I've time to lose and power to choose,
 'Tis not so much the gallant who woos
 As the gallant's way of wooing!"

A lover came riding by awhile,
 A wealthy lover was he, whose smile
 Some maids would value greatly.
 A formal lover, who bowed and bent
 With many a high-flown compliment,
 And cold demeanor stately:
 "You've still," said she, to her suitor stern,
 "The 'prentice work of your craft to learn,
 If thus you come a-wooing.
 I've time to lose and power to choose,
 'Tis not so much the gallant who woos
 As the gallant's way of wooing!"

A second lover came ambling by,
 A timid lad with a frightened eye
 And a color mantling highly.
 He muttered the errand on which he'd come,
 Then, only chuckled and bit his thumb,
 And simpered, simpered shyly.
 "No," said the maiden, "go your way,
 You dare but think what a man would say,
 Yet dare to come a-sueing!
 I've time to lose and power to choose,
 'Tis not so much the gallant who woos
 As the gallant's way of wooing!"

A third rode up at a startling pace
A suitor poor, with a homely face,
No doubts appeared to bind him.
He kissed her lips, and he pressed her waist,
And off he rode with the maiden placed
On a pillion safe behind him.
And she heard the suitor bold confide
This golden hint to the priest who tied
The knot there's no undoing:
"With pretty young maidens who can choose,
'Tis not so much the gallant who wooes
As the gallant's way of wooing!"

NEW LIFE-SAVING APPARATUS.

In the September number of our Magazine, we gave our readers an illustration of a life-preserving apparatus. It excited much comment among our seafaring people, and we received numerous letters commending the apparatus, and only one or two condemning it. We take an interest in everything that is calculated to save life, and thus render a sailor's profession less hazardous than it now really is; therefore we indulge some pride in presenting to our readers an engraving representing a new contrivance for saving people from drowning. This is an American invention, and has attracted a great deal of attention in this country and Europe. It is believed to be nearly perfect, and so safe that even a lady can don the uniform and battle with the waves as bravely as a strong man.

The inventor is Captain I. B. Stoner of New York, a gentleman of independent fortune, who served throughout the late war, and his object, it is said, is not to make money, but to perform a truly philanthropic work. Two Americans—a gentleman and his wife—have been commissioned to explain the nature of the apparatus; and the way in which they are obliged to do so is certainly novel and interesting. They first slip their arms through cork jackets, and then insert their persons in a loose India rubber overcoat, which covers the whole of the body, except the hands and face, around which it is tightly secured. India rubber weights are then attached to the shoes, so as to enable the wearers to maintain a perpendicular position and perfect equilibrium, and being thus equipped they jump into the water. They carry with them a tin case, in shape somewhat like a buoy. This article is divided into compartments, and in the upper one they manage to pack biscuits, a flask of brandy, a revolver, Bengala lights, Roman candles, and some Liebig's sausages. The lower compartment of the case contains about six quarts of water, which is drunk through an India rubber tube, closed by a metal screw top.

In the river Thames the experiments were quite successful, but the inventor desired to give further proofs of the efficacy of the apparatus. He wanted to astonish France, and he succeeded most effectually. On board of a steamer, about nine miles from Havre, Mr. Stoner and three friends appeared in the safety costume, and without a moment's hesitation flung themselves into the waves, the steamer going at full speed. The passengers on board were a little uneasy, as they were soon out of sight of the adventurers, and the vessel gave no symptom of turning, or of sending a boat to their assistance. They could see a small dark point on the waves, however, and on this they fixed their eyes until the steamer steered towards it, when they discovered—first, that there were four black spots; and, secondly, that they represented the amphibious party comfortably eating their lunch from a floating buoy, surmounted by a flag, which served as their celaret and sideboard. About an hour of this calm and not unpleasant occupation sufficed to show the complete efficacy of the safety costume, which it was the object of the excursion to commend to public notice. After concluding their marine lunch, the gentlemen drew from their convenient receptacles paper and tobacco, of which they formed cigarettes, and enjoyed a tranquil smoke.

The price for each suit is about $37 in gold, but no doubt the apparatus can be manufactured much cheaper, so that it can be placed in the hands of every one who desires it.

THE MAORIES.

"Maori," meaning "native," is the distinctive name of the New Zealander, whose title, however, to original growth on the soil is doubted. It is said that the Maories are Polynesians, though they themselves allege that they are Tahitians, who, within historic ages, sailed down, island by island, in their war canoes, massacring the inhabitants, and, finally landing in New Zealand, found a numerous horde of blacks of the Australian race living in the forests of the South Island. Favored by a year of exceptionable drought, they set fire to the forests, and burned to the last man, or drove into the sea, the aboriginal possessors of the soil. Some ethnologists believe that this account is in the main correct, but hold that the Maori race is Malay; others have tried to show that the conflict between blacks and browns was not confined to these two peoples, but raged throughout the whole of Polynesia; and that it was terminated in New Zealand itself, not by the destruction of the blacks, but by the amalgamation of the opposing races. The legends allege war as the cause for the flight to New Zealand. The accounts of some of the migrations are circumstantial in the extreme, and describe the fine planting of the yams, the astonishment of the people at the new flowers and trees of the islands, and many such details of the landing. The names of the chiefs and of the canoes are given in a sort of catalogue of ships, and the wars of the settlers are narrated at length, with the heroic exaggeration common to the legends of all lands, some of which is still preserved:

"Welcome at last to this fair land—a resting-place; Spirit of the Earth, to thee, we, coming from afar, present our hearts for good."

The fact that the Maories are Polynesians is proved by identity of language and similarity of customs. Their huts are the same, the names of their deities, their arts. This fact established, then, according to Dilk, our North American Indians are distant relations of the Maori race, as from their personal habits, the form of their altars, and other peculiarities, the former were probably from Polynesia. There is great likeness, he says, between the legend of Maui, the Maori hero, and that of Hiawatha, especially in the history legs shorter than those of Englishmen, though their heads are smaller. The tattoo, as a mark of distinction or taste, is frequent. The Maories readily embrace the Christian religion, and have long since abandoned cannibalism, though some of the aged ones confess love for the relish of the old regime. They are kinder to their women than is usual among barbarians, and are hospitable, though mercenary. They have a literature, and are witty and smart, but not deeply intellectual—the reasoning faculty being deficient. One half of the adults read and write and two-thirds of them belong to Christian churches. They are generally clothed in civilized costumes, and possess flocks, herds, furniture, houses and cultivated land. The English hold these people in subjection, having taken possession by the right of discovery, and the late rebellion was an attempt to recover their independence.

of how the sun was noosed, and made to move more slowly through the skies, so as to give men long days for toil. The resemblance, also, of the Maori "runanga," or assembly for debate, to the Indian council, is exceedingly close, and throughout America and Polynesia a general blending of poetry and gravity is characteristic of the Malays, whom he assumes to be the origin of the Polynesian race. At all times it has been remarked by ethnologists and acclimatizers that it is easier by far to carry men and beasts from the poles towards the tropics than from the tropics to the colder regions; hence the Malays, in coming to New Zealand, and this country especially, unknowingly broke one of Nature's laws, and their descendants are paying the penalty in extinction.

The Maories are a very good people. Their stature is large, but their forms are peculiar, their bodies and arms being longer and their

This struggle, from a misunderstanding of the Maori people, awakened a sympathy for England, which was not deserved. One peculiarity revealing the chivalric character of the Maories in war is in "proclaiming" the districts in which lies the cause of war as the sole fighting ground, and never touching their enemies, however defenceless, when found elsewhere. Civilized nations might well imitate this.

The Maories do not occupy their lands as the white settlers do in Australia, wide apart, but they draw in sociable proximity and club and live together in Pas. A Maori Pa corresponds to a European village, for in it the natives dwell, around it each family has its small cultivation whereon potatoes, wheat and maize are all planted. The village is not made for defensive purposes. For this latter there is a fighting Pa, on places selected for the purpose. In the dwelling Pa the huts—[see engraving]—are composed of a very light kind of rush called roper, which is cut when green; it is allowed to dry, and is tied to thick posts securely by strings made from the flax plant. In the hut a small opening, about three feet and a half high, forms the door, chimney and window. A number of palisades or rails surround each hut, which is usually ornamented by some carved wooden figures, painted or daubed with a red clay composition.

In the fighting Pa—[see engraving]—the settlement is enclosed by a double row of rails or palisades, along which cross-horizontal pieces are fastened. The upright posts are about six inches apart, and are cut off at the bottom, so that their ends shall be about eight inches from the ground, in order to allow the muzzles of the guns of the defenders to fire under them. Immediately in rear of these rails, rifle pits are dug;—[see engraving]—they consist merely of a number of holes, which, in the strongest fighting Pas, are connected by underground passages, so that the cunning Maori fires his gun from one hole, then pops down and crawls through his narrow rabbit-like way, only to appear again in another direction. These mole-hill constructions are very puzzling and nasty places to attack. As the Pas are approached, their inmates always welcome you by calling in a plaintive, whining, pleasing tone of voice, "Here mai, Here mai," (Come here.)

We present in the engraving below a view of the native warlike implements of the Maori soldiery, which are very formidable in a hand-to-hand conflict, though the use of the rifle and musket renders the use of such arms obsolete. They consist of, 1. A Wahaika; 2. A Taiha, having a carved head, and is carried only by chiefs; 3. A Mere. It is made of bone, having a string at one end for passing over the wrist. It is used for hand-to-hand fights; 4. A small short-handled Tomahawk. The Wahaika is a wooden tomahawk with a long sharp handle, carved at one extremity, while from the other is suspended a tuft of parrot's feathers, the object of which is to distract the attention of an enemy in close engagement, by shaking this feathery plume in an indescribably rapid manner, while a fatal dart or thrust is made with the spear end.

The living of the Maories is not of a nature to attract civilized people. They are gluttons and eat with the greatest rapidity. They abjure knives and forks and partake with the primary natural implements and these not overclean. They breakfast very early and dine about noon, at which latter meal water is the chief beverage, but should any rum, or "wai pero," (dirty water,) be offered to the diners, it will not be refused, for drinking is a vice, which tends daily more to their decrease.

A SQUALL AT SEA.

On this page our readers will find a spirited illustration of a squall at sea. The design and narrative were sent to us by a young gentleman at present residing in Melbourne, Australia, and we will let him tell his story in his own words, for it is rather entertaining to those who know not the terrors of the deep:

I sailed from Boston for Melbourne in the half-clipper ship T—, as one of the crew, rated as an ordinary seaman, at $18 per month and the right to a discharge in Australia. To tell you the whole truth I had read "The Gold Hunters" and "The Bushrangers," in one of your publications called the "AMERICAN UNION," and afterwards in book form as published by Messrs. Lee & Shepard, and I wanted to see if I could not meet with some of the serious and laughable adventures which befell your versatile contributor. I didn't suppose that I could make money as fast as he and his friends did, but then I had great hopes of finding wealth in the gold fields or in raising stock and selling wool. I have met with a few adventures, but not such as I read in the books alluded to. Once I was robbed near Ballarat and stripped to my shirt and even my revolver taken away (it was loaded at the time), and I couldn't help wondering, while the confounded bushrangers were going through me, how different your author and his gallant friend Jack would have acted under the circumstances. They wouldn't have been robbed. Not much. They would have, (according to their own accounts) shot the ruffians to the right and left and found thousands of dollars worth of gold dust on their persons, which they would have quietly pocketed and continued their journey as though nothing had happened. I didn't manage in that cool and unconcerned manner. I just let the scoundrels take all they wanted, and my teeth chattered in my head when they put their revolvers to my temples and said they had a mind to blow out what little brains I had. I half believe that they meant it, because when I asked them if they had ever heard of your contributor and Jack, and Mr. Murden, they told me to hold my jaw or they would break it for me. I don't think that the fellows ever read "The Gold Hunters." If they had they would have treated an American citizen in a different manner for fear of the consequences. When they said "travel," I left them at a rapid rate, and although the insects were rather troublesome to a fellow without trousers, and shoes and stockings, still I felt quite thankful that my life was spared to meet with other adventures of a more agreeable character.

After the bushrangers had done with me, I stopped at a farmer's, or stockman's house ten miles from where I was robbed, and I had to beg for clothes to cover my nakedness.

At first the owner of the premises took me for a suspicious, or indecent person, and set his dogs on me to drive me off, but I imitated Ulysses, and sat down, not showing the least disposition to fight the savage brutes. They came up as though they would tear me limb from limb, but stopped at a respectful distance and snuffed at me, which made the thick-headed John Bull swear, but still he took a fancy to me and gave me clothes, and I paid for them by looking after his sheep and repairing his clock, which had stopped for the want of cleaning. I didn't know much about the business, but I happened to make a hit the first time trying.

But let me tell you what happened to me on the passage out. I met with an adventure on the water that was startling, as the engraving will show. You see we were near the Cape of Good Hope, and expected to get around it in the course of twenty-four hours, when one afternoon, while we were close-hauled, under single-reefed topsails, with just as much wind as we could stagger under, a white squall came tearing along from the coast of Africa, and struck us like a tornado, although it was all over in ten seconds, so it seemed to me. No one saw the squall coming, and no one made ready for its reception. It took our foremast by the board, with all its top-hamper, carried away the bowsprit close to the night-heads, with bobstays and spritsail yard, and main royal mast and royal yard, but left the rest of the ship uninjured. The whole force of the squall was forward. It seemed to be travelling in a narrow path, not more than ten fathoms wide, so I judged by the looks of the water after it passed us. There was some swearing on board of the ship for the next few minutes, and after we had thus relieved our minds we went to work with a will and cleared the wreck and got up a jurymast, and stuck out a bowsprit. Then we made sail, and we all supposed the "old man" would go into Cape Town and repair, but he didn't do anything of the kind. He was too afraid of the underwriters and his owners. He kept us at work until he got things shipshape, but, O gracious, wasn't we a used-up set by the time the last spar was in its place and the last backstay set up! You had better believe we were tired, and needed sleep. But we arrived safe, and now if I meet with more adventures out here I'll send you an account of them, that is if you would like such things, but you mustn't expect me to rival "The Gold Hunters."

THE ASCOT CUP.

The races at Epsom and Ascot have become British institutions, with all their gross immoralities sustained by government, and nobles join with the rabble in observing them. The recent Ascot races, and the award of the Ascot cup, attract attention to the scene, which is a small village in Berks, within six miles of Windsor Castle on the southwest. Its only importance is derived from its races, which happen every year, its race-course, established by William, Duke of Cumberland, being very superior. There is a distinction made betwixt "royal Ascot" and the more national Derby, at Epsom, the former being especially marked by the proprieties of custom, and patronized more noticeably by the aristocracy, as befitting its royal origin, while at the latter the shopkeeper or the mechanic shoulders the patrician, with rough but not rude familiarity, and there is a tumultuous whirl which affords a lively notion of Babel in its wildest agony. People must have a strong nervous organization to stand more than one Derby in a year.

At Ascot an air of repose, a luxurious languor, seems to hang about the place, and this, coupled with the beautiful scenery that surrounds Windsor Castle, and the brightness and freshness of the landscape, renders a visit very delightful to all who "in populous cities pent," seek for a few sunny hours' relaxation, blended with amusements which are bracing without being riotous. The racing, if not so good as at Epsom, is quite good enough for ninety-nine out of every hundred visitors to races; and though Ascot Heath has the reputation of being less crowded than the Downs, it is fast becoming Derby-like in its proportions.

The recent race for the "cup" that forms the subject for our illustration, was one of much interest. In spite of plenty of dust and crowd, the aspect of elegance which is the rightful attribute of Ascot was not by any means wanting, and the scene presented by the heath during the four days had much of the fashionable picnic air which attaches to it by tradition.

"The weather," writes an enthusiastic spectator, "was lovely beyond description; a cool, fresh breeze blew from early morning, freshening towards afternoon. The drive through the park past the Virginia Water was, as usual, in the very fullness of its early summer beauty; and that beauty is of a kind which can be matched nowhere save in this pleasant English land. There were any number of carriages which came by road from London, and those who made the expedition had not much dust to complain of; and for persons who could not spare the time to make the long drive down, and yet wished for a fuller glimpse of the woods, and green fields, and commons than may be had from the windows of a railway car, there was the middle course of Ascot via Windsor. On the opening day and the cup-day, when the Prince and Princess of Wales attended—formerly the sovereign and royal family used to attend Ascot in semi-state—everything was so bright and gay that the impression left upon the spectator's mind was one of a very kaleidoscope of variegated hues. Every one of the fair company of ladies who filled the galleries of the grand stand, lined the roofs of carriages, and overflowed upon the lawn, where the betting-men plied their trade, seemed to have blossomed forth with the freshest and brightest of light summer dresses. Gray scarves, and fringed parasols, and shot silks were woven all together into a mass of color; and the spectacle, when the royal cortege drove up, was, as usual, singularly beautiful. It would, of course, be mere affectation to assert that this princely progress could match in pomp or grandeur with the displays of court splendor familiar to countries where state ceremonial is more attended to than it is with us; but it may be said truly that the view of Ascot, when the royal carriages are passing up the race-course, stands in its own line alone."

Among the "silver prizes" to be awarded to the owner of the fleetest horse, was the so-called "gold cup," the representation of which is herewith given, which was won by Brigantine, the property of Sir Frederick Johnstone, but this is matter of past news.

This piece of plate, which in racing technology is called a cup, but which silversmiths call a plateau, as a piece of art and workmanship merits the highest praise. Intended as a centre-piece for the dinner-table, its glossy brightness, and elaborate as well as delicate chasings, are well in keeping with the fruit and flowers it is intended to hold, for the gratification of those accustomed to dine luxuriously, blending and softening the vigor of feeding with the poetry of sentiment. To the appreciative, who can delight in contrasts, the figure subjects—the Champion's Challenge, a mounted knight in full armor, with the thickest danger. This knight in silver carries us back to the days of English Hotspurs:

shield—would recall the poetical pictures we hear of the days of chivalry, when civilization, if in its dawn, was flavored with the brave manhood of men who swore by the "bright eyes of beauty," and for a smile from the ladies of their love would rush madly into

It is an elegant trophy, and though we have no interest in contested fields beyond the mere incident of news, still should we be called to possess so rare an ornament, we should prize it with full as much zeal as though we had won it on the turf.

THE STRUGGLE FOR MAVERICK.

A Dramatic Story....In Three Parts.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

PRELIMINARY CHAPTER.

IN the south-easterly part of the Empire State there is a small peninsula, shut in on the west by the Hudson River, and on the east by the waters of Long Island Sound. It is a region which is now thickly settled, being practically a suburb of the great metropolis of our country; but at a date not far from forty years ago, although there were several of the old colonial villages in the area referred to, there was also much wild land, with thousands of acres of forest, and wild hills, and nooks, and corners, which you will not find to-day. In 1880, which is the time now written of, there were some beautiful and productive farms and some stately residences on this peninsula; there was a considerable population, embracing many of the old and wealthy families whose ancestors had fought on the right side in the Revolution, and who were therefore permitted to retain their hereditary estates; and its inhabitants at that time, never dreaming of the astonishing improvements which a few years more began to develop, could never have looked to see this little territory as densely populated as it now is. It was in truth a very different place then; and notwithstanding its neighborhood to the great city, we could trace in it many of the characteristics of our new western country. It was, about the time named, the theatre of curious and startling domestic events, which it is now my privilege to record.

Not many miles below Tarrytown, where the Hudson begins to narrow and to lose the picturesque beauty which attends most of its course, the east bank of the river assumes the form of an abrupt precipice, perhaps seventy feet in height. There is hardly gradation enough in its descent to break the flight through the air of a stone dropped from the top of the cliff; it would probably fall clear of its side, into the water beneath. But the river changes with the lapse of time; and although now it has invaded the shore at this point so that there is a depth of six feet at the very foot of the cliff, yet forty years ago there was a smooth strip of sand, like what you may see at Coney Island, intervening between the shore and the water. Now, too, trees grow far out on the brow of the cliff, and the highway runs quite close to it, as it did then; but now you might not know of the danger that lurked beneath your feet in approaching the edge of the bank at this point, until you had put aside the interposing boughs. If you did that, you would start back affrighted to find yourself treading so near the jaws of destruction. But part the branches again, cling to the stoutest of them, and look over. The jagged side of the cliff falls beneath you so precipitously that the sight will dizzy you; the river runs seventy feet below, and the stone that you drop falls with a very faint splash in the water.

Such is the Tory's Leap. The place derives its name from a well-authenticated tradition of the Revolution relating to one Simeon Barnwell, a desperate character of the neighborhood, who espoused the cause of King George at the outbreak of the war, and who, after the city was occupied by the British, was put in authority over the country between Tarrytown and Manhattan Island.

Like all base natures when invested with temporary power, he exercised it brutally and rapaciously, making himself the pest and terror of the farmers of the neighborhood who refused to openly avow allegiance to the king. With a band of choice spirits he ravaged the country, plundering, outraging, and burning, until the enemy's power in this quarter was broken and the evacuation of the city left him without allies to support him. Prudence would have dictated flight, at this juncture; but Barnwell, apparently believing that the people were too much in terror of him to molest him, boldly remained at home, setting the country at defiance. It was a false security; the British transports had not cleared the Narrows when Barnwell was surrounded in his house by a crowd of injured and exasperated men who demanded his surrender. His answer was a shot which instantly killed two of them; and then the infuriated party broke into the house to seize him. He was not found for some minutes, and then the horsemen of the crowd espied him trying to escape from the barn mounted on a fleet brown mare which had often served him well in time of need. Instant pursuit was made and continued for some miles; when the desperate tory, perceiving that the two foremost of his pursuers were fast gaining on him, riding with pistols in their hands, ready to slay him on capture, turned his horse sharp to the river, and urged her off at this cliff! The two fleet horsemen pulled up in time to save themselves; but such had been the desperate energy of the tory's leap that horse and man fell into deep water, and floated down the stream, dead and mutilated.

Such the legend. But other tragic occurrences are connected with this dangerous locality, besides that which gave it name; one in particular, which is directly germane to the incidents that are now to be narrated.

In the spring of 1830 a fisherman upon the river discovered a human body lying on the sand at the foot of the cliff. It could not have lain there long, because he was positive that he rowed inshore and examined this place at nightfall of the previous day, desiring to find a better place to set his lines. There was nothing there then but the sand of the beach; but in the early hours of the following morning, while the mists were still rising from the river, as he came to examine his catch, he was horrified to find a human body on this sand. Beaching his boat, he examined it carefully. The clothes were torn, the neck apparently broken, and there were several bruises on various parts of the body, but no wounds such as would be made by firearms or sharp weapons. The conclusion was irresistible that the unfortunate man had fallen or had been thrown from the summit of the cliff. And it was quite as clear that he must have died instantly. He was unknown to the fisherman; and wisely leaving the body where he had found it, the latter made haste to notify the nearest coroner of his discovery. A jury was summoned, and the inquest was held on the spot. The body was carefully and critically examined, and a surgeon pronounced it free from the marks of any injuries excepting such as must have been received by the fearful fall. The bank above was scrutinized, and no evidences of a struggle were found. The grass appeared to have been somewhat trampled down; but no more than the feet of one man might naturally have done. Nay, more; there were other evidences discovered which made it plain to the jury that the deed was one of deliberate and premeditated suicide. A gold watch was found, hung by the chain to a bramble between the bank and the road; beside it was a miniature; and the inference was irresistible that these things had been carefully laid away before the fatal plunge into eternity. But no note, no scrap of writing was found to explain the reason of the act, or to indicate what he desired to be done with these objects of his last fond care. The watch bore the inscription on the inner case, "H. L. From his mother. 1827." And there was no difficulty in recognizing the beautiful face in the miniature as that of Mrs. Roesselle, the newly-married wife of the Episcopal minister of the parish.

The majority of the jurors had known the deceased in his lifetime; none of them hesitated to pronounce the body that of Horace Levin; and the facts concerning the young man, as they were generally known in the neighborhood, were enough to furnish a motive for the suicide. He was the only and petted son of a wealthy widow who lived at Albany; but for a year past he had spent most of his time in and about Tarrytown, endeavoring to gain the affections of a very beautiful young girl, an orphan, Helen Westcott by name. It was supposed at first that he was the favored one among her many suitors, and it was known that she had given him the miniature which was found on the bank quite early in their acquaintance; but rumor soon began to whisper that the Rev. Alvin Roesselle, the gifted, young, and handsome clergyman of the country parish, had supplanted Levin; and this appeared to be the truth. The effect upon the latter was noticeable. He lost both appetite and spirits; he thinned and paled, and grew to be only the shadow of his former self. Even after the minister was the well known accepted suitor, and Levin's visits had necessarily been discontinued, the unhappy youth still hung about the neighborhood, often about the house, seemingly unwilling to accept his disappointment as final and irrevocable. And on the wedding-day, when Mr. Roesselle and Helen were married at the church by a minister from the city (a college-mate of the bridegroom), in the presence of a house full of friends and parishioners—even then Horace Levin was seen in the church-porch, dark, miserable, silent, hovering like a cloud upon the joy of the occasion. Some of the friends of the bride and groom, fearful of intended violence, kept purposely between him and them as they entered and left the church; but there was no necessity for this. Levin watched them with gloomy brow as they came and went; and when the bridal party drove away to the parsonage he disappeared. This happened eight days before the discovery of his dead body on the sands; and it could not be discovered by the coroner that he had been seen more than twice since that morning. Once, three days after, and just at night-fall, a laborer who had been working all day in the parsonage garden, and who knew Mr. Levin quite well, saw him walk slowly and furtively in the twilight, in front of the gate, pause an instant, and look in; and then, when the man addressed him with "good-evening, sir," he started and walked rapidly away, without reply. And half an hour before dark, on the evening before the discovery of the body, some boys to whom the deceased was also well known, and who were driving home their cows along the river-road, saw him loitering along the bank half a mile below the cliff. They said that he took no notice of them, and that he was only occupied with breaking a stick into small pieces and throwing them one by one over the bank as he walked very slowly up the river. And this was all that the coroner could discover.

More to give complete satisfaction to their minds than in the expectation of discovering anything additional in the case, the jury requested that the examination of Mr. and Mrs. Roesselle might be taken. It was fortunately very brief; fortunately, for the circumstances of the case naturally made allusions to it extremely painful to them. But they knew absolutely nothing that could shed any further light upon the motives or the mental condition of the miserable youth. Mr. Roesselle had not seen him since the wedding, and was as surprised to find that he had continued in the neighborhood, as he was horrified to learn of his tragic end. Mrs. Roesselle had met him once in the street at Tarrytown, two days before, when he passed her, looked fixedly into her face, and walked quickly on, without remark. He appeared very much agitated, and she could not help observing a wildness in his eyes, and a general strangeness of his manner, which she had never seen before. She had forbore to say anything to her husband about it, as the subject was an unpleasant one. This was the last she had seen of Mr.

Levin. He had never been to the parsonage; he had never troubled her in any way; and the news of his death was shocking in its suddenness to her. When they laid the miniature before her, and told her where they had found it, she was affected to tears.

"Poor boy—poor, crazy boy!" she said. "I have done him no intentional wrong; I thought he might see that he would be far happier without me than with me; and I am distressed by his death beyond measure. His poor mother—how I pity her! May I keep this, Alvin?" And she held up the miniature to her husband, who gravely bowed.

In view of these facts, the coroner's jury returned their inquisition that the deceased, Horace Levin, had come to his death by his own intentional act, without the aid, furtherance, or act of any other person or persons whomsoever, by jumping from the bank known as the Tory's Leap, on the Hudson River, to the shore below, on the night of the 17th or the morning of the 18th of April, 1830; by means whereof his neck was fractured, and himself instantly killed. The verdict went upon record, and stands to-day as the official evidence of the cause of Levin's death.

The body was taken to Tarrytown, laid out, shrouded, and coffined; and then, by reason of the absence of the minister from the village, it was conveyed to Mr. Roesselle's parsonage, whither the bereaved mother shortly came from Albany. The same church which had witnessed the union of the clergyman and Helen Westcott was filled again to hear the service for the dead read over the corpse of him who had stood gloomily in the porch at the wedding; and where there were then smiles of joy there were now tears and faces of sympathetic grief. The tones of Mr. Roesselle's voice faltered as he read the service, and more than once he seemed almost overpowered with emotion. The body was taken by the stricken mother to her own home, for burial; and then, as time passed on, the remembrance of Horace Levin, his unhappy love, and his dreadful fate, became a thing of the past, and grew faint, with other things of the past, to the inhabitants of the neighborhood.

But fate, or circumstance, call it what you will, works silently and mysteriously while men sleep and months pass; and when Horace Levin met his death at the Tory's Leap, on the night of the 17th or the morning of the 18th of April, 1830, a train of events was started, which, radiating to diverse lives and leading through different homes, wrought powerfully for good and ill to those whom this narrative concerns.

PART FIRST.—I.

THE GATHERING OF A STORM.

ABOUT midway between Tarrytown and the city, on the direct road, there stood at this time one of the most charming of all the charming cottages that overlook the Hudson. It was built on a gentle rise of ground, ten rods back from the highway; the spacious grounds in front were left in a grassy lawn which was closely shaven in the summer time, and which was overshadowed by four lofty elms, around which were rustic seats. From the back and side windows of the cottage the view embraced a long stretch of the river and its scenery, with passing vessels. The front was covered with a veranda; the spot was always shady in the fierce summer heats, and so high that it caught many of those aggravating breezes which we can see rustling the treetops while not a breath of air stirs below. If quiet amid natural beauty were the wish of the passer's heart, he must often have wished for such a situation as this, as he passed along the dusty road.

There were many visitors at this place in those days; all gentlemen. Those who were familiar with the appearance of the house inside knew that it was plainly but tastily furnished; that while there were no evidences of wealth in or about it, the books, and pictures, and musical instruments showed that it was the home of at least one cultured mind. And those who had the entree of the cottage knew that its mistress was Miss Augusta Traynor, and that she and her domestic were its only occupants.

And there were many, very many, of that neighborhood, who did not know Miss Trayton personally but who knew well what she was and what she had been. There were many who had never seen her, and who knew nothing of her fascinations except by hearsay, who could have told you that Miss Traynor was an orphan, and had lived at the cottage two years; that her father had been one of the most prosperous of the merchant-princes of the city, and that Augusta had been among the foremost of its acknowledged belles, with suitors by the score; that the death of Mrs. Traynor by the upsetting of a pleasure-yacht in the bay, was followed by the bankruptcy of Mr. Traynor, and that little more was saved from the wreck of his princely fortune than sufficient to purchase this cottage and to furnish it in a humble style; and that the ruined merchant had died of a broken heart very shortly after their removal hither. And it was said that the change in Augusta Traynor's circumstances had by no means deprived her of her lovers, but that no lady in the vicinity had half as many as she.

There was truth in this, and a single day's watch at the cottage would have verified it. There were many in the city who had admired this girl in the days of her bellehood, and had looked upon her as a prize to be won, who now, though they knew her to be shorn of fortune, could not entirely withdraw themselves from her influence, and who therefore came up often from the city to look upon her face and listen to her music, and enjoy the charm of her conversation. A less beautiful woman than she, trained in the society that she had known, and surrounded by her peculiar class of admirers, might have lost them all with the loss of wealth; but men everywhere, all over the world, will pay willing court to the highest types of beauty, and even mercenary fortune-hunters will look admiringly at beauty that is not gilded with wealth, and regret that it is not gilded, before they pass on to worship at other shrines. And thus it was with Augusta Traynor. Chafing under the restraints of her reverses, remembering with sighs of discontent her former triumphs in the parlors of wealth and luxury in the metropolis, she found herself, at the age of thirty, beautiful, because her mirror told her so, ambitious of a grand and advantageous match, because she felt the promptings of the desire in every breath she drew, still sought after, still flattered, and still unmarried. And these are hard circumstances with which to surround any woman. They are apt to be fatal to honesty of purpose; they are more apt to be fatal to the dictates of true love. The sequel proved this true of her.

She stood one afternoon of that summer upon the veranda in front of the house, listening to the farewells of two young gentlemen from the city whom she had been entertaining since morning. She had known them both in the days of her father's affluence; they had often contended for the honor of her hand in the dance, and she knew that in those other days she might have brought either of them to her feet with the offer of his hand, with but a look. Upon this day they had chatted of theatres and operas, of parties and weddings, and had blown back and forth with her the frothy small-talk of extra-fashionable life; and she had likewise chatted lightly, and smiled emptily, and played for them the trifles of music that they liked. They had far exceeded the time allotted to this call, they said, as the clock chimed three, and they rose to go. But that was not wonderful, one of them added, for who ever did get away from Miss Traynor's presence without a large sacrifice of time? Yes, and a larger sacrifice of heart, the other added; and then both of the exquisites laughed, and bowed, and simpered, and Augusta held the check tighter on her face, and kept down the look of weary disgust that strove to occupy it; and she smiled too, as people sometimes smile at the stake. And then her visitors hoped to be permitted to call again, and really longed to see her in the city again, and thought that if they ever prayed, they would pray that New York might not languish much longer without Miss Traynor; and then they just touched the tips of her fingers with those of their scented kids, and bowed four or five times more; and then, having consumed eight minutes by the clock in making their adieux, they were gone.

"By Jove, what a fine girl!" one of them exclaimed, when just out of earshot down the walk.

"I don't know of anything like her in the city, Ned," was the response.

"But she's poor."

"I suppose."

"And is all out of the set."

"Of course."

"So she wont do for either of us."

"Certainly not."

And with this conclusion the two disappeared from sight. The reader will not regret to know that the needs of our narrative will not require their further appearance.

Their remarks were made beyond the hearing of Augusta Traynor; but had she heard every word she could not have read these young men more thoroughly, nor known what was passing in their minds more perfectly than she did. She stood erect upon the veranda some moments after she had lost sight of them, her queenly head thrown back, her dark eyes kindling, and her thin, sensitive nostril quivering with the strength of her feelings. The cloud grew darker upon her face; it seemed to borrow a shadow from her raven hair; and presently her thoughts broke out in an impatient stamp of the foot, and bitter words that escaped her as she walked up and down the piazzas.

"Fools! fools!" were the first ungentle words. "How much longer am I to sit here and play my lady to these impudent coxcombs, who, because they have known me in better days, when my favor was a prize, dare to come here to see with their own eyes how well I can bear adversity. What am I to them but a recollection?—what do they care now for me, more than to make me the subject of an idle hour's curiosity? Nothing. With fortune, I was something in their eyes—I was more than all other women; without it, I am become as nothing but an ornament. I am weary, I am sick and tired of such trifling; I will not see them again, or any like them. They shall know that I know why they come here; and they will then begin to save themselves the trouble of coming."

She paused in her walk, and leaned her hand against the pillar of the veranda.

"Yet how are they worse than I?" she queried of herself. "To them, marriage is only the ladder by which they climb to wealth that brings them independence of toil, which confirms them in a life of idle luxury, and which raises them to a higher social plane than they can ever reach alone. Is this not much the same with me? Are not my days and nights given to scheming and planning how I may regain what I have lost? And do I not know that if it is to be done, it can only be by an advantageous marriage?"

Augusta Traynor started at the sound of the last question, as if fancy many of us would be startled could we hear our unspoken thoughts put into speech, and looked hurriedly around her to see that no person had overheard her confession. She sat down upon a seat on the veranda, and putting her hand to her forehead occupied herself seriously with the endeavor to settle decisively in her own mind whether what she had just declared in a question was to be the rule of her actions. Was love to bow to ambition? Was her heart, and its best impulses, to yield to an inordinate craving for the mastery of wealth, for the pride of station, and the brilliancy of a life such as she had lived? She sat with her eyes covered, and thought and wrestled over these questions, until the clock striking four aroused her. Then she started up and looked up the road. There was a glimpse of it to be seen, more than a mile away, between the elms; and her practised eye discovered a alight rising of dust, even at that distance.

"I told him to come to-day for his answer," she said, gazing fixedly at the dusty spot till it disappeared behind the trees. "Five o'clock was the hour I named. He was always too early; he will be here in a few minutes. I promised him a final answer; nay, I gave him reason to hope that it would be such as he desired. What shall I do—my God, what shall I do?"

She was much moved; both hands were over her face, and she swayed herself back and forth in a convulsion of emotion. When she uncovered her face it was rigid and harsh in the darkness of its beauty, and her brow was ruffled by the scowl that came with her contending thoughts.

Her eye fell upon her music-book, which lay at her feet. She took it up, and opening it, drew from between its leaves a square of bristol-board, on which her own cunning fingers had drawn the face of him she loved. It is more than she had ever uttered aloud, but she had confessed the truth to her heart more than once; and now, as her eyes rested on the picture, she again confessed to herself what she would not put into words—"That is the man I love!"

The face was one that many women would have loved. The hand that drew it was wonderfully skilled in the use of the pencil, and it had disposed the light and shade on hair and brow, in the eyes, and over all the face, and brought forth from the paper a picture which only a good artist could make, and therefore a perfect resemblance. There was no color about it; but you knew as well without it as with it that the hair that waved carelessly about the round, full face was brown, that the eyes which sparkled with something of defiance, if not wickedness, were blue, and that the face must be ruddy and fair. It was a handsome face, but not a good face. You felt in looking at it that the strong will which it showed must be kept in constant exertion to repress the evil tendencies that it suggested; that it was a face in which more could be feared than hoped. Augusta Traynor held up the picture before her eyes and gazed long and earnestly at it. The harshness disappeared from her brow, her eyes grew soft and luminous, her lip trembled, and all the gentler part of the woman came to the surface. In one moment she thought of the proud, impulsive, headstrong man whose visits to the cottage she had encouraged; of the manly, eager way, in which he had entreated her love; and of her promise, given two days before, that she would answer him once for all at this hour.

"And may I hope for such an answer as I wish?" he had asked. Never had she heard his voice quiver before; it did quiver with those words. And she had smiled in answer, and sent him away strong-hearted, resolved to give up the baser part of life, to live purely and restrain his passions, that he might deserve her love and make her happy.

And did she not love him? The picture was its own sufficient answer. She had drawn every stroke of it from memory, in his absence; and memory never could have so faithfully prompted her hand if the prompting of love had not also been there. Without love, such a performance must have been a miracle; with love, it became possible.

She sat there some moments longer, fighting out with herself the world-old battle in that female heart between ambition and love; and though the struggle was fierce and strong, it ended as such struggles always end in natures such as hers. One tear dropped upon the picture—a precious tear indeed, for it marked the instant when selfishness triumphed forever over love in this woman's heart; and then her face grew proud and stern again. Deliberately she tore the face in two and concealed the pieces in the music-book; and from that instant her decision was fully taken.

"How could I hesitate one moment?" she reflected, impatiently tapping her foot against the trellis. "He has nothing that I want, but love; and that is the least a woman wants! Pshaw—let me forget as fast as may be that I was ever weak enough to think of him. My game goes higher than he, poor fellow, can rise; and I'll bring it to my feet quickly enough."

She had not noticed that during the last few moments of her intense preoccupation of thought a horseman had dismounted at the gate, secured his horse, and walked with eager steps up to the veranda. She did not see him, and she was unconscious of his presence, until he pronounced her name.

"Augusta!"

She started and raised her head; the suddenness of his appearance discomfited her, and the blood flowed all at once into her face. He interpreted the sign as his heart wished, and his arm was quickly thrown about her.

"Augusta—my own dear Augusta!" he exclaimed, and stooped to kiss her. His breath was hot upon her cheek before she could disengage herself from his arm; and then she started back, and her eyes flashed angrily upon him.

"Don't touch me," she said. "You are crazy. Mr. Maverick—"

"I begin to be afraid I am," he interrupted. "How have I offended you, how have I misunderstood you, Augusta?" He stopped; she was looking him full in the face. It was the face of the picture.

"You came for an answer," she said, with chilling reserve.

"Yes; and I thought from your looks—" he eagerly interrupted; but she stopped him.

"You would do well always to wait for a lady's answer," she said. "Here is mine; I cannot be your wife."

Darkness swept into the florid face of the man as into the summer sky at an eclipse.

"You cannot?" he repeated. She bowed. He ground his boot upon the edge of the step, and then broke out furiously:

"By Heaven, Augusta Traynor, I don't understand it. You have received my visits with favor; you have shewed your preference for me in a dozen ways; you would not tell me 'no' when I asked you two days ago to wed me, but you put me off till now, smiling encouragement on me all the time. Augusta, stop a minute and think. You know me well; you know that such a passion as I have for you can't enter into a man's very life, as it has into mine, and then be uprooted all at once, as you want me to tear this out, without taking away all the good part of that life with it. Now think, woman—think, THINK, I say, before you destroy me!" She quailed before the fury of his aspect, and he made a strong effort, and moderated his tone. "Have you not loved me?"

"Perhaps I have," she replied. Her face was pale; her fingers pulled a rose to pieces; but her voice was steady.

"You may have heard bad reports of me. I have not been a good man—I mean to be, God and Augusta Traynor permitting! If that is the cause—"

"That is not the cause," she interrupted. "I have not been influenced in this way against you."

"Then tell me why you have decided to make me wretched. Tell me why." He sat down in the seat she had vacated, and looked at her with desperate curiosity.

"Let me ask you to end this scene, Mr.

Maverick." She spoke in a light, easy tone; and as she proceeded she fell into a strain of banter. "If I did love you a little—what then? Must a woman marry a man, and every man, whom she loves a little? Mercy on me, what a world we should have then!"

She laughed merrily; a forced laugh, which caused Maverick to grind his teeth with rage.

"No, Mr. Maverick," she went on, "let us put an end to this, and never speak of it again. As I was foolish enough to confess, I have loved you a little; but I have never thought of marrying you. What, will nothing satisfy you? Well, then, if you must know the truth, I have promised my hand to another."

Augustus Maverick could not know that this was untrue, and that she spoke of an intention rather than of an accomplished fact. He clutched the arms of the chair in which he sat, and spoke one hoarse whisper.

"His name?"

She hesitated; and then, looking toward the road started and grew paler. Another horseman had ridden up to the gate, had dismounted, and was traversing the walk with rapid steps.

"It may be as well," she reflected. "If I tell you," she said, aloud, "will you promise to do him no injury, and not to forget that you are in the presence of a lady?"

"Yes," Maverick jerked out.

"He is behind you now."

Maverick faced about, and found himself confronted by a man of his own height, and of similar features, but with darker hair and complexion. The recognition was instant and mutual.

"Oliver?"

"Augustus?"

They were brothers.

The new-comer stood still, regarding the scene with a cold eye, and exhibiting not the least agitation, hardly any surprise, in his hard face. He was apparently the elder of the two by at least ten years. Whatever he may have thought of the presence of his brother here, the feeling was not shown upon his self-contained face, nor expressed in words.

Augusta Traynor was quick of wit; but she was not equal to this emergency. She smiled and banished the tremor from her lips; but she could not upon the instant think how a collision between these two was to be avoided. What accident or freak could have brought Oliver Maverick here at this hour she could not conjecture; it was not according to her understanding with him, and was at best a frightful contretemps. She looked at Augustus; he uttered a low cry, and pressing his hand to his head, staggered back against the lattice. Then he removed his hand, and his eyes seemed to burn and glitter with fury as he looked from one to the other.

"You will remember your promise?" Augusta entreated.

"Yes, yes—I will remember my promise," he bitterly cried. "I was not to injure the man whom you meant to marry; and he is my brother. He knew where my heart lay—none knew it better than he; and he was base enough to supplant me. Well, well—I will not injure him; I will not shoot him, nor cut his throat—but this I will do—I will make him an outcast from his home, and a penniless beggar on the earth! And I will not injure you, Augusta, although you have this day treacherously given me over to the baser part of myself; but I warn you that if you marry this man, his fate shall also be yours. Fools, fools both of you—how clearly do I see through the arguments that he has been base enough to use, and you treacherous enough to accept, for my undoing. Did he tell you he is the old man's favorite, that all Maverick Farm, and all the stocks and mortgages are to be his, and that he will make you richer than you used to be? Ah, you turn red, Miss Traynor; my easy guess was the true one. Yet I tell you both,"—and the speaker raised his hand above his head, and spoke with a terrible earnestness,—"that though I injure you not in body, though I leave you free to enter into this marriage which rests in treachery, in falsehood, in deceit, and in the selling of the soul of at least one of you for the promise of gold—the price shall never be paid! Marry, if you dare, I'll be faithful to my word."

He looked at Augusta; she trembled, spite of herself, before his passionate earnestness, and cast down her eyes. So beautiful she looked as she stood there, that the fiery heart of the man was almost touched again; and then he struck his face with his flat hand, and recovered his mood. Without another word he stepped past his brother, and seizing Augusta Traynor in his arms kissed her, once, twice, thrice, upon the lips. The action was so sudden and so unexpected that she neither cried out nor struggled; and when she found herself released, Augustus Maverick was striding towards the gate, half way down the walk. The two never spoke together again.

Before Oliver Maverick and Augusta Traynor had parted that day, their marriage engagement was consummated. And some weeks afterwards they were married.

There are with some men turning-points of life, when an act done or left undone, or a point lost or won in life's great game influences them forever. It was so with Augustus Maverick. He came upon this day with his heart full of peace and love, to plight his vows to Augusta Traynor, and in receiving her love to enter upon a better life. One word from her would have reclaimed him—nay, one look would have done it. He found himself, instead, proud, hot-blooded man as he was, the victim of a heartless sacrifice, a deliberate deceit, a soulless bargain; and the good aspirations that were rising within him were utterly and forever cast down. And as he mounted his horse and galloped up the road, his tumultuous brain was busy with plans of dreadful import to some of those—it may be to all—who have become and are yet to be actors in this drama of real life.

II.

His love for Augusta Traynor had stopped this man short when he stood upon the threshold of an enormous sin. The treatment which he had just received at her hands, while stifling his good impulses, brought into renewed life the bad; and as he urged his horse into a harder gallop his mind ran riot over designs and projects which had been for months lain aside. One, in particular, rose uppermost; and wherever his thoughts wandered, they continually returned to it. But he did not yield to it at once; he resisted the thought at first, and tried to turn it off; and then, as it pressed more clamorously on him, he succeeded. He stopped his horse by the side of the road, and dismounting, seated himself upon a large stone, while he held the rein.

"Let it be so, then," he moodily muttered. "I would have had it otherwise; but I can't help it. It's an ugly thing to do, and I've been putting it away from me, hoping that I never should have heart for it. If I have the heart for it now, I say it's not my fault. Let the blame be with those who have driven me to the bad."

Conscience was fierce within him, and as he sat there he repeatedly muttered the words, "I don't care; let it be so; the fault will not be mine; let them bear it who deserve it;" as if to fortify himself in his purpose, and to drown all consciousness of wrong within him. The sun had not yet set, though the long summer day was drawing to a close; and as he sat and held the rein, while his horse cropped the grass by the roadside, he looked down the highway over which he had passed, and saw a moving speck descending the hill half a mile back. He knew at once that it was a horse and rider; and though he was not in the mood for company, and would not have endured the companionship of most of the men whom he knew, he waited and looked, rather idly than from any sense of curiosity. The black speck advanced slowly; the horse was evidently coming on a walk or a very deliberate trot. The sun shining from the west had thrown the shadow of the hill over the moving speck, so that it had been indistinct; but the instant it came out into the broad sunlight it was outlined sharply against the hill, and Maverick, as he looked, suddenly jumped to his feet and uttered an exclamation. He was an expert horseman and an enthusiastic lover of the horse; an animal once seen by him was always remembered in its gait and movements, as well as in its form; and he at once recognized the advancing horse as one that he had often seen. That horse never had but one rider, he well knew; and as he leaned upon his own saddle and eagerly looked up the road, his new emotion found vent in words.

"Has the devil thrown that man in my way at this moment?—he, of all other men on earth—lest I should slacken my purpose?"

He paused abruptly, and looked still more eagerly. Horse and rider advanced on a jogging trot, for the animal was old and decrepit; and in a few moments more were within a few rods of the spot where Maverick stood.

"The man himself!" was his whispered soliloquy. "Fate wills it; I only follow. But by Heaven, how I should astonish him!"

He was in the saddle again with the quickness of an expert rider, and held his mettled animal in check by the roadside. The newcomers advanced, and were soon almost abreast of him. The rider was dressed in a suit of black throughout, except the straw hat upon his head, and he sat loosely upon the saddle with his arms down and his head fallen upon his breast in a reverie. He might have passed Maverick unobserved had not the latter saluted him in a loud voice.

"Good-morning, parson. Which way?"

The rider suddenly raised his head, and exhibited the face of Alvin Roesselle, the clergyman. It was a pale, sallow and rather sad face, with high cheek bones and strongly marked features. He looked like a born student, with his great expanse of forehead, and his sunken, brilliant eyes; but there was, too, beneath his habitual gravity, almost sadness of face, an expression of sweetness which came forth at call. He was startled now at the suddenness of the salutation, breaking in upon his thoughts; and as he looked up and saw by whom he was addressed, he was somewhat puzzled that he should have been addressed at all. About the man before him, he knew nothing more than that he was the second son of old Ezra Maverick, of Maverick Farm, and reputed the hardest drinker, the roughest rider, the most dissolute young man for many miles around. Personally he knew nothing of him; he had never spoken with him; and he remembered that when he called at Maverick House some weeks before, the old man was sick and declined to see him, and that both the sons were away from home. In the parish church there was a great square pew which was the hereditary property of the Mavericks, and he had heard from some of the oldest parishioners that many years before, when Ezra Maverick was young and just married, he had occupied the great pew regularly with his wife, at seasons of worship. It was a practice that had long been discontinued; not once since the death of his wife had Ezra Maverick sat there, and no one had ever seen either of the sons within the walls of the sanctuary. It was therefore with some natural embarrassment that Mr. Roesselle returned the salute.

"Mr. Augustus Maverick, I believe," he said.

The other nodded and wheeled his horse into the road.

"I have waited for you," he said, abruptly. "Not that I expected you," he made haste to add, "but—I saw you coming, and waited."

"I have been over to visit old Norah Adney," said the clergyman. "The poor soul is dying with consumption, and I try to see her at least twice a week."

And then there was a pause of some minutes, while they rode along side by side, Maverick constantly curbing his horse to the pace of the slower one beside him. For twenty minutes the conversation never went beyond commonplaces about the weather and the news; and then it ceased entirely, and a dead silence prevailed between the two. There was no bond of sympathy between them, and the manner of Maverick was rather repellent than otherwise. This, coupled with the bad character that rumor ascribed to him, constrained the clergyman to silence, when with almost any other stranger his graceful and easy address and conversation would have been charming. He glanced furtively at his companion as they rode on, and Maverick looked over his horse's head, straight up the road. Once, however, he turned his face and looked at the other, and that was when they had approached very near to the spot known as the Tory's Leap. The clergyman had discovered the locality, and a peculiar smile crossed Maverick's face as he observed the shudder that crossed that of his companion.

"A spot of much interest," Maverick said, suddenly checking his horse directly opposite the bank. As he pronounced the words he never removed his eyes from his companion's face, and he saw that sickly shudder cross it again.

"A most horrible place," was the low response.

"Yes, to be sure; in one sense, I suppose that is so," the other rejoined, in a loud voice. "But it is an interesting spot, too. I'll warrant you now, parson, you never went to the edge of the bank and looked over there where that poor devil of a Levin made an end of himself last April. Have you?"

"Never, never—and I shall never wish to. The associations of the place are too awful to allow me to think seriously of such a thing. Let us go on."

Maverick turned his head away, that his companion might not see the exulting smile that ran over it.

"A hard fate—wasn't it, parson?" he asked, never moving to go on.

"Yes, yes—hard enough. But I must ride on."

"Did you know that unhappy young man?" was the next question. The speaker still held his rein tight, and looked full at the face of the clergyman.

"No. I do not think I ever spoke to him. But really, Mr. Maverick, I cannot stay—"

"It would only take a single minute, parson, for you to dismount and look over the edge of the cliff. I will hold your horse."

"God forbid!" The exclamation was uttered with a very marked agitation of voice and a trembling of hands and face, not a tone nor a motion of which escaped the watchful Maverick.

"Excuse me, sir," the clergyman continued. "This melancholy subject seems to have a strange fascination for you; I frankly confess that it is too unpleasant to me to bear more than a passing reference. You may understand why this should be so; but if you heard none of the gossip which connected the name of Horace Levin with that of Helen Westcott before my marriage—I say if you have heard none of this, then you cannot understand why this subject is extremely painful to me. I must decline to converse any further about it; and as we are near the corner where you will turn off to reach Maverick House, I will bid you good-evening now. I do not wish to be ungracious, sir; I shall be happy to call upon you soon, and renew your acquaintance under more favorable auspices. Good-evening, sir?"

He chirruped to his horse, and the animal, which had been standing as though fastened into the road during this colloquy, resumed his jog-trot. Maverick gave his own horse the rein, and two bounds brought him beside the other. A shadow crept over the clergyman's face; then a faint spot of red shewed upon his cheek, and he looked at his tormentor with impatient inquiry. They had now reached the corner of which Mr. Roselle had just spoken; but Maverick made no motion to turn off. He kept his eyes fixed upon the clergyman's face, coolly, deliberately, evidently with a purpose.

"I suppose I have heard all the gossip you refer to," he said. "I suppose there is no doubt that the lady whom you married, and Horace Levin, were once engaged—or something very near to it. What of it? I fail to see why that circumstance should make you so averse to the mere mention of the place where poor Levin met his end."

The minister's pale face was in an instant flooded with a rash of indignant blood. His hands trembled with excitement so that they could hardly hold the reins; he strove to speak out an indignant protest against this continual impertinence, but he was tongue-tied with the force of his emotions. They rode past the turning, but Maverick still kept his horse by the side of the other.

"Well, parson," he said, with cool bluntness, "no matter now. We'll dismiss the subject, for the present, at least. You spoke about calling on me at some time not far distant; but the fact is, I have some business that is pressing, and I can't wait for your call. I'll go home with you to-night, if you please."

The clergyman looked uneasily at the speaker.

"I pray you defer your call till to-morrow," he said. "I am weary, and somewhat nervous. I am hardly fit to converse at all."

"I must see you to-night," was the peremptory reply. "My business is brief, and must be done now."

"Then speak it here," was the last desperate appeal of the clergyman, shrinking from the proposition as he shrank from the man. "Excuse me, sir, but I would rather choose the time when you are to come to my humble parsonage. Tell me now and here how I can serve you."

The answer was quick and stern, and admitted of no denial.

"You see it is getting toward evening, parson, and any of these obscure places along this road which we are passing may hold an eavesdropper. What I have to say to you must be said in secret; what you have to promise me must be promised in secret."

They rode on in silence, and soon the gathering twilight hid their faces. Tormented by the strange persistency of Maverick in forcing this disagreeable subject upon him, and believing from his sinister appearance and address that his forced visit boded no good to him, the clergyman rode on, glad at last that he had an opportunity in the obscurity of the hour to compose himself for the coming interview. After riding some distance further, they turned down a lane which led to the parsonage. Daylight had gone when they reached it, so that they could not see the steep roof of Maverick House above the trees, a mile and a half away across the fields.

They dismounted, and Maverick tied his horse.

"Go and put your animal up," he said, to the other; "I will wait here for you."

The clergyman returned in a few minutes, and found Maverick sitting on the steps, but in the shade of the pillars, so that the lamplight from the house could not reach him.

"Take me directly to your study," he said. "Acquaint no one with my presence here."

His tone was that of command. Mr. Roesselle silently led the way through the hall, and was about to open the second door on the left, when the door opposite was flung open, and the apparition of a lovely young creature in a white muslin dress burst out of the sitting-room upon them. Her arms were about her husband's neck in an instant.

"Why, you naughty Alvin!" she exclaimed. "You are trying to get into the house without letting me know you are here. But my ears are too quick, sir; I heard you, and I—"

The strange expression of the face into which she was looking told her as plainly as words could have spoken it that there was another present; she turned her head and saw Augustus Maverick looking at her. She dropped her arms and retired a few steps, and her husband said:

"This gentleman has a little business with me in the study, Helen, dear. But I will be with you in a few moments."

She hid her confusion by an immediate escape into the dining-room, and the two men passed into the study. It was a small room, filled with Mr. Roesselle's books and desk, and on a small table a lamp was burning faintly. The clergyman raised the wick enough to make a bright light, and handing his visitor one of the two armchairs, sat down in the other. Without a word he leaned his face on his hand, and looked inquiringly at Maverick. The latter seemed in no hurry to be seated. He stood by the chair, his fingers drumming on the back, and carelessly said:

"Mrs. Roesselle is a charming woman."

There was no answer; the clergyman was looking at him to ascertain what the remark might mean.

"You have been married about three months, I believe," was spoken, in the same careless tone.

"More, But, Mr. Maverick, I beg to remind you that you are here against my expressed wish, on your own invitation, for the purpose of transacting some business with me. Is it too much to ask that you will confine yourself to that business?"

Maverick stepped to the door without a word, opened it, and looked into the hall. Then he closed it, turned the key, and took his seat in the chair directly in front of the clergyman, and so near that their knees touched.

"I merely wish to ensure secrecy," he said. The other did not speak—it may be that he could not command his voice—but motioned him to continue.

"I must tell you candidly, parson, in the beginning, that what I have to say relates entirely, in the first instance, to the death of Horace Levin."

Mr. Roesselle almost sprang from his chair; the blood rushed angrily into his face again, and he had commenced to utter a protest, when Maverick with a strong hand on either shoulder forced him back into the chair, and continued to talk, so rapidly that the other could not interrupt him.

"You need not say a word, sir; not a word. I know all you would say. The subject is unpleasant to you, I am aware; but I cannot help that. You must hear me; if a stronger word is necessary, then I will say, you shall hear me. Parson Roesselle, you know that the verdict of the coroner's jury declared that Horace Levin came to his death by his own act. Do you know of any person who dissents from their conclusions, and doubts the correctness of that inquest? You need not answer; I see by your face, that you would tell me that you are surprised that I should suggest any such doubt. Ah sir, let me tell you further, not only do I suggest the doubt, but I have ever believed, and do now believe, that Horace Levin did not die the death of a suicide."

The clergyman started again, and exclaimed, "How could it be otherwise? How—"

"Look at the circumstances," Maverick continued, again forcing him to sit down. "A man is found dead at the foot of a tall cliff, and we will allow that he must have fallen from the top of it, since the marks on his body seem to show it, and since he was seen in the vicinity of the bank above but a few hours previous. He had been disappointed in love—excuse the mention of the well-known fact, sir, but it is necessary; and that, say the jury and the people, is cause enough for the act. Bah, bah!—we all know better. Such things don't happen in America, except in story-books. You are much such a man as was your dead rival, Mr. Roesselle; now would you have killed yourself had you been the disappointed one? Assuredly not; you would laugh at the idea now, if you were not so very sober. But they say that his watch and the picture of his former sweetheart were found carefully put away, and of course by his own hand, at the place of his death, and therefore it must have been a premeditated self-murder. Pish, pish!—that is worse reasoning still. As though a man on the very brink of eternity should think of trinkets or love-tokens! Don't you see the absurdity of the thing? Now, Mr. Parson, I can easily imagine a way in which this youth may have come to his end. He would not take off the keepsakes that he prized if he was about to kill himself; but I have known young fellows to do just that before a personal conflict. Upon my soul, sir, I believe that there is at least one man alive who can tell the truth about Levin's death; because I think he died in a struggle on the top of that bank. Why could not the fools who examined the spot see that there were footmarks stamped into the ground by two pair of boots? Why could they not see that some of the heel-marks showed the print of nail-heads all around the heel, and others had no such marks? I looked for myself, and I found so much with no trouble at all."

The speaker purposely paused, to observe closely the effect that his words produced upon the clergyman. The latter sat nervously working his fingers on the arms of his chair, profoundly agitated, and striving to interrupt the flow of the other's talk. As soon as an opportunity was given him, he exclaimed:

"You talk of this subject in defiance of me; I have told you that it is deeply painful, I have begged you to desist; you will not. If, then, I am compelled to hear what you will say, for the sake of my feelings, already pained almost beyond endurance—for my sake, sir, be brief and rapid."

"I want to know what you think of my reasoning—of my conclusion?" Maverick bluntly said.

"I do not wish to converse at all on this topic," was the instant reply. "But if you will have my opinion, I merely say that both your reasoning and your conclusion are absurd, for reasons that I need not state."

"And you think the inquest was right?"

"I think it folly to doubt it. But I am not interested in your groundless suspicions, and I am not the proper person to receive them. I am a minister of the gospel, not an officer of the law."

"Perhaps I may go to a magistrate at Tarrytown with my suspicions," returned Maverick, in a slow and measured tone. "Whether I do or not depends very much on you, Mr. Roesselle."

"Upon me?"

"Upon you. For look you, sir—although you may still pretend that the relation which the lady whom you married once maintained with the man of whom we speak does not and should not interest you to discover all that can be known about the death of that man—I think otherwise, and I am bound to tell you all I know of that affair. A moment since you heard me say that I believed there was at least one man alive who could tell all about Horace Levin's death; but I can say more than that. I can say with truth, I do say, that there are two men alive who know all about it. And I am one of the two."

"What do you mean?" Roesselle faintly asked.

"I will tell you; and after I have told you, I want you to tell me whether I had better go to Tarrytown and lay my information before the authorities. You see, sir, I insist that you ought to feel an interest in this strange affair, and I insist that the relation in which your wife once stood with this man who is dead, gives me the right to demand your advice. And are not you the clergyman who read the burial service over the corpse? What could be more proper than that you should advise me in this juncture?"

A nervous, impatient motion of the minister's hand told Maverick to go on. He continued, speaking slowly and in a low tone:

"The inquest declared that Levin came to his death on the night of the 17th, or the morning of the 18th of April, 1890. It was, in fact, on the night of the 17th, about nine o'clock. I know the time, because I was there, and saw the deed! It was a clear moonlight night, and I had been—no matter where I had been;" and the speaker bit his lip as he remembered that it was the night of his first visit to Augusta Traynor's cottage. "I was riding up the road, when my attention was attracted to a saddle-horse that was tied among some bushes between the road and the bank, and I rode over to see what it meant. I reached the bushes, and thought no more of the horse, for, as I sat in my saddle I looked over their tops, and I saw a scene of which I was the only witness. Two men stood face to face a few feet apart, very near the brow of the cliff, and not more than two rods from me. The light of the moon was strong, and I at once recognized the one farthest from me as Horace Levin. The nearer of the two I did not know immediately; but within the next minute I saw his face and heard his voice, and then I knew him. I sat silently, and neither of them saw me, or had any intimation of my presence.

As I looked, I saw Levin take off his watch and chain and hang them on a bramble, and lay something beside it which he took from his pocket. Then he came toward the other, and shook his fist menacingly in his face. 'I believe you've lied about me,' he said, almost choked with anger. 'Nothing but lies would have done that business.' 'I have not lied about you,' the other replied. 'You have—you have—and you lie when you deny it!' raged Levin. 'You will be ashamed of this, some day,' the other calmly rejoined. 'I'll make you ashamed of your conduct now,' was the next; and Levin shook his fist directly in the other's face. 'There's bad blood between us; I'll fight you now,' Levin cried. 'I have no bad blood with you, and I certainly will not fight,' was the reply. 'Ho, ho! A coward as well as a sneak!' the excited man sneered; and with the words he struck the other a violent blow upon the chest. It staggered him back; but when he recovered his breath and his feet, he had lost all control of himself. He rushed upon Levin like a wild beast, seized him with a strength far beyond his appearance, and hurled him to the ground. Horace Levin fell within a foot of the edge of the cliff, and with the force of the shock that had impelled him there not spent, he rolled over! He threw up his hands and caught some shrubs that grew over the edge, but they yielded, and he disappeared down the cliff. His antagonist ran to the edge, knelt down, and looked over; and when I retired, as silent and unperceived as I came, he was in the same position."

The horror of this revelation bristled in every hair, and distorted every lineament of the listener.

"What!" he gasped, "do you mean that Levin—was—was—"

"Murdered? Yes."

"And you saw it?"

"I saw it."

There was a pause. Roesselle seemed about to ask another question, but his tongue refused him utterance. Augustus Maverick continued:

"I saw it, and I recognized the murderer."

He bent forward, and grasping the arm of the clergyman, he lowered his voice to a thrilling whisper, and pronounced the words:

"And you are the man."

A VISION.

BY MRS. ELLEN M. MITCHELL.

I closed the book, whose pages weird
 Had held my senses tranced all day;
 What wonder, then, that strange eyes peered
 From out the twilight's shadows gray?

A phantom host stole through my room,
 The shades of heroes long since dead;
 I shuddered in the gathering gloom,
 And awe-struck marked their noiseless tread.

Dark warriors, with their brows deep lined
 By care, in royal pageants passed;
 Vague pictures of the 'wildered mind
 That, fancy-painted, faded fast.

By glamour bound, the silvery swell
 Of music floated to my ear;
 It stirred my soul, a wizard spell,
 & So sweet rung out its throbbings clear.

Kings clad in purple met my gaze,
 Of whose wild splendor I had read;

Mine eyes were dazzled by the blaze
 Of light their gold and jewels shed.

Ah! whence has come this sudden change?
 What is it meets my startled glance?
 Why should the real world look so strange?
 Who woke me from that dreamy trance?

The gas is lit; the embers burn
 With fierce red heat; I sit alone:
 My thoughts from past to present turn,
 And airy phantoms all have flown.

Was there a more heroic age
 Than that wherein we work and wait?
 O, shall we find that history's page
 Can braver deeds than ours relate?

With pulsing throbs the heart of Time
 Beats high, still full of lusty life;
 The present looms up grand, sublime,
 By glory crowned, with greatness rife.

TWO ARROWS AT ONCE.

BY FRANK H. ANGLIER.

ONE pleasant afternoon in June, Mr. Arthur Mortley, having nothing else in particular to do, sat in his office with his feet on the window-sill and looked out into the Park. The dreamy rustling of the trees below him, casting their cool shadows across the pavement before the window, breathing pleasant tales into his willing ears, of country brooks and sunny meadows far away, brought a sweet languor to his brain, and caused Mr. Mortley at that moment to indulge in dreams.

The June term was over. The courts had closed for the long vacation. Mortley's briefs were all stuck into their respective pigeon-holes until the next October, and now there was nothing in particular to prevent him from going to the country for a summer's holiday and rest. Of course he should go to Hertford. That had been decided a year ago, long before he received Tom Trenholm's letter, begging him, if he entertained any regard for his old chum, to come down and help him catch some of those two pound trout that were getting so "sassy." "Bring all your flies and plenty of brown hackles," wrote Tom, "I'll promise you some sport that is worth coming for." The innocent!—not to know that Hertford held for Mortley something better worth coming for than trout.

If he had not loved her as well as he did, he would have asked her to marry him at once, when he first told her his secret on that golden summer afternoon a year ago. As it was, he had only revealed to her how strong his great love was, and asked her to become his wife some day. Then he was entering an untried profession. He felt that he had no right to invite her to share his fortunes until his position in the great scrub-race of life was more certain and better secured, and it was with no slight satisfaction that his eye, wandering vaguely upward in his reverie, rested now for a moment upon the letters painted across the window-panes, "Blaikie, Fountain & Mortley," and a dream of the future home, radiant with her presence as its mistress, flitted across his mind.

It was not because she was beautiful that Mortley had fallen in love with Eva Trenholm (did I not tell you that her name was Eva?). Neither was it because she was witty, and accomplished, and good, nor yet because she was Tom's sister. "Confound it!" muttered Arthur, whenever he tried to think of it, "I don't know what it is. I couldn't help it. I would die for her, and she knows it." That was the sum and substance of it. As well ask a daisy why it grows, or a rose why it blooms, as to ask of man or woman their reasons for making targets of themselves for the arrows of Love.

I think that if Eva Trenholm had never seen Arthur Mortley, she never would have loved at all. There is a class of women whose natures are so finely strung, their instincts, passions, tastes and affections so delicately poised and balanced, that they can assimilate with nothing that is not their perfect opposite. There is an instinctive shrinking from all that tends to disturb this natural equilibrium—a quick recoil from whatever is harsh to the inner sense. Let him who would win the affections of women such as these, be wary in his approach. They are the electroscopes of the social world. Their fine perceptions will indicate the presence of a disturbing influence as unerringly as gold foil will reveal the existence of electricity, and the vigilant monitors which hold watch and ward over their hearts will close their doors and bolt them fast.

Eva Trenholm was a woman of this kind. She felt within herself that, as she had never loved but once, so, should this love fail her, she never would love again. She had come to Mortley with her trusting, faithful heart in both her hands, and had said, "Take it; it is yours for all time. I have nothing more to give you." And he had accepted the trust as sacred, as a gift he had not deserved, but for which in his daily prayers he thanked God from his inmost soul.

There seemed no good reason apparent to either of these young people, why the present summer should not witness the consummation of their desires. In one short year Mortley had reached the summit of the weary hill which less fortunate men are often a lifetime in climbing, and found himself in the midst of a successful practice. Now he could return to claim his waiting bride without any pangs of conscience or a distrustful feeling that his eagerness had overbalanced his judgment. There was nothing to prevent his marriage. No doubts or fears had ever come between them. No suspicions of the other's constancy had ever crossed the mind of either. He believed in her as thoroughly as she believed in him, which is more than one can often say of engaged people in these days of matrimonial plots and counterplots. Therefore it was with a feeling of calm satisfaction that Arthur Mortley sat thinking of these things on that sultry afternoon, with his feet upon the window-sill and his eyes bent upon the rustling trees in the Park.

A week afterward, he met her at the station at Hertford.

"Behold!" she cried, gayly, holding up her riding-whip as she saw him coming across the platform with his carpet-bag; "I've come down for you on horseback, because I knew you would enjoy that better than riding up to the house in the carriage. We can have a good gallop on the way. James will take your luggage."

"Always a thoughtful puss," he said, vaulting lightly into the saddle which the groom vacated for him, and bending tenderly toward her to imprint a kiss upon her lips. "Which way do we go?"

"Through the woods," she said, touching her horse with her whip; "you have no idea how lovely they are, this summer."

"And what news?" he asked.

"Nothing interesting. All I have to offer you will be croquet and driving. Tom adds fishing. The dear boy has gone crazy about trout, and litters the dining-room carpet all over every morning with his feathers and flies. Then Rose is here. She will be company for you whenever I am busy."

"Rose who?" asked Arthur.

"Why, Rose Burnham. Dear little girl! You don't know how she has grown into my heart already."

"Not my cousin Rose?"

"Yes, certainly. Mother became acquainted with her family at the springs last year, so she invited Rose to spend a month with us this summer as company for me. It will be pleasant for you, won't it?"

"I never saw Rose Burnham in my life."

"All the better. I shan't say any more about her then, until you meet her, but you won't see her to-night, for she has gone to the parsonage to tea with Tom, and it will be late when they come home. I refused an invitation because I expected you. It matters nothing. How grandly these trees throw their shadows across the road?"

Rose Burnham at Hertford! If Eva Trenholm only knew how that name had danced like an ignis fatuus before the mental vision of her lover in years that were gone! Mortley had heard of his cousin here and there, in a hundred different places—heard of her as something bright and pretty, a tender blossom among the seedy stalks that clustered about the old Mortley homestead, but never yet had he placed eyes upon her. So invariably had she eluded him, that he had almost doubted whether her avoidance of him were not intentional. If he visited the old farm, she was ever absent. If he went to Newport in the hope of meeting her (for he did take that amount of trouble on two different occasions), she would be gone with her parents to some other spot. In his younger days, in fact, Mortley had searched high and low for this little female jack-o-lantern, until he began to believe her to have but a mythical existence at best. Then a new star dawned upon his world, and nebulae had no longer an interest for him.

And this new star shone so brightly into his life! How its soft and tender light brightened the dark corners and made glad the waste places! She looked so queenly to him as she rode under the shadows of the wood, her yellow hair falling loosely down upon the dark velvet of her riding-habit, and her frank, blue eyes turned ever and anon toward him with some eager question!

She was not one who would pass as beautiful in the eyes of the world. Eva Trenholm was of a type essentially American. Slender and graceful in figure, soft and pliant in outline, almost fragile in the delicacy of her proportions, the contour of her face and form suggested intellectuality rather than beauty. Her eyes were large and blue—twin orbs which held all truth and ingenuousness swimming in their clear depths. Her mouth was small and delicately outlined—a trembling, sensitive mouth, that was wont to betray the presence of every passing emotion. Her carriage was that of a refined superiority, almost of queenly command. If it was beauty at all, it was an imperial beauty, a beauty fit to be given to the mother of a king. Her hand was white and soft, dimpled upon the knuckles, rose-pink upon the palms, much like the hands of other American girls, but firm to clasp, and with something in its touch that indicated resolution and perhaps a certain strength of character—which last quality, I take it, is more easily discoverable through the grasp of a hand than in any other manner, whether it be given by man or woman. But it was not so much the beauty of her face as the beauty of her presence, that grew upon Arthur Mortley. It was the musical rhythm of her every movement, the grace and harmony of all that she did, that had thrown about him a magnetic and potent spell.

They reached an opening in the wood which looked out upon a rolling landscape, in the midst of which a wreath of blue smoke curled softly upward into the still evening air from behind a little grove of trees.

"Voilà—the house!" exclaimed Eva. "I'll try a gallop with you from here to the gate; and tightening her rein, she urged forward her horse, and was soon lost from Mortley's sight in a cloud of dust.

"Well done!" said Arthur, when he had caught her, tossing his whip to the boy who came out to take the horses. "What kind of rider is my cousin Rose?"

"I am not a judge, but I think she rides well. She is a very little girl, you know."

He lifted her lightly from her horse and held her for a moment before letting her go. A look which spoke volumes went out from his eyes into hers as he did so. If she had ever doubted his faith, that quick, sudden flash of intelligence, speeding with the swiftness of thought from his brain to hers, would have banished forever her suspicions. It told her more than all his words had ever done.

The first greeting from the family over, he resigned himself without resistance to the magic of her influence. By a necromantic spell, more wonderful than the arts of Circe, she held him through the evening. To him her very presence by his side was a joy whose full measure he could hardly yet realize. At the piano as he turned her music; at the little game of chess under the evening lamp; in their walk upon the broad piazza in the moonlight before retiring for the night, the whole burden of his grateful thought was, "She is mine! She has promised to be my wife!" And with the short-sightedness of all men in love, he felt to the fullest the burning ardor of his own passion without knowing the real measure of its depth or strength. No hard experience as yet had tried his constancy or purified his heart. Who shall say that even now he was not deceiving himself and her?

The birds were carolling their early matins when Arthur awoke next morning and threw open his window. Below him was a sea of gorgeous blooms, tossing their subtle fragrance into the clear air. The dew hung in crystal drops from the cups of golden blossoms that bent beneath their weight of trembling pendants, and a fresh, earthy smell came up from the damp flower-beds in the garden. Leaning upon the window-sill for a moment, and peering down through the leaves of a vine that partly obstructed his view, Mortley's eyes fell upon a neatly-dressed female figure seated upon the steps of the piazza, and engaged, apparently, in tying together the stems of a bunch of crimson roses. Her face was hidden by the rim of a broad straw hat, which so concealed her head and shoulders as to leave in view for Mortley's edification only a pair of very small, white hands, which seemed just then to be deftly busy. He knew that Eva was an early riser, although he had hardly expected her to be up and stirring so soon as this; but not to be too far behind-hand, he finished dressing himself and descended to the piazza. Without a doubt that it was really Eva before him, he advanced softly toward her and placed both hands upon her shoulders. The wide straw hat was lifted suddenly, and a surprised face, which was not Eva Trenholm's, was turned to meet his gaze. Mortley stepped back in some confusion.

"Halloo!" he said. "I beg your pardon."

She looked at him for a moment as though studying his features well, and then replied:

"Halloo! Who are you?"

The brusqueness of her manner, and the mischievous look in her wide, brown eyes, made Arthur laugh in spite of himself.

"Just what I was about to ask you," he said. "When I saw you from the window, I thought it was Miss Trenholm."

"Well, you see it isn't Miss Trenholm. And what then?"

"Tell me who, then, first."

"There goes my best rose, right down in the wet dirt. Pick it up, please?"

Mortley stooped for the flower, and with his knife divested the branch of its thorns before returning it.

"Thorns are bad for the fingers," he said.

"You had better let me doctor the rest of them for you."

"O yes, do," she exclaimed, handing him the whole bunch; "I've pricked my fingers with them awfully, already. Let's see. You were going to tell me your name, you know."

Mortley looked into her eyes and laughed again.

"I believe you know it already," he said.

"I suppose you are Arthur Mortley, aren't you? Well, I am Rose Burnham—your cousin, you know. You can kiss me if you want to."

To this challenge Arthur, nothing loth, at once responded, but, whether it was from nervousness, or over-eagerness, or a miscalculation of their relative heights of stature I cannot say, his lips touched her face at a point some distance above their intended place of junction, and he kissed the tip of her nose.

"O dear!" she said, "that's not the way to kiss a cousin. Here now!"

So, saying, she threw both her arms about his neck, and pressed her ripe, red lips to his, in a burning, sensuous kiss, which tingled through Arthur's memory to his dying day.

"That's the way to kiss cousins," she exclaimed. "Cousins are next to sisters, you know, only a little better. You are going to stay here some time, aren't you? There's no use asking that, though, for I know you are. I did hear you were going to be married before you went home. It's so, isn't it. Hertford is a great place for such things. Would you believe it? I have only been here two weeks, and one of these precious Hertford youths has been down on his knees already. Singular, isn't it?"

She untied the ribbons of her hat and shook out a glorious mass of brown ringlets, which the morning breeze at once seized upon in great delight, as its own appropriate playthings. Was it not somewhat strange that a slight feeling, as of pain, should flit across Mortley's consciousness as she told him this? It was hardly a palpable sensation—only a shadowy, vague impression, but he regretted that the thing had happened, or having happened, that she had spoken of it.

"Very singular," he said,—"that it should have taken him two weeks to do it."

"O nonsense!" she replied, with an impatient gesture; "don't spoil my good opinion of you by making such silly remarks. Here comes Eva. Give me the roses, please. I picked them for her."

She snatched the flowers from Mortley's hand and rose hastily.

"You have dispensed with all need for an introduction, I see," said Eva, stopping upon the threshold of the hall. "I hope you haven't begun to quarrel already."

"O no, we're going to like each other famously—at least," said Rose, innocently; "I am going to like him, and it won't be my fault if he doesn't like me. Here are some roses, dear—Folly's peace-offering to Wisdom. Accept them, do."

She went to her and twined her arm about

Eva's waist as she presented the nosegay, and as the two girls stood there in the doorway—the one so tall and stately, and with frank, blue eyes bent pleasantly toward the petite figure at her side, the other laughingly shaking her brown ringlets about, and resting her pink cheek against her companion's shoulder—a recognition of the contrast between them arose involuntarily in Arthur's mind. He did not know that he was contrasting them. He would not have acknowledged that there was the slightest opportunity for comparison, but, nevertheless, he did wonder, as he stepped across the piazza, to take Eva's hand, how it was that Rose seemed so much prettier and more attractive to him, just then, than she.

"Yes, and if he doesn't fall in love with you quite, before you have done with him," said Eva, "it will be because he has greater power of resistance than all the other men have. This little witch is a sad destroyer of hearts, Arthur."

"Now don't, please," exclaimed Rose, turning from pink to crimson. "If they will fall in love with me, how can I help it? I'm sure I don't want them to, and I know Arthur has too much good sense to do anything so foolish. There goes the breakfast-bell, and I'm glad of it, for I'm awfully hungry."

There was something in this little chatoyant, sparkling girl, which to Arthur Mortley was fast proving strangely magnetic. Already she had cast about him the shadow of a spell, in which she was yet to bind him in, still stronger bondage. Not yet did he suspect his thralldom, or begin to feel the potency of her charms. It was still too soon for that, but even now he acknowledged to himself her beauty, her grace, and her overflowing exuberance of spirits—in all of which qualities, it seemed to him, she contrasted favorably with Eva. Her attractiveness was a new sensation for him. She seemed to owe it to a faculty over which she had no control. She affected nothing. Whatever she was, it seemed to be spontaneous and natural, a free growth from a simple, unthinking, girlish heart, too innocent for coquetry or deception. Her freshness interested him, and with a grand confidence that he stood beyond the reach of danger, Arthur Mortley resolved to make a study of her. The fact that he occupied the relation of cousin, and that he was engaged to another woman, would act as an insulator for him, and he could play with her electricity without fear of being scorched.

With characteristic abandon he resigned himself to the delights which Hartford had to offer him. Soon there was a whirl of silks and satins in the house of Trenholm, and work was commenced upon Eva's bridal trousseau. Her engagements in these pleasant, exciting preparations left Arthur and Rose much together, and there were many drives to the station for letters, strolls into the wood for mosses, and rambles over the fields for berries, when Eva was not with them, or her restraining influence over them. Even Tom was forgotten. To Arthur the days at first were one long dream of peace. Softly and quietly the hours slipped by—told off like golden beads upon the rosary of life—and happiness slumbered for him in the cool shadows of the woods, in the depths of the clear waters of the river, and in the warm sunlight on the meadows. It drifted over him with the afternoon clouds, and was whispered to him by fragrant winds that came redolent with the breath of hayfields. It was sung to him by the robins in the old orchard, it was rustled softly by the branches of the trees, it was droued by the bees amid the clover—over the same song—"peace, peace—here is perfect peace;" and by the fern-fringed borders of tumbling brooks, by the rambling lines of moss-grown walls, in the pastures, on the hillside, in the fields of waving corn, he heard the same sweet melody ringing out into the summer air—"peace bloometh in the Garden of God, and happiness is our everlasting heritage."

But this feeling of quiet happiness was not destined to last. Through all these days there was being woven about him a web so subtle that he saw it not until he found himself entangled in its meshes. The swift shuttle of Fate, though it carried a silver thread, was none the less twisting a cord which was to bind him fast. Unconsciously, even to herself, this little laughing witch, with her soft brown eyes and clustering curls, was driving a golden wedge into his life which at last had entered his heart. Then the days grew dark, and the stars became pale and thoughtful. Once he was conscious of asking himself this question,—"Is it possible for a man to love two women at once?" Then he cursed himself for an idle fool, and went out into the woods alone to reason with himself.

O, the racking misery of it! Either he loved Eva Trenholm, or he did not. If he did not, was he doing a thing honorable in the sight of God to make her his wife, whatever such a course might be in the eyes of men? Was this dashing meteor which had flashed into his world worthy of the sacrifice? Was she true and faithful? Did she care for him? All these questions he asked himself while he was trying to grind down his growing love for her, and to trample upon it and beat it out of his heart.

And yet whatever Rose Burnham did she did unconsciously. If she had bewitched this man, she did not know it. That he was more attentive to her wishes than was compatible with the relations which he held to Eva Trenholm, she was, perhaps, vaguely conscious; but then the attentions were agreeable, and it was not in woman's nature, much less a nature like Rose Burnham's, to resist the temptation which was opened thereby for an innocent flirtation. There never dawned upon her mind a suspicion that he might be in earnest. The poor fellow must have amusement, and was she not invited to Hertford to amuse him? If he made a fool of himself, which was not likely, at all events, it was not her fault. And so she accepted his invitations to ride, and boated with him on the river, and played croquet with him upon the lawn, without a thought that she was teaching him the saddest of lessons on the danger of playing with fire.

To him the days, which were to have been so fruitful with tender delights, were full of hopeless misery. With a fierceness which can never be told, Arthur Mortley wrestled with himself. Of the intensity of that struggle, none but himself ever knew. Heroic in little things he might be, but to this fearful test his moral strength was not equal, and with an overwhelming sense of degradation and shame upon him, he allowed himself to be drawn still further into the maelstrom, whose roar even now came to his ears from far over the troubled waters. He could not choose between these two women. If he might have married them both, he would undoubtedly have done so as the easiest mode of escape. Probably, in that case, he would have loved them both through all his life as dearly as he did at present, for there never would have come to him the terrible experience, which afterward taught him that what men fail to discern alone, a Higher Intelligence will sometimes reveal to them.

One day, as he lay under the trees on the river bank, a shadow fell upon him. It was cast by a sunburned, coatless young man in a straw hat, who stopped and leaned upon the fence for a moment to look at the water.

"Are you Mr. Mortley?" asked the stranger.

"I am," replied Arthur; "very much at your service, I'm sure."

"Then you are the man I have been wanting to see," replied the stranger, cutting a splinter from the fence with his knife, and beginning to whittle it into a toothpick.

"Very well, sir, I am here for your inspection."

"It was about Miss Burnham, that I wished to speak," said the man, hesitatingly. "Are you going to marry the girl?"

"I once had a friend," replied Arthur, raising himself on one elbow and looking at the stranger steadily; "who was a doctor, and on one occasion I was rash enough to ask him what it was that he had given me."

"Well?"

"And then he told me it was none of my business."

"I didn't come here to bandy words," said the man, fiercely. "Perhaps you don't know me. My name is Fairlie—Eben. Fairlie. They do say you are engaged to be married to Squire Trenholm's daughter, and there are those who think, if you care nothing for Rose Burnham, that it would be manly in you to stand aside and give others a chance."

"True," said Mortley, reflectively gazing before him into space.

"Is that all the answer you have for me?" asked the man, sullenly.

"My dear friend," replied Arthur, jumping up and taking him by the hand, "if you will answer for me the question you have asked about this girl, I will be your debtor for life. Do you know whether she cares for me?"

"You are trifling with me," said Fairlie, angrily. "If it hadn't been for your cursed fooling with her, she might have looked at me. I don't lay up any grudge against you, but God forgive you, if you are wronging either her or t'other poor girl. That's all."

Then he shut up the blade of his knife savagely, and walked away.

That night it was late when Mortley returned from his walk. He sauntered wearily into the parlor, and stood for a moment in the middle of the room, trying to penetrate the dusky gloom. The lamps were not yet lighted, and a figure sat in the recess of the deep bay window, its dark outline revealed against the lighter sky without.

"Rose," he exclaimed, "is it you?"

"Yes," she said. "What kept you away from supper, you truant? Off fishing with Tom?"

"I have been trying to solve a question in metaphysics," he replied, taking a seat upon an ottoman at her feet, "and I think fate has sent you to help me."

"O dear!" said Rose, "I don't know anything about metaphysics."

"Do you believe a man may have two hearts?"

"I don't know," she said. "Men are strange creatures. I know that a woman could not."

"Because I know a man," he continued, "who at this moment cannot decide which of two women is dearest to him."

"He is much to be pitied," said Rose.

"He certainly is."

"Is that the problem you have been studying all the afternoon?"

"I have been studying it much longer than that. Now I come to you for help."

"And if this man does not know himself what he should do?" said Rose; "how can he expect you, who have no interest in the matter, to decide for him?"

"He has left it to me and to Destiny to guide him," returned Mortley, "and Destiny has brought me to you."

"You foolish boy. I know nothing of these abstract questions. They are all riddles to me. How do you expect me to help you?"

"By marrying me!"

"O Arthur!"

He had placed his hand upon hers, but she recoiled from him as though he had stung her. He could see, by looking past her toward the window, that her bosom was heaving tumultuously, and he heard her breath come quick and fast.

"Rose! Rose!" he cried. "You can never know what I have suffered. I have cursed myself for my wretched folly, but I have not had the courage to tell her of this thing, or to leave this unhappy place. God knows, I would do no wrong. It is fate—fate. Had she been here to-night, instead of you, I should have asked her to save me."

She was silent for a moment, while her breath came more easily. Then she bent toward him and with her hand brushed back the hair from his hot forehead.

"Arthur," she said, quietly, "had you never seen me, you would never have doubted your love for her."

"No," he replied. "I never until this moment knew my own heart."

"You do not know it now," said Rose.

"You judge me by the past," he answered.

"Has all this terrible struggle wrought no change in me? Do all these days of helpless misery count for nothing?"

"If I should tell you," said Rose, "that what you ask can never be—that you must go back to her whose happiness you would have me ruin—go back and tell her of the terrible wrong you were so nearly doing her, and ask her forgiveness on your knees—what would you do?"

He buried his face in his hands and was silent. He remained so long in this position without speaking, that Rose at last placed her hand upon his shoulder, to recall him to himself. Then he raised his head and said, in a hoarse whisper:

"I should go."

"Then," she said, "let us forget what has passed between us. Never allow yourself to think, Arthur, of what might have been. I would not be your wife now, even though I did not know that your love for Eva is at this moment far deeper and greater than any feeling you have for me. I think your problem is solved."

She bent her face toward his and kissed him, and then rose from her seat.

"It is not solved," he cried, catching her dress to retain her. "If this had happened sooner—if I had said to you a year ago what I have said to-night—would your answer have been the same?"

She paused a moment before replying. Then she said, very quietly:

"It will do you no good to know that. I cannot tell you."

She loosed her dress from his grasp and glided softly from the room, while Mortley turned to the window and gazed vacantly out at the deepening twilight. He did not see, as he stood there, lost in a bewildered maze of reflection, the movement of a woman's figure, which had sunk down beneath the open window with both hands pressed upon the temples. If he had seen it, the sight would have done little toward calming his emotions, for the figure was that of Eva Tranholm.

After he had betaken himself to bed, his scattered thoughts had an opportunity to arrange themselves. In the stillness and privacy of his own room, he soon recovered from the first stunning effect of his blow, and was able to see the full measure of his folly. But even now he experienced no relief from his self-inflicted torture. Was his love for Rose the less a true love because its object was unattainable? To him the new hopelessness of his passion for her was only a fresh cause for wretchedness. He did not yet recognize the wide divergence between these two currents of feeling. He had not yet learned that the one was the froth and the other the wine—the one passion and the other love. There is a vast difference between these two, but Mortley had not learned it. It needed a sterner teacher than Rose to reveal it to him. Tossing in feverish restlessness from side to side upon his couch, he lay awake for hours, asking himself what he should do. The terrible problem seemed no nearer a solution now than ever before. And yet, in the silence and stillness of the night, Providence, which took as much care of Arthur Mortley's affairs as it does of other people's, was working out the answer for him.

He had dropped at last into a troubled, broken sleep, from which he suddenly awoke with a nervous start. The room seemed strangely light, and as he lay for a moment trying to collect his yet half-aroused faculties, there came vibrating across his consciousness the distant sound of a bell. A subdued and muffled roar, striking upon his ear like the roll of a far-off sea, awoke in him an indefinable sensation of terror, and he arose and threw open the window. A burst of dense, black smoke flashed into his face as he did so, and took away his breath. A sound of many voices, a hurrying of people to and fro without, a crash of falling timbers and the blinding light which streamed into the room, brought him more completely to himself. Closing the sash again to shut out the clouds of smoke, he hastily donned a few pieces of clothing, and then, dropping to the roof of the piazza, he slipped safely down the water-leads into the arms of the people who were standing below.

The strange, intense light, and its lurid reflection upon the sky, had aroused the country people round about for miles, and already they came running across the fields toward the Trenholm mansion, some with ropes, some with buckets, and some with axes and hatchets. No one seemed to know the origin of the fire, and no one at that crisis of affairs stopped to speculate upon the matter. A line of men, under the leadership of a stalwart man in a dark blue blouse, had formed between the well and the house, and was rapidly passing forward buckets of water to throw upon the flames. The others stood in a circle at a comfortable distance from the burning building, and stared at the work of destruction in bewildered apathy.

Scarcely had Mortley reached the ground, when there appeared at a window in the north wing of the mansion, a figure, which the crowd at once recognized as Eva Trenholm.

"A ladder—a ladder!" they all cried. "Has no one brought a ladder?"

A dozen men started off across the fields with the speed of men running for their lives. Mortley remembered seeing, some days before, a ladder in the barn. Thither he directed his course, and breaking the lock of the door with one blow of an axe, he seized the object of his search and came striding toward the scene of action. The fire had caught in the main portion of the house. Mr. Trenholm and the servants had escaped without injury before the alarm had been given, but so rapid had been the rush of the destroying element, that all communication with the wings of the building had been almost immediately cut off. The apartment occupied by Eva Trenholm was adjoining that assigned to Rose during her stay, though there was no communication between the two. As Mortley, making gigantic strides over the ground, returned with his burden, a cheer went up from the sea of anxious faces upturned in the red light toward that pale figure in the window, but as he looked upward too, he saw a second figure at the other window, standing back in the shadow of the room. He knew that this was Rose Burnham.

Shall I tell you that at that sight Arthur Mortley's heart stood still? Now, at this awful moment, amid the roar of the flames and the falling of stones and timber, in the terrible glare and heat of fire and amid the crash and terror of destruction, the truth came to him as to which of these two women he really loved. They say that drowning men recall in the one brief moment that is left to them, before Death closes his icy fingers around them, the most trivial incidents of their lives. In that instant there came upon Mortley a recollection, terrible in its distinctness, of the minutest events of the past few weeks, and in one quick second of time he suffered anew the intensified torture of the whole period of his struggle. Yet, though his heart for a moment stopped its pulsations, his feet never once faltered. In that hurried upward glance at those two shadowy figures above him, Arthur Mortley read the solution of his problem. There was no time to lose. Already the fiery tongues of flame were creeping along the roof of the wing, and in a moment all help would come too late. There could be scarcely time to save them both, and with a steady arm, Mortley planted one end of his ladder on the ground, and lifted the other until it touched the sill of one of the windows. But it was Eva Trenholm's window, and not Rose Burnham's.

A dozen men rushed toward him and offered to ascend to the rescue, but he waved them off, and began to battle his way alone through the smoke that poured down upon him and blinded him. He had turned, when half way up, to wave farewell to the other shadowy figure, which still stood half-concealed behind the curtains of her room. Then a joyful shout came upward to his ears from the crowd below, and another ladder was raised beside him and up against the second window. The man in the blue blouse was springing lightly up it, and looking down upon him, Arthur Mortley's eyes met those of Eben Fairlie.

Cruel as was the lesson of that fearful night, there were at least four persons who thanked God that it had been taught them. When daylight dawned upon the smoking ruins, and they stood together gazing at the blackened timbers, four silent thanksgivings arose to Him who ruleth all things, that beneath those smouldering ashes no hearts were buried. In Eva Trenholm's mind there existed no self-torturing doubt as to the course she should pursue. Knowing all, as she already did, she could not go to her fate blindly. To her there was no need for better proof of Arthur Mortley's true nature, than the past night had revealed to her. She knew of his sufferings and respected them. She felt the real existence of that silent current of love which had all the time been setting from his heart toward her—which had never for a moment stopped; though turned aside for a period from its gentle purring course, by a single flower which Fate had thrown upon it. And Eva Trenholm, strong in the one virtue in which all women are strong—stronger even in that, perhaps, than some—still held her heart in both her hands; and said to Arthur Mortley as of old, "It is thine for all time." And I do not think that either he or she has ever thought to reproach Cupid for shooting two arrows at once.

FRUSTRATED HOPES.

BY A CORPORAL, OF CO. "Q."

I HAVE just finished reading, with intense interest, Lieutenant Sly's wonderful adventures in Louisiana, as narrated by James Franklin Fitts, in the July and September numbers of your excellent magazine. As a former member of the brave old "411th," I take almost a personal interest in the reminiscences of the lieutenant. That they are truthful, in part at least, I can vouch, from my own memory. I am sure the regiment turned back from the march towards Alexandria, and that we met the adjutant the same day; but the little circumstances of the alligator, and the rescue from Ballie Vinson's guerrillas, have wholly escaped my recollection; probably from the fact that, as a member of "Co. L," I was not with the detachment which came to the rescue at the critical moment, which Captain Fitts so graphically describes. From my knowledge of the adjutant's general reputation for veracity, I am sure the whole account must be true. The adjutant needs no praise from me. He was a brave soldier, and an excellent officer; and the scars which he will bear through life sufficiently attest his bravery on that terrible 14th of June at Port Hudson, and afterwards in "the valley."

He will not remember the humble corporal of "Co. Q," who used to note with unbounded admiration the soldierly stride, his fearful "Grecian Bend," and his inimitable salute en quarts, as he marched to the front, and presented the regiment at dress parade. How we watched, with unutterable anxiety, the growth of his feeble mustache (the only feeble thing about him by the way); and how greatly we rejoiced, when, at length, it became visible to the naked eye as he faced the regiment at regulation distance! Behold, all these things are written in the memory of the veterans of the "411th," but as none possessed the adjutant's descriptive powers, they have never been committed to paper.

Though the adjutant was a gallant son of Mars, he was no less a worshipper at Venus's shrine. There, too, he stood confessedly the first amid a host. He does not tell us of his adventures in love as well as war. Perhaps his natural modesty forbids; but just here secure to say mind an incident which may serve to throw a still brighter halo of glory around his martial brow.

It was on the same march back to Brashear from Alexandria. Our orders were to collect all "contrabands," together with all means of transportation along our line of march, and to convoy them to Brashear, which was to be made a recruiting rendezvous for the new Corps d'Afrique.

Such a medley of sights and sounds as our train presented on that march; was probably seldom witnessed during the war—always excepting the wonderful march to the sea. Negroes, carts, family carriages, mules, darkies of all ages, sizes and complexions, feather beds, stoves, dills and satins, were indiscriminately "mixed" and strewn along the line of march for nearly half a score of miles.

The news of our coming went before us, and at each plantation we would meet crowds of darkies eager to go to "de land of Canaan with Massa Linkum's men;" while shouts of "Glory!" "Bress de Lord!" "Hallelujah!" and "we's gwine wid you all," would fill the air with such a joyful chorus as the cypress woods along Bayou Teche never before echoed.

The "411th," had a weakness for door-yards, and as the evening shadows of the gray-bearded live-oaks began to lengthen across the road, "old Galsim's" "eagle eye" (when not suffused with tears at the recollection of that bottle of claret which his hostess of last night did not produce) would eagerly scan the horizon for plantation door-yards. When one apparently suitable was discovered, Adjutant Sly would boldly ride forward to reconnoitre, and returning, report as to the number and appearance of the young ladies, the prospects for coffee and corn-dodger, and sometimes, if it occurred to him, would mention the size of the door-yard and the chances for wood and water. On this occasion the report was favorable, and soon we camped.

"Colonel Grizzly" and staff were met by a "ladye faire" of middle age and vinegary aspect, who, contrary to custom and expectation, welcomed them warmly; professed the strongest Union sentiments; opened her parlor and piano; and soon the brave adjutant was soothing the dogs of war with soft, sweet music. A bounteous supper was soon in course of preparation—while, to fill the cup of their happiness, two young ladies of most exorcinatingly lovely forms and smiling faces made their appearance, and the acquaintance of the officers.

Arabella, the elder, whose hair inclined to the auburn tint, but which curled most bewitchingly, attracted probably by the adjutant's resemblance to herself in the capillary line, approached and engaged him in conversation. The hero of Bismarck and the remorseless slaughter of Balfie Vinson (who, alas for romance! still lives, a freight agent in Louisiana,) was soon entranced beyond recall. It was evidently a case of love at first sight. I dare not say how many visions of plantations and cotton bales, negroes and sugar cane, with Arabella into the bargain, all in that paradise of the Attakapas, flitted through his mind.

But outside, we of the musket and knapsack made our fires, boiled our coffee, and discussed the singularity of the fact, that at this plantation there were no darkies to greet us with rows of glittering ivories and shining eyeballs glistening like new constellations in these low latitudes. Beyond a few house servants, who gave us no manifestations of welcome, there were no negroes to be seen about the place. At length, some adventurous soldier in quest of hoe-cake discovered away up in the garret dark faces and woolly heads projecting from a window.

The news spread. A ladder was procured and down came a troop of Africans some thirty in number, whom their mistress fondly believed safely hidden from the prying eyes of the Yankees.

But soon she heard of the discovery, and "O, what a change was there, my countrymen!" Her black eyes snapped; her vinegary face grew still more acid; gone were her welcoming smiles; and with a voice as sweet as fourteen cat-concerts, she eloquently bade the officers, in Southern phrase, to "git."

"Out of this house, you infernal Yankee nigger thieves! you robbers! you desecrators of Southern homes! Ditch, stop the chicken-doin's!"

Arabella's turn-up nose aspired still higher. Bang! went the lids of her piano, and in a tone yet shriller than her mother's she, too, gave orders to "git!" It was whispered that she even seized the adjutant by his flowing locks with her own fair, musical fingers, and direful would the result have been had not the colonel interfered and saved "Mr. Sly."

Slowly the colonel and staff left the room. Sadly they retreated to the far end of the piazza; sullenly they ordered their servants to bring coffee from the commissary. But no power could drive them from the piazza; that was their citadel; and there they resolved to "do or die."

Alas for visions of Arabella and Attakapas plantations! "Gone like the baseless fabric of a dream."

The shock to his most sensitive feelings was too great. For days after, the adjutant's usually genial countenance wore a look of gloom that not even rumors of an extra issue of "Commissary" could wholly remove.

The exciting events of the succeeding weeks may have dalled the pain of the wounds which his too susceptible bosom had sustained; but I verily believe that to this day he carries scars upon his heart as lasting as any made by bullets.

To us, who, in the crowded door-yard, heard with terror the shrill voice of the madam, and viewed with affright the officers retreat, the newly emancipated brought hoe-cakes innumerable, and unlike the officers we had reason to rejoice in our "chicken doins."

Truly it is an ill wind that blows nobody any good.

A TRAGEDY.

BY MARY N. ROCKWELL.

WINTER.

No Christmas tree for us, my boys,
Shall bear its magic fruit to-night;
We miss one from our household band
Who long hath shared with us its light.

O, pale and patient little hands,
That toiled so faithfully for me!
God grant that his green tree of life
Shall be to-night my Christmas tree.

SPRING.

Flowers that she watched bloom at her head:
Ay, "gone is gone, and dead is dead!"
Pinks that she loved, pale and sweet,
Plant I here at the weary feet.

Periwinkle, with eyes of blue,
Weave thy green web o'er the heart so true;

Christmas roses, with blossoms red,
Brighten, I charge ye, her lowly bed!

SUMMER.

Roses nodding in misty rain,
Chanting low this sad refrain:
"Only a lost life comes not again."
River, hush thy moaning song.
Whispering low of fearful wrong,
Bid me not doubt her hope of heaven—
"To whom loveth much, is not much forgiven!"

AUTUMN.

Autumn, bearing golden sheaves,
Shed o'er her grave thy mantle of leaves;
O'er it thou weepst with chilling rain,
"Only a lost life comes not again."

THE VOYAGE OF THE LAPWING.

BY ELIZABETH NIGELOW.

PHEBE sat on the doorstep, with the afternoon sunshine glinting in her hair and playing about the tangle of bright-colored worsteds that lay in her lap. Her forehead was wrinkled up, and her blue, babyish eyes had a perplexed, almost a despairing look in them; for it was a very intricate piece of work that Phebe was engaged upon, and her worsteds were getting hopelessly tangled up together. It was a crocheted tidy, the pattern of which Samantha Staples had brought home with her from Ipswich, where she had been at school, and whose like had never been seen on the Cape before. At first it had seemed easy enough, and Phebe had worked on gayly, knitting in hopes and fancies brighter than the wools; but now it was so vexing that her face grew really distressed, and she heaved a great sigh from the very bottom of her heart that brought Aunt Jane to the door.

"Umph! when I was young girls didn't waste their time over such foolishness," said Aunt Jane. "Spolling your eyesight and crooking your back, tea. If you were at the spinning-wheel—"

"But, Aunt Jane, this is so lovely! And—and it's for the cabin of the Lapwing!" And a bright, rosy flush came over Phebe's face as she looked up cannily into her aunt's. "I want it to look just as pretty and homelike as possible, you know."

Aunt Jane sniffed contemptuously, but her puckered-up mouth relaxed a little.

"You had better been a mending your stockings. There's a whole basketful of 'em on the sitting-room table."

"I forgot them, aunty. I'll go and mend them right away," said Phebe.

"O, you needn't hurry, now. I couldn't bear to see them setting there all day—I never did hold with such shiftless ways—so I mended 'em myself."

"What a dear, good, old aunty it is!" said Phebe, throwing her arm around her neck, "and what in the world shall I do without her?"

"There, there, child! don't bag me!" said Aunt Jane, smoothing her rumpled collar. "There's Gilbert coming down the road;" and she vanished into the house.

"Poor Aunt Jane!" said Phebe to herself, with a little sigh. She never minded if Aunt Jane was a little cross, for she knew what a faithful, tender heart she had, and she always remembered the great disappointment of her life, which people said had "soured" her. Long ago, before Phebe was born, Aunt Jane's lover had sailed out of that very harbor that was in sight from the doorway where Phebe sat, and had never come back again. "Ah, what should I do," said Phebe to herself, "if—" and then she did give one glance up the road at the tall, manly figure that was coming that way, though before she had kept her eyes coquettishly averted.

It wasn't Gilbert; it wasn't his gait. Phebe saw it with a pang of disappointment, though a moment before you would have thought from her face and attitude that she was perfectly indifferent as to who might be coming down the road.

But who could it be? Such tall, handsome young men were not very plentiful in Rockport. He must be a stranger. "But I have seen him before," said Phebe to herself, and then suddenly remembered when. A ship, bound on a foreign voyage, had put in the harbor for repairs the day before, and one of the village girls had pointed out this young man, whom they had met in the street, as its captain—Captain Matthews. But what could he be coming there for?

He leaned over the gate and lifted his hat, with a very graceful bow for a sailor.

"This is Miss Hanson?" he said, as Phebe went towards him, with wonder in her eyes.

Phebe made a demure little bow.

"Can I see you alone for a few moments?" he said, in a voice that sounded strange and husky, and impressed Phebe with a sudden fancy that she had, somewhere, heard it before.

Phebe looked back towards the house. Aunt Jane was not in sight; she had gone to the kitchen to make biscuits for tea.

"We are quite alone, sir," said Phebe, with dignity, yet not without a little tremor in her voice, for she was a little afraid of this man whose manner was so strange.

He glanced furtively around him until quite sure that no one was in sight. Then he removed his cap and a wig of jet black hair that had covered his head, next a false mustache and whiskers of the same color, and a fair-haired, smooth-faced young man was revealed.

Phebe grew white, and started back.

"Phebe, don't you remember?" he said, holding his arms out towards her; and his voice was very different. Phebe drew near him again, with her blue eyes fixed like one in a dream. She touched his hand with a sort of curious wonder, as if to discover if it were real flesh and blood.

"O Joe, Joe! I can't believe it is you!" she cried, then, falling into his arms. He folded her tightly to his heart, and kissed her bright hair tenderly. "But, Joe, tell me how you escaped—how it all happened, for I feel as if I were dreaming?" said Phebe.

He cast a quick, cautious glance around again—he was used, evidently, to keeping always on his guard—and put on his false hair and beard.

Phebe started away from him again.

"I don't like to see you with those on. I don't believe that it is you when I see them!" she said.

But he gathered her into his arms again, laughing, and began to talk, low and earnestly, and in her eagerness to hear his explanations Phebe forgot his unnatural look.

As they stood there, his arm around Phebe's waist her hand resting on his shoulder, a young man came around the turn in the road, in full view, though they were too much occupied with each other to see him. But he saw them, and started at the sight, while a dark flush overspread his handsome, sunburnt face.

He had almost reached her side before Phebe saw him; when she did see him she stepped suddenly away from Captain Matthews, her cheeks flaming.

"Let me introduce you to Captain Drew, Captain Matthews," she said, with an evident struggle for composure. "Captain Matthews is an old friend of mine, Gilbert."

"I should judge so," said Captain Gilbert Drew, shortly, making a little curt bow to Captain Matthews, but ignoring his proffered hand.

He was honest and straightforward, this young sailor, and could not dissemble his anger. He would not shake hands with a man who a moment before had had his arm around his sweetheart's waist.

"I think I may as well bid you good-by, Phebe," said Captain Matthews, and held Phebe's hand in a long and close pressure, bowed profoundly to Gilbert Drew, who regarded him with something very like a scowl, and took his departure.

"Well?" said the irate young captain, looking steadily into Phebe's face.

She was watching the retreating figure with anxious, it seemed to Gilbert Drew with tender eyes, and did not heed his angry tone; but when she caught sight of his stern, set face and flashing eyes a deep flush flickered over her face.

She looked relieved when Aunt Jane uttered a shrill summons to tea.

"You'll come in to tea, Gilbert," she said, coaxingly, laying her hand on his arm. "You like Aunt Jane's biscuit so much, you know, and—and I'll forgive you for being so rude to me just now if you'll come."

"It seems to me, Phebe," said Gilbert, softened, in spite of himself, by the touch of her hand, "that I am not the one who needs forgiveness. I should like an explanation of the scene I witnessed a few moments ago."

"I can't give you any explanation," said Phebe, quickly, dropping her hand from his arm, and her face grew very grave and stern under Gilbert's searching eyes, but did not change color in the least.

The young man looked perplexed. Phebe was always so frank and true, he hardly knew how to doubt her, but then there was the evidence of his own eyes. Phebe looked up in his face very humbly and beseechingly.

"I can't tell you anything more, now, than that, he is an old friend, and I was so glad and so surprised to see him that perhaps I wasn't quite so—so ceremonious as I should have been."

Gilbert's brow darkened, and Phebe saw plainly that she was not mending matters. She tucked her little white hand inside his large, brown one, and her baby-blue eyes looked pleadingly up into his face.

"Gilbert, won't you trust me?" she said, softly. "There is something that I keep back that I can't tell you now, though sometime I may. But you know, Gilbert, that there is nobody in the wide world that I—" and her eyes dropped, and shy pink blushes chased each other over her face, her voice was very low, and faltering, and sweet—"that I love like you."

It was the first time that Phebe had ever confessed so much, and Gilbert caught her in his arms and kissed her, and drove the last shadow away from his brow, and allowed himself to be led into the house, where Aunt Jane awaited them in a fever of anxiety lest the biscuit were cold.

Gilbert was a great favorite with Aunt Jane. She had always been determined that Phebe should not marry a seafaring man, and then the knowledge that Phebe might have done better, as far as money and position were concerned, harassed her continually. For there was Gerald Bayne, the great man of Rockport, the owner of nobody knew how many ships, and warehouses, and stocks, and lands, who had been in love with Phebe ever since she wore pinafore, and who might have won her. Aunt Jane was continually saying to herself, if it had not been for Gilbert Drew.

Not that Phebe had ever manifested the least liking for Gerald Bayne, but she could not have been insensible to such attractions as his. Aunt Jane was sure, if Gilbert Drew, with his handsome face had not come in the way, and coaxed her into fancying herself in love with him. But Phebe was the apple of her eye, and she hadn't the heart to try to thwart her; perhaps, too, she was conscious that it would not be of much use to try, for Phebe was a determined little thing when she had once made up her mind.

Willfulness was a family trait. Aunt Jane well remembered how being thwarted in his will had been the ruin of one member of it. That was Phebe's brother; from childhood all his dreams had been of the sea, every ship that sailed out of the port he followed with longing eyes, all his hopes and fancies flew forward to the time when he should be able to go.

But his mother was a widow, and the sea had swallowed up so many of her kindred—her husband among them—that she had a dread and horror of it, and absolutely refused to let the boy go. She kept an unceasing watch over him, and when, in his sixteenth year, he attempted to run away, he was caught and brought back, and sent to the city to work his way up; his mother fondly hoped, to honor and wealth in a mercantile house. But news of his recklessness and ill-conduct came continually, until, at last, three years from the time he left home, the blow came that broke his mother's heart. He had been concerned in an extensive bank robbery and sentenced to a long term of imprisonment, and had committed suicide to escape it.

Poor Mrs. Henson died in three months afterwards, and Phebe was left to Aunt Jane's care; and they had lived together ever since, in that little gray stone house by the sea. And Aunt Jane, remembering her nephew's fate, had an almost morbid dread of crossing Phebe in anything; if it had not been for that it is very unlikely that Gilbert Drew would have been seated so cozily at their tea-table, with Aunt Jane's cherished strawberry preserves put on for his especial benefit. For Aunt Jane was ambitious, and that she was not to see Phebe Mrs. Gerald Bayne was the great disappointment of her life.

But not the slightest of Aunt Jane's biscuit, nor the sweetness of her preserves, nor even Phebe's society, was able to dispel the cloud that still lingered on Gilbert's brow. He had perfect faith in Phebe; he said to himself, over and over again, but still it was not a pleasant sight that he had witnessed. And Phebe seemed so strangely nervous and excited, so unlike herself; she talked perfectly at random, and even when he reminded her that in just three weeks the Lapwing would be ready for sea, she seemed scarcely to hear him, but was listening intently as if for a footstep on the gravel walk, and she started and grew pale at every slight sound. And when Gilbert arose to take his leave, at least an hour earlier than his wont, she did not ask him to stay, but seemed rather relieved at his going. Yet she stood in the door and watched him out of sight, with a wistful, anxious look on her face.

"I'm going to bed," said Aunt Jane, "and you had better go too. What is the matter between you and Gilbert. Haven't had a falling out, have you?"

"No, no indeed! nothing is the matter," said Phebe, faintly. "Don't wait for me, Aunt Jane. I am not going to bed quite yet."

Aunt Jane was quite sure that everything was not right, but she was too wise to say anything; she went her way up stairs, and left Phebe sitting alone on the doorstep. The village clock struck nine just as the echo of her footsteps died away, and Phebe rose, with a great sigh of relief, wrapped herself in her cloak and drew the hood over her head, ran lightly down the road, climbed the stone wall and crossed the pasture, then sped lightly over the rocks to the seashore.

It was almost as light as day, and the moon made a glittering wake upon the sea in which two or three ships rested, with gleaming sails, like great, white, hovering birds.

A man started up from one of the rocks at the sound of her footsteps—Captain Matthews.

"I am late, I know, Joe, but I couldn't get away before; and now I mustn't stay long, for Aunt Jane may call me, and she would be frightened to death to find I was not in the house."

They sat down together on a rock, his arm around her waist, her eyes looking up into his. Ah! if Gilbert Drew could have seen her then his face would have worn a darker cloud than it did now. He was a fool to have faith in her after what he had seen, you think? Well, he thought so himself afterwards. Only once in their long talk—for Phebe forgot that she ought not to stay—did they mention his name.

"You are going to marry Gilbert Drew?" the young man said.

"Yes," said Phebe, simply.

"Not if he knew, I fancy, Phebe!" And the man's tone was hard and bitter.

"I think sometimes that he must have heard it from some of the village gossips; there are so many who would enjoy telling him," said Phebe. "But of course he cannot know all."

"He never shall know all, Phebe. I have made you wretched enough! You shall never be troubled by me again."

"But I couldn't live without seeing you, Joe," cried Phebe; "and there may yet come a time when we can see each other openly, without fear of disgrace."

The young man shook his head hopelessly.

"We will wait and hope, Joe," she whispered. "Now I must go. No, no, you must not go home with me! You might be seen; it was very dangerous for you to come to-day; and I am not afraid. I shall wait to see you in your boat before I go."

The young man got into a row-boat, whose rope he had fastened to a stone, and was soon rowing away to where his ship, the Winged Rover, lay at anchor, looking like a great, black shadow in the moonlight.

Phebe turned towards the house. There was no light to be seen in any of the windows; it was evident that Aunt Jane was sleeping the sleep of the just, unconscious of her niece's absence. So Phebe walked leisurely along, now and then casting a backward glance at the Winged Rover. But when she came within a few feet of the pasture bars she started back with a low cry of alarm; a man stood leaning over them in a careless attitude, watching her intently.

"Pray don't let me alarm you, Miss Phebe," he said, reassuringly, and as he lifted his hat Phebe recognized Mr. Gerald Bayne.

Never agreeable in its expression, his face now wore a look of malicious triumph that made it positively repulsive to Phebe; she saw at once that he had witnessed her meeting with Captain Matthews; she remembered with a thrill of terror that he might have heard all their conversation.

"Will you allow me to accompany you home? It is not safe for you to be out so late alone," he said, quietly.

Phebe drew herself up haughtily. His tone and manner deceived her. He had not heard, or he would not be so calm, she thought.

"I don't need any escort for so short a distance, thank you," she said, coldly, attempting to pass him.

He stepped before her and whispered a few words in her ear. A low, half-stifled cry broke from her lips, and her face grew white.

"And you listened! I wouldn't have believed that, even of you!" she cried.

"No, I didn't listen. I didn't need to. I knew it before," he answered, coolly.

"And you will use your knowledge? You will bring disgrace and ruin upon him and me?"

"Isn't it my duty?—unless I have my pay for keeping your secret."

Phebe's lip curled contemptuously.

"And your pay?" she asked, haughtily, in spite of her terror.

"Can you ask? Don't you know the one treasure without which the whole world is valueless to me?" And he took in his one of the hands that hung limp and nerveless at Phebe's side.

"O, how can you be so cruel? What have I ever done to you that you should persecute me so!" cried Phebe, passionately.

"Cruel to you, Phebe? If you could only understand how much more my love is worth to you than Gilbert Drew's, how much happier you must be as my wife! Why, his is only a boy's fancy that he will forget in a twelvemonth, while I will cherish you so tenderly, always, Phebe!"

Phebe drew her hand away.

"I will never be your wife," she said, firmly, emboldened by his softened tone. Surely one who professed to love her so much could never persist in bringing such sorrow upon her as he had threatened!

"As you choose," he replied, "but think a moment! What will Gilbert Drew say when he hears this story? The Drews have always borne an honest, honorable name; they pride themselves upon it."

"I am not afraid of what Gilbert Drew will say," returned the girl, proudly. "It is only for Joe that I care? How can you, what good will it do you to betray him? Will nothing move you to keep our secret?" she cried, desperately.

"Yes, one thing. You will do that, Phebe? Nothing else can move me, not even your tears. Is it yes?"

"O, I don't know, I can't tell! Give me until to-morrow to think."

"Until to-morrow morning. I will come then for my answer."

He walked beside her to the house, but Phebe left him at the door without a word of adieu. But there was a smile of triumph on his face as he went down the lane. And he was not deceived.

Early the next morning Captain Gilbert Drew, who was superintending some arrangements on the Lapwing, was surprised to receive a note from Phebe, sent by the little boy whom she usually employed as a messenger. As he opened it the ring he had given her—a little, golden circle with a blue forget-me-not—rolled out. This is what he read, in Phebe's handwriting, but in wavering, unsteady lines, and with stains on the paper that looked like traces of tears:

"I write to ask you to release me from my engagement to you. I can never be your wife. You must not ask me why, nor ever try to see me. But God bless you, always, Gilbert!

PHEBE."

Captain Drew crammed the note into his pocket, and seized his hat. He would go to Phebe, at once, and discover the meaning of this strange freak. But then, suddenly, the memory of that scene which he had witnessed the night before, and which Phebe had refused to explain, rushed over him. This was the result. Phebe had cast him off because her old lover had come back!

He went back as hastily as he had come—this impulsive young sailor, set his heel upon the little ring that still lay on the cabin floor where it had fallen, and crushed it to atoms.

The workmen were hurried and driven that day as they had never been before, for the captain had decided that he must sail in a fortnight, at least.

Aunt Jane received the news with the greatest amazement. That Phebe had broken her engagement with Gilbert, and was going to marry Gerald Bayne, of her own accord, was too much to be believed.

"I can't say that I am not pleased," she said, when Phebe told her the simple facts, refusing all explanation, "but it doesn't seem as if you were treating Gilbert just right, since you haven't any reason."

"I have a reason," answered Phebe, quietly. But she went about the house with a pale face, and eyes whose old, glad light seemed quenched forever.

In spite of herself she was disappointed that Gilbert should have obeyed her injunction; to see him only once more would have been such a comfort! But yet it might have made her lot even harder to bear.

Gerald Bayne was constant and open in his devotion, and before a week the change in Phebe's prospects was known all over the village. Of course everybody pitied Gilbert and blamed Phebe, except a few ambitious young ladies who did not see how anybody could be expected to resist the temptation of being mistress of Gerald Bayne's fine house, and being considered the grandest lady in Rockport.

Two weeks passed and Phebe had not seen Gilbert save once at church, when his stern, set face and the cold, contemptuous glance he gave her made her shrink. The Lapwing was to sail on the next day, and as it happened the Winged Rover was to be ready then to proceed on her voyage, and Rockport lads and lassies, eager to improve every opportunity for a good time, determined to give them a little party by way of farewell. It was to be in the town hall, and the Rockport band had been practising vigorously for a week past in preparation for the great event.

Gerald Bayne was very anxious that Phebe should go, it would be such a fine opportunity to parade his triumph before Gilbert Drew's eyes; but Phebe at first refused, decidedly. But as the time drew near, such an impatient longing came over her to see Gilbert's face once more that she consented to go. It would be more pain than pleasure to see him under such circumstances, she said to herself, over and over again, but still the longing remained too strong to be resisted.

And if she went she must be the gayest of the gay; she must not wear her heart upon her sleeve. There were two who would be there who must never know how great her pain was: Gilbert Drew, because if he knew it he would insist upon an explanation which she could not give him, and because he would forget her more easily and so suffer less pain himself if he believed her fickle and heartless, and Captain Matthews for another reason.

Aunt Jane brought out the white India muslin that was to have been her bridal dress, and insisted upon her wearing that.

"You will have a finer wedding dress than that, now, of course, and it will be just the thing to wear to the party!"

"No, no, I can't wear that! I never will wear that!" cried Phebe, and a great sob shook her voice. Aunt Jane looked at her in wonder and perplexity, then put the dress away without a word.

A week before the party Gerald Bayne sent as a present to his betrothed a dress of pink, Canton crape, the loveliest thing that ever was seen, which he had bought out of a ship that had just come into port. There never was a prettier picture than Phebe made in that dress; the bright pink was just what she needed to brighten her pale cheeks, and in the making of the dress Miss Simpkins, the village dressmaker, had achieved a wonder, having gone to the city on purpose to get patterns; it was be-bowed and be-puffed and be-paniered like any city belle's, and Aunt Jane, surveying Phebe with admiring eyes after she was dressed for the party, said to herself that in the whole State Mr. Gerald Bayne could not have found a fairer or a sweeter bride. And for her—was it not better that her beauty should be splendidly set off, than that it should be half hidden by its commonplace surroundings, as the wife of Gilbert Drew?

When Phebe entered the hall that night, leaning on Gerald Bayne's arm, the first eyes she met were Gilbert's, not stern nor reproachful, but coldly contemptuous.

He had driven her out of his heart utterly, she thought, with a numb pain at her heart that was like despair. After that she was gay with scarce an effort, so wildly, recklessly gay that everybody stared at her in surprise, and wondered what had changed shy, modest little Phebe Hanson so suddenly into something very like a brilliant, dashing belle.

Only once Gilbert asked her to dance. She felt as if she had hardly strength enough to do it, but there were so many eyes upon her, and it would look so strange for her to refuse! It was a waltz, and at the first notes of the band Phebe remembered the music; they had danced to it before, she and Gilbert, on the night when they had first met, in that very hall. Gilbert looked steadily in her eyes at those first notes.

"You have heard that music before," he said.

"Have I? I don't remember," she answered, carelessly, blushing scarlet, the next moment, at the falsehood.

"Some people forget easily," said Gilbert, bitterly. And after that he said nothing.

Captain Matthews was quite a favorite, especially among the young ladies, yet Gilbert Drew, watching him furtively, saw that it was Phebe whom his eyes followed, it was at her side that he lingered longest. And Gilbert fairly ground his teeth with anger. Not even for Gerald Bayne had he so great a dislike as for this gallant young captain, for he could not help fancying him, in some way, the cause of Phebe's faithlessness. Captain Matthews was evidently desirous of being friendly with him, but Gilbert's replies to all his advances had been so curt that he had at last given up the attempt. But as the gay company separated that night he followed Gilbert down the street.

"Good-by, captain," he said, heartily, holding out his hand. "Our tracks divide again to-morrow; you'll go in the morning, I suppose, and I shan't be ready till afternoon, but unexpected things are always happening in this world—which is a queer craft to sail in, any way—and maybe, in some port or other, we two'll meet again."

"I hope not!" said Gilbert Drew, sharply; and strode on, disregarding the proffered hand.

It was very rude, certainly, and it was very unlike the brave, young sailor, who had been wont to have a kind, courteous word for everybody. But just before he left the hall he had witnessed a scene the remembrance of which was ranking in his mind at that moment. Captain Matthews was saying good-by to Phebe; they were alone together, in the little ante-room, and Gilbert Drew, pressing by the door, had seen his arm around her waist, her head resting on his shoulder, while her tears were dropping like rain over her white face; and he saw Captain Matthews bend his head and press his lips to hers. Who could blame him for not feeling disposed to be friendly with him?

A dark flash mounted to Captain Matthews's brow as he watched him striking off in the darkness.

"A queer fellow, that," he said to himself. "Not any too amiable. I guess Phebe is well rid of him. But I wish I could make her tell me why she threw him over!"

Early the next morning the Lapwing, with a favoring wind and sunshine glittering on her sails, was leaving Rockport far behind her; could he ever get so far away that the echo of Phebe's wedding bells would not reach him? Gilbert Drew wondered. And Phebe, in a sea-ward window, was straining her eyes to catch the last gleam of those sails which were bearing her heart away.

Six months have passed, and this morning there is no sunshine glittering on the Lapwing's sails. A darkness like night hangs over the sea, a fierce gale is blowing, and thunderbolts crashing about the brave little ship as she struggles in the black, raging waves. She bears herself gallantly, though her masts have snapped like straws, and at every fresh gust she strains; and grinds, and groans; but there is no hope. Gilbert Drew knows it. The Lapwing was a stanch vessel, and she had borne much; all her outward voyage was untroubled, they were vexed by calms one day, and tormented by tempests the next. And now the Lapwing will never see the end of the homeward voyage on which she has started, and there is little doubt but that before this tempest has spent itself, captain and crew will have gone on that longer voyage from which there is no home-coming. The hold was filling rapidly.

"We must take to the boats; it is our only hope, though no boat can live long in such a sea as this," the captain said, hoarsely. He was no coward, but this looking forward to a certain death was terrible to him. Life was so fresh and strong in all his veins, and, though Fate had been very unkind to him, and his dearest hopes had been dashed, it was still precious to him, for,

"Whatever crazy sorrow saith,
No life that breathes with human breath
Has ever truly longed for death."

"It is certain death to take to the boats," the mate said. "Fire the gun once more. There may be a ship near."

"If there were, who would run to certain death for the chance of helping us?" said Gilbert Drew.

But the gun went booming out over the waters, and there they waited for what seemed an eternity, and then, far off and faint, an answer came—or was it only a distant peal of thunder? But there was no time to wait longer. The boats were lowered and quickly filled—more than filled. Gilbert Drew leaned over the vessel's side, after they were all in the boats but him, and looked at the little, crowded boat that awaited him.

"The boat is full enough already; there is no chance for so many," he said. "I shall stand by the ship."

Prayers were of no avail, and they went, at last, and left him, knowing that the Lapwing when she sank would draw them in also. And Gilbert Drew stood, alone, on the vessel's deck, waiting for death.

But, suddenly, in a pause of the wind he heard a shout; with a sudden thrill of hope he answered. A moment after a boat that rode the waves gallantly was beside the Lapwing. There were five or six men in it; one of them was standing up straight and tall, and a sudden flash of lightning showed Gilbert his face—it was Captain Matthews. Just as Gilbert Drew swung himself into the boat a flying spar struck Captain Matthews on the head and knocked him—thank God, not into the sea—but into the boat, white and senseless. Without a word Gilbert took his oar, and they rowed away for life towards the vessel, the Winged Rover, that Gilbert had last seen in the quiet little harbor of Rockport. It was but a short distance, and two boats from his own ship had already reached it, the crews faint and exhausted, but without one man missing. They lifted Captain Matthews over the vessel's side, and laid him on the deck. A stream of blood was flowing from his mouth, but he opened his eyes and looked up into Gilbert's face as he bent over him.

"I told you we might meet again," he said, faintly.

"You are too weak to talk," said Gilbert.

In spite of himself he had still a feeling of enmity against this man who had saved his life. That life was scarcely a precious gift coming from his hands, he thought.

"No, I am not too weak, but I think I am dying. No matter; your life is worth more than mine. But I had something to do; you must do it for me. You must stop Phebe from marrying that man! Why, you don't know who he is! He is what I am, an escaped convict—only he is a thousand times worse than I ever was," he added, looking up eagerly, as if to see whether his listener believed; "he was the one who led me into evil; if it had not been for him I should never have broken my mother's heart nor brought disgrace upon poor little Phebe. And it is so strange that I shouldn't have known him. But we parted company that night when we got out of jail together, and I had never seen him since then! How was I to think that Mr. Gerald Bayne, the richest and most respectable man in Rockport, was Bill Eckley? I should never have known it—a wig and false whiskers changed him even more than they did me—if I hadn't met John Harrison, he was another of my old comrades in Havana, and he told me where Bill was and what a fine show he made. And now I shall never get there to tell poor little Phebe, and if you should be too late! Promise me that nothing shall hinder you, that you'll see her just as soon as possible;" and he caught at Gilbert's hand, gasping painfully in his eagerness.

"What is she, what is Phebe to you?" cried Gilbert, eagerly, almost fiercely.

"To me? She is my sister. Better for her, poor child, if she hadn't been!" he said.

Gilbert remembered vaguely that he had heard stories from the village gossips of Joe Hanson, who had been a black sheep, a thorn in his mother's side, but he thought he was dead long ago.

"They think in Rockport that I am dead," he said, seeing Gilbert's bewilderment. "You have heard so, I suppose. The jailor got up the story that we had committed suicide, because he was to blame for our getting out so easily, and we were willing enough never to contradict it. I had a chance to begin the world anew if I could disguise myself so that nobody would recognize me, and I broke away from my old comrades and tried hard to live a better life. I never meant to go back to Rockport at all after my mother died, I had brought disgrace enough on my family; but chance, or fate, or Providence, whatever you please, sent me there, and I couldn't resist the temptation to tell little Phebe who I was, and see if she would turn against me. Nobody knew me there, unless Bill Eckley did. I think sometimes that he did, from glances he gave me; and I think, too, that he may have persuaded Phebe to marry him by threatening to deliver me up. She acted so strangely; she seemed to think so much of you, at first, and she would not tell me any reason why she threw you over."

A light broke in upon Gilbert's bewildered mind—a light by which all the dark past was made clear.

"I understand now, and I know you are right. I know she loved me," he said. "But I—I—you don't know how much I have wronged you! And to think that it is to you that I owe my life!"

"That was nothing. I should have done it for anybody. When that first boat reached the vessel, and the men said they had left their captain on board the sinking ship, I resolved to rescue him, or die in the attempt, for very likely, I said to myself, he is an honest, honorable man, whose life is worth much more to himself and his friends than mine is to me. But when I heard that the vessel was the Lapwing, and knew that it must be you, I was more eager to go, for Phebe's sake, for I thought if what I fancied was true, my saving her lover's life might atone in some measure for the trouble I had brought upon her. If you are only in time to save her! if she is not married to that man!"

"But you may live to tell her, yourself," said Gilbert, hopefully.

He shook his head, slowly.

"No, no, I shall never see her again. And it is just as well; I should only bring disgrace upon her. Something or somebody would be sure to betray me, sooner or later. And my life hasn't been so pleasant that I should prize it highly. It is hard to know that you have no right to breathe the free air, that every man you meet may be a spy sent to watch you. And it is hard to get to going right when you have begun all wrong. But God knows I've tried and—it'll be all right where I'm going," he said, wearily.

Gilbert watched over him unceasingly, but all efforts to save his life were unavailing. He had given it to save Phebe's lover.

The homeward voyage of the Winged Rover was a rapid one, but to Gilbert Drew it seemed that ages passed before he reached Rockport. He asked no one of the village people whom he met for news of Phebe. He could not find voice to, but he walked straight to the little stone cottage and entered the parlor unbidden.

A dress of snowy silk and a white bridal veil lay on the sofa, and his lips grew white with dread. But Phebe came into the room. She started back when she saw him, then held out her hands involuntarily, with a little glad cry, drawing them back the next instant and making an effort to greet him quietly and coldly.

"Phebe, you have not worn those?" he said, pointing to the sofa.

"No, I shall wear them to-morrow."

He saw the look of dread, almost of agony, that came over her face, and caught her in his arms.

"My darling, you shall never wear them," he cried; and then he told all his story rapidly, breathlessly. At first Phebe was only able to realize the fact of Joe's death. But joy mingled with her grief when she understood the whole.

Mr. Gerald Bayne, as he called himself, needed no urging to induce him to leave Rockport for parts unknown, after an interview which Gilbert had with him that day. It was better so than to accuse him openly for Phebe's sake, Gilbert thought. Gossips were busy enough with the story as it was.

Two months later the India muslin dress that Phebe had laid carefully away, she thought forever, was brought out again; and when the Esperanza, Captain Drew's new ship, sailed out of Rockport harbor, a happy little bride went in her.

THE STAR IN THE EAST.

BY LOUISE DUPRE.

Blow joyfully, O winter wind,
With silver-bell notes in your breath!
A star peers through the darkness blind,
Whose brightness breaks the shadow, death.

Rising above the eastern hills,
Its gleams light all the sad, old earth;
Cast rays of cheer 'cross wintry seas,
Bring gladness to the lowliest hearth.

Its joy fills every pealing bell,
Thrills from the organ's mellow note;
Its praises ring from every tongue,
Swell solemnly from every throat.

Its peace lies deep in every heart,
Hiding all grief, and care, and pain;
This glorious birthnight of our King,
The weary world is young again.

The altar glows with Christmas flowers,
Rich wreaths of incense fill the air;
Snow-white, snow-pure, O Lord, may be
Our altar-flowers of praise and prayer!

The windows blaze with ruddy light,
Palace and cottage share the feast;
On prison roofs and dungeon walls
Fall the glad starbeams from the east.

O wondrous star, whose promise blest
Is all our joy this Christmas night!
Surely our Christ is born, and we
No longer wander without light.

O holy night! in winter's clear
And sparkling coronal the gem;
Since once beneath its purple sky
Was born the babe of Bethlehem.

UNDER SUSPICION.

BY W. H. MACY.

My watchmate Harry Langley and I went on shore one Sunday afternoon, our ship lying moored in the beautiful bay of Papeete, in the island of Tahiti. It was soon after its occupation by the French under the reign of Louis Philippe, and the raising of the protectorate flag over the territory of a people as yet partially unsubdued. Some mountain tribes still held out against the invaders; though the sovereign Pomare had submitted to necessity, retaining an empty title; a crown without a sceptre.

The little shops and cabarets which had sprung up under the new regime were all open, for Sunday appeared to be the liveliest day of the week. Soldiers in gay uniforms were sauntering idly under the shade of the cocoa-palms, or singing in the little places of resort, hob-nob with sailors in white frocks from La Sirene frigate, moored in the bay. The sons of the soil, for the most part thoughtful and sullen, were also to be met with in considerable numbers; while the native women, their shining black hair encircled with bright-colored wreaths, mingled freely with the Frenchmen, seemingly ready to hug their chains—and their jailors, as well.

Having disposed of a bottle of vin ordinaire, after the fashion of our own country, by perpendicular drinks, instead of spending an hour or two in sipping it, like the soldiers seated at the little tables near by, we started for a stroll, out of town. We intended to return by sundown, as at that hour, the regimental bands, reinforced by the musicians from the frigate, were to begin their evening concert in the park fronting the governor's mansion.

We soon passed out of the stir and bustle of Papeete, and settled into a slow, leisurously walk, occasionally meeting and passing a soldier or two, more rarely a native, stopping frequently to admire the beauty and luxuriance of the scene, or to knock down an orange from its tree, and to suck the refreshing juice. We rambled on further than we had intended at starting, and coming to a retired spot, where the shade was invitingly cool, threw ourselves down for a rest.

I had closed my eyes, and was fast losing my consciousness of surrounding objects, when I was roused by the voice of Langley.

"That young fellow must be practising for the stage," said he.

I raised my head upon my arm, and followed the direction of my friend's glance, down the vista formed by the trees which grew in open order. Some two hundred yards from us, an officer, in the uniform of the "Infanterie de la Marine," was pacing back and forth under the trees, with drawn sword, making passes at empty air. Now and then he stopped and struck an attitude, plying his weapon with great skill and spirit, as if fighting an imaginary opponent. He did not appear to be aware of our vicinity, and, with a curiosity quite natural under the circumstances, we rose with one accord for a nearer view.

By dint of Indian tactics, skirmishing in range of the largest trees, we managed to approach within fifty yards or less, and again ensconced ourselves in a position to see without being seen. The officer, a mere stripling, with beardless cheek and slender figure, still continued his performance or rehearsal, or whatever it might be, accompanied by words doubtless suited to the action. But so limited was our knowledge of the French language, that neither of us was much the wiser for this soliloquy.

"Mad as a March hare," I whispered to Langley.

"I hope not," he replied, "for if he should get sight at us, he might give chase. 'Twouldn't be pleasant to look at that shining small-sword over one's shoulder. But I don't believe he is quite a madman—only a Frenchman."

"But here comes another?" said I. "Lie close."

The young soldier put up his sword and advanced to meet the new comer, who was habited in naval uniform, as an aspirant or midshipman. He was also a young man, scarcely older than the other, though stouter in frame, and with a deeper tinge of bronze in his cheek.

The two saluted each other politely, though not cordially; and, after exchanging a few words in a low tone, drew and measured swords. They then took their stands, confronting each other, and, as the weapons crossed, the expression in their set faces told the object of their meeting. They were, indeed, Frenchmen; but neither actors nor maniacs.

"It's a duel to the death?" I whispered to my shipmate.

"And we are the only witnesses. Strange that they should meet without seconds."

"It's a secret affair, of course. They are forbidden to fight, and have stolen away to meet here alone, by appointment."

"Hadn't we better show ourselves, and volunteer to see fair play?"

"No," said I. "If they want to fight, I'm not going to interrupt them. And I must confess, I've a curiosity to see a live duel, though it seems a pity that one, perhaps both, of these fine young fellows may be spitted like a robin, before our eyes, in a very few minutes."

"Hush! they're beginning to play," said Langley. "It's too late to move now, we might be the means of killing one of them, by throwing him off his guard."

By this time we had eyes and ears for nothing but the fight. With suspended breath we watched the agile movements of the combatants, and the flash of their deadly weapons in full play. They appeared to be very equally matched in respect of skill, and after a rapid succession of passes, they fell back for a momentary rest without having drawn blood.

"We might enter on the stage, now," said Langley, "and save a fool's life—perhaps two."

"No," said I. "It's only postponing the matter—they would meet again. Let them fight it out."

For neither my comrade nor I entertained for a moment the idea of turning informer to prevent a second meeting of the fiery youths. Such a course would have been foreign to all the teachings of our seaman's creed. Besides, I must plead guilty to a full share of curiosity to see the result of the duel. I was a victim of that fascination by which all men are more or less affected in similar cases.

Again the ringing sound of steel broke the stillness, as the duellists attacked each other with even greater vigor than before. But the superior strength and endurance of the naval officer now began to tell in his favor. He was also cooler and more wary than his antagonist, who, as he lost wind, also lost caution, and exposed himself to a deadly thrust. Too late I regretted that I had looked passively on to see a fellow-creature slaughtered, when I might have postponed, and perhaps prevented it. I can never forget the sickening feeling I experienced, as I saw the life-blood of the young soldier dyeing the grass, while the sword dropped from his powerful grasp. A swaying motion of the body; a dull thud upon the grass; and the fight was over. The survivor carefully wiped the traces from his weapon; cast a look more in sorrow than in anger upon his late foe; and disappeared rapidly in the direction of Papeete.

Langley and I, still obeying the fascination which had held us to the spot, approached the body as soon as the midshipman had passed out of sight. With a shudder I looked down into the young face, set in death, and still distorted in angry passion. I stooped over him and opened the breast of his coat, revealing the fatal wound from which the blood was oozing. His own sword lay where it had fallen, partly under his body. My shipmate pulled it out, thickly stained, with the blood of its unfortunate owner only, for his opponent had escaped without a scratch.

We were both so absorbed that we had not observed the approach of a corporal and a file of soldiers, fully armed, as if coming in from some outpost or picket station. They were close upon us before we were aware of their presence, and we were seized, before we could think of either resistance or escape. We were both crouching over the body, I adjusting the coat upon the breast, with one hand inside, as if in the act of rifling the pockets, and Langley overlooking the operation with the bloody sword still in his hand. To explain the matter was out of the question, as they understood even less of our tongue than we did of theirs.

One man was left to guard the body until the proper officers should be sent to examine it, and we two innocent seamen were marched into town, and delivered up at the provost-marshal's headquarters, charged with murder and robbery. We were not even allowed the opportunity of conferring together, but placed in separate cells at the guard-house.

We were arraigned the next morning before a semi-military court of investigation. Our captain was present to see and hear, if not to understand; and an interpreter was provided, to make known to us the charge of which we were accused, as well as to translate our statements in reply to it. The corporal was summoned as the principal witness, and testified to the manner in which he had found the body of the sous-lieutenant Gantier, with the two men stooping over it. He told how he saw me, with my hand, as he supposed, in the breast-pocket of the deceased, and my shipmate, Langley, still holding the bloody weapon with which the deed must have been done. His statement was, of course, fully corroborated by those of his men.

The sword taken from Langley was found to fit the wound. It was identified by the comrades of Gantier as his own, and the opinion was expressed in court that we must have taken it from his side while he was sleeping. It appeared in evidence that his pocket-book and other little matters were found safe on his person; but this was not worth much in our favor. The natural inference was, that we had been surprised and arrested before we had time to complete the robbery.

Langley and I were kept at opposite sides of the room, to prevent the possibility of collusion, and were now called upon, one at a time, for our own statements of the affair. Of course they agreed exactly, inasmuch as each told the whole truth.

"This story may be true," said the presiding officer of the court. "At all events, the prisoners must have every chance to sift it to the bottom, that justice may be done. Could you recognize the man who, as you say, fought this duel with Gantier?" he demanded, addressing me through the interpreter.

I thought I could; and my shipmate, in reply to the same question, was equally confident. A note was written and sent off at once, summoning all the midshipmen of La Sirene to appear in court.

Some five or six came on shore and were confronted with us, but we were obliged to confess, without hesitation, that we had never seen either of them before.

We learned, however, that a boat expedition had been sent away during the night on secret service, and that two midshipmen were among the officers in charge of it. One of these two might, perhaps, be our man; and we were remanded to the guard-house to await their return.

But our captain was allowed to confer with us while in court; and, by a little management on his part, we learned the names of the two absent officers—Delavigne and Rigaud. This was done at Langley's suggestion, though I was at a loss to know of what consequence it could be to him.

"Rigaud is our man," he whispered, as soon as he heard the two names.

"How do you know that?" I asked, in surprise.

"I have something to prove it, but I cannot show it to you here. I am sorry to inform upon him, as he will probably be dismissed the service in disgrace, if he does not meet with any other punishment. But I see no way to get ourselves out of the scrape unless by getting him into it."

We had no time for further words, but were conducted again to our separate quarters. I was left to wonder at my shipmate's meaning, until another day cleared up the mystery.

My door was thrown open, and, still guarded, I was conducted to the military hospital, where, by a gesture, my attention was directed to a wounded officer stretched upon a couch. A single glance was enough; and I signified to the interpreter that the duellist was before us. I passed on, and Langley, who came directly behind me, also recognized Rigaud at once. He had, it seems, been mortally wounded in a skirmish with a hostile party of natives at Tiarel, while on duty in one of the frigate's boats. He opened his eyes at the noise made by our party, and made some inquiry of the surgeon who stood at his side. When informed of the reason of our being brought to the hospital, he raised himself in his bed, in spite of the surgeon's remonstrance against his making the exertion. He explained the matter in French to all present, then addressing us, somewhat to our surprise, in fluent English, "Boys," said he, "you need not go further to prove your innocence; for, as you suppose, I am the man who killed Lieutenant Gautier. It does not matter to explain to you the cause of quarrel between us, but, under the code of honor, as understood among military men, I could not avoid fighting him. He insisted upon a duel without seconds or witnesses. I have but a few hours to live, and I am glad to know that you were present and saw the whole affair. It is well that I have fallen honorably in my country's service, and thus escaped disgrace and expulsion. Fortunately, I have lived long enough to establish your innocence of the charge of murder; and I trust you are ready to testify that Gautier was killed in fair fight, standing an equal chance with myself."

The sufferer fell back exhausted upon his bed, from which he never rose again. Almost his last words of consciousness were those addressed to us.

Langley produced a gold ring which he had picked up on the sword by the body of Gautier. Inside the ring was engraved the name "A. Rigaud." He handed this to the dying man, who recognized it and returned it to my comrade, with a sign that he should keep it.

The dying words of the young midshipman, spoken in the hearing of so many witnesses, of course satisfied every one of our innocence. We both signed and swore to a full statement of the circumstances of the duel, and returned to our ship, speculating upon what might have been our fate had Rigaud died before having seen us.

Langley still preserves the marked ring as a memento of this strange incident; and the two young Frenchmen sleep side by side beneath the shade of the cocoa-palms at Papeete.

Tried by Fire.

BY MRS. R. B. EDSON.

WHEN, under the pressure of some sudden or seductive temptation, a man—a strong man, perhaps—goes down, the air is full of reproaches and marvels at his weakness, or wickedness. Every one is sure he could have withstood the temptation, and talks volubly of what he should do in such and such cases, were he in such and such a one's place. Doubtless he is honest in his belief, for very few thoroughly know themselves. In the ordinary course of events, no great temptation arising, they are moral and upright. They get a reputation for goodness, and bear a fair character before the community. By-and-by some insidious temptation rises in their way; they turn away from it, they struggle against it, they bring all their previous good character to bear upon it, but still it stands in the way and confronts them, and they tremble as they find a hitherto unsuspected element in their nature responding to it. God pity them if they fall!—their fellows will not. All the bitterness of struggle, all the passionate depths of anguish and travail of spirit, and alas! all the fierce after-aching of regret and remorse, are quite lost sight of in the sweeping denunciations of those who have never been tempted.

I would not be understood as offering excuse or palliation for wrong doing. Sin cannot be too strongly denounced; but in view of the weakness of human nature, and our own liability to error, might we not be more lenient towards the sinner, even while condemning his sin? Are the two so closely allied as to be utterly inseparable in our thoughts? Might not the return to virtue and integrity be made easier by a more liberal infusion of Christian charity in the popular heart, and thousands, who have taken the "first false step," saved from the easy, downward way? What is the true course for Christian men and women to take in this matter? Shall they stand aside, rejoicing in their own strength, and purity, and inflexible virtue, thanking God that "they are not as other men are, or even these publicans," or, is there a more tender and Christly way for dealing with the erring?

I beg that none, in their haste to "get at the story," will skip the above because it has the look of sermonizing. They are serious questions, it is true. That they appeal to every community, and touch both the romance and reality of life, is equally true.

I do not imagine Grantley to have been much above the average of New England towns in regard to virtue and religion. It had its scores of pious people who frowned upon all not of their peculiar stamp and superscription; it had also its fair quota of scoffers who lived, like parasites, on the shortcomings of those same pious ones. It had, like other small towns, its petty aristocracy, its middle and lower classes; and, taken altogether, was perhaps a fair sample of the majority of moderate-sized New England towns.

Alfred Lindsey had a good deal to contend with from the start. The class of people are not yet extinct who believe it impossible for any good thing to come out of Nazareth. There were those who believed it the wildest recklessness in James Sherwood in taking a Lindsey into his store, even in the irresponsible situation of errand boy. It had been more a matter of impulse with him, than from any deliberate benevolence he felt towards young Lindsey, or the class he represented.

I do not mean to insinuate that the Lindseys were sinners above other men. Indeed, I rather incline to the opinion that, according to their gifts and opportunities, they were full as good as their betters. To be sure their gifts, peculiarly considered, were exceedingly small, and they were not the sort of people to make opportunities.

Had they been fortunate enough to have been born rich, they would have made good-natured, respectable citizens, but not men and women of energy and enterprise. There was, perhaps, half a dozen families of them, and all singularly alike in character and disposition. If there be one thing above another a genuine New Englander thoroughly despises, it is shiftlessness and indolence. In a country where every man is expected to invent at least a patent gridiron, or an "improvement" on one already invented, people of the Lindsey pattern are at a sorry discount.

For three generations the Lindseys had been "hewers of wood and drawers of water." Some of them had been offered opportunities of becoming artisans, but so long as they got enough to eat, and an extra shirt in case of emergency, they were content to let well enough alone. They never went to church, and so had no need of fine clothes. They had very little literary taste—the annual Town Report and Farmer's Almanac furnished their year's reading. This again was not particularly expensive. They had no foolish pride of appearance, and old hats and coats, though a trifle less transparent, had the merit of costing less than window glass. They believed in taking the world easy. They fulfilled, literally, the command to "take no thought for the morrow." They worked barely enough to keep them out of the almshouse, yet were forever hovering on its verge. People said it was "no use trying to help them," though I am rather doubtful about the experiment ever having been tried.

Up to his twelfth year Alfred Lindsey had followed in the steps of his predecessors. He had lived principally in the streets, picking up occasional jobs of work and a pretty good knowledge of human nature. No one thought to look under the tattered hat, or they might have seen a pair of brilliant gray eyes looking keenly out at the world—the busy, restless, struggling world, upon which he was only a fungus growth. Some such thoughts crept into his brain, sometimes. A longing to crowd himself into the busy ring and fight his way with the rest sometimes came over him, keeping him awake for hours after his two brothers, George and Ben, were asleep. But these never seemed to be an opening. No one saw him, apparently, and so he waited till one day Fate cleft the way for him.

An unusually heavy fall of snow, solidified by frequent rains falling upon and freezing in it, had distinguished the winter. The streams were already swollen beyond precedent, when a strong south wind, accompanied by a heavy rain, set in. Mr. Sherwood's residence was situated on a little knoll, below which the river bent abruptly, broadening to a beautiful pond, dotted in summer with snowy lilies, and in winter by gay parties of skaters.

"Papa, isn't the river rising?" Corrie Sherwood asked, pausing at the door, on her way to her chamber.

"A little, I presume; but it won't rise high enough to reach you, little one, if you hurry off to bed," the father answered, smiling at the flushed little face, looking out of a tangle of soft chestnut hair.

"You are quite sure, papa?"

"Sure! Why, Corraline, what puts such absurd thoughts in your usually wise little head? The river never rises half way up the knoll. Go to bed without any fears, my child."

"The river does roar fearfully, James," Mrs. Sherwood said, going to the door and opening it a little way.

"Well, my dear, it's chained fast to its bed, and can't get away," he answered, with the air of a man who is conscious of having said a clever thing.

Mr. Sherwood was the merchant of Grantley. There were several grocers, and simple "store-keepers," but only one Mahomet. The others were respectable citizens, merely—Mr. Sherwood eminent and honored. All the "best" people in Grantley—I use the word in its social, not its moral sense—patronized his house. If he sometimes took advantage of his popularity and respectability, and sold the same quality of goods at a slight advance on the other Grantley dealers, it did not lessen his sales. The prestige of trading at Sherwood's was worth a small percentage.

"I wish you would go to the door and look out before retiring," his wife continued, strangely oblivious of her lord's cleverness.

"You and Corrie are nervous," he said, rising.

Standing on the broad, polished granite steps of his elegant residence, Mr. Sherwood looked down, in a double sense, at the low, tumble-down hovel of Tom Lindsey. It stood at the edge of the pond, in close proximity to the old "grist mill." The light shone out from one of the dilapidated windows, revealing a wild, turbid sea of broken ice and floating boards.

"I shouldn't be surprised if it carried off Tom's hut. I'm sure I hope it will!" Mr. Sherwood said, coming back to his warm, luxurious room. "The pond is full of floating boards, so I suppose Morton has suffered some. But he piled his boards on the river's edge to save storage. But I'm not afraid of its injuring me, and other people must look out for themselves;" with which quite unheeded-of sentiment Mr. Sherwood, merchant, retired to his virtuous repose.

"Papa, papa, wake up! Allie Lindsey is out here in a boat. Their house is carried away; and O papa, the water is all over the meadow!"

Mr. Sherwood sprang hastily to his feet, thoroughly awake.

"How came you to know about this, Corrie?" he asked, as he hastily dressed.

"Allie woke me, shouting under the windows. I don't think I was sleeping very soundly, papa."

"Where is the boy, now?"

"Gone back with his mother—O, I didn't tell you his father, and George and Ben were carried away in the house. He managed to get into a boat, and took his mother out of the window, but the ice got between them and he couldn't save the rest. Ben jumped out into the water, but just as Alfred was reaching to draw him into the boat, a great piece of ice came crashing against it, carrying down poor Ben, and crushing some of the fingers on Alfred's hand. Then he saw how the water was up round our house, and he rowed clear up here, with that wounded hand, too, to tell us of the danger. Isn't he a real hero, papa?" the bright eyes flashing out their admiration.

"Yes, Corrie," he answered, promptly, "a true hero."

It was hard work, but by daylight the cows, horses and swine had been driven to a place of safety. Had the work been delayed two hours longer three thousand dollars worth of stock would have perished in the waters. The water was nearly five feet deep in front of the house, and the broad, beautiful meadows stretching back to the wood was one broad lake of foamy waters, when the gray light of morning broke over the scene.

Alfred Lindsey completed his bravery by rowing against the current nearly a mile, and procuring men and boats to take away the beleaguered family.

Poor Tom Lindsey and his two boys were washed up on the meadows, crushed almost past recognition by the ice and timber. Only Alfred and his mother, a weak, fair-faced woman utterly devoid of ambition or energy, were left, and they utterly destitute and shelterless.

"I ought to do something for Alf," Mr.

Sherwood said, after the excitement and peril were beginning to subside in Grantley, and he had ventured back to his house again. "I hardly know what is best. Giving to the Lindseys is like pouring water into a sieve."

"Why don't you hire him, papa?" Corrie asked, soberly. "You could pay him more than he earned if you thought it was right, you know."

And this was how it happened that Alfred Lindsey became a clerk—for he was soon promoted from his original post of errand boy—in the highly respectable mercantile establishment of Sherwood & Son.

As I said before, young Lindsey had much to contend against. First came his own long-seated indolence. He had never been confined to labor, and though his resolution was strong to succeed, the flesh was sometimes weak. His mother, grown weak and fretful, grew also selfishly unreasonable, and instead of helping him forward, was a perpetual drag and hindrance to his efforts, by her demands on his time and purse. With their improved finances she had developed a weak vanity for dress, and upbraided Alfred that he could not indulge her in her rapidly increasing wants. Then there were the prejudices of all Grantley to overcome.

The thriftlessness, and indolence, and impotence of a score or more of uncles and cousins was a continual "old man of the sea" about his neck. No one thought to honor him the more because of them, recognizing the merit that had vindicated itself despite untoward circumstances. He was "a Lindsey," and that fact was never lost sight of, but continually urged against him, as in itself something too monstrous for forgiveness. We all know how the stigma of a name will cling to one, particularly in a country town, where every one's antecedents are thoroughly known, and how hard it is for one of a proscribed family to rise above the level, or pass the bounds society and common opinion have set for him.

It argued therefore no ordinary strength of character when at twenty-one Alfred Lindsey had so far overcome and lived down the prejudices of his townsmen as to be admitted—still a little reluctantly, but yet admitted—to be a young man of ability and promise.

From the first Robert Sherwood had been Alfred's firm friend. Five years his senior, with fine natural abilities, and a superior education, it is easy to see the great help he could be to a boy like young Lindsey, if he chose. He did so choose. He spent his evenings in teaching him those studies which he had himself acquired at great expense, and rejoiced enthusiastically when the pupil's thought sometimes outstripped the teacher's. He braved even his father's displeasure, by recognizing him as his social equal upon every possible occasion, and by his friendship and countenance forced others to.

"If I am anything, it is you who have made me," Alfred said, his lips trembling in spite of him, as Robert Sherwood put a paper in his hand on his twenty-first birthday, declaring him a junior partner in the great house of Sherwood & Son.

"Nonsense! You've earned the compliment—for it's not much more, you have got to put work instead of money into the firm, and I know we shall be the gainers)—fully and faithfully. I hope, of course, it will be better for you, but it's no more than fair to tell you that things don't look just as I wish they did, for your sake, particularly. I'd like to promise you a larger income than I dare."

"I had not thought of the income," he answered, earnestly.

"You are more unselfish than I," he replied, a slight color rising to his forehead. Adding, after a little pause, "I wish I had had the good fortune to have been born poor. The unlimited use of money is little better than a curse to a boy."

"It did not spoil you, at least."

"It entailed a curse that will follow me to my grave!" he said, vehemently. "It has made it a necessity—it has fitted a yoke upon my manhood, and I cannot break it! Well, perhaps it will all come out right—I mean that it shall," he added, earnestly, his fine face a trifle clouded.

"If you are in any sort of trouble—now, or ever—where I can serve you, I will do it gladly, even if it costs me my life, or what is more, my good name," was Lindsey's impulsive answer.

"I hope we shall be reduced to no such desperate strait as that, my dear fellow," he replied, smiling, "but your good-will is just as truly appreciated. By the way, I suppose you received Corrie's note?"

"Yes, but I don't think I had better come," coloring vividly.

"Not come! Why, it is got up expressly in your honor, as I read at once through that transparent little sister of mine. I would like to see you try to settle it with her, if you alighted her invitation."

"I am sorry to say it, because I know it will pain you," Lindsey said, hesitatingly; "but I am quite sure it would be more satisfactory if I absent myself. Don't think I mind it, it is very natural, and I can easily make an excuse that—"

"You mean that it would be more satisfactory to my father, I suppose, Lindsey?" he interrupted, gravely.

"I think so, yea."

"But am I of no account? And Corrie—why the girl would cry herself sick over the disappointment! You are a most wonderful hero in her eyes, Alf. Her worship dates back to the time of the flood—the flood on the Connecticut, I mean," he said, laughing to cover his companion's embarrassment.

"Miss Sherwood has been very kind to remember a poor fellow like me, at all," he replied, just a little stiffly. Then, his face softening, "I won't mind, though, if it will be any pleasure to you to have me come."

"It is not simply my pleasure that I am considering—you know it would be that—but the right of the thing. I do not consider one man's prejudices of birth should stand in another's way, a barrier between him and his rightful position. My father understands that you are to come."

"Very well; it is settled, then," Lindsey replied, turning to his desk.

But all day the thought annoyed and troubled him—the thought that he should not be quite welcome in the house of his wealthy senior. He was not at all blinded by the partnership just conferred on him. He knew quite well whom to thank for that. Besides he was proud, if he was "only a Lindsey." He knew very well that he should receive cool looks and scanty recognition from a portion of the guests. They were too well-bred to be positively rude; but there is the quiet ignoring of one's presence—the grouping together, leaving one quite alone and aside, with a score of other little petty circumstances, that tend to make the prescribed one uncomfortable. He expected to be subject to any or all of these annoyances, but because Robert desired it he would submit to the ordeal. Possibly, too, though I cannot say, considering that he did not himself admit it, the pretty pink-tinted note which Corrie had sent him had some influence in his decision.

Through all the nine years since that night of storm and terror, Corrie Sherwood had been different to him from other girls. He blushed, even now, at the remembrance of the tearful kiss she had given him when he had lifted her light form out of the boat, in the gray dawn of that wild, frightful February morning. To be sure it was but a childish impulse of gratitude, and neither of them was more than a child, but he had never forgotten! The memory had been, simple as it was, a strong incentive to effort. Not that any presumptive or sentimental passion had grown out of it. He had never dreamed of being in love, in the received sense of the term, with his employer's daughter; yet her smile was brighter than sunshine to him, and her friendship the one thing desirable in life.

Contrary to young Lindsey's expectations, he was cordially received; the fact of his admittance into the firm acting a most potent open sesame into that mystical circle known as "good society." Mr. Sherwood, too, met him more cordially than he had expected, though still with a little stiff, patronizing air, which said, quite as plainly as words, "You are very welcome among us, and under the circumstances have a right here, but I beg you to remember that you are not exactly of us—you understand."

But Robert and Corrie paid him the most flattering attentions, and as he promenaded up and down the long, brilliantly-lighted rooms, with Corrie Sherwood's fair hand resting lightly on his arm, and her beautiful eyes lifted trustingly to his face, he forgot all annoyance and discomfort, and lived only in the enchanted present.

But Fate, which takes a malicious pleasure in making people miserable, dropped a grain of bitterness into this cup of sweetness. It was near the close of the evening's entertainment, and Lindsey had sat down for a moment near the window. The blinds were closed, but the window itself was open. Two gentlemen were talking outside. The first voice he did not at once recognize, only the words sent the blood in a quick wave from his heart to his face.

"Ah, Sherwood," the man said, with a short laugh, "everybody understands the move, as cleverly as it has been done. Of course you are expected to deny it; but any one with half an eye can see where the next partnership is to come in."

"By Heaven! Mordaunt, I'll not listen to such senseless talk," cried a quick, passionate voice, which poor Lindsey knew all too well.

"Ah! is that it?" in a surprised tone. "I thought you understood the turn matters were taking, and took the young fellow into the firm to take the curse off—pardon me for saying it.”

“Perhaps you will enlighten me a little in regard to this matter,” Mr. Sherwood said, in his haughtiest tone. “It is not possible any one has dared associate my daughter’s name with this—this Lindsey?”

“I am sorry I mentioned it, really,” Mor-daunt said, apologetically. “It has been thought possible and even probable that Lindsey would some day marry Miss Sherwood. You surely are not blind to the fact that they are very intimate—for friends.”

“I would sooner see my daughter lying dead, than married to a Lindsey, Mr. Mor-daunt. You can contradict all such shameful rumors,” Sherwood replied, coldly.

If the allegation had been true, Alfred Lindsey could scarcely have felt worse, and the evening which had passed so delightfully, set in mortification and sorrow. A weary, restless night followed—a night of discouragement and bitter despair. It is no use, the tempter whispered, try as hard as you may, you will never be anything but “a Lindsey.” You might just as well give up the struggle first as last.

The morning found him feverish and nervous. It was later than usual when he went down to the store. Two men were standing on the sidewalk, and when he opened the store followed him in, amusing themselves by sauntering about, looking at the showcases, and apparently making a mental valuation of the contents of the store.

“How long before I could see one of the partners?” one of them asked, sauntering to the door and looking back.

“I am one of the partners,” Alfred answered, in a rather ungracious tone.

“Ah! May I ask if it is not something quite recent?”

“It is, sir.”

The men glanced at each other, and one said in a low tone, “wait.”

“We will come in again. Good-morning, sir,” bowing, and passing out as unceremoniously as possible.

It was perhaps half an hour later when Mr. Sherwood, senior, came in, and passed at once to the office. Two hours wore away; a few straggling customers dropped in, and then came the post-boy bringing rather more than his usual complement of letters. Alfred took them into the office at once. Mr. Sherwood was sitting in a listless attitude, his chin resting on his hand. He sprang up with a little flash of excitement in his face as Lindsey came up to the desk, and took the letters with a sort of nervous clutch, running them over rapidly in his hand till he came to one superscribed in a coarse, scrawling hand. Tossing the rest on the table he tore this open with hands that trembled visibly. It was very brief, for he crumpled it in his hand almost instantly, and sank back in his chair with a low groan.

“Take me home,” he said, in a hoarse whisper, as Alfred held a glass of water to his white, drawn lips.

A carriage was at once brought to the back entrance, and leaning on Lindsey’s arm, he walked out to it, and was driven speedily homeward, leaving his bewildered junior in a state of doubt and perplexity.

Slowly the hours dragged away, and the bell of the office clock rang out sharply—one sharp, ringing stroke. One o’clock! No word or hint from the great silent house on the knoll—not so much as an open door or blind all that long, long forenoon! Alfred Lindsey grew positively nervous watching it through the restless leaves of the beeches that ran in a slender zone about the soft, velvety knoll. Had some fateful hand fallen upon and paralyzed every living thing? The suspense was becoming intolerable, when the front door opened, and Robert came swiftly down the street. Lindsey stood in the door awaiting his arrival, a strange, overwhelming sense of danger shutting down upon him. He leaned forward eagerly, scanning his face, trying to get some hint of the story he felt lay behind its immobility and pallor.

“Ah, Lindsey! how hungry you look! Don’t devour a fellow so with your eyes, man,” he said, with a laugh, as he came up the steps.

Something in his tone—its lightness, perhaps—jarred upon his highly-strung nerves with such suddenness that it was with difficulty he could repress a cry. A moment, and he had himself in hand, and could laugh at his nervous anxiety.

“I believe I am a little faint,” he said, taking up his hat. “I have no recollection of eating any breakfast,” his face darkening at the remembrance of what it was that had taken away his appetite, and driven sleep from his pillow.

“You need not hurry back, Lindsey,” young Sherwood said, turning over the leaves of a huge ledger, “I am at liberty, and if you are back by three, the time trade usually sets in, it will be soon enough."

"I have nothing to keep me so long unless I take a row up the river."

"Do, by all means," was the eager answer; "you keep too close indoors. Yes, take a good long row, and don't feel hurried about it."

"Thank you, I believe I should feel better. Do you know," laughing still a little nervously, "I imagined all sorts of terrible things about you up at the house, this forenoon."

"Why?"

The question came sharp and vibrant, and in a voice so strange that Lindsey involuntarily stopped and looked back at the speaker, feeling very much as if he had been hit by some invisible ball. But the face was turned away—it had been all the time—and the leaves of the ledger turned slowly, the white fingers slipping down mechanically. He quite forgot the question for the moment, but presently recollecting, answered:

"Your father was taken ill here this morning, you remember, and I suppose that, added to a sleepless night—"

"You should know nothing of sleepless nights—you who are free from—"

He paused abruptly, and as Alfred did not choose to enlighten him as to the cause of his sleeplessness, there was no more said on the subject, or indeed on any other, for Lindsey went immediately out.

His dinner eaten, he went to the boat-house, but both boats were out. Well, he might as well go back to the store. He would take a stroll down street first, he thought, turning involuntarily in the direction of Mr. Sherwood's. He passed the house, noticing how still everything seemed, and how closely-shut the blinds were. He remembered all at once that he had not asked if Mr. Sherwood was better or worse. He saw Terry Dermott, the gardener, out in the field, and went out to him.

"How is Mr. Sherwood, Terry, better?" he asked, as soon as he could make a break in Terry's oration upon the relative merits of the various fertilizers in the market, and the mode of applying the same.

"Och, and ye must ask somebody else but I," he replied, with a mysterious nod which was very vaguely expressive. "I reckon though he be mighty bad, for there was no dinner ate in the house, only what I ate myself in the pantry, and Miss Corrie's eyes looked as if she had cried a week, when she came out to ask me to stay about the house—somewhere within call, she said—the afternoon."

"There's something strange about it," Lindsey said, under his breath, the old nervous, uneasy sensation taking possession of him, together with a feeling that he was needed at the store immediately. He had been away scarcely an hour, yet as he walked down the street it was with difficulty he could keep himself from breaking into a run. It seemed as if his feet were made of lead, they dragged so. He had experienced a similar sensation during sleep, but never before in his waking hours.

The store door stood slightly ajar when he came up. He walked directly through to the office. Something told him he would find the door locked, and without trying it he took a duplicate key from his pocket and endeavored to fit it in the lock, but the key on the inside prevented. There was, however, a smothered exclamation, and a sudden rustle of paper, and a voice he scarcely recognized asked, hurriedly:

"Is that you, Lindsey?"

"Yes, open the door, I want to come in," was the quick answer.

"Wait a minute, I am busy."

Lindsey went back to the store, and two ladies coming in, kept him busy perhaps fifteen minutes. At the end of that time, and just as they were passing out, Sherwood came to the door and called him. He was deadly pale and his hands trembled, but there was a firm, hard look about his eyes and mouth which Lindsey had never seen there before.

"I want you to be off for Hartford in the half past five train, Lindsey," he said, in a hurried, nervous way, quite unlike his usual open, calm manner.

"Certainly; but I must know what the trouble is, first. You look like a maniac."

"Do I?" passing his hand hastily across his forehead. "Well, I am not sure but I am—or shall be. You see we are in rather a tight place—if you insist on knowing. A bill for ten thousand dollars worth of goods. It is in the hands of one of the hardest men in existence. He would not hesitate an instant to shut up the store if every dollar was not forthcoming at the precise moment it was due. Five thousand dollars takes every cent of money the firm can command for a week. In this extremity we are obliged to borrow. You are therefore to take this check to Hartford, get the money, and return immediately."

"Mr. Morrison," Lindsey said, looking at the check.

"Yes; he has accommodated us before, you probably remember."

"I think I once took one of his checks into the bank. A year or more ago, wasn't it?"

"I don't remember. He has helped us several times. I am going down to the house, and will send Terry down with the team. He has got to go down to Windsor Locks, and you can ride down so far with him and take the train from there. I want you to attend to a few small bills that are due. I'll come down to the store again before you leave. By the way," pausing and looking back with his hand on the knob, and speaking cautiously, "I wouldn't say anything to any one, if I were you, about going down to the city."

"Very well," turning and going behind the counter, a troubled, perplexed expression on his face.

Several customers came in, and among them one of the men who had been in to inquire for one of the partners that morning. He said nothing about them, now, however, but bought a pair of gloves, loitering about the store till Terry drove up. Lindsey at once went out, leaving him in the store. Robert had ridden down with Terry, and paused a few moments, giving some additional directions concerning the business at Windsor Locks. Just as he was turning away, the man in the store sauntered leisurely out, bowing coolly to Sherwood as he passed.

"Who is that man?" Lindsey asked. "He came in in company with another man very early this morning and asked to see one of the partners, but he went away without mentioning any business."

"It is Clark Hunter," Sherwood replied, his face darkening.

Lindsey said no more; he understood at once. Clark Hunter had been a former suitor of Miss Austin's, Robert Sherwood's bride elect, and he had heard that there were not very pleasant relations between the rivals.

Terry tried very hard to interest his companion in conversation during the journey to Windsor Locks. At length he hit upon a new topic.

"Some trouble between yourself and the old one?" he asked, insinuatingly.

"Mr. Sherwood, do you mean?" looking up, surprised.

"Yes, the old gentleman. You see I heard it all last even," looking exceedingly wise. "It was after the company had all gone, and I jist in from the stables, stopped a bit in the kitchen. The doors was open, and I heard the ould chap say, angry like, 'I'll niver have my daughter a-disgracin' herself in such a way, or somethin' like it.'"

"What did Miss Sherwood say?" Lindsey asked, involuntarily, yet despising himself for listening to what was not intended for his ears.

"O," said the garrulous Terry, "she said niver a word, only cried as if her little heart would break. And the ould one, says he, 'Lindsey will not come here again, and I forbid you from meeting him, only in the presence of others—'"

"Stop, Terry!" Lindsey interrupted, suddenly. "I have no right to listen, or you to tell me this private conversation."

"But there wasn't only a bit more, and—"

"Not another word!" was the peremptory answer.

"Och, jist as ye likes, though if a nice, swate young leddy said the likes of me, I wouldn't stay away for as many ould ones as there is stars in the skies." And Terry chuckled inwardly at his smartness in putting the gist of Miss Corrie's answer so cleverly.

The business at Windsor Locks was duly attended to, the journey to Hartford made, the check duly presented, and at once cashed without question. The cashier knew young Lindsey, and had that morning seen among the business notices in the "Courant," the advertisement of the new firm. Mr. Sherwood and Mr. Morrison were both old customers at the bank, and had often accommodated each other, but never to quite so large an amount. Morrison was good, however, for five times that amount, and he dismissed all thought of it from his mind.

The evening train found Alfred Lindsey among its passengers. Just as they were on the point of starting a young lady touched his arm timidly. He looked up, and instantly his face flushed scarlet.

"Mr. Lindsey, pray pardon me, but I am alone, and I suppose you are going to Grantley?" said a soft, hesitating voice.

Alfred arose hastily, and amid a little confusion on both sides—more than there was any apparent cause for—Miss Annie Morrison was seated beside him.

"I was so pleased when I saw you," she said—the faintest bit of an accent on the "you"—"for I'm a perfect coward about riding alone at night. I missed the other train, and if I had not feared mother would be alarmed about me, should not come to-night at all. I am so glad now that I did!" And she settled herself cosily down beside Lindsey, who most cordially echoed the last sentence.

Ever since Alfred Lindsey could remember, Annie Morrison had been the most beautiful and wonderful of creatures to his fancy. He had never touched her hand, or sat beside her, before—he had never expected so much happiness—and it is no marvel that the moments flew, and all the trouble and perplexity of the day were forgotten in the sweet delirium of the moment.

"I read something in the Hartford papers about you," she said, just before they reached Grantley. "Father said a year ago that Mr. Sherwood ought to take you into the firm. He didn't know it when he went away."

"Your father gone away?" Lindsey exclaimed, so suddenly that she gave a quick start, laying her hand on his arm.

"O Alfred, how you startled me!" she said, withdrawing it with a vivid blush.

"Pray pardon me," he stammered, between two contending emotions, of joy and alarm. "I had not heard your father was away—when did he go?"

"Yesterday morning. I went as far as Hartford with him. He has gone out to Uncle Charles's in Pennsylvania."

A terrible crushing sensation almost took his breath away—how came Robert Sherwood by that check?

A moment's reflection, however, served to allay the fearful suspicion that had forced itself upon him. Knowing of the impending emergency, he had doubtless procured it several days before; but, in spite of this reasoning, he felt uneasy, and the strange illness of Mr. Sherwood, and Robert's subsequent unusual behaviour—the anxiety to get him out of the way, the locked door, the rustle of paper—all combined to fill him with a vague sense of apprehension. Even Annie Morrison's sweet face was for the moment quite forgotten in the fever of emotion.

"Grantley!" called the conductor, putting his head in at the door.

Lindsey sprang up nervously, then colored suddenly as he caught the slightly surprised look in Miss Morrison's face. She followed him out without speaking. The carriage was waiting for her, and Lindsey went with her, and though there was no particular need, as the coachman was waiting, handed her in, and heard her low "good-night, Alfred," with a vague impression that it was only a beautiful dream—he had heard that voice so often in dreams.

The carriage had barely turned away when there came a nervous grasp on his shoulder. He turned, and by the dim light of the swinging lantern saw Robert Sherwood. Was it fancy, or did the pale rays of the lantern give his face that livid, unnatural look?

"How came you with her?" he asked, in a nervous whisper.

"If you mean Miss Morrison, she came from Hartford in the train, and being alone, kindly accepted my escort."

"You said nothing to her about—about that?" lowering his voice still more.

"I did not trouble Miss Morrison with business matters," was the rather cool answer.

"Thank you, Alf," in a relieved tone. "I might have known I could depend on your sagacity, but this business has made me nervous, I think. Once clear of this snag, and we'll have smooth sailing again, I hope. You see if it got out that we were so short, every petty creditor would be down on us, and our credit would suffer irretrievably."

"You did not tell me that Mr. Morrison had left town," Lindsey said, as calmly as he could.

"Didn't I? Yes; gone West for a month," he answered, carelessly.

There was no more to be said without revealing his suspicions, and the possibility that they were unjust and unfounded kept him silent. The money was given into Sherwood's hands, and the note duly paid the next day.

Mr. Sherwood still remained ill—at least he was not seen out. Three days had passed—three days of evident anxiety and expectancy on the part of young Sherwood, who now remained almost constantly in the store, watching the mails with feverish eagerness. The morning of the fourth day Lindsey noticed among the letters one with the peculiar scrawling hand he had remarked before—the one had such a remarkable effect on Mr. Sherwood. He observed that Robert grew a trifle pale when he saw it, and that his hands trembled when he tore open the envelop, but he was not prepared for the bitter groan that burst from his white lips as they syllabled the one word, "ruined!"

Lindsey slipped to the door and turned the key. He would not be interrupted now—he must know all.

“Robert—Mr. Sherwood,” he said, firmly, coming and standing before him, “I have a right to know what this means, and I must.”

“It means that we are all beggars—”

“Yea,” he interrupted, “I understand that, only tell me it is nothing worse. That check of Morrison’s—”

“I meant to pay it, God knows, Lindsey?” he exclaimed, covering his face with his hands. “I expected to have the money to return to the bank long before his return.”

“He did not give you the check, then?”

“We had some of his blank checks, and I—O my God!”

“Enough, I understand,” Lindsey interrupted, strongly moved by his companion’s anguish.

After a while, Sherwood controlled himself enough to tell the story. Some six months before, a friend had induced his father to invest heavily in a new oil company just beginning operations under the most flattering prospects. At the same time, ignorant of his father’s investment, he had himself bought one hundred shares in another company whose promises were even more flattering than the other. This left them very short of funds, and the bill just paid was for goods bought on six months’ credit, contrary to their usual custom, but made necessary by the circumstances. The first three months things looked favorable, and under the prospect of success other debts were incurred. Latterly—say for the last month—rumors of failure in the first-named company had been circulated, and the morning after the party, they had seen in a paper the announcement of the failure, and the flight of the treasurer with what little funds remained over the expenses that had been incurred in what had proved fruitless labor. Still they hoped the story false, as no other had been received from the agent in New York. The morning mail, however, brought one, confirming the newspaper report, and pronouncing it a dead loss to the stockholders. The effect on his father had been such as to nearly deprive him of reason; and his anxiety about Gorham’s bill, so near due, drove him wild, and he declared, in a frenzy of passion, that he would never live to be disgraced by having his store closed, or an attachment put on his property by Gorham, who he knew would not hesitate to do it.

In this strait, his father half-erased, his mother and sister weeping, and begging him to do something to save them and quiet his father, the temptation to use Morrison’s name came to him. He fought against it until he was himself half-distracted, yielding at last, by comforting his conscience with the assurance that Morrison would gladly accommodate them if he was at home.

“God knows, Lindsey, I had never dreamed of such a possibility as this,” he gasped, in a hoarse whisper. “I had invested ten thousand dollars with the prospect of tripling my money in six months. The six months expired yesterday, and I have scarcely slept an hour this week, I have been in such a fever of expectancy. It is all over now! Bentley writes, the whole thing was an enormous swindle, and the sharp fellows who got it up are already on their way to Europe with the money of their dupes; an old, worn-out oil well, being all that is left for the stockholders. I dare not tell father—and that check—O my God, I shall go wild!” And springing to his feet he paced the floor in an agony of remorse and despair.

“Why not write to Mr. Morrison at once, telling him the story as you have told it to me. I don’t think he would prosecute the case—you could secure him by a mortgage on the store and contents; you say you have accommodated each other.”

“I will do so at once. Heaven bless you, Lindsey; I feel new courage already. I can bear the disgrace of bankruptcy—but crime!” shuddering convulsively.

A rap at the door interrupted them. Lindsey turned the key and looked out. The shop boy stood a little in advance of three men, two of them the same who had visited the store the morning after Corraline Sherwood’s party. He closed the door behind him and walked forward to meet them.

“We would like to see the senior partner,” one of them said, glancing toward the office door.

“Mr. Sherwood is ill at his house, sir,” Lindsey returned, quietly.

“Mr. Robert Sherwood, then.”

“He is busy, just now; if you would inform me of your business,” Alfred began; but the man interrupted him with a short laugh and an expressive shake of the head.

“Call Mr. Sherwood,” Lindsey said, turning to the boy.

Robert came out at once, deadly pale, but calm. He had evidently overheard the conversation, and, knowing the voice of the speaker, divined at once his business. He bowed quietly, and leaning against a pillar, said, in a steady voice:

"You can proceed with your business, gentlemen; I think I anticipate its nature."

The two men exchanged glances, and then made a sign to the third, who took out and read a writ of attachment upon the store and contents, in behalf of Doyle & Hunter, of Hartford, creditors to the firm of Sherwood & Son, for goods to the value of nine hundred dollars. The business concluded, Messrs. Doyle & Hunter turned to go out, leaving the officer in charge of the store.

"I know whom I have to thank for this, Clark Hunter," Robert said, an angry flush struggling through the dead pallor of his face.

"Thank you," Hunter retorted. "I am sorry I couldn't give you time to draw on your friend Morrison!" And with a low, exultant laugh, he walked away.

The flush faded instantly from Robert Sherwood's face, and a look of despair settled down upon it. With an unsteady hand he opened the office door and went in.

"A bad business, Mr. Lindsey," the officer said, looking sorry.

"Yes," Lindsey answered abruptly, without looking up, a strange expression growing every instant in his face, and his gray eyes darkening to jetty black.

A moment or two more of struggle, and he followed his partner into the office.

"It is too late for what I proposed," he said, speaking hurriedly, like one who had made up his mind to do a thing and is in haste to have it over. "I have come to the conclusion that I signed Morrison's name. I shall be arrested for presenting the check—I shall at once admit that I did it on my own responsibility—"

"And bear the punishment for my guilt! No, I am not such a scoundrel as to suffer that, Lindsey," Sherwood interrupted.

"Hear me, Robert," he cried, laying his hand on his arm. "Think of your parents and Corrie. You can settle all these demands and have a home left for them, at least. You are young and capable, you can soon get into some business that will keep you all comfortably—and, pardon me for alluding to it, permit you to marry Miss Austin."

"We were to have been married in a month," he interrupted, sadly.

"Yes, I heard so. But if she is a true woman she will wait willingly, and sympathize with and encourage you, meanwhile. If I am anything, or ever might have been, it is your kindness and sympathy that have done it. I ask it as a privilege, my best and truest friend, to bear this burden for you. There is no one dependent on me, now mother is dead, and no one will be pained or unhappy on my account. I am only a Lindsey, you know, and no one will be surprised; beside, I shall not suffer—" he was going to add, "because I have the consciousness of innocence," but checked himself, and substituted, "because I shall have the consciousness of repaying in part the great debt of gratitude I owe you."

Sherwood at first positively refused to listen to such a plan, but he was worn down with care and loss of rest, and mind and body were nearly exhausted in the struggle. He felt the force of Lindsey's reasoning, and at last yielded, weakly, perhaps, but not selfishly, for it was not of himself he thought, only of his father and mother, and Corrie—and possibly of Floy Austin; no man is willingly disgraced in the eyes of his betrothed wife.

Well, the blow had fallen, and all Grantley was confounded. But the bankruptcy, incredible as that seemed, was quite overshadowed by the dreadful turpitude of young Lindsey, though not a few were heard to declare that it was nothing more than was to be expected of a Lindsey, and they were not surprised in the least—in fact, had been expecting some such thing to happen ever since James Sherwood was so quixotic as to take the boy into his store. It seemed the whole trouble from first to last originated in Lindsey's crime, according to the odd logic of the Grantley-ites, though Robert Sherwood took every occasion to declare the true cause of bankruptcy to be an unwise and wild speculation. But this was set down as only another proof of foolish weakness in upholding and countenancing Alfred Lindsey—he had always done so.

Only one person in Grantley (save, of course, Robert Sherwood) believed in the possibility of Lindsey's innocence. Why should they, indeed, since he himself had admitted his guilt at the first? But Annie Morrison was a stubborn little thing when once she made up her mind to anything, and as determined as she was stubborn. It made her angry to see every one so willing—indeed, rather pleased—to believe evil of one who had fought his way up so bravely against the prejudices of his fellow-citizens. She had a natural love of opposition, and so she espoused his cause, and was in her element. If there was any other reason that influenced her in the matter she did not admit it, even to herself. She managed to see him after his arrest just long enough to say, in a low voice:

"You don't suppose I believe this absurd story, Alfred? No, I know better, and I am going to prove it!"

"Miss Morrison, I beg," he began, but she nodded gayly, in a very positive way, and tripped away.

A sharp pang of regret, the first he had felt, shot heavily through his heart. He conquered the feeling after a little struggle. He knew he could never be anything to Annie Morrison—he had always tried to remember it, but a heart is a wayward thing to manage.

"She will never know that I am innocent," he said, a little sadly, "and by-and-by she will come to think like the rest." And yet his heart beat lighter all day for that whispered word.

Before the day of trial came, Annie had nearly succeeded in converting her father to her belief in young Lindsey's innocence. She had a happy faculty of winding that personage round her finger. He had a great deal of faith in his Annie's judgment, and altogether believed her to be a most wonderful little woman.

"You see," said Annie, argumentatively, "it's not at all probable that he would do this when it wasn't going to benefit himself any, only to pay an old debt contracted by the firm six months before he was admitted into it. And, by the way, I think it a shabby trick in the Sherwoods taking any one into such a shaky concern as theirs very evidently was.

"I think they meant well, my dear," her father interposed, mildly.

"Perhaps," was the doubtful answer. "But now, father, does it look reasonable that any one would be so anxious to convict themselves if they were really guilty, as you say Mr. Lindsey was? You say he seemed 'feverishly eager to criminate himself.' Now is that natural, father?"

"Well, not generally, I don't think."

"Of course not. I tell you he is not guilty of this forgery, and if you send him to prison, you will do a very wicked thing," she said, vehemently.

"But, my child, he is in the hands of the law; it will not be as I say," he replied.

"But you can establish some test—see if he can write your hand—it is said that the imitation was perfect—or require him to declare under oath that it was his work—something to get at the truth—for it is my firm belief that he is sacrificing himself to save the Sherwoods."

Mr. Morrison promised to mention these things to a legal friend and get his opinion; he did not know as he could do much more.

The day of the trial came round; it was only a formal one, the accused having confessed his guilt, and requested that no defence be made for him. A counsel had, however, been assigned to him, to sum up the extenuating circumstances, and beg that the court might be as lenient as possible in its sentence—considering the nature of the crime—in view of his youth and his previous good character.

But a new complexion was at once put upon affairs, by Clark Hunter's coming forward at the opening of the court and boldly charging the forgery upon Robert Sherwood. He stated that, knowing the financial affairs of the firm to be in a very ticklish condition, he had, in company with a detective from the city, kept an eye on the Sherwoods for several days previous to the time of the forgery. He knew of their dabbling in speculations, and learned of the failure of the concern perhaps before they did. He was a little surprised to find a new partner in the firm, and did not know but possibly he might have money. He waited to find out. He soon learned that it was only a poor clerk who had long been in their employ. He knew Gorham's note fell due the next day, and he had a natural curiosity to see how they managed to pay it. He was interested, from the fact that the Sherwoods owed their firm quite a sum. He saw Robert Sherwood come down to the store, and almost immediately young Lindsey go away. He looked into the store twice, but saw nothing of Sherwood. He afterward saw Lindsey come down to the store, and a moment after, looking in through the glass door, saw him behind the counter waiting on some ladies. Afterward, from the same position, saw Sherwood open the office door and beckon to Lindsey, who came out from behind the counter and followed him into the office. He then walked away down street, not caring to let Sherwood see him just then.

In a little less than ten minutes Sherwood came out of the store and walked hastily toward home. He then entered the store, several others also coming in. Bought a pair of gloves, and waited further developments. He had a theory that some means were to be put in operation to procure the money to meet Gorham's bill next day, and thought possibly the store and contents were to be mortgaged.

"Presently the sound of wheels made me lift my eyes," he continued, "and I saw Robert Sherwood, and a fellow whom I judged to be one of their servants drive up in a carriage. Lindsey went hastily out. There was no one in the store, and a strong impulse to open the office door and look in took possession of me. I did so, and the first thing that caught my eye was a piece of crumpled paper lying in front of the desk. I took it, and without looking at it, put it in my pocket and hurried out. Sherwood was still talking with Lindsey, who was seated in the carriage with the Irishman. I walked immediately out, and when at a sufficient distance, smoothed out the paper and read, 'T. D. Morrison' written in half a dozen places, together with the time and place of date. But the date was 'Sept. 11th,' instead of thirteenth as it really was. I was shocked at the suspicion that forced itself upon me. I had letters in Sherwood's hand, and I compared them with the writing on the paper, and saw at once that it was the same, only a little disguised. I had also a letter of Morrison's, and I remembered all at once that I had previously observed that there was a striking similarity between the handwriting of the two men."

"I knew Morrison had gone West. I wrote him immediately, asking if he had loaned Sherwood a sum of money to be drawn from the bank during his absence. He telegraphed back that he had not, and Mr. Dole and myself visited the bank, and found a check for $5000 had been presented by Lindsey the afternoon of the 13th. We went down at once and put an attachment on the store. Subsequent developments you are familiar with. I demand now that Lindsey give us a proof of his handwriting being the same signed to the check, or that on this piece of paper," producing it and laying it on the table.

Lindsey firmly refused. There was a little excitement, and before it had subsided, Robert Sherwood, his face pale, yet firm, walked into court.

"Stop!" he interrupted. "It is I, who am the culprit—"

"No! no, it is not, gentlemen—O, do not mind what he says!" Lindsey cried, interrupting him. "O Robert! you promised me you would not interfere," a pleading pathos in his voice.

"Damen and Pythias," sneered Hunter.

Well, of course the entire complexion of the matter was changed, and Robert Sherwood, the handsome, generous, talented son of one of the oldest and most respectable families of Grantley, was condemned to imprisonment for forgery, and Alfred Lindsey's noble conduct was on every tongue. Public opinion, that fickle creature, fell at once to abusing Robert Sherwood, and if it could have had the fixing of the sentence, I am afraid the gallows would have had another victim. By-and-by, however, the excited state of opinion subsided. Lindsey used every effort to soften the feeling against him, and at the end of a year succeeded in getting up a petition, headed by Mr. Morrison, for his pardon. After some delay it was granted, and Robert Sherwood, grown sadly old and altered in a year, came back to Grantley. During his incarceration, Lindsey had acted the part of a son to the poor, broken-down old man, who seemed little enough like the proud merchant of former years. All Grantley prophesied that Lindsey's love for Corrie Sherwood prompted him to this course of labor and sacrifice, as well as being at the bottom of his devotion to Robert. It is so hard for mankind to believe in the unselfishness of their fellows, or to conceive it possible that a warm and tender friendship can exist between a man and woman.

Well, as I said, Robert Sherwood came back to Grantley, broken in health and spirits, his good name tarnished, poverty and toil before him, a weak, almost imbecile father, and a helpless mother and sister dependent on him for support. Did his old friends, remembering all his long, upright life, his pure morality, his generous, noble nature, forgive him this one sin, committed under such great excitement and provocation, and not a deliberate wrong; and remembering their own liability to fall in some moment of terrible temptation, gather about him, and with words of encouragement, and kindly proffers of sympathy and assistance, hold up his faltering hands, and strengthen his faltering heart? Did they do this, do you think?

Alas! no. They held aloof from him, they said continually by their conduct, "we are holier than you," and managed in a hundred nameless ways to keep the fact of his disgrace continually before him. There were a few noble exceptions. Mr. Morrison showed not only his true nobility as a gentleman, but his Christian spirit, in using every effort to make him feel how fully and thoroughly he forgave him, and wished to have it quite forgotten. He also tried bravely to combat the prejudices of his fellow-citizens, but with very indifferent success. Alfred Lindsey, now in business at Windsor Locks, helped and encouraged him in many ways, but his sensitive soul was slowly crushed under the hardness and coldness of his fellow-citizens, and like a tree dying at its core, he gradually lost strength and life, and people saw at last that he was dying, yet not one of them, perhaps, thought that possibly his blood would be required at their hands. There was a little convulsive sympathy then, but it was too late. There was, however, one beautiful ray of brightness that streamed out over his darkened life. Floy Austin had been true to her love for him, though her father had forbidden her to see him after his arrest. But when the story that he was dying came to her ears, she threw aside all parental control, and came to him, and insisted upon being his wife immediately. He objected faintly, but the thought of having her with him to the end, and of calling her at last by the sweet name of wife, was too pleasant to be long resisted, and so in the solemn shadow of death they were united in wedlock, and her hands ministered to his last earthly wants, and her loving faithfulness brightened the valley of shadows.

And so Robert Sherwood was dead—dead in the flush of his young manhood. If he erred and fell in that one terrible moment of bitter temptation, were they quite guiltless who barred the way of his return to honor, and virtue, and usefulness?

After Robert's death, Alfred Lindsey came up and took Mr. and Mrs. Sherwood and Coralline down to Windsor Locks. He knew how desolate and terrible the old place must seem to them now, and he promised Robert to make their grief as easy for them to bear as possible. Grantley people talked about it some, and wondered "why he didn't marry Corrie and done with it—it would certainly look better."

But one, two, three years went by, and both Alfred and Corrie kept on in the even tenor of their way. There was nothing heard of marriage between them, but that a deep, and tender, and earnest affection existed between them, no one could doubt who knew them. Some people, not understanding pure and tender feeling, laughed, and made sneering remarks and innuendoes, but the poisonous arrows glanced off harmless from their strong armor of purity. But there came a change at last; a change that released Lindsey from his self-imposed life of labor and sacrifice in their behalf. Corrie Sherwood, quite unexpectedly to most people, though not to Alfred, married a wealthy gentleman in Hartford, who at once took her parents home to his house. The day after they left, Lindsey went up to Grantley. He had scarcely been there since Robert Sherwood died. There were reasons why he dared not trust himself to go there much.

Annie Morrison, a little paler and graver than on that autumn morning when she had ridden from Hartford to Grantley with Alfred Lindsey, sat lost in thought before a light fire that flickered through the twilight shadows of a gray October evening. A low rap sounded on the door. Of course it was her father, she was expecting him momentarily; so she said, with a little low laugh:

"Come in, if it's anybody that loves me."

The door opened and a gentleman came forward, pausing where the light fell across his face.

"Annie," he said, tenderly, "I could not stay outside when you said that."

Of course she gave a little feminine start and scream, and protested against his taking her so literally, because, of course, she was only in fun, besides, she was so sure it was her father. But when he told her in earnest, passionate words of his love for her all these years, and how he had not dared to come to her before lest her sweet face should make him forget the path of duty he had marked out for himself; and that now the burden was off his hands, and he was free to seek his own happiness, etc., etc., why, she quite broke down, and admitted between little happy, hysterical sobs, that "she had loved him always;" and when a little later Mr. Morrison really came in, he found his little girl the betrothed wife of Alfred Lindsey, and like a model father, added the paternal blessing.

THE GOLDSMITH'S DAUGHTER.

BY MRS. CAROLINE ORNE.

"You have been so diligent to-day, my good lads, that although half an hour earlier than usual, you may leave off work, and seek whatever diversion may please you, provided you keep within proper bounds, and avoid mingling in the street riots which are getting to be frequent as well as dangerous.

These words were addressed by Godfrey de Coigners, a thriving goldsmith of the city of London, to his two apprentices, the elder of whom sat diligently at work linking together a heavy gold chain for a wealthy citizen, while the other, whose duty it was to wait on customers, was busy in polishing a piece of plate.

Walter Kingsley quietly deposited the chain in a drawer, which he locked, and taking his cap, stood awaiting for his companion.

"Shall I fasten the street door and close the shutters?" inquired Simon Cosin, the younger apprentice, fixing his small, keen eyes upon his master's face.

"Yes, Simon," replied the goldsmith, passing his hand over his face as he spoke, to hide the sudden flush occasioned by the prying looks of his apprentice.

As Simon Cosin turned away to perform his task, a faint smile flickered over his countenance, which Kingsley, quiet and careless as he appeared, failed not to observe. Having performed it as his master had ordered, Cosin adroitly slipped a small key from beneath a bit of canvas, which appeared to be lying carelessly at one end of the shelf, which he held in such a manner as to be concealed by the sleeve of his jacket. The two apprentices now left the shop by a passage which led to the back of the building, which admitted them into a close, dark alley. As soon as the door was closed behind them, the goldsmith secured it on the inside with a heavy bolt. He then, having examined the fastenings of the front entrance and the window shutters, lit a lamp; for though the sun was yet a quarter of an hour high, the light was excluded, except what was admitted through the open door of an inner apartment. He placed the lamp on a table, and crossing this inner room, opened a door which revealed a narrow staircase.

"Alice! Alice!" said he, "come to me a minute, I wish to speak with you."

A door at the head of the staircase was almost immediately swung back, and a beautiful face, evidently dimmed with a shade of sadness, peered from behind it.

"Come down, my daughter," said the goldsmith; "I wish to give you some directions before I go out."

This was said in a somewhat louder voice than was absolutely necessary for one so near as Alice to hear, and was clearly intended for some one in the chamber. As soon as Alice had descended the stairs, her father passed into the workshop and made a sign for her to follow. She was somewhat surprised to find that the apprentices were gone, and that the shop, instead of the lingering gleams of day, was lighted by a lamp.

"Should any person, except Grantham, call and inquire for me," said her father, "say that I shall not be in till eight o'clock. If disposed to wait my return, let it be in the oak parlor, and be careful that neither you nor Dame Gifford have occasion for anything in the shop, or the room adjoining."

"You had better lock the door, then, as soon as I am gone, for though I can promise for myself, it is not unlikely that the good dame may be seized with a sudden desire to see the silver vase and the drinking-cup, set with jewels, you are making for the archbishop. Father," she added, while a deeper shade of sadness stole over her features, "I am haunted with the fear that some evil is hovering over you."

The goldsmith turned quickly round, and said, sharply, "Why do you suffer yourself—" but he checked himself and added, playfully, "if idle fancies disturb you, Alice, it is a sign that you are too much at your embroidery, and too little in the fresh air. Nothing is so good as fresh air to dispel a fit of the vapors."

"I wish it were indeed the vapors which thus trouble me, both for your sake and mine. But it is not so. Will you forgive me, dear father, if I tell you that I know why Walter and Simon were dismissed so early, and why for some weeks past, you have often worked while others have slept?"

"Have you dared," said her father, sternly, "to pry into what you should not know?"

"I have made no attempt to pry into anything. The knowledge of the unwelcome secret, which has ever since preyed upon my spirits, was obtained accidentally."

"In what way?"

"The evening you had the first interview with the stranger you call Grantham, I was present."

"Impossible!"

"It is true. I had entered the shop a minute before, as it seems, without your notice, to ask you about something, and imagining that the stranger might wish to make some purchase which would require only a few minutes, and not caring to be seen by him, I stepped behind the screen which you sometimes place before the table when you are at work, and thus, unintentionally, heard every word that was said. But, father, you have nothing to fear from me, for I will prove to you that a woman can keep a secret."

"I believe you, my child, and since you know what passed between me and the stranger, you shall see the progress I have made in the work he engaged me to do."

Saying thus, he unlocked a writing-desk, and opening a private drawer, took thence a golden coronal.

"An hour's work," said he, as he placed it on the table, "will finish it."

"And this," said Alice, "is intended to crown Robert de Bruce, the rebel, and the enemy of King Edward. O father, why did you consent to do what, if found out, must cost your life?"

"Yes, as you say, should the secret transpire, it will cost me my life. But there is no danger—there can be none. According to my own views of the matter, I have been guilty of no crime. Might is all that can give Edward a right to rule Scotland, and for my own part, I rejoice that Bruce has triumphed. Let Edward be content to rule his kingdom, I say."

"And so say I. But whatever we may think on that subject, the danger you have brought upon yourself by fashioning this bauble remains the same."

"You suffer yourself to be unnecessarily alarmed. The whole affair has been conducted with so much secrecy and discretion, that there can be no danger."

"I wish that I could feel the same confidence that you do; but there is the youngest apprentice, Simon Cosin, who has as much curiosity as he has cunning, who would—and I accuse him not without cause—betray his own brother for the sake of a broad gold piece."

"It cannot be that he has any suspicion of the matter," said the goldsmith; but while he spoke, the keen glance with which Cosin regarded him as he and his fellow-apprentice were preparing to leave the shop, flashed into his mind and caused him considerable uneasiness.

"He may not," said Alice, "suspect the real nature of the affair, but I am persuaded that he already imagines there is something in agitation which you are desirous to conceal from him, and he will not rest till he finds what it is."

"I believe that you are mistaken."

"I am nearly certain that I am not."

"What are your reasons for thinking thus?"

"They are founded on a hint which Walter gave me."

"I don't know why Walter is entitled to more confidence than Simon; I believe, were I inclined to trust either, it would be my younger apprentice."

"Father, you are not so well acquainted with Walter's true character as I am. The brow which is covered by the flat cap of a London apprentice would grace an earl's coronet," said Alice, with a warmth which brought a look of surprise to the countenance of her father, and a blush to her own.

"How long has Master Walter Kingsley stood so high in the good graces of my daughter?" he said.

"Ever since he endangered his life by rescuing that poor, helpless old man from the mob, at the head of which was Simon Cosin, whom, in their cruel thirst for what they called sport, they came near depriving of life."

"That does tell in his favor, but time is wasting, and you must leave me; I would fain finish this coronal to-night, and then I shall feel more at ease."

"I wish, father, that you would just melt it down, and then, should suspicion get abroad, so as to cause search to be made for it, nothing could be found to implicate you."

"Step this way, Alice, and you will see that I have nothing to fear even from the strictest search." And he opened his writing-desk as she drew near, and requested her to point out to him the drawer where the coronal had been concealed.

"I cannot," she replied, after having examined the interior of the desk with strict scrutiny.

"I was certain you could not, and though I am not afraid to trust you, if search should be made, it may be better that you remain ignorant of its situation. Now, my child, go and let no foolish fears disturb your dreams to-night."

The moment Alice had left him he secured the door which communicated with the staircase, and then addressed himself diligently to the task of finishing the coronal. He hoped to complete it in an hour, nor did he overran the time by more than a few minutes. As he was taking it to the desk to deposit it in the secret drawer, he thought he heard a slight noise outside the door which opened into the street. He stood still and listened, but as the noise was not repeated, he imagined that it must have been caused by some person who was passing. He, therefore, quickly restored it to its place of concealment, and locking the desk, retained the key about his person. On going up stairs, he found that his daughter had retired to her own room, and feeling weary and dispirited, he bade Dame Gifford "good-night," and sought his own place of repose.

One of the windows of his apartment could be seen from the street which passed in front of the building, and as the curtain was partially drawn aside, two persons, who had for about fifteen minutes been standing opposite, watching for that purpose, were aware of the moment of his entrance. They could not only see the gleam of light, though it had been placed in a remote corner of the room, but could discern the outline of his form, as he many times crossed and recrossed his chamber, previous to disrobing, as if his mind was ill at ease.

The persons watching, who were screened by the dark shadow of the building near which they stood, began to grow impatient, when suddenly the light was extinguished. They waited not another moment, but crossing the street, one of them, who was a little forward of the other, went directly up to the door of the goldsmith's shop, and dexterously displacing one of the panels which had been previously loosened for the purpose, he was enabled to remove the two heavy bars by which the door was secured. The only obstacle to their ingress being now removed, they both entered the shop. He who happened to be the leader, then carefully closed the door and replaced the panel.

"This way," he then said to his companion, and as he spoke, caused the light from a dark lantern to fall on the writing-desk in which was concealed the coronal. As he bent forward and placed a key in the lock of the desk, the light revealed the cunning and sinister countenance of Simon Cosin, the goldsmith's younger apprentice. The person with him now took the lantern, and the dark cloak, which he wore, falling open, displayed the rich dress of a nobleman. The desk was soon thrown open.

"There is nothing here," said Lord Segrave.

Cosin made no reply, but pressing his finger against the back of the desk, on a spot which in no respect appeared different from any other, a small door flew open and revealed a drawer containing the coronal, which was the object of their search. A small bundle of papers lay beside it, which Lord Segrave hastily examined. None appeared to him to be of much importance, except one. In this allusion was made to the intended coronation of Robert Bruce at Soane, and although the day was not designated, the goldsmith was requested to have the crown ready by the tenth of the month, when Master Grantham would call for it, and secretly convey it to its place of destination. This he retained, and refolding the others restored them to the drawer. After a few moments' hesitation, he also returned the coronal.

"Are you going to leave it, my lord?" asked Cosin.

"Yes, I believe it will be best to leave it till morning, when your traitorous master, and this, his precious piece of handiwork, can be secured at the same time."

"I can see no good that can come of leaving it," said Cosin, with a dissatisfied air.

"There can be no harm that I can see in suffering it to remain a few hours, and the prize is too precious to be borne, at this time of night, through streets in the neighborhood of Whitefriars, whose only population is made up of thieves, robbers and assassins. Besides, this paper which I hold in my hand will be sufficient evidence against your master, even should we fail to gain possession of the crown, so that at any rate, your promised reward is secure."

At this moment, sounds of loud and riotous mirth were distinctly heard, although they were borne from a considerable distance. Whatever doubts remained in the mind of Lord Segrave as to suffering the coronal to remain till morning, or at least till a guard could be procured, were now put to rest. He therefore ordered the apprentice to lock the desk, and after waiting long enough to assure themselves that the gang of rioters were not approaching in that direction, they left the shop.

Lord Segrave immediately crossed the street and turned into a close, dark lane, leaving Cosin to secure the door. He had restored the bars to their former position, and had bent down to secure the loosened panel, when he heard some one quickly pass near him. He was somewhat startled by this, and rising and looking, in the direction of the receding footsteps, he could dimly descry through the gloom a person who he thought resembled his fellow-apprentice.

"If he has dared to set the spy on me," he muttered, between his teeth; "but no—he suspects me not—I need not fear." Having thus settled the matter in his own mind, he finished replacing the panel, and then withdrew to a place, to which he had been directed to repair by Lord Segrave, that he might be in readiness to lend his assistance at whatever hour he might be required.

Dame Gifford had remained awhile after the goldsmith and his daughter had withdrawn to their separate apartments, that she might regale herself on some delicacy, which for the last fifteen minutes had been simmering on the embers, in a little silver saucepan. She had just lifted the lid to see if the gravy had assumed the proper consistence, when she heard her name pronounced in a low, cautious tone of voice. Had she not at once recognized the voice, the contents of the saucepan would probably have been overturned into the ashes; as it was it barely escaped a fate as disastrous. As soon as she was satisfied that the saucepan was firmly settled on the embers, she rose and turning round said:

"Bless me, Walter Kingsley, how came you here, and how did you get here?"

"I got in there," he replied, pointing to the casement, which he had left swinging on its hinges, "and my business is to speak with Mistress Alice."

"And do you think that Mistress Alice is going to rise from her bed because one of her father's prentices takes it into his head that he wants to speak with her?"

"I have something to say to her which will admit of no delay. I must see her, and that immediately."

Finding she still hesitated, he said:

"Go, good dame, and fetch her hither, and the very first holiday that comes, I will mend the clasp for you, which you asked me to do yesterday."

"And so you think to bribe me? but remember, if I go, it will be out of good-will, and not for the sake of reward."

Without further parley she proceeded to Alice's chamber and knocked at the door, which was at once opened. Her anxiety was such, that feeling no inclination to sleep she had remained at her window, hoping that the stranger whom her father called Grantham, might yet come and remove the coronal.

"Has he come?" she eagerly demanded, of Dame Gifford.

"Yes; but if I should give you a piece of my mind, I should say it is not seemly for a lass who might, if she chose, marry one of the richest burgher's sons in the city, to be so earnest for a stolen meeting with her father's apprentice—not but that Walter is a nice lad and comely enough to be a prince."

Alice made no reply, for the stranger was in her mind when she asked the question, and she felt that Dame Gifford had misapprehended her. She, however, could not prevent feeling alarmed at being summoned to an interview with Walter Kingsley at such an hour, for she felt persuaded that it had something to do with the dangerous business which her father, in an evil hour, had been tempted to undertake.

It proved to be as she had suspected. Walter had been aware for some days, that Costa was in the possession of some secret which endangered the safety of their master, though he was ignorant of its precise nature. He at any rate determined to keep a vigilant watch upon Cosin's proceedings. At one time, when they two were alone in the shop, Cosin, when he imagined Walter too deeply engaged in his employment to notice him, busied himself in fitting a key to the writing-desk. But Walter did notice him, nor did he fail to observe him when he slipped the key which he knew to be the same, from under the piece of canvas, and concealed it in the sleeve of his jacket.

When the two apprentices left the shop Kingsley took a different direction from that chosen by Cosin, but in a short time turned back and succeeded in keeping him in sight till he met Lord Segrave, when they both entered a small obscure building. When almost wearied with watching, Walter saw the door open, and Cosin, preceded by a person closely muffled in a cloak, come forth. The evening was extremely dark, the stars being blotted out by a mass of heavy clouds, from which fell an almost imperceptible mist. The darkness was in Kingsley's favor, and he succeeded, without their suspecting it, in following them to his master's shop. Having seen them enter, he approached the door, where, by attentively listening, he was able to arrive at a pretty accurate conclusion as to what was concealed in the desk. He also found that Lord Segrave had concluded to let it remain till morning, that it might be removed with more safety, when his master would also be arrested, unless he previously made his escape.

"I would willingly have concealed this from you," said Walter, in conclusion, "but I knew that at any rate you must soon know it, and thought it best not to excite Dame Gifford's wonder by asking for your father. I thought it best to ask for you, and permit her to put her own construction upon it, which will at least be wide enough of the truth."

"I was already in possession of the dreadful secret," said Alice, "but hoped that it might remain a secret to all except me and the parties engaged in the transaction. I must go to my father and tell him of his danger. He may yet save himself by flight."

"Tell him," said Walter, "that if he will but say the word, I will have a fleet horse in waiting for him in an hour from this time at any place which he may think best."

They now separated; Walter, so as not to excite Dame Gifford's suspicions, going out at the window which had admitted him, and Alice by the door which led to her chamber, whence without difficulty she could go to the apartment occupied by her father.

Dame Gifford, who had by this time finished the contents of the saucepan, as well as a cup of warm spiced ale, after raking the ashes over the embers, went to her room and was soon enjoying the sweets of profound repose. In a few minutes afterwards, the goldsmith and his daughter and Walter had met together, anxiously discussing what course it would be best to pursue. Alice entreated her father to attempt to escape, in which she was earnestly joined by Walter. If he would agree to this, Walter offered to risk the perilous undertaking of conveying the coronal to Scone. But the goldsmith had no faith that he should be able to escape, though he at length yielded to the tears and entreaties of his daughter, and consented to make the attempt.

Walter knew where he could obtain horses, and in half an hour they were in waiting. The presentiment that he should not escape continued to haunt De Coigners to an extent which paralyzed exertion. While Walter Kingsley, in a suitable disguise and the coronal ingeniously concealed, took the road to Scotland, his master pursued a different direction, where a few hours' hard riding would bring him to the house of an old friend, in whose fidelity he thought he could confide.

The first faint gleams of dawn had hardly broke in the east, when Alice, who was keeping watch in a chamber which commanded a view of the street in front of the shop, could hear footsteps which approached with evident caution. They drew nearer and nearer, and soon ceased in front of the shop. She listened attentively and could hear when they gained admittance. She now ventured to throw open the casement, but though this availed her to hear a faint murmur of voices, she could distinguish nothing that they said. Unable longer to control her painful solicitude, she groped her way to the apartment where the evening previous she had the interview with Walter, and descended to the foot of the staircase to which allusion has before been made. All was silent for a few seconds, and then there was a bitter execration, which she well knew was in consequence of being baffled in their expectations of finding the coronal.

"The person who was to convey it to Scotland must have come for it after we were here," said a voice, which Alice knew to be Simon Cosin's.

"It is not of much moment whether we find it or not," said some one, in reply. "This paper is sufficient to prove your master guilty. Are you sure, Cosin, that there is no secret outlet from the building by which the traitorous rascal can make his escape?"

"There is no place big enough for a weasel to escape," was the answer of the apprentice.

"Lead us to his chamber then. A thrifty artisan should have been astrir by this time, but he doubtless wishes to indemnify himself for those extra hours of labor he has been obliged to bestow on the Scottish crown."

There was an attempt made to open the door where Alice stood listening, which being fastened on the inside, was unsuccessful. It, however, caused a delay of only a few minutes, and as Alice heard the lock give way she fled to her own room. She had only time to fasten the door, when she heard steps in the passage which led to her father's chamber. They soon found that it was untenanted.

"He may have escaped to his daughter's room," suggested Cosin.

"Where is it? Show it to us," was the inquiry and demand of several voices at once.

"This way," said Cosin.

The next minute there was a rap against Alice's door.

"We must enter, either by fair means or foul," said one of the men, "and we leave it with you to choose which we shall do."

"I will unlock the door immediately," said Alice, for she well knew that it would avail nothing to refuse.

The door being thrown open, a slight survey of the room convinced them that it offered no place of concealment. Dame Gifford was by this time aroused, who though sternly questioned could give them no further information than that she herself had lit the lamp for the goldsmith when he rose to retire, and that he left the room by the door he always did when he went to his bed-chamber. As for Alice, she refused answering every question, however trivial, with a firmness which could not be shaken, and after having searched every part of the house under the direction of Cosin, they were obliged to yield to the unwelcome belief that their intended victim had made his escape.

Had Godfrey de Coigners been able to maintain the appearance of as much coolness and self-possession as Walter Kingsley, his apprentice, he might have been safe. This was far from being the case, and when, as soon as it was found that he was not in the house, persons were sent in different directions in pursuit of him, although he was artfully disguised, he yielded himself to the first who came up with him, without the least attempt at evasion. His captor conveyed him back to London, and before night he was tried by the king's council, and condemned to be executed at seven o'clock on the morning of the next day but one.

This was the first Alice heard respecting her father after she parted with him. For half an hour she sat like one stupefied. Neither Dame Gifford's attempts to comfort her, nor her noisy lamentations, had power to draw her attention. The day was near its close, when suddenly starting up she exclaimed:

"I will go to the king and beg my father's pardon—he must—he will grant it."

"Why, the poor child is demented to think of such a thing," said Dame Gifford. "The king will only be angry with you, and when he is angry I've heard it said that he is dreadful to look upon, and that his eyes are fierce as a lion's, and seem to sparkle with fire. A glance of them would kill you. Come, my lady-bird, be persuaded not to go. What cannot be cured must be endured, and the remedy you seek, though it may harm yourself, can avail nothing in favor of your father."

"I shall go, Dame Gifford, so don't add to my affliction by magnifying the difficulties which may beset me."

"You are a willful child and always would have your own way, for which I must thank myself, for it all came of my over-indulgence. Since you will go, I wish Walter was here to go with you. He is a good, sober lad, and is shrewd and sharp-witted withal, and would know how to manage with as much address as a courtier."

"Since he is not here, I must go alone."

"That you shan't do. Do you think a handsome lady like you would be suffered to pass through the streets unmolested at this time, when Whitefriars begins to empty itself of its rogues, and the wild, young Templars are abroad, who are quite as much to be feared by one like you?"

"What can I do, then?"

"It may be that neighbor Gadson will go with you."

"O, I know he will—go, good dame, and see."

Dame Gifford soon returned accompanied by Master Gadson. The impatient Alice, enveloped in a dark colored cloak and hood, met them at the door. The vigorous arms of the worthy citizen and her own intense excitement sustained her, as they rapidly pursued their way to the palace of Westminster, where Edward I., and Marguerite of France, his second queen, at that time had their court.

Master Gadson used every effort in his power to introduce his young charge to the presence of the king, but after waiting nearly an hour, which to Alice seemed an age, they were told that the king being weary and indisposed, had retired to his private apartments and could not be disturbed.

"The queen, then—let me see the queen," said Alice.

"It cannot be," said the page, who had been sent to inform her of the impossibility of her having access to the king.

Just at this moment a door, opening into a passage communicating with the queen's apartments, and directly opposite where Alice and Gadson stood, was unclosed. Several ladies were crossing the passage at the time, and Master Gadson, who had several times seen the queen, recognized her as one of them. He pointed her out to Alice. The moment the words had passed his lips, she darted forward with the speed of thought, and the next moment was kneeling at the queen's feet. Marguerite, surprised at the suddenness of the movement, said kindly, while she at the same time attempted to raise her:

"What would you have, my fair girl?"

"My father's pardon."

"Who is your father?"

"Godfrey de Coigners the goldsmith."

"The unhappy man we were speaking of only a few minutes ago?" said the queen, addressing one of the ladies.

"Yes, your grace, the same."

"I have no power to pardon him," said the queen. "Your petition must be addressed to the king."

"I came to the palace for that purpose," said Alice, "but they would not let me see him."

"It is doubtless well that you were denied, for the king, who is both ill and weary, might have been in no mood to give you a favorable hearing."

"What can I do?" said Alice; "to-morrow my success may be no better, and the next day it will be too late."

Marguerite remained silent a few moments, as if revolving in her mind what was best to do.

"I will myself," she at length said, "intercede with the king for your father's pardon."

The ladies in attendance looked surprised, for never had there been an instance, where a queen of England had ventured to stand between a mighty Plantagenet in his wrath, and his intended victim. Marguerite noticed this, and smiled as she said:

"You think for so young a queen, I am a very bold one—is it not so?"

"We know that your grace has the courage to be good and merciful," was the reply of one of the ladies; "and if you do what you intend, it will be more than any of your predecessors ever ventured to do."

"I shall be proud and happy to be the first instance, then," was Marguerite's reply. Then addressing Alice, she said, "Go, now, and hope for the best. I will watch for a favorable opportunity to speak in behalf of your father, and will see that you are advised of the issue at the earliest moment possible."

Alice pressed her lips to the queen's hand, and with looks expressive of grateful thanks she was unable to utter, withdrew and rejoined her kind protector.

They found Dame Gifford anxiously awaiting their return. After the departure of Master Gadson she persuaded Alice to recline on a couch which she spread for her near the fire, and was rejoiced to see wearied nature, after awhile, yield to the oblivion of sleep. But her slumbers were uneasy, and she often started as if harassed by painful dreams. When she awoke morning had dawned. At first, she was only conscious of a heavy oppression weighing upon her spirits, but suddenly, the fearful truth broke in upon her mind.

With leaden feet, the hours, one after another crept away. Sometimes it seemed to her that it was impossible to longer endure the agony of suspense to which she was subjected. More than once she made up her mind to go again to the palace to learn the success of the queen's promised intercession with the king, but was as often restrained, not only by the thought that the messenger which Marguerite had promised to send to make known to her the result might arrive in her absence, but by the difficulty, as taught by the experience of the preceding evening, of gaining admittance into the palace, unless under the protection of some one thought to be of more consequence than the worthy Master Gadson.

The sun was past the meridian by more than three hours, when a messenger arrived from the queen.

"For Alice de Coigners," were his words, as he placed a small packet in the trembling hand extended to take it.

Alice quickly severed the band of floss silk which secured it, and opening it, saw written on the outside of a folded sheet of paper:

"The pardon is granted. MARGUERITE."

Inside the sheet, was a copy of the pardon. After stating that "Godfrey de Coigners had been guilty of the heavy transgression and malefaction of making the coronal of gold to crown the king's rebel and enemy, Robert de Bruce of Scotland," it went on to say that,

"we, the king, pardon him solely at the intercession of our dearest consort, Marguerite, Queen of England."

In two hours more, Godfrey de Coigners was beneath his own roof.

Not long afterwards he gave up a share of his thriving business to Walter Kingsley, and at the same time, what the latter prized more highly, the hand of his daughter.

BACK TO MY OWN.

BY FENNO HAYES.

ONE doesn't often come to suicide all at once, except in love affairs, I think. The idea had dogged and haunted me for three months. First, it was a thought whose entrance into my heart shocked me, and was shown out in high haste. Then, material objects began to haunt and tempt me. I got afraid of my medicine case—there were certain little bottles there took on a strange fascination. Sometimes the gleam of a knife in a shop window would give me a turn—"there's a short cut to death," I'd think. Get on, get on, for the love of Heaven—Launcelot Launce! Then the times grew harder, and I never crossed a bridge but something whispered, "drowning is an easy death to die. A little plunge, and all is over." Set your foot quick on the firm shore, Launcelot Launce, or never on the firm shore shall you set your foot again!

Well, I wrestled with and fought it for awhile, then I dallied with it and then I hugged it, and here I was, a man, able-bodied and all that, and about to kill myself because I couldn't get bread to put in my mouth. You despise me? So should I in your place. But disappointment, and hunger, and cold, take a man's courage so surely, given day after day only these, that before he knows it it's all gone, and then "facilis descensus Avernus," whether one chooses to take the cross cut direct, or the long way round through villany and crime.

I suppose hunger made me a little light-headed. At any rate, the strongest feeling I had, as I sat over my last stick of wood, with my pistol in my hand, was that it really was a most stupendous joke that I should be freezing and starving, and about to take my own life. The idea of dining off Sevres and silver one New Year's day, and committing suicide the next for want of a crust! To be sure neither Sevres nor silver was my own, but I had been laboring under the mistake of supposing them to be so all my days, so the effect was the same.

I had a strange feeling at the moment of being, not one, but three—the me of olden time, the me of latter days, and the me contemplating these two former personnells, as one might a couple of his own photographs.

"You were a gay, debonaire sort of fellow," I said, turning to one of these, "and a merry dance you made of life, and if I were to introduce you to this," turning to the other, "it would be somewhat after this fashion—self to self's ghost!"

In that hour, which one would naturally have supposed to be a solemn one, I was rather possessed of a feeling of strange bizarre lightness, and I laughed aloud at my pleasant fancy, while I examined my pistol with a touch almost caressing.

At this moment a most remarkable thing happened—a most uncommon and unusual thing. My office bell rang.

I had waited so long in vain for this same event to occur that I had half a mind to treat it disdainfully, at this eleventh hour. But, after all, when one plays at balance, with life and death, each should have a fair field and no favor, so I laid my pistol by, with a whispered "wait!" and answered the summons.

I recognized the porter of the Darley House as I opened the door.

"Yees wanted at the hoose," he said, in his broad Irish brogue, "there's a grand 'laddy sick there, an' sint for yees."

"Very well, Tim," I answered, as nonchalantly as if "grand keddies" were in the habit of sending for Doctor Launce at all hours, "I'll be along directly."

As I stepped back into my room for my overcoat the pistol shining on the shelf seemed somehow a very different thing from what it had a few minutes before. I even was conscious of a little shudder as I glanced that way, and as I walked along over the crisp snow the keen, bracing air seemed to rouse and waken me as if from a nightmare.

But if I had any visions of achieving a professional reputation from the difficulty of this providential case of mine, they were dissipated at once as I entered one of the parlors of the Darley House and saw before me my patient. Never was the seal of perfect health more plainly set on lip and cheek, or displayed in the full flowing of a woman's figure than in hers who awaited me, half reclined in a deep, luxurious armchair.

Doubtless my face betrayed my astonishment, for, dismissing the servant on some trifling errand, she said, the roses deepening in her cheeks, and a shade of embarrassment perceptible in her voice, despite her assured coolness:

"You are right, Doctor Launce. I am no more sick than you are. And yet, for reasons that I cannot explain, but which I assure you are not in the slightest degree reprehensible, I wish to appear so. If you will only treat me as nearly as is possible as you would if I were afflicted with violent pneumonia, I will be so very, very much obliged."

The large, soft, brown eyes looked pleadingly full into mine, and the rich, liquid voice was full of entreaty as she proffered this singular request.

I hesitated a little, more from astonishment than anything else.

"I pledge you my word you shall never regret it," she said, "nor I," she added, a little proudly.

Just then the servant reentered. A well-simulated expression of pain crossed her fair face, and she put her hand quickly to her side.

There was no time for further consideration; I accepted the situation.

"The pain is almost constant now, is it not?" I said, gravely. Then seating myself at the table, and remarking that I quite frequently put up my own prescriptions, I prepared a potion, supposed to be very powerful, but, of course, perfectly simple and harmless.

A little gleam of pleasure in her eye did not escape me, nor a slight twinkle of merriment, either, as I ordered mustard applications in liberal quantities.

"I hope she will have the thought to insist on applying them herself," I said inwardly; "there is no need of her martyring herself to a too great extent."

Well, what with servants running for hot water and mustard plasters, and my gravity and Miss Farnsworth's (so she introduced herself) little, repressed exclamations of pain, we succeeded in getting up quite a commotion in the Darley House. It seemed the stylish young lady, who had arrived only that afternoon with a goodly number of trunks, had excited considerable attention and speculation, and the news of her sudden and violent attack of illness was received with corresponding interest and solicitude.

At length, Miss Farnsworth professed herself somewhat relieved and I took my leave, promising to call on the following morning, unless the case should demand my presence before that time, "which I do not now anticipate," I said, with professional caution.

"Whatever may be the cause of the young lady's conduct," I said to myself, as I reentered my room, "her little comedy has spoiled my tragedy," and I took down my pistol and removed the charge. I was a different being from that of three hours before. Death seemed now as foreign a thing in my mind as life had before appeared—so different a coloring had a single gleam of hope given things.

For long, monotonous months I had been waiting, waiting, for that which never came, my pocket growing lighter and my heart heavier every day, the current always setting one way, not a straw giving a backward ripple to the downward tide.

An orphan, almost from my birth, at an age before my recollection of my grandfather, a man of large property, had died intestate, and to me, as the lineal heir, the property had fallen. And in the belief that this property was mine I had grown up to manhood, a gay, light-hearted, impulsive fellow, who had never seen aught of life but the bright, easy side. The only touch of the practical there was about me was a passion for the study of medicine, and this I had pursued to a really considerable extent, for the mere love of it.

One day as I was rummaging among some old papers in the library I happened to pull out, from a corner where it had lain undisturbed for many a year, a paper, yellow and worn with age. I unfolded it with idle curiosity.

There at the end was the signature, firm and bold, of my grandfather, and above it my eyes read the words that made my brain spin like a top, for it was the last will and testament of William Launce, and it gave and bequeathed all his property, not to me, but to Alicia Orton, a person whose very name and existence were hitherto unknown to me.

The shock was a severe one in every way, but, most of all, my pride was touched. I had lived on what was not mine all my days. Could I live another hour without giving up this property to its rightful owner? I was young and impulsive, with a full share of that pride which had always been a leading trait of the Launces, and I thought less of what a mighty change this involved for me than of dispossessing myself of that which was never mine.

But who and where was this Alicia Orton? Who would know? Grandfather's lawyer was dead—the witnesses were dead. "Bah!" I said, impatiently, "everybody is dead. No, wait, there is old Aunt Rhoda. She may know." And locking the will carefully in the drawer where I had found it, I went in search of this individual.

I found her knitting, smoking and working with equal vigor, in the full enjoyment of undisturbed possession of that rather chaotic region, her own room.

At sight of me a smile of delight spread over her broad, dusky face, whose color was finely set off by the snowy whiteness of her kinky hair.

"Well, bress de Lord," she said, joyously, "ef here aint my boy, a comin' to see me in my own room, de room he gib me all for myself! Set down, chile. Wall, thar, I 'clare for it, de chairs is pooty much occipled. 'Tis mazin' how things does get heaped up with me clarin' up all the time. Yis, honey, jist tarna dem things right out on de floor. Dey aint much count—jist a few stockings an sich I was gwine to cut over for Nancy's chilen."

"Aunt Rhoda," I said, as soon as I could get in a word, "do you know, or did you ever know, a person by the name of Alicia Orton?"

"Lordy massy, yes! Well, no, not exactly, eider, but I knowd 'bout de moder of her, she that was Margaret Reeves an' married a Orton, but orter married your grandfader, an' I'll say dat ef I am talkin' to you. But, dar, de Lord knows you aint noways to blame, so don't yer trouble, honey," she said, with the rambling garrulity of age.

"Ought to have married my grandfather? Why?" I said, trying to bring her back to that head of her discourse.

"Why? Hadn't a man orter marry a gal when he hangs round her a year or two, an' gets her so she aint no eyes nor nothin' for nobody but him? His folks beat him out of it, yer see. Nobody nebber was good enough for de Launces dem days. But he 'pented on it! pend on dat. He nebber took no comfort wid de woman he married, an' nebber was like hisself arterwards. But yer aint noways to blame 'bout it, ef she was yer grandmoder, honey."

Poor old Aunt Rhoda! She had always a soft place in her heart for "her boy," as she always called me, big and little.

I began to see through this matter. My grandfather had willed his property to the child of his old sweetheart, as an atonement. There was something of spite mingled with this more Christian spirit, I thought afterwards, when Aunt Rhoda explained his cruel and complete ignoring of me by informing me that he never manifested the slightest fatherly feeling for his own son, my father seeming only to regard him as the child of the wife he hated.

"Do you know where this Alicia Orton is now?" I said, again.

"Wall, no! yis! praps I do. 'Pears now I heard Nancy say somethin' 'bout a Miss Orton that was teachin' music to Miss Price's chilen, when she was down to Fairbanks on a visit. 'Honey," she said, elevating her voice to a high key, "what was that music teachin' Orton's fust name?"

And from some invisible quarter came back the fateful reply:

"Alicia!"

"Aunt Rhoda," I said, "this place, and all that I have so long thought was mine, is this Alicia Orton's. I have discovered to-day that grandfather left a will, and by that will every dollar of his property is given to her."

The good old creature's aged eyes filled with tears, and she rocked herself to and fro in a state of great dismay and sympathy.

"Don't yer nebber say nothin' 'bout it, honey, nebber! He hadn't no right to will his property 'way from his own blood, dat way. I nebber see sich a topey-turvy world as this is. I 'clare for it I'm glad I'm most down to Jordan's shore. Dat's what yer grandfader wanted to tell 'em an' couldn't, whar dat ar was. He had a stroke you see, an' nebber could speak nor lift a finger arter it, an' all the time a tryin' to, three days an' nights. He was an awful close-communioned kind of man. Nebber told nobody nothin'. Dey asked him (his lawyer man died just 'fore he did yer see) ef dar was any will, an' some thought he meant yes, an' some no, but dey nebber found none, so nobody don't know nothin' 'bout it. An' don't you, honey. My 'vice is, jist say nothin' 'bout it. You've had it so long, an' yer oughter hev it anyway. Blood is blood, 'member dat, my boy."

"Aunt Rhoda," I said, feeling very chivalrous and strong to do and dare, "do you suppose I'll live a day longer on what is another's? I'd starve first, though there isn't much danger of that. If a young girl can get her own living I should think I might."

"Yis, chile, but yer see yer warn't brought up to it. Makes all de difference in de world, dat does," said Aunt Rhoda, with a dubious shake of her head.

But I paid little attention to her croakings. A feverish haste possessed me to divest myself of my unlawful riches. I could scarcely bear the air I breathed, the food I ate, the house I lived in. I communicated the discovery of the will at once, by letter, to Miss Orton, and commenced settling up matters as fast as possible preparatory to a removal to the West, which was then the popular El Dorado. I thought that I had knowledge enough to set up for a physician there.

I did not wish to stay and meet my successor. It did not seem to me I could face her, for I had a strange unreasonable feeling of shame at holding the property from her so long. She answered my letters in a womanly, yet business-like style, begging me, however, in a deliberate manner, to consider the old place as my home always and to remain there as usual.

In return for this I wrote a cold, proud letter, declining the offer, and pledging my word that I would as soon as possible make up the value of the only piece of property I had sold.

Then I disposed of my guns, fishing apparatus, and a number of other expensive articles which I didn't see that a woman could have any possible use for, and started, cutting myself adrift from all my old moorings and setting myself afloat on the world's untried sea, as ignorant of its shoals and deeps as a man could well be.

I settled in a Western town, and there, as I have said, I waited, till "hope deferred," pride, disappointment and hard fare wrought such a change in me that many an hour I sat doubting my own identity. "This way lies madness," and so at last I came to the rash resolve to leave a world which I despised myself for my inability to conquer.

When I made my morning professional call on Miss Farnsworth, I found her decidedly comfortable. Indeed, she felt quite restored to her usual health, "thanks to my skill," she said, with a beaming smile, as I seated myself. This little speech from the "grand leddy" quite enhanced my importance with Tim, who was stirring the fire, as I perceived at once from the expression of his face as he regarded me.

I had thought my patient one of the most beautiful women I had ever seen, on the night before, and the clear morning light served only to confirm this first impression, for, unlike so many women who seem only night-blooming flowers, she had no blemish of complexion, no lines of time and care, for daylight to search out and reveal. She was dazzlingly fair, without pallor, her abundant hair a perfect bronze, with those lovely waves and ripples that art seeks in vain to counterfeit, and her eyes a rich, golden brown, luminous and warm. Her figure was tall and full, and her expression at once noble and feminine. The old familiar quotation came at once to my mind as I regarded her:

"A perfect woman, nobly planned,
To warn, to comfort, and command."

Her peculiar conduct of the preceding night puzzled me, but she was a woman for whom it was impossible to entertain any feeling contrary to respect.

When Tim had left the room she thanked me warmly, blushing brightly the while, for helping me on with her little play of the night before, and then dismissing the subject, we fell into an easy, delightful conversation, until, at length, I found myself speaking of my business, or, rather, of my lack of it, a thing which I had never before done to any human being.

"There is something wonderfully sympathetic about her nature," I thought, as I went homeward, and for the first time in many a day the winter sunlight seemed not to mock me with its brightness.

Wonder of wonders! "It never rains but it pours." When I reentered my office, there was an order upon my slate. This was indeed quite a big sprinkle for me—a call to the house of the great man of the town.

Well, it is especially true in a profession that "it is the first step which costs." My call to Miss Farnsworth, who took up her quarters at the Darby House and became at once the fashion, helped me amazingly, and I was quite sure she aided me whenever she could by mentioning me with favor. The tide had turned with me—I had now only to turn my sails to the prosperous breezes.

The people of Darley suddenly discovered that Doctor Launce was not only a fine physician but a gentleman, and this gave me an entree into the circle in which Miss Farnsworth moved. Of course I fell in love with her. It would have been far more strange had I not. She was a fine musician, and of music I was passionately fond, and I fell into a habit of dropping into her parlor, when I was weary with long rides, and resting, while she sung, in her deliciously modulated voice, songs sweet, and soft, and low. I got a way, too, of telling her of my hopes, my cares, my successes, and one night, when I had driven all day, and was, O, so gloriously tired with hard work, I told her what a mad, cowardly act her chance call had saved me from.

I looked in her beautiful eyes, half shrinking—for what if I should read there contempt and scorn? But there were only pity and ineffable sympathy in their lovely depths.

"You do not despise me?" I said, eagerly.

"No," she said, softly. "I know too well what creatures of opportunity we are, to do that. No," she repeated, "I do not despise you."

There was some wonderful light in her eye, some heavenly smile about her mouth, as she spoke the word "despise," that transported me.

"No, you do not despise me, Nora Farnsworth. You love me!" I said, with a sudden, triumphant surety, and all in a moment I held her mine, mine, in my arms.

Once, before my love returned to her home in New York, I asked her what she meant by her assumed illness.

"For that, and the reason why I left my home and came here, you must trust me till you come on to New York. You can, Launcelet?" She laughed as she spoke, but I could see a shade of anxiety in her face lest the secret troubled me.

"For that, and anything else in the world you may choose to ask me," I said, with a fervor that reassured her. "And to New York I shall come just as soon as I can bring the money with me to pay the debt I told you of. I can go to my old home then, and meet Miss Orton without blushing."

"What sort of person do you suppose she is?" said Nora.

"I never thought enough about her to picture her," I answered, carelessly. "I only know I thank her now for giving me the chance to know what I was made of. And yet, God knows I cannot flatter myself," I added, soberly. "Success hangs on very slight things, sometimes."

Nora alid her soft hand in mine.

"Forget that night," she said. "You never would have done it."

But I don't know about that.

Nora went back to New York, and I stayed behind, well content to labor with so glorious a prize in view. Such letters as we wrote! Nora has been my sweet, sweet wife this many a year, but I never think of some passages in those I received from her without the sweet thrill returning that I knew when first I read them. I have a fancy that lovers who are never parted lose the most lasting sweet of courtship—those delightfully extravagant, deliciously absurd, and yet sacred things—love letters.

Things went well with me, and it was not long before I had the pleasure of bidding Miss Nora Farnsworth expect me in New York on a certain day soon after the reception of the happily written letter conveying this bidding.

I have no doubt but certain women with babies, certain young and old, but alike inexperienced voyagers, thought me a most obliging and accommodating traveller on that trip from Darley, Indiana, to New York city. The fact was, I was happy, and I could afford to be good-natured. I had the money in my pocket to pay that old debt which had weighed on me, like an incubus, so long, I had a profession that warranted me in making the sweetest woman in all the world my wife, and I was going after her now.

At the New York station a pair of brown eyes drew my own like a magnet. There was my own sweet darling waiting for me. How the blushes came and went in her soft round cheek, as she sat beside me in the carriage! As we rode on, an agitation, unusual to her manner, seemed to possess her and grow more and more marked every moment.

The quarter of the city through which we were passing was near my old home. We were even on the same street, and as we were about to pass it, I couldn't help a feeling of regret (only for her sake, I will affirm,) that this lovely place was not indeed mine, as I had once fancied. Why was the carriage stopping?

A soft hand stole shyly into mine.

"Welcome back to your own, Launcelet Launce," said a voice, bewilderingly sweet.

"To all your own," she repeated, with an emphasis fervent and tender, and like one in a dream I entered my old home, where old Aunt Rhoda received "her boy" with rapturous delight.

"Alicia Farnsworth Orton," said my brown-eyed darling, with a gleam of merriment in those same brown eyes, while she made me an arch courtesy. "Aunt Rhoda sent me after you, didn't you, aunty?"

"Yes, I did jist dat, honey. An' I reckon ye've 'got him fast. Aint dat so, my boy? Guess I'd better be helpin' set on dat supper." And breaking into a mellow, unctuous laugh that made her quiver like a huge mould of jelly, Aunt Rhoda departed.

"Did you think I could come here, and, driving you out, take that which was rightfully yours, I don't care what the law says, without a word?" said Alicia Orton, her whole figure expressing a pride that at least matched my own. "When they told me you had gone West, without money or friends, I determined to find you if it were a possible thing. Besides, to tell the truth," she said, with a little blush, "I liked your cold, proud letters, and had a little curiosity about you. I found you at last, and learned enough of you, no matter how, to convince me that times were none too good with you. I knew you wouldn't let me help you, knowingly, you proud, foolish fellow, so I had to disguise my name. My old days had taught me, long before, that fashion rules everything, a choice of physicians as well as musicians, so I adopted the little ruse you know of, for the double purpose of seeing you and bringing you into notice. I don't believe that success is always the gauge of a man's merit, but I saw that you could improve opportunity. That interested me, and then—and then—"

How celestially she blushed!

"And then you fell in love with me," I said, supplying her hesitating speech. "And I with you, Nora Farnsworth. And now again with you, Alicia Orton, and never did a man before have two such glorious sweet-hearts!"

And I had just time for the kiss that sealed my second betrothal, when Aunt Rhoda came shuffling in with news that more substantial sweets awaited us.

THE DEVIL'S HOLLOW.

In the town of Catskill, on the Hudson River, there dwelt, some years ago, an attorney of the name of Mason. He was in considerable practice, and had two clerks in his office, whose names were Mansell and Van Buren. In ability these young men were nearly on a par, but they differed widely in disposition. Van Buren was cold, close, and somewhat sullen in temper; but in business, shrewd, active and persevering. Mansell, although assiduous in his duties, was of a gayer temperament, open as the day, generous, confiding and true.

Mason, without being absolutely dishonest, was what is called a keen lawyer, his practice being somewhat of the sharpest; and as the disposition of his clerk, Van Buren, assimilated in many respects to his own, he was a great favorite—more intimately in his confidence, and usually employed on those delicate matters which sometimes occur in an attorney's business, and in which the honesty of Mansell might rather hinder than help.

Mason had a niece, who, he being a bachelor, lived with him in the capacity of house-keeper. She was a lively, sensitive and clever girl—very pretty, if not positively handsome. She had the grace of a sylph and the step of a fawn. It was natural that such a maiden should be an object of interest to two young men living under the same roof; and by no means a matter of astonishment that one or both of them should fall in love with her; and both of them did. But as the young lady had but one heart, she could not retain the love of each. In making her selection, the choice fell upon Edward Mansell, greatly to the chagrin of his rival, and to the annoyance of Mason, who would have been pleased to find Van Buren the favorite suitor. However, Mansell was chosen lover, and Mason could not alter the case by argument, nor was he disposed to send away his niece, who was in some measure essential to his domestic comfort; and, moreover, he loved her as much as he loved anything.

Matters went on this way for some time; a great deal of bitterness and rancor being displayed by Mason and Van Buren on the one hand, while Kate and Edward Mansell found in the interviews they occasionally enjoyed, more than compensation for the annoyance to which they were thus necessarily exposed.

It happened, at the time when Edward's engagement was within a month of its expiration, that Mason had received a sum of money as agent for another party, amounting to nearly three thousand dollars, of which the greater portion was solid coin. As the money could not be conveniently disposed of until the following day, it was deposited in a tin box in the iron safe, the key of which was always in the custody of Mansell. Soon after he received the charge, Van Buren quitted the office for a short time, and in the interim an application from a client rendered it necessary for Mansell to go up to the courthouse. Having despatched his business at the hall, he returned with all expedition, and in due time he took the key of his safe to deposit therein, as usual, the valuable papers of the office over night—when to his inconceivable horror, he discovered the treasure was gone.

He rushed down stairs, and meeting Van Buren, communicated the unfortunate circumstance. He, in turn, expressed his astonishment in strong terms, and indeed exhibited something like sympathy in his brother clerk's misfortune. Every search was made about the premises, and information was given to the nearest magistrate, but as Mason was from home, and would not return till the next day, little else could be done. Edward passed a night of intense agony—nor were the feelings of Kate more enviable. Mason returned some hours earlier than was expected, and sent immediately for Van Buren, and was closeted with him for a long time.

Mansell, utterly incapacitated by the overwhelming calamity which had befallen him, from attending to his duties, was walking, ignorant of Mason's return, when Kate came, or rather flew towards him, and exclaimed:

"O Edward, my uncle has applied for a warrant to apprehend you; and, innocent though I know you are, that fiend in human form, Van Buren, has wound such a web around you, that I dread the worst. I have not time to explain; fly instantly, and meet me at nightfall, in the Devil's Hollow, when I will explain all."

Mansell, scarcely knowing what he did, rushed out of the garden and through some fields; nor did he stop till he found himself out of town on the banks of the river. Then, for the first time, he repented of having listened to the well-meant but unwise counsel of his dear Kate. But the step was taken, and he could not retrace it now. He proceeded until he arrived at a thick grove, in the vicinity of the Devil's Hollow, where he lay completely hid, until night closed upon him.

He then approached a dark opening in which there was a deep hollow, which had acquired a celebrity from its having been the scene of a murder some years before, and was such an object of superstitious awe to the farmers of the vicinity, that he was considered a bold man who would venture there after nightfall. This, doubtless, had influenced Kate in the choice of such a place of meeting, inasmuch as they would be secure from interruption.

Mansell returned, and lingered on the skirts of the grove, until the sound of a light footstep on the gravelled path which led to the place announced the approach of the loved being whom he felt he was about to meet for the last time. The poor girl could not speak a word when they met, but bowing her head upon his shoulder, burst into a flood of passionate tears. By degrees she became more calm, and then detailed to him a conversation she had overheard between Van Buren and her uncle; and gathered thence that the former had succeeded in convincing Mason of Edward's guilt, by an artful combination of facts which would have made out a prima facie case against the accused—the most formidable one being the finding of a considerable sum of specie in Mansell's trunk. Knowing that he could not satisfactorily account for the possession of this money, without the evidence of a near relative who had departed for Europe a week before, and whose address was unknown and return uncertain, Edward, to avoid the horror and disgrace of lying in the county jail in the intermediate time, resolved on evading the officers of justice, until he could surrender himself with the proofs of his innocence in his hands.

The moon had now risen above the hill which bound the prospect, and warned the lovers that it was time to separate.

"And now, dearest," said he, "I leave you with the brand of thief upon my fair name, to be hunted like a beast of prey from one hiding-place to another. But, O Kate, I bear with me the blest assurance that one being, and that being the best loved of my heart, knows me to be innocent; and that thought shall comfort me."

"A remarkably pretty speech, and well delivered!" exclaimed a voice, which caused the youthful pair to start, and turn their eyes in the direction whence it proceeded, when from behind a solitary tree that grew in the Hollow, a tall figure wrapped in an ample cloak walked towards them. The place, as we have before said, had an evil reputation, and although Edward and his companion were of course free from the superstitious fears which characterized the country people, an undefinable feeling stole over them, as they gazed on the tall form before them.

Mansell, however, soon recovered himself and told the stranger that; whoever it was, it ill became him to overhear conversation that was not intended for other ears than their own.

"Nay," was the rejoinder, "be not angry with me; perhaps you may have reason to rejoice in my presence, since being in the possession of the story of your grief, it might be in my power to alleviate it. I have assisted men in much greater straits."

Edward did not like the last sentence, nor the tone in which it was uttered; but he said:

"I see not how you can help me; you cannot give me a clue by which I can find the box."

"Yes, here is a clue," replied the other, as he held forth about three yards of strong cord. "Here is a line; go to the river at a point exactly opposite the hollow oak; wade out in a straight line until you find the box; attach one end of the cord to the box, and the other to a stout cork, but remove it not yet."

"The devil!" said Mansell. Whether he really believed himself to be in the presence of the evil one, or that the word was merely expressive of surprise, we know not.

The stranger took the compliment, and acknowledging it with a bow, said, "The tin box of which you have been accused of stealing, is at the bottom of the river, and you will find that I have spoken no more than the truth."

Mansell hesitated no longer, but accompanied the stranger to the spot, and in a few minutes the box, sealed as when he last saw it, was again in his possession. He looked from the treasure to the stranger, and at last said, "I owe you more than life, for in regaining this, I shall recover my good name, which has been foully traduced."

He was proceeding towards the shore, when the other cried:

"Stop, young gentleman! not quite so fast;

just fasten your cord to it, and replace it where you found it, if you please." Edward started, but the stranger continued: "Were you to take that box back to your employer, think you that you would produce any other effect on him than the conviction, that finding your delinquency discovered, you wished to secure impunity by restoring property? We must not only restore the treasure, but convict the thief. Hush! I hear a footfall!"

As he spoke, he took the box from Edward, who now saw his meaning, fastened the cord to it, and it was again lowered to the bottom of the river, and the cork on the other end of the cord was swimming down with the tide.

"Now follow me in silence," whispered the stranger, and the three retired and hid themselves behind the huge trunk of the tree, whence by the light of the moon they beheld a figure approach the water looking cautiously around him.

"That is the thief," said the stranger, in a low voice, in Edward's ear. "I saw him last night throw something into the river, and when he was gone, I took the liberty of raising it up; when, expecting that he would return and remove his booty, I replaced it, and had been unsuccessfully watching the place, just before I met you in the Hollow."

By this time the man had reached the river's brink, and after groping some time through the water, he found the box, but started back in astonishment on seeing a long cord attached to it. His back was turned to the witnesses of the transaction, so that Edward and the stranger had got him securely by the collar before he could make an attempt to escape. The surprise of Mansell and Kate may be more easily conceived than painted, when as the moonbeam fell on the face of the culprit, they recognized the features of Van Buren, his fellow-clerk.

Mansell's character was now cleared, while Van Buren, whom Mason, for reasons of his own, refrained from prosecuting, quitted the town in merited disgrace. The stranger proved to be a gentleman of large landed property in the neighborhood, which he had now visited for the first time in many years, and having been interested in the young pair whom he had delivered so opportunely from tribulation, he subsequently appointed Mansell his man of business, and thus laid the foundation of his prosperity. It is almost needless to add, that Kate, who had so long shared his heart, became his wife, and shared his good fortune.

SINK OR SWIM:

—OR,—

HARRY RAYMOND'S RESOLVE.

BY HORATIO ALGER, JR.

AUTHOR OF "LUCK AND FLUCK," "RAGGED DICK SERIES," "CAMPAIGN SERIES," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER I.

THE VERNON HIGH SCHOOL.

"SINK or swim, live or die, survive or perish, I give my hand and my heart to this vote."

These words were declaimed in a clear, ringing voice from the platform of the Vernon High School. The speaker was a boy of fifteen, well-knit, and vigorous, with a frank, manly expression, and a prepossessing face. His dark, chestnut hair waved slightly above a high intellectual brow, and his attitude, as he faced his schoolmates, was one of ease and unconscious grace. His eye flashed as he declaimed with appropriate emphasis the patriotic extract which commences in the well-known words quoted above. He had learned the orator's secret—to be in earnest—and he carried his audience with him. When at the conclusion of his declamation he bowed and walked to his desk, the boys broke into spontaneous applause. Though this was contrary to the rules of the school, Reuben Tower, A. M., the principal, uttered no reprimand. He had himself been pleased with the declamation, and sympathized to some extent with the scholars.

"Very well indeed, Master Raymond! you speak as if you felt it," he said.

Harry Raymond looked gratified, at this double commendation. The applause of his schoolmates pleased him, for he was by no means indifferent to their good opinion, which he tried on all occasions to deserve. He was no less pleased with Mr. Tower's praise, for he had a high respect for his ability, and that praise was never lightly bestowed.

I have spoken of Harry's good appearance. I am obliged to confess that his dress had nothing to do with this. In fact, his jacket and pants were of very coarse texture, and by no means elegant in fit. Besides this, they appeared, though neat, to have seen considerable service, and there was a patch on one knee; very small, indeed, but still a patch. In fact, I may as well state at the outset, that Harry was the son of a house-carpenter, an industrious and intelligent man, but still of limited income, and obliged to economize strictly in order to lay aside, as he made it a point to do, a hundred dollars a year, as a provision for the future.

The applause which followed our hero's declamation was almost unanimous. I say almost, for there were two boys who did not join it. One of these was James Turner, a boy about Harry's age, but more slightly made. He was the son of Squire Turner, the wealthiest man in Vernon, and his dress afforded quite a contrast to the ill-fitting garments of our young hero. The village tailor's skill had not been deemed sufficient, but James had accompanied his father to New York, where his measure had been left with a Broadway tailor, who had made up the suit and sent it to Vernon by express. The cloth was very fine, and there was a style and neatness of fit about the clothes of which James felt very proud. He regarded his companions with a supercilious air, as if convinced of his own immeasurable superiority, in dress at least.

James Turner did not participate in the applause called forth by Harry Raymond's declamation. On the contrary, he sat with an unpleasant sneer on his lips, and cast a glance of scorn at the patch, which his quick eye had detected in our hero's pants.

There was another boy, sitting next to James, who also refrained from joining in the applause. This was Tom Barton, a friend and hanger-on of James Turner, who by persistent flattery earned the privilege of being treated with half-contemptuous familiarity and condescension by the young aristocrat. He knew that James did not like Harry Raymond, and the sneer which he saw on the lips of his patron gave him the cue. He attempted to imitate it, and gaze scornfully at the young orator in his momentary triumph.

"James Turner?" called out the principal.

James Turner rose from his seat, and walked to the platform, which he ascended, greeting the audience with a stiff and consequential bow, and an air, which might be interpreted to mean, "Boys, you will now have the privilege of hearing me speak."

James had selected a good piece—Patrick Henry's well-known appeal to arms, familiar to every schoolboy, commencing—"I have but one lamp by which my feet are guided, and that is the lamp of experience."

It is a fine piece of oratory, lofty in tone and sentiment, and should be spoken with dignified earnestness. James Turner's voice, which was shrill, was scarcely calculated to do justice to it. Still it would not have called out any demonstration from the young auditory, but for one or two peculiar ideas on the part of James, as to the proper way of speaking it. When he came to the clause, "we have prostrated ourselves before the throne," he suited the action to the word, and sank upon his knees. But, afraid of soiling his pantaloons, he first spread out his silk handkerchief on the platform, and this spoiled whatever effect the action might otherwise have had. There was a general titter, which the young aristocrat saw with anger. At the end of the sentence, he rose from his knees, and with a general scowl at the boys, kept on with his declamation.

But a more serious contretemps awaited him. A little further on the orator says, "we have been spurned, with contempt, from the foot of the throne." Here again James, with a striking lack of judgment, thought it would heighten the effect to suit the action to the word. Accordingly he prepared to kick out with his right foot. Unfortunately, he was so provoked with his schoolmates, for their lack of appreciation of the other point he had made, that he executed the manoeuvre, if it may properly be so called, with a spiteful emphasis which was too much for his equilibrium. He lost his balance, and fell forward in a ludicrous manner, and rolled over on the floor of the schoolroom.

It could not be expected that fifty school-boys could restrain their merriment under such trying circumstances. There was a wild burst of laughter, in which, after an ineffectual attempt to resist the infection, Mr. Tower himself was compelled to join. Boys laughed till the tears came into their eyes, and the merriment was only increased when James Turner rose to his feet, and with an air of offended majesty, marched indignantly to his seat, darting a look of withering scorn, as he meant it to be, at his youthful audience.

The laughter recommenced, and became almost hysterical. The principal, however, quickly recovered himself, and said:

"Boys, that will do. Turner, you must excuse the boys for a little good-natured merriment at your expense. I think your conception of the gestures proper to use with your piece is not quite correct. However, that is a point on which the most experienced speakers are apt to make mistakes; not only boys, but men. Your intention was good, though the effect was injured by circumstances."

These remarks ought to have appeased the offended orator, but he evidently did not mean to be appeased so readily. His feeling of mortification was swallowed up in a greater feeling of anger and irritation at the presumption of his schoolmates, in daring to laugh at him, the son of the richest man in Vernon. He felt that he was entitled, rather, to be treated with respect and deference. So he sat sullenly through the remainder of the speaking, with an ill-tempered scowl upon his features.

When the speaking was over, Mr. Tower rose and said:

"Boys, you are aware that at the commencement of the term, I offered a prize to the boy, who, in your own judgment, should be pronounced to have succeeded best in declamation, taking into consideration the whole term. As this is the last time we shall declaim before vacation, I will call for the vote now. I shall distribute small slips of paper among you, and I will ask each boy to inscribe upon his slip the name of that one who in his opinion deserves the prize. We will afterwards count the votes."

Slips of paper were accordingly distributed, and the boys were soon busy in recording their votes.

"Sheffield, you may collect the votes," said Mr. Tower.

The boy referred to passed among the desks with his hat, and the slips of paper were deposited therein. These were handed to the teacher, who forthwith proceeded to count them.

The count over, he rapped on his desk.

"Boys," he said, "I will announce the vote. Votes cast, fifty. Of those Walter Sheffield has one; James Turner, two; and the remainder, forty-seven in number, are for Harry Raymond, to whom I have great pleasure in awarding the prize, of which he has been pronounced worthy by the nearly unanimous vote of his schoolmates. Raymond, you will come forward."

Harry Raymond advanced toward the teacher's desk, amid the loud applause of his companions.

Mr. Tower placed in his hands a handsomely-bound volume, consisting of selections from the best efforts of orators, ancient and modern, saying:

"I have great pleasure in giving you this volume, Raymond, for my own judgment approves the selection of your school-fellows. I trust you will be able to express in your life, as you have so appropriately done upon the platform, the lofty and elevated sentiments of our best orators."

There was a flush of gratification upon our hero's cheek as he received the book with a respectful bow, and returned to his seat, amid the renewed applause of his fellow-pupils.

CHAPTER II.

SOUR GRAPES.

HARRY RAYMOND lived in a small house, just off the main street, fronting on a narrow road or lane. The building lot, consisting of an acre of land, his father had bought three years before for one hundred and fifty dollars. After purchasing and paying for it cash down, he found that he had but one hundred dollars left towards the house which he wanted to build. Under these circumstances he went to Squire Turner, who was the moneyed man of the village, and asked for a loan. Knowing that his money would be safe, the squire agreed to furnish him what money he might need towards the house, taking a mortgage upon it when it was completed.

Mr. Raymond, therefore, at once commenced building. His house cost a thousand dollars, of which Squire Turner furnished him seven hundred, the balance being made up of his own labor and cash in hand. So when all was done, he regarded himself as worth a property of twelve hundred dollars, subject to a mortgage of seven hundred. During the three years that had since elapsed, he had managed, besides paying interest, to pay up three hundred dollars of the mortgage, leaving only four hundred due. This had not been accomplished without some economy, but his wife and Harry had cheerfully acquiesced in this, being anxious for the time to come when they might be clear owners of the little house.

The house contained six rooms, and stood about fifty feet back from the street. The land in the rear made an excellent garden, supplying them with all the vegetables of which they had need.

Besides Harry, there was his sister Katy, a little girl of ten, sweet and winning in her ways, to whom he was warmly attached.

Mr. Raymond had kept Harry steadily at school, feeling that a good education would be of far more value to him in after life, than the small amount he might earn if kept at work. Harry had justified this determination, having acquitted himself on all occasions most creditably in all the studies which he pursued. Out of school he found time to work in the garden, and assist in various ways by sawing and splitting what wood was required for family use, so that his father, on returning from his day's labor, was not under the necessity of fatiguing himself by extra work.

We will now return to the Vernon High School.

When school was dismissed, Harry Raymond was surrounded by his friends, eager to congratulate him on his success.

"Say, Turner, did you vote for yourself?" called out one of the boys.

"None of your business!" said James Turner, sharply.

He stood a little on one side with his crony, Tom Barton, surveying the scene with an ill-tempered scowl. It was very disagreeable to him to see Harry Raymond's triumph. In fact, he hated our hero, for no good reason except that Harry was his acknowledged superior in acquirements, always standing higher in his classes, and received from his schoolmates a degree of respect and deference which James Turner with all his money could not buy.

YOUNG TURNER SNEERING AT HARRY.

"I congratulate you, Harry," said Walter Sheffield, good-naturedly, "which is doing the handsome thing, considering that I was your rival. You only had forty-six more votes than I. That's what I call a close shave."

"You voted for yourself, didn't you, Sheffield?" said Will Pomeroy.

"I'm not going to expose myself, if I did," said Walter.

"Shouldn't wonder if Turner voted for himself," said one of the boys in a low voice. "But he had two votes."

"O, Tom Barton cast the other vote, of course," said Will Pomeroy, rather contemptuously. "He fawns upon Turner just because he's rich. I wish him joy of his friend."

"Why don't you come and congratulate Raymond on his prize?"

"I'd rather congratulate him on his pantaloons," said James, with a sneer.

"What's the matter with them?" demanded Will Pomeroy, supposing at first that Harry might have soiled them in some way.

"Patches seem to be in fashion," said James, with another sneer.

Of course the attention of all the boys was attracted to Harry's knee, and the patch, which had hitherto escaped observation, was discovered.

Harry Raymond's cheek flushed, for he saw that an insult was intended, but he did not at once speak.

"For shame, Turner!" said Will Pomeroy, indignantly, and it was evident that the other boys sympathized with him in his feeling.

"What should I be ashamed of?" retorted Turner.

"For your meanness in twisting Harry with the patch."

"I didn't, I only mentioned it."

"You are envious because he got the prize."

"What do I care for the trumpery prize? It didn't cost more than a dollar and a half. My father will buy me a dozen such books, if I want them."

"Perhaps he will, but for all that you'd have taken it quick enough if you could have got it. It isn't the value of the book, it's what it means."

"What does it mean?"

"That Harry Raymond is the best speaker in the Vernon High School."

"Boys," said Harry, quietly, "don't trouble yourselves to defend me. I don't care what James Turner says. Perhaps the book didn't cost more than a dollar and a half, but it was given me by your votes, and that makes it worth more to me than if it cost a hundred dollars. I haven't had a chance to say it before, but I am grateful to you for your kindness in awarding it to me, and I shall always treasure it for that reason."

"Three cheers for Harry Raymond!" called out Walter Sheffield, waving his arm, and giving the signal.

The three cheers were given with a will, and Harry looked gratified at this proof of the regard in which he was held.

"Now three groans for James Turner!" said another.

"No, boys," said Harry, promptly, "don't do that."

"But he insulted you."

"I suppose you mean about the patch. But never mind about that. You all know that my father is a poor man, and can't afford to buy me expensive clothes. If I get my clothes torn I can't afford to throw them aside. I don't like patches any better than anybody, but till I get richer I shall wear them."

Harry spoke so manfully, that the boys heartily sympathized with him. It might have been supposed that James Turner would have been convinced of his meanness and ashamed of it, but he was essentially a mean boy, and it may be added that a part of his meanness came to him from his father, who, though a rich man, was selfish and cov-etous, and never known to do a generous action. So James now could not refrain from a parting sneer.

"If Raymond wears patches because he is poor," he said, "I'll give him a pair of pants that I've got through wearing, any time when he'll come up to the house."

"You needn't trouble yourself," said Harry, angry at the insult. "When I want your cast-off clothes I'll let you know. I'll go in rags first."

"Just as you choose," said James, sneering. "There's no accounting for tastes. Come along, Barton."

The two boys walked away, not much regretted by those they left behind. If they had heard the remarks made about them after their departure, neither would have felt particularly complimented.

"The beggarly upstart!" said James to his companion. "He puts on airs enough for a pauper."

"So he does," said Barton. "He can't speak half as well as you. But Mr. Tower's prejudiced."

"I don't care for his miserable prizes," said James. "They're not worth thinking of."

It was only another illustration of the well-known fable of the fox and the grapes.

CHAPTER III.

A SUDDEN BLOW.

HARRY RAYMOND, after receiving the congratulations of his schoolmates, took his way homeward. He was not obliged to travel by the road, as there was a short cut across the field.

At the end of ten minutes he threw open the door, and went into the house. His mother was ironing, and Katy sat near by, reading a book.

"See what I've got, mother," said Harry, holding up his prize.

"What is it, Harry?"

"It's the prize for declamation. The boys took a vote, and it was awarded to me by forty-seven votes out of fifty."

"I am very glad to hear it," said Mrs. Raymond, and her face wore a proud look, as she glanced at the bright and animated face of her son.

"Who were the three boys that didn't vote for you?" asked Katy.

"I was one of them," said Harry, smiling.

"Who did you vote for?"

"For Walter Sheffield."

"Is he a good speaker?"

"Yes."

"But he isn't as good as you are."

"That isn't for me to say."

"Who got the other two votes?"

"James Turner"

"He's an awful disagreeable boy," said Katy. "He puts on all sorts of airs just because his father is rich. I wish father was as rich as Squire Turner."

"Perhaps you'd like to have him for a father."

"No, I shouldn't," said Katy, quickly. "He's just as bad for a man as James is for a boy."

"So you see money isn't everything," said her mother.

There was a deeper meaning in these words than her children knew. There was one passage in her early life, known only to herself and her husband, with which the rich Squire Turner was connected.

As a girl, Mrs. Raymond had been very handsome, and even now, at the age of thirty-six, she retained much of her good looks. It was not generally known that Squire Turner had been an aspirant for her hand. But, though he was even then rich, and could have given her an attractive home, so far as money can make a home attractive, she quietly rejected his suit, and accepted Mr. Raymond, a journeyman carpenter with less than a hundred dollars.

This rejection Squire Turner never forgot nor forgave. He was not a forgiving man, and his resentment was bitter, though he did not choose to show it publicly. Indeed, he treated Mr. and Mrs. Raymond, to all appearance, as though nothing had happened, but none the less he nursed his anger, and waited patiently for an opportunity to repay by some grievous injury the wrong which he fancied he had suffered. About the same time with Mr. Raymond, Squire Turner also married a Miss Ellis, a sharp-tempered splinter from a neighboring town, whose only redeeming point was the possession of ten thousand dollars in her own right. Her husband cared nothing for her, but only for her money, and the marriage was far from being a happy one. Domestic dissension and almost continual wrangling, were what James had witnessed from his babyhood up to the time of his mother's death, a year previous; and perhaps it is not surprising that the son of such parents should have been unpopular, and possessed of disagreeable traits.

Yet Mr. Raymond had applied to Squire Turner for money to assist him in building his house. The squire had two objects in granting this request. First, the security was ample and the investment a good one; and, secondly, a debtor is always to some extent in the power of his creditor. Squire Turner was by no means averse to establishing this power over the husband of the woman who had rejected his suit. The time might come when he could make a use of it.

"What piece did you speak to-day, Harry?" asked his mother.

"The supposed speech of John Adams. You remember how it begins, 'Sink or swim, live or die, survive or perish, I give my hand and my heart to this vote.'"

"Yes, I remember it."

"I have been thinking, mother," continued Harry, "that I shall take my motto from it."

"What do you mean?"

"I mean this. Sink or swim, I am going to do my duty, and try to succeed in life. I am not going to be frightened by obstacles, but am going to push on as well as I can."

"It's a good motto, Harry. I hope you'll have strength to adhere to it."

"I think I'll go out and split a little wood, now, mother."

"I wish you would. I always burn a good deal on ironing days."

"I think I'll split up enough to last two or three days. I have more time Wednesdays than Mondays."

On Wednesday the only afternoon exercise was declamation, so that, instead of closing at four, the school was usually out, as to-day, at half-past two. At half-past five Harry reentered the house.

"Isn't supper ready, mother?" he asked. "I'm as hungry as a bear."

"Yes, Harry, it is ready, but your father has not got home yet. I have been waiting for him."

"Where is he at work?"

"On Doctor Lamson's house, just across the railroad. The doctor is in a hurry to get it finished as soon as possible, and perhaps the carpenters are working extra hours."

"Did father say anything about it before he went away this morning?"

"No, he didn't mention any intention of stopping. But he stopped on Monday a little over time, and perhaps he has done so to-night."

"Well, I hope he'll return soon, for I feel uncommonly hungry."

"If your father isn't here by six, we'll sit down. I can keep the tea hot for him."

Not a shadow of apprehension was in Mrs. Raymond's mind as she spoke, but already a heavy calamity had fallen upon her, of which she was unconscious.

Six o'clock came, and Mr. Raymond had not returned.

"I think you had better sit down to tea, children," said their mother. "I am not very hungry, and I will wait for your father."

They sat down accordingly, and Harry made a hearty supper, quite justifying the report he had given of his appetite.

Another hour passed away.

It was now seven o'clock, and Mr. Raymond was still absent.

"I wonder your father does not come," said Mrs. Raymond, with a little vague restlessness, which had not yet been converted into anxiety. "He has not often been so late as this, without telling me beforehand that he meant to stay away."

"I think I will go out and meet him," said Harry.

To this Mrs. Raymond made no objection, feeling, on the whole, rather relieved by the proposal of her son.

She set the tea once more on the stove, and the bread and pie were also placed on the hearth of the stove to keep warm.

"Your father must be hungry," she said to Katy, "as it is so late."

Harry went out of the gate, and walked slowly up the road in the direction of his father's probable return. He strained his eyes to see through the gathering twilight, but could see nothing of his father. Rather surprised at this, he kept on, until he happened to meet in the street Hiram Payson, who he knew had also been employed on Doctor Lamson's house.

"Good-evening, Mr. Payson," he said.

"Good-evening, Harry; where are you going? To the store?"

"No, I thought I would come out and see if I could meet my father."

"Meet your father? Why, where has he gone?"

"He hasn't got home from work yet. Did you start before him?"

"No, he started before me."

"He did!" exclaimed Harry, in surprise. "What time was that?"

"About five o'clock. I know it was not later than that."

"Where can he be?"

"Haven't you seen anything of him?"

"No. Did he say anything about going anywhere before he returned home?"

"No."

"Where can he be?" asked Harry again, and this time there was anxiety in his tone.

"I'll tell you what, Harry," said Hiram Payson, "if you are going to look for him, I'll join you."

"Thank you, Mr. Payson. I wish you would."

The two pushed on in the direction of Doctor Lamson's new house. It was probably about a mile distant in all, the railroad being three-quarters of the way. They reached the railroad, and, as if by mutual consent, paused and looked about them.

"Your father sometimes walks on the railroad a little distance, as far as Carter's pasture. Perhaps we had better take that way."

Harry assented. There was a scared look on his face, and a fear which he did not dare to define to himself.

It was realized all too soon. About fifty rods distant, they came upon the mangled remains of his father, lying stretched across the track. His hearing had been affected by a fever, which he had three years previous. It was evident, that as he was walking on the track, the train sweeping round a curve had come upon him unawares, and his life was the forfeit. Harry uttered one shriek of horror, and sank down beside his father's body, now cold in death.

PRINCESS ETHEL.

BY MISS CAMILLA WILLIAM.

PROBABLY there never was any woman on earth more beautiful than the Princess Ethel. She was so lovely that every one who saw her turned to look again; and when they looked they smiled, just as you always do when you see anything that delights you. The picture of her which you see here is very pretty, but by no means does her justice. She had heaps of dark hair, which would curl most gracefully and was silky-fine and glossy. She had large blue eyes, with a tender and cheerful light in them, and very long lashes. Her shape was perfect, as you can see, her hands and arms were lovely, and she was as white as new milk. You will perceive that she wears earrings, and has her hair done high, as is the style now. Well, it was she who set the fashion; and the Empress of France and the other ladies have only just a little while ago found it out. As quick as they saw that picture, they went and did up their hair just like it, and put on just such earrings.

This princess had the misfortune to lose her father, at which she was very unhappy; for not only was he a very good father, of whom she was fond, but he was a warrior, and protected his kingdom and his daughter from the wicked folks who lived about. When he died,

Ethel did not know what to do. She could not lead armies, as he had done; and two of her greatest generals were dead. If she had only known where her Uncle Madoc lived, it would not have been so bad. But when her father became king, on the death of his father, Madoc, his twin-brother, had gone off to live in a strange land, as they supposed.

"I go," he said, "because, since I and my brother are twins, I have as much right to be king as he, and my presence might give him trouble. I am happier, with only my wife and son, than I could be on a throne. Besides, I look so much like the king that I might be mistaken for him, and that would be very annoying to all."

"O, if I only knew where Uncle Madoc was," said the princess, weeping bitterly; "he would come and take care of my kingdom for me. But here I am helpless, with foes all around, and my armies frightened to death. If I were a man, I would be braver; but it is a miserable thing to be a woman."

While she wept, a servant came to the door of her chamber, and, bowing lowly, said:

"Madam, the King of Colchis is at the palace gate, and wishes to see your highness."

"I don't want to see him," answered the princess. "He is my enemy, and an ugly, hideous old man besides."

"Madam," said the chamberlain, bowing lowly again, "he has ten thousand men with him."

"O!" exclaimed the princess, starting up, and turning a little paler (she couldn't be much paler than she already was); "that alters the case. Invite him in, and say that I will come as soon as I shall have wiped away the tears that I am shedding for my father."

Then she called her maids, and they began to dress her. And while they dressed her they talked. One of them said:

"O princess, there is no escape for you. You will have to marry him."

"Marry who?" asked the princess, staring through her tears.

"The King of Colchis," said the maid.

"Does not your highness see that he has come to offer himself to you?"

At that the princess pulled down her hair, and put off her purple mantle, and threw away her rings and bracelets.

"Make me look as ugly as you can," she said. "Put on mourning. I will never marry that wretch, never!"

So they put away all her ornaments, and dressed her in mourning, and let her hair hang. But, instead of being ugly, she was then more beautiful than ever.

"What shall I do?" she cried, in despair. "Why have I not a snub nose, and black teeth, and blue lips, and red hair? Make haste all of you! Get things to make me ugly. Cut off my hair, Mignon, black my teeth, Agate, do something, all of you!"

But even while she spoke, she heard the king stamping about the hall below, asking in a fierce voice why she didn't come, and saying that he would himself go up stairs after her.

"Alas! madam, you must go without delay," said her ladies. "It is vain to try to make you look ugly. You grow more beautiful every moment."

"Let us make haste, then," cried the princess, and hurried down stairs, trailing her black robes and her dark hair about her, her face looking out from all that shade like the evening star out of twilight skies. At least, so thought a young warrior who stood just behind the king.

The king himself seemed pleased, for he smiled a horrible smile that made his grizzled old face look ten times more hateful than before, and going to the princess, he took her by the hand, and kissed her before she could help herself.

"My dear," he said, in a great, harsh voice which he tried in vain to make soft, "I have come to ask your hand, and to marry you right away. That will unite our two kingdoms, which lie side by side, and give you some one to take the lead of your armies, and protect you. And, besides," he added, chucking her under the chin, "it will give me a pretty wife."

"O no!" cried the princess, shrinking back, and blushing with anger; at which she grew still more beautiful, so that the young warrior behind the king, who had never once removed his eyes from her, thought that now she was the morning star.

"And why not?" demanded the king, frowning terribly, so that the ladies all covered their faces with their hands, and Ethel nearly fainted with terror.

"Because," she stammered, "you are a good deal older than I am, and I am afraid you would die first, and that would be a great grief to me."

The king laughed so that the palace shook, then seized the princess by the arm and said:

"You are a glib liar, and an artful minx besides. I have seen you casting glances at Prince Falchion here," turning to scowl at the handsome warrior behind him; "and I dare say he has been admiring you. But he is a mere adventurer, without a kingdom, or a piece of gold even, unless I give it to him. You had better both of you be careful. Now, madam, will you marry me?"

"No, never!" cried Ethel.

The king gave her arm an awful squeeze that made her cry out, then turned to the young prince:

"Prince," he said, fiercely, "take this lady to my great forest on the borders, and set her to tending goats. She shall stay there in solitude, have only berries, and nuts, and water to live on, and sleep on the bare earth, till she consents to be my wife. See that you obey my orders, and that you do not touch her yourself, or so much as smile upon her. If you do, your head will come off in less than no time. My dwarf shall follow and watch you, and see that you behave."

Then the king gave the princess a push out of the door, and, looking about on the trembling courtiers, he said, in a voice of thunder:

"I am king here. Obey me, and do not dare attempt to see, or to help that impudent wretch."

Meantime Ethel was following the prince to the far-away forest, and the dwarf was close on her heels, watching. But she was not very unhappy.

"It is not so bad to follow him," she thought, looking at his fine, graceful form and stately bearing. She marked, too, that he took very little steps, so as not to tire her.

It was near night when they reached the forest where the princess was to live all alone and tend goats, and there the prince stopped and looked at her, with his face full of love and pity. Fortunately, just at that moment the dwarf stubbed his toe, and fell down, so there was chance for a word.

"Find my Uncle Madoc," whispered the princess.

"I come from him. He is not far off," whispered the prince in return. "In two days you shall be free."

By this time the dwarf was up, rubbing his nose and watching; and there was no way but for the prince to go. The princess looked after him as long as she could see him; and once, when the dwarf stumbled in running (for now the prince took long steps), he looked back and smiled at the princess, and she smiled at him.

"How he must love me," she thought, "when he thus risks his head to give me a smile!"

Two days and nights are a long time to spend in a lonely forest, with only goats for company, and berries and water for food; and if it had not been for hope the princess's heart would have broken. Moreover, the hateful dwarf came at morning and evening, and asked her if she had consented yet to marry the old king, and when she said "No," he told her he had orders to hang her the next time.

"What shall I do if the prince or my uncle does not come?" she thought in terror, on the third morning. "It is almost time for the dwarf, and he will hang me, surely!"

As she spoke, there was a crackling in the bushes, and the frightful dwarf made his appearance with a large rope in his hand. He fixed it to a tree branch, got the noose all ready, then said to the princess:

"Will you marry the king to-day?"

"No!" she cried out; "I will die first!"

At that the dwarf, who was very strong, and had immense arms, caught at her to put her head in the noose. But as he did so, two arms reached around the trunk of the tree, one of them pushing the dwarf's head into the noose, and the other pulling at the end of the rope, and all done so quickly and neatly that the little wretch was hanged entirely before he knew it.

Ethel cried out joyfully, and stretched her hands to the prince, who stood smiling by her. But it was not he who owned the hands that had delivered her. Their owner appeared instantly, a tall, rough-looking man, with long hair, a slouched hat and curled beard. He was rather rough, but not ugly looking, and Ethel cried out again when she saw him, for she knew he was her Uncle Madoc.

"Let us fly!" she cried. "The king will be after us as soon as he misses his dwarf."

Uncle Madoc shrugged up his shoulders, and leaned to give the hanging wretch a good pinch, to make sure that he was quite dead. Then he said quietly:

"I'm rather too old and heavy to fly, little niece; and we are in no sort of danger. Our armies, Prince Falchion's and mine, have gone on to destroy the King of Colchis, and get every sign of him out of sight before we go to the palace. I gave orders, too, for preparations to be made for a marriage."

At that the princess blushed most beautifully, and her uncle caught her up in his arms, and laughed, and carried her through the wood toward her palace. The Prince Falchion walked behind, and while Madoc sang and muttered to himself, he whispered to the princess:

"I came from afar to see you," he said, "and when I met the King of Colchis, he made a captive of me. Your uncle sent me as soon as he heard of his brother's death. But, though I have helped to save you, I am miserable; for he is going to marry you to some wealthy prince, while I have only a heart and a hand to offer you."

The princess said nothing; but she reached out her hand and plucked a branch from a flowering shrub, a beautiful branch full of fragrant flowers and fruit.

"What is that for?" asked the prince.

"To give to my husband," she answered, dropping her eyes.

THE BEAUTIFUL FLOWERING BRANCH.

He said nothing, but walked on sorrowfully, till they reached the palace, where everything was in splendid order, and the King of Colchis and his warriors all hanged and out of sight.

Such rejoicings never were seen; and when the princess, magnificently dressed, came down to be married, the air was full of music, and huzzas.

"Who is to be your highness's husband?" asked the archbishop, seeing the princess stand alone, with her ladies in a cluster behind her.

She glanced around the circle to where stood Prince Falchion, looking pale and despairing, and smiling sweetly on him, she held out to him the flowering branch she had plucked in the wood.

Instantly his face became radiant, and he ran to throw himself at her feet.

"If you want to marry me, prince," she said, smilingly, "you will have to stand beside me."

So they were married, and lived happy ever after. And Uncle Madoc was general of all the armies.

WHERE CAN FAIRY-LAND BE!

BY LOUISE DUPEE.

O, where can fairy-land be, do you think?
Under the ground, with some sly, little door,
All cunningly hidden neath marsh-buds pink,
Or buttercups, down on the meadow's floor,

That opens whenever a fairy wing
Taps on it lightly, then closes again;
Locked fast in winter, but soon as the spring Drops on the green buds her glad, ringing rain

The tiny key turns in the lock of gold,
And up on their mist-woven ladders frail
Fays shy and gray, and fays merry and bold,
Come trooping, and scamper o'er hill and dale.

O, where can fairy-land be, do you guess?
In some purple hollow 'twixt mountains
green,
Shut in by the doop, brambly wilderness,
With tallest thorn trees that ever were seen?

The birds, and the butterflies, and the bees,
They find the way thither, I know full well,
And wild brooks that chatter over the leas;
But, coax them forever, they would not tell!

O, where can fairy-land be, do you know?
Isn't it down in the marsh-meadows deep,
Where rushes, with never a wind touch, flow,
And the drowsy marigolds shine and sleep?

But, no! all the elfins would have wet feet,
And a cold every day, if they lived there,
For the mosses are wet even in summer's heat,
And water drips off from the maiden's hair.

The mermaid's chambers are under the sea,
And giant's castles are up in the air, [lea,
The water sprites live neath the brooks of the
And gnomes the home of the diamond share;

But where the fays live, that every bright night
Dance over these meadows, I cannot think.
I know when they're out, for the moon's more bright,
And stars when I look at them seem to wink.

But I ne'er can find e'en the ghost of one,
Though I pull the flower cups open and peep
Still as a mouse lest they hear me, and run Home through the shadows to wait till I sleep.

THE HOUSEKEEPER.

COTTAGE PUDDING.—Six ounces of currants, half a pound of minced suet, and the same quantity of grated bread, half a grated nutmeg, a table-spoonful of white wine, or rose water; mix all well together, with the beaten yolks of five eggs, to a stiff paste, and with floured hands roll it into twelve or thirteen small puddings in the form of sausages; fry them gently in butter till of a nice brown; roll them well in the frying-pan. Serve with pounded loaf sugar strewed over them, and with a sweet sauce. They may be boiled.

FRUIT SUET PUDDING.—Of finely-minced suet, flour, grated bread, and cleaned currants, a quarter of a pound each; a tea-spoonful of pounded ginger, one of salt, two ounces of brown sugar, and a tea-cupful of milk; mix all the ingredients well together, and boil it in a cloth for two hours. Serve with a sweet sauce.

FAMILY PUDDING.—Mix with a pound of flour half a pound of raisins stoned and chopped, the same quantity of minced suet, a little salt, and milk or water sufficient to make it into a stiff batter; boil it for five hours. Serve with melted butter poured over it. Two well-beaten eggs may be added.

ALMOND CAKES, SMALL.—One pound of butter beaten to a cream, half a pound of finely-pounded and sifted loaf sugar, half a pound of dried and sifted flour, and the same quantity of blanched sweet almonds cut into thin small bits, one well-beaten egg, and a little rose water, must be mixed well together and with a spoon dropped upon wafer paper or tins, and then baked.

BREAD PUDDING.—Make a pint of bread-crums; put them in a stew-pan with as much milk as will cover them, the peel of a lemon, a little nutmeg grated, and a small piece of cinnamon; boil about ten minutes; sweeten with powdered loaf sugar; take out the cinnamon, and put in four eggs; beat all well together, and bake half an hour, or boil rather more than an hour.

PLAIN BREAD PUDDING.—Make five ounces of bread-crums; put them in a basin; pour three-quarters of a pint of boiling milk over them; put a plate over the top to keep in the steam; let it stand twenty minutes, then beat it up quite smooth with two ounces of sugar and a salt-spoonful of nutmeg. Break four eggs on a plate, leaving out one white; beat them well, and add them to the pudding. Stir it all well together, and put it in a mould that has been well buttered and floured; tie a cloth over it, and boil it one hour.

BUTTER CAKES.—Beat a dish of butter with your hands to a cream, add two pounds of sifted sugar, three pounds of dried flour, and twenty-four eggs, leave out half the whites, and then beat all together for an hour; when you are going to put it in the oven add a quarter of an ounce of mace and a nutmeg, a little sack and brandy, seeds and currants, if you think proper.

CAKE, WITHOUT BUTTER.—Take the weight of three eggs in sugar, and the weight of two in flour; when the five eggs are well beaten, gradually add the sugar, and then the flour, with a little grated lemon-peel, or a few caraway seeds. Bake it in a tin mould, in rather a quick oven.

CHESHIRE CAKE.—Beat for half an hour the yolks of eight, and the whites of five eggs; add half a pound of pounded and sifted loaf sugar, a quarter of a pound of dried and sifted flour, and the grated peel of a small lemon; beat all well together, and bake it in a floured tin.

SANDWICHES.—Cut some bread into thin slices, pare off the crust, and spread a little butter on them; cut them nicely into oblong pieces, put between each some bits of fowl, and thin bits of ham, both nicely trimmed; add a little mustard and salt. Any cold roasted or potted meat may be used. Serve them for luncheon, garnished with curly parsley.

SEED BUNS.—Take two pounds of plain bun dough, and mix in one ounce of caraway seeds, butter the inside of tart-pans, mould the dough into buns, and put one into each pan; set them to rise in a warm place, and when sufficiently proved, ice them with the white of an egg beat to a froth, lay some pounded sugar over that, and dissolve it with water splashed from the icing-brush. Bake ten minutes.

FISH SAUCE.—Three anchovies and an onion chopped, and a small bit of horseradish boiled in some stock, then strained, and thickened with a piece of batter rolled in flour.

CURIOUS MATTERS.

PRECIOUS STONES OF AUSTRALIA.—It would be a strange feature of these latter times if a glut of gold were to be followed by a glut of precious stones, and yet the intelligence of the gem discoveries in Australia does but confirm the predictions of those best acquainted with the subject. By the operations of some natural law, precious stones are almost uniformly found in company with gold. Either the processes which forms gold forms also these valuable crystals, or a second process is usually at work in connection with the first. Experts assured us, long ago, that whenever the Australian diggings were carefully examined, precious stones would be found there. It seems they have actually been found for years past; though never specially looked for; but recently the sand of a particular mine has yielded specimens of such abundance that diamond-washing has been recognized as a distinct and remunerative industry. The diamond, the most precious of all stones, is a mere crystal of carbon; the others, with certain exceptions, are mere crystals of clay. These clay crystals take different names, according to their colors. When red, the crystal is called a ruby; when blue, a sapphire; when purple, an amethyst; when green, an emerald; when yellow, a topaz; but all these varieties represent one and the same stone; in fact, the colors pass into one another almost indiscriminately. The information from Melbourne assures us that rare varieties of the ruby are among the gems there discovered, so that, besides obtaining an increased supply of diamonds, we shall receive specimens of jewels hitherto inaccessible.

A STRANGE STORY.—A very strange and almost incredible story is told by a respectable and reliable citizen of Bow Lake Village, Strafford, New Hampshire. This gentleman caught a common striped turtle a short time since, and at the request of the school-teacher took out the heart, which is a curiosity, from the fact that it seems to retain signs of life for days after being taken from the body of the turtle. The heart was pierced with a needle and otherwise experimented with, after which it was thrown out, and one of Mr. Waldron's hens was seen to swallow it. A few days after, Mrs. Waldron broke a number of eggs, and in the centre of one of them found the turtle's heart. At that moment she called her husband and one or two other persons, all of whom saw and identified it. It is a curious question how this seemingly living piece of flesh came in this egg. The truth of this story is vouched for by numbers of reliable citizens.

A MARKED MAN.—In the history of escaped convicts there never was, perhaps, one more easily recognized than the one who has recently escaped from New South Wales, and supposed to be at present in London. He is described in the Hue and Cry: "Adam and Eve, tree and serpent, B. S. T. S., bust of a man, mermaid, half-moon, ship, George and the Dragon, man, birds, heart and darts, hope and anchor, T., crown and flag, on the left arm; seven dots between the finger and thumb of the left hand; man and glass on the back of the left hand; ring pricked on the middle finger of the left hand; two pugilists on the centre of chest." He was tried at Cambridge on the 15th of May, 1830, and sentenced to transportation for life—in his tenth year.

CURIOUS AFRICAN MARRIAGE CUSTOM.—When the Muata-Cazembe falls in love with a female, either from personal observation or from a report of her attractions, he causes her to be conveyed to his ganda, where she is compelled to discover all the objects of her former amours, who, by order of the Muata, are immediately put to death, and all their property confiscated. When all objects of jealousy are thus removed by the Cata-Dofu, or high commissioner of the seraglio, who is the chief agent in carrying out the orders of the Muata, the new object of his passion is sent to join the other ladies of the seraglio. The introduction of a new wife into the harem is thus always the signal for a number of deaths; and, indeed, to so great an excess is this carried, that the occasion is often laid hold of as a pretext for the jealous to wreck their vengeance on the unsuspecting victims of their hatred.

THE "VELOCIMANE."—An Oxford clergyman, the Rev. R. H. Charnley, is the inventor and patentee of what he has christened the "velocimane" (a tricycle), a machine which involves the principle of hand work as a means of locomotion. The "velocimane" is by no means a ponderous tricycle. The seat which it affords is comfortable and secure; its mode of steering is original and ingenious; its pace is exceedingly good; and, finally, the power to work it successfully is easily acquired, and strengthens the muscles of arms and chest.

FACTS AND FANCIES.

A LESSON IN GARDENING.—In a village lying between the little town of Sidney and the north pole, there is a young lawyer who took lessons and degrees on the old home farm until he became satisfied that there was an easier way to get the daily bread of this life, and then went to college. He there received no lesson in field culture, and our young squire has always exhibited his approval of this lenity by the general aspect of his garden—the tares in which, as in days of old, got the better of the wheat. One morning this summer, a little earlier than he usually put on his slippers, there was a ring at the door, and Bridget ran to answer it—the squire at the same moment jumping into pants and dressing-gown in expectation of an early client. Bridget returns with a grin.

"Who is it, Biddy?"

"An' he didn't tell me a bit!" and Biddy grinned wider still.

"But what did he want?"

"I don't b'lave he wanted nothin' at all, sir," and Biddy snickered in full Irish.

"Did he say anything?" in a jerk, that led the pious Biddy to fear a wicked word or two would follow, and she hurried to say in the greenest Emerald:

"He did sure, he did, he said if the square wants his weeds to do the best they can, he had better pull those nibbins o' corn out o' the way."

The squire's corn never recovered from the shock.

WHAT DID HE SAY, LYDIA?—Good old Mrs. Call was very hard of hearing, being somewhat advanced in years. Her daughter Lydia was a bouncing lass, who loved a good frolic, and knew well how to get one up. Lydia had arranged a junket, and the young men and maids were all on hand. Among the rest was the General —, one of 'em. In the midst of the fun, in popped old Deacon —, to see how the widow fared. This was a wet blanket to the merriment, and the deacon held on till Lydia was out of all patience. She wished he would go, and by-and-by he gets up to depart. "O deacon," said mother Call, "don't think of going before tea."

The good deacon, so strongly urged, replied:

"Well, I rather think I will, as the folks will not expect me home till dark."

"What did he say, Lydia?" asked the widow.

Lydia had a ready answer.

"He says he will not, to-day, mother, as the folks expect him home before dark. Why, how deaf you are, mother."

"O well, some other day, deacon, wont you?" said mother Call, as she showed the deacon out.

"Smart girl, that," said the old deacon, as he trudged along home. "She'll find her way through, I'll warrant."

A CONSOLED WIDOWER.—A short time since an old man, at Corfe-Mullen, England, had the misfortune to lose his wife, and in proof of his affection for her whom he had sworn at the altar to love and cherish through life, he performed the last sad office in his power for her remains, by himself making the coffin. The funeral took place a few days afterwards, and when the inconsolable widower went to the clerk of Canford parish to pay the expenses, he stated, amid the tears that rolled down his cheeks in great profusion, that to save time he might, perhaps, as well do two things at the same time as one, now he was there. The clerk looked somewhat amazed, wondering what the two things were, when the old man informed him that he would pay for the banns being published of marriage to a second wife. The fact is, he had fallen in love with the woman who had refused his first love. The reason he gave for his haste in contracting a second marriage was, that the cherry season was coming on, and he had no one else to keep the birds from his cherry trees.

A PEEPING TOM.—It was at Muscatine, Iowa, lately, that Peeping Tom experienced an exasperating disappointment. At midnight he saw a much muffled man in the street, and to see was to follow him. Muffled man knocks at the door of a house and is admitted. P. T. is full of dirty delight. He crawls stealthily up. "Now I have 'em!" says Tom, "with my little eye, their sin I'll espy." He finds a convenient window, the key-hole being unavailable. He commands the interior; he hears kissing; he strains his enraptured gaze; it is—it is—ah! it is a husband kissing his beloved wife! The sharp-sighted investigator retires in great disgust at this irrefragable evidence of so much virtue and marital fidelity in Muscatine, and groans in spirit at being obliged to think better of his kind. It could hardly have been worse if he had lost his eyesight like the original P. T.

MARRIAGE EXTRA.—A sailor boy purloined two or three pies at different times. He was overheard in his whimsical method of repeating the marriage ceremony, thus:

"I now propose a marriage between Jack Bowning and this pie; if any objection can be made to this union, let it now be known, or forever keep the peace."

On this freak being whispered to the captain, he prepared a good rope's end, and holding it in one hand and the boy in the other, said:

"A union is now proposed to take place between this rope and a sailor boy; if any objection can be made to this ticklish match, let it now be known, or forever keep the peace."

"Captain," said the boy, "the banns are forbidden; the parties have not the least regard for each other. To make it right, both with one voice should be reconciled to be spliced."

"Well," said the captain, laughing, "you may go this time, sirrah, but look out how you make love to or marry any of my pies, for it is clearly pi-ratical."

THE MARCH OF MIND.—Reader, did you ever go into a little red "school 'us" in the backwoods, when the worthy pedagogue was teaching the young idea to shoot as well as he knew how? If you did, you might have heard some such dialogue as the following:

"John, wher's your passin' lesson?"

"That sentence on the blackboard—'There go a gentleman and a scholar.'"

"Pass there."

"There are a noun of multitude, fust person, singlar, nomerative case to go."

"Very well, 'go' the next." So Tom makes for the door. "Come back—pass go."

"I was trying to go past."

"Next."

"Go is an insensible rig'lar verb, finity mood, perfect tense; 1st person, go it; 2d person, go ahead; 3d person, no go; made in the 3d person, to agree with daddy's old gray mare understood."

"Very well, next pass gentleman."

"Gentleman are an abstract noun, subjective mood, neuter gender, but in opposition to scholar."

"Right; scholar, the next."

"Scholar is an obstinate, pronominal adjective, ridiculous mood, imperfect tense, fust person, because I am speaking, and governed by a."

"Give the rule."

"Scholars are governed by indefinite articles."

"Very good; take your seats with nine merit marks apiece."

WORSE YET.—A New Jersey justice of the peace was travelling with a friend in the western part of Ohio, and came into quite an unsettled region. Late in the day the two travellers reached a cabin, where they asked for supper and lodgings. The old man was away, and the old woman promptly refused, but the grown-up daughter put in a good word for the good looking men, and her mother finally consented. After supper, as they were all sitting before the fire, the old woman began the talk:

"I s'pose, strangers, you're from Connecticut, or some such Yankee place?"

"O no, ma'am," said the justice, "we are not Yankees by any means."

"Well, where did you come from, then?"

"We are from New Jersey, madam."

"O, good laudy!" said the old woman, "worse yet!"

DELIGHTFUL EFFECTS OF HABIT.—Habit is a funny thing. We have all heard the story of the man who slept above a baker's oven for twenty years, then changed his lodgings, but had to go back to the oven before he could sleep. A case illustrating the same principle recently occurred in Ohio. A city man, accustomed to lodge on one of the noisiest streets visited a country friend. Too much quiet destroyed his rest at night. His friend felt for his distress, and said he would try and relieve it. Accordingly he went to a neighbor's and procured a bass drum, which he had beat under the fellow's bedroom window, and had his boy run a squeaking wheelbarrow up and down on the porch, while his wife played on the piano, and his servant girl pounded on the chamber door with the tongs. In this manner the sufferer was enabled to get a few hours of quite refreshing sleep, though it was hard on the family.

AN APPROPRIATE TRIBE.—Tom, during his last tour to Niagara, in company with Smash, saw an Indian hewing a small piece of timber, with a view to making canes.

"Pray, sir," said Smash, "to what tribe do you belong?"

"The Chip-a-way tribe," replied the Indian, without looking up to give his interrogator one smile.

A NATURAL RESULT.—A farce was produced in Bannister's time, under the title of "Fire and Water."

"I predict its fate," said he.

"What fate?" whispered the anxious author, at his side.

"What fate?" said Bannister; "why, what can fire and water produce but a hiss?"

CHINESE SCENES AND CUSTOMS.

THE NANKING PAGODA.

Everything relating to the "Central Flowery Kingdom," as it was called by Mr. Minister Cushing, is interesting to readers residing at the antipodes of that great country, particularly as the people of that and our own have not only been united by commercial bonds, but are likely soon to be in social and political relations, by the demand for labor, the incentives to emigration, and the passage of the 15th amendment to the constitution, by which John Chinaman may take position with ourselves as a voter, and have a voice in governing our own country that he never enjoyed in his. "Well, if so be, so be it."

The country is greatly excited about the matter, and foreigners, especially, who have nominally white skins, are indignant at the proposed influx of yellow labor. The Chinaman comes from a crowded country, tyrannical usage and deep poverty, to a land, to him, full of richness, and with his industrious and frugal habits there seems little reason to doubt that he will become a good citizen, and useful in developing the resources of the country. So, also, as domestics, the Chinese are cleanly and tractable, as proved in San Francisco, and the time may be coming when those who employ domestics will be released from the tyranny of their servants; a consummation devoutly to be wished.

But it is more of China than of the Chinese in America that we desire to speak, a few prominent objects of which afford our artists themes for illustration at the present time. And first

THE PAGODA.

This is a species of temple, and forms a conspicuous and characteristic feature in Chinese scenery. They are similar in form, everywhere, but of different degree of richness, and are generally nine stories in height. Almost every town in China has one or more of these structures. Ferguson, in his "Handbook of Architecture," says, "I cannot but think that the tapering, octagonal form, the boldly marked divisions, the domical roof, and the general consistence in design and ornament of these towers, entitle them to rank tolerably high among the tower-like buildings of the world." The most remarkable pagoda in China was that at Nanking, destroyed by the rebels in 1858, of which the engraving on the preceding page is a representation. It was called the "Porcelain Tower of Nanking," from the glaze put upon the bricks of which it was built. The tints were various—blue, white, green and red—and the effect of the spectacle at a distance, in sunlight or moonlight, was very remarkable. It long stood among the foremost of the world's wonders. This structure was begun in 1412, and finished in 1431, and having been erected by the reigning emperor as a monument of gratitude to an empress of the Mung dynasty, it was also called the "Temple of Gratitude." It was octagonal in form, and 236 feet in height, inclusive of an iron spire 80 feet high that surmounted it, and from the summit of which eight chains depended, to each of which were attached nine bells, while to each angle of the lower roofs a bell was attached, making the total number of bells 144, which tinkled in harmony with every breeze. Each story was ornamented with lanterns, pictures, images and pithy proverbs. A flight of steps led up through each floor to the top, and each story had a landing-place, where were windows, from which an agreeable and extensive view could be taken of the city, the river and the distant country. At the top the scene was particularly grand. Lit up with its many lanterns on festival nights, and its bells making music on the air, the pagoda was a source of great delight to the loyal Chinese; but traitors had no such fine appreciation, and its ruin was the result. But its glories are remembered, and to this day its site is visited, and the Chinamen will tell with tears in their eyes of its past magnificence. Nanking is a fine city, however, with many sources of pride that compensate for the loss of that.

NINGPO.

This is an important commercial place in the harbor of Chusan on the Takia River, canals from which intersect the city. It is one of the five cities opened to general intercourse by the treaty of 1842, wrung from the Chinese by the combined powers. The English troops took it and held possession of it for several months in 1841. It is surrounded by a dilapidated wall about six miles in circumference, twenty-five feet high, and fifteen broad at the top, with five gates. The streets are long and broad. Numerous bridges cross the canals throughout the city, and a bridge of boats connects the city with the suburbs. Many of the streets are spanned by triumphal arches of distinguished scholars and eminent men who were natives of Ningpo. The scene in the view before us is in a part of the city chiefly occupied with temples and monastery grounds. In the foreground is a common native house, with two windows opened in the wall for the summer months. A similar house stands next, then a monastery ground, then some smaller dwellings. On the right side of the canal is the head chapels is opened for daily preaching. There is one temple said to have been erected 1100 years ago, with a tower 100 feet high. In 1843 a missionary hospital was established at Ningpo, and all classes have resorted to it for surgical assistance. It is a crowded but interesting scene that our engraving presents.

LADIES OF CHINA.

The engraving on this page, from a photograph of two young Chinese ladies, is commended to those who may be disposed to consult novelty in the chignon, though it is but just to say that the present mode among our own females has maintained its place longer than any of its predecessors. The Chinese arrangement possesses no advantage that we

THE BABY HOUSES.

Infanticide prevails to a very great extent in China, more, however, in some places than in others. About Fuchow it is very prevalent, while in some places it is rarely known. In poor families, which have a large number of children, the death of infants is regarded as anything but a calamity, showing a willingness to have them die almost equivalent to helping that event. The large number of infant bodies cast away is often regarded as evidence of infanticide, but unjustly. The little bodies are wrapped up in a mat and thrown into the river, or hung from the branches of trees to keep them from the dogs, or, which is very often the case, thrown into structures called "baby-houses,"—as seen in can see, beyond the fact that it is kept in place by a resinous gum, and at night the fair head is deposited on a high wooden pillow with a groove that fits the neck exactly, and by this means they sleep without disturbing the hair. We think that if our own fair dames and demoiselles were required to pay this tribute to fashion, they would hardly be willing to sacrifice so much, but we have seen them endure torture, under the affliction of heated tongs and hot slate pencils, that a Mohawk might make up faces at, and perhaps they would accept this, if it should be the fashion. It is hard to see how, by any possibility, either of the young ladies in the engraving could close her eyes, with such a strain upon the back hair pulling them open.

our illustration—little buildings, with small holes in one side, through which the baby is put, erected by benevolent persons for this purpose. The impression, however, which prevails, that these are provided in encouragement of infanticide, is incorrect; they are simply expedients to evade the interment of infants. This denial of burial to infants is due in many places to the following superstition: "When infants die, it is supposed that their bodies were inhabited by the spirit of a deceased creditor of a previous state of existence. The child during its sickness may be cared for with the greatest tenderness, and no expense spared in employing a physician and procuring medicine; but if it dies, parental love is turned to hate and resentment, and it is called 'Short-lived spirit,' or

'devil.' It is regarded as an enemy and intruder in the family, which has been exacting satisfaction for the old, unpaid debt; and having occasioned a great deal of anxiety, trouble and expense, has left nothing to show for it but disappointment. The uncared-for and un-coffined little body is cast away anywhere; and as it is carried out of the door the house is swept, crackers are fired, and gongs beaten to frighten the spirit, so that it may never dare enter the house again."

In cases where infanticide is common, males preponderate to such an extent that it is difficult for parents to obtain wives for their sons, and they often make arrangements with a family which has an infant daughter, to spare her life and betroth her to their son. In these cases, the girl, at a very early age, becomes the inmate of the family of her betrothed husband. Parents of the lower and middle classes, whose daughters live with them till they are married, feel that they are entitled to some remuneration from the parents of the husband, for all their expense and trouble in bringing her up. For this reason, when a girl is betrothed with the expectation of her remaining in her own family, her family expect a considerable amount of money, so that the transaction has very much the appearance of buying and selling. Many men are doomed to a life of celibacy because they are too poor to buy and support a wife.

In case of the death of unmarried young men of particular promise and preeminence, the following expedient is adopted to rescue their names from oblivion. An arrangement is made with another family which has lost a member of the opposite sex, by which ceremonies representing the betrothal and marriage of the deceased parties are performed. After this, a child of some other member of the family may be restored to them, as a son, and so the life of the deceased be transmitted, and his tablet, with those of the reputed wife and descendants, be placed in the family temple. These ancestral temples abound in China, nearly every village having at least one.

WINTER.

BY J. J. COLBATH.

Beside the frozen pool the cows,
Stand still, in rumination lost
On verdant meads and summer browse,
Now held in thrall by ice and frost.

The barnyard fowls, with humble air,
The snow, with dubious seeming scratch;
The doves a sombre aspect wear,
And stand inactive mid the thatch.

Dark winter birds, with croaking notes,
Soar far the naked trees above,
While down the snowflake stilly floats,
Like benediction fraught with love.

Breaking the silence that prevails,
A grateful sound salutes the ear;
It is the music of the flails,
That sings the bounty of the year.

Afar the grateful home appears,
With warmth and every comfort rife,
That stimulates the heart and cheers
The passing hours of wintry life.

Ah! joying this, what ask we more?
The angry storm in vain assails;
With plenty lavishing its store,
We laugh at all the bitter gales.

The ready smile, the gleeful speech,
The loving light of beaming eyes,
Make sunshine though the tempest screech,
And clouds and snow enshroud the skies.

Thus winter takes a cheerful form,
Where competence and love exist,
But, to the raging of the storm,
'Tis fearful for the poor to list.

Theirs is a cruelty of fate,
Precluding all of hope and trust,
That fills the heart with brooding hate,
And doubt if God is good or just.

O brother, in your cheerful home,
When wintry storms in fierceness rage,
Think of the desolate who roam,
Whose life is but a dismal page!

RELIGIOUS SERVICE IN RUSSIA.

Our illustrations show the Russian priests of the Greek church on and off duty—in their sacerdotal and domestic capacities. They are divided into the "white" and "black" degrees, the former the secular, the latter the cloistered. The appellations are derived from their respective classes, the one party, as in our engravings, being clothed from head to foot in black, the other performing divine service in white robes bordered with gold. The dress of the black clergy, equally elegant with the former, is throughout Russia the same, fixed by general edict. The head is covered with a tall, cylindrical black cap, round which flutters a long piece of black gauze, that hangs down behind like a lady's veil when thrown back. The principal garment is a long, full tunic, made generally of black velvet. The handsome curling beards, with which the monks are universally decorated, harmonize admirably with this dress; they look like rich fur trimmings on the velvet robes. Their long hair, divided into three tails, one falling down the back and one over each shoulder, is not quite so ornamental. It would be difficult to describe the magnificence of the superior priesthood in full dress. It is enough to say that the enormous mass of gold and silk stuffs of various kinds which the Russian clergy, like the Catholic, have, in the course of centuries, laid their hands on, is such, that the toilet of the vainest worldling is moderate and modest in comparison.

The incomes of the Russian clergy are exceedingly small; and the convents, with few exceptions, are very poor, since Peter the Great deprived them of their lands and their serfs, and reduced nuns and monks to ridiculously small pensions of the state. A metropolitan (the highest in rank) receives but about one thousand dollars a year, an archbishop about nine hundred dollars, and a bishop even less than that. In this proportion the incomes decrease, until in the lowest ranks their incomes are miserably insufficient for a living, and have to be eked out by begging. The bishops, all additional sources of revenue included, have seldom more than three thousand dollars a year. Each bishop has a monastin (convent of the second class), whose income belongs to him, and all the superior clergy have also residences found them, in their convents or within the city, and furnished with everything necessary, from servants and horses down to dogs, cats, spoons and plates, at the cost of the crown. The greater number are also provided with a country residence, with arable land, domestic animals and furniture. Under such circumstances a large salary is not so desirable. They live in luxury, while their poor brethren, like the curates of England, do the work and starve. A priest's influence extends very little beyond the sacred duties of his office, people of all ranks kissing his hands, but slighting him immediately after.

The performance of mass in the convent at Strelna, four miles from Peterhoff, was recently witnessed by a traveller, who has given the world an account of the ceremony:

"Our preparations were soon made, and a brisk half-hour's drive brought us to the entrance of the garden surrounding the monastery, already thronged with a motley congregation. The gilded turrets and arched windows of the building gave it a picturesque appearance, greatly enhanced by the surrounding trees, now brilliant with their short-lived summer verdure. But we have little time to glance at them, for the eddying crowd sweeps us onward through the archway into the great hall, already more than half filled; where, for the first time, we have leisure to survey our company. And a motley throng they are; smooth-faced boy-officers in glittering uniforms; blase students with pale cheeks and heavy eyelids; beautiful girls with long dark hair floating over their white robes; Russian nurses in scarlet shawls, with tiaras of gilt pasteboard on their foreheads; low-browed peasants in sheepskin, their hard faces softened by devotional fervor; and many more beside.

"Suddenly a door opens at the far end of the hall, and, amid a dead silence and universal turning of faces in that direction, the officiating priest comes forth with slow and measured steps, arrayed in a high, helmet-shaped cap, richly embroidered, and a flowing robe so thickly covered with silver lace, that its color can hardly be told. Then follow the two assistant priests similarly attired, and lastly two boys of twelve, in long yellow robes, with flowing black hair and pale feminine faces, bearing the sacred books, which they deposit reverently in front of the chief priest, who has by this time taken his station beside the altar. In another moment his deep sonorous voice breaks the stillness, reading the customary prayers, which are couched in that ancient Slavonic tongue which was a written language before modern Russia ever existed. Page after page, the sounding syllables roll on, while ever and anon the sea of heads around us sinks down like corn bowed by the wind, and the hand of each worshipper touches his forehead, shoulder and breast in rapid succession, making the sign of the cross. Suddenly a gleam of light flashes in our eyes, as a hand is stretched over our shoulders bearing a lighted taper, which we pass on in like manner to those in front; and at the same moment a score of similar lights are seen creeping like glow-worms through the black masses of the surrounding crowd, and meeting around the altar. The priest raises his voice, and repeats thirty or forty times with extraordinary rapidity the words—"Gospodi pomili" (Lord have mercy upon us), which is echoed at length by the voices of the entire congregation; and a grand burst of music surges up through the whole expanse of the hall, dying away at length among the arches of the roof in a cadence inexpressibly sweet and plaintive—a characteristic feature of all Russian music."

The practice of lighting the tapers, described above, the devout Russian does not leave to his priest, but performs it himself. These tapers, of all qualities and prices, are sold at the door, the income from which and the drops of wax that are saved going to the church. On great holidays, when the churches are all thronged so that every one cannot approach the saint he wishes to honor, the lights are seen dancing from hand to hand till they reach the foremost persons, who are requested to present them, which is done with all readiness and politeness. When a Russian has made a sufficient number of crosses and genuflections, and lighted up a candle to his favorite saint, he deems himself as safe from the clutches of the arch fiend, whom he most sacredly believes in, as if he were already in Abraham's bosom. But bad men light their tapers with the good, and invoke the blessing of saints on unholy enterprises in this way; in one case two servants lit a candle to the "Mother of God," who was solicited to aid them in robbing their master of ten thousand roubles.

The narrative goes on to say:

"The heat is by this time overpowering, and happy is he who has a pillar to lean against in the midst of the universal crushing and crowding; but not the slightest sign of weariness or impatience can be detected among the congregation. There they stand, patient, devout, enduring; a fair type of what their nation has been for centuries, and what her rulers have striven to keep her for centuries more. And over all rises once and again the strange, sweet, mournful music which nameless generations have handed down—the wail of an oppressed people, inarticulately shaping itself into sound, and rising in an everlasting prayer. The ladies of our party, however, more deeply impressed with the demoralized condition of their bonnets than with any historical or theological meditation, cut short our musings by proposing a change of place; and with some difficulty we make our way up to the gallery, where we remain till the close of the service.

"This service over, we descend to the great gate of the monastery, where the distribution of consecrated bread sprinkled with salt is going forward. Some of the recipients carry their portions slowly and reverently away; others eat theirs on the spot, with the addition of copious draughts of 'kvas' (a piquant but not at all intoxicating liquor), two casks of which, furnished with huge wooden ladles, stand beside the gate. While we are looking on, a monk approaches, and courteously invites us to partake of the midday meal, which is now being prepared in the refectory hall. Accordingly, we follow our guide into a vast, high-roofed salle, not unlike a college dining-hall, with four immense windows on either side, and a long table in the centre flanked by benches of oak. The archimandrite or chief, a fine-looking old man with a flowing white beard, wearing the black helmet-formed cap and dark robes of his order, but distinguished by the silver crosses and medals which glitter upon his ample breast, receives us very cordially, and gives us seats at his own table, which is set at right angles to the larger one. We have scarcely seated ourselves, when the monks flock into the hall, and take their places at the table, twenty on each side, in their high caps and black robes. The officers of the fraternity place themselves on the right and left of the archimandrite, while a young assistant priest mounts the steps of the reading-desk at the lower end of the hall, and reads aloud two chapters of the New Testament, after which he kisses the archimandrite's hand and retires. The first words of the reading seem to be the signal for commencing the repast, for at once every one attacks the dish of excellent cabbage-soup before him; while the archimandrite, needlessly apologizing for the poorness of the fare (this a fast-day), pours me out a tumbler of what appears to be cold water. Delighted at this unexpected concession to my temperate tastes, I empty the glass at a draught, and am instantly conscious of a sensation as though I had swallowed a shovelful of hot coals, washed down with a pint of viotril; this innocent-looking drink being, in fact, the strongest 'vodka,' or Russian corn-brandy. The surrounding monks laugh aloud—the chief more temperately follows their example; whilst I, with burning lips and watering eyes, devote myself to my soup with a vain attempt at composure. The next course consists of another kind of soup, called in Russian 'otvinia,' composed of the bitterest imaginable herbs, plentifully moistened with kvas, and freshened with lumps of ice by way of additional relish. Such as it is, however, the mixture does not seem much to the taste of our party, whose involuntary contortions of visage over this innocent fare appear to amuse the good fathers not a little. But this penance is fully atoned by the excellent fish which succeeds, followed in its turn by a kind of gigantic sandwich of cabbage and hard-boiled eggs enclosed in a firm kind of crust, popularly known as 'Russki Pirog,' or Russian pie. This, with a modicum of cheese by way of supplement, concludes the entertainment; this being (as the archimandrite again reminds us) a fast-day. He adds, however, that should we ever do him the honor of a second visit on any day not specially set apart by the church, he will be most happy to show us that a monastery kitchen is not bare of good cheer at all seasons; an assertion of which a glance down the table amply sustains the truth; for, although meagre faces and slender frames are here and there to be seen, the majority of the brotherhood are robust, finely-built, ruddy-cheeked men, of whose companionship Friar Tuck himself might have been proud. The old chief, with a sly smile, proffers me another glass of vodka, which is (like many a less pliquant production) 'declined with thanks;' whereupon he rises from his seat, and pronounces a long Slavonic thanksgiving, answered by a deep sonorous 'Amen' from the entire fraternity, who then file out of the hall in the same order in which they previously filed in. The remains of the dinner are then bestowed upon three or four haggard-looking peasants who have been hanging about the great gate, probably in expectation of some such largess, ever since our repast commenced; the superiors come forward and enter into conversation with us, in the most friendly manner; while the venerable archimandrite himself takes one of the smallest members of our party on his knee and bestirs himself to amuse him as heartily as if he had been doing nothing else all his life."

The sacredness of the clerical office, measured by any standard that we recognize, is not of a very high character, but, with the party quoted in the foregoing pages, we may say, that the Russian clergy are not by any means so black as they are painted.

ISMAEL PASHA OF EGYPT.

Ismael Pasha, the Viceroy of Egypt, tries to keep peace with his superior, the Sultan of Turkey. War between the master and his dependent servant will not occur this season, for the powers of Europe are not yet ready to encourage the fight by taking sides, France with Egypt and England with Turkey. The former power aims at most exclusive control over the canal that runs through the viceroy's dominions, and is a short road to India and power in the East, while England is jealous of all encroachments, and will share with no nation that which she has stolen and ravished from the weak rulers of India. Through blood, treachery and gold, has Great Britain extended her sway over the Hindoos, and what she has gained she fears she may lose by the arts of France or the serried columns of Russia.

We have some little sympathy with Ismael Pasha. He wants to be independent of his master. He desires to be king, and to make Egypt a nation that will be powerful in commerce and the arts, but hampered as he is at present, it is impossible for him to realize his idea of greatness. The time must come when his ambition will be satisfied. Egypt cannot long remain dependent upon the "sick man," as the Sultan is called by Russia.

We owe Ismael Pasha some little debt of gratitude for his treatment while we were ascending the Nile. He did all that he could to make the rough places smooth, and the firman which he granted our party was as potent as the wand of an enchanter. Whoever looked at it bowed before it, and supplied our wants without a murmur.

We give on the next page a fine picture of the Pasha and his English turnout. He likes English carriages, harnesses, coachman and postilion, and when seated on the box with the driver, does not scruple to tell him to let the spirited animals show their best paces. Then his subjects had better not get in the way, unless they want broken limbs, for his highness does not stop at trifles. The Pasha's harem may often be seen riding out dressed almost entirely in the European fashion, with the exception of a very thin veil, and also with Englishmen in scarlet and gold liveries as drivers and footmen. Another bold step toward doing away with old customs, is that the viceroy has ordered the removal of all divans from Egyptian government officers, to make room for chairs and small sofas in the European style; and, what is still more important, clerks and other employees are henceforth to be deprived of the pleasure of both smoking and coffee-drinking while remaining within government premises.

While in Egypt we heard a story of Pasha Mahomet Ali, who has now passed away, and the Fellahs thank Allah for it, for the old scamp was a Tartar.

"Do you see that canal?" the Pasha used to ask visitors, when he was in good humor. "Well, then," continued the Pasha, "that canal leads to a large village in the middle of the Delta, from which, and from the neighboring provinces, it brings the produce down the Nile. How do you think I made the canal? You shall hear. Two years ago I stopped here on my way to Cairo from Alexandria, and having determined to make a canal from the Nile to that village, I sent for the chief engineer of the province; and having given him the length, breadth and depth of the canal required, I asked him in what space of time he would undertake to make it. He took out his pen and paper, and having made his calculations, he said that, if I gave him an order on the governor of the province for the labor required, he would undertake to finish it in a year. My reply was a signal to my servants to throw him down, and give him two hundred blows of the stick on his feet. This ceremony being concluded, I said to him, 'Here is the order for the number of laborers you may require. I am going to Upper Egypt, and shall come back in four months; if the canal is not completed by the day of my return, you shall have three hundred more.'" In relating this story, the Pasha's eyes sparkled, and he almost jumped from his sitting posture with excitement, as he added, rubbing his hands, "By Allah, the canal was completed when I returned."

Ismael Pasha is not so cruel, but he is willful, and will have his own way. He will be king if he lives long enough, and if the European powers will side with him instead of the Sultan. Without the aid of the former he will be crushed in the course of time. He played a bold card at the dedication of the Suez Canal, and has won the good opinion of many princes, and even the Empress Eugenie has smiled on him. But smiles won't hold the hand of the Sultan. The Pasha must bribe or fight, and he is prepared for either course.

HINDOSTANEE ARCHITECTURE.

We present on the next page the view of a padoga at Ramisseram, an island and town near the southerly extremity of Hindostan, between it and Ceylon. The island forms a part of the chain of islands and rocks stretching from Ramhad on the main land to Manaar in Ceylon, and separating the Gulf of Manaar on the south from Polk's Strait on the north. This temple is one of the most splendid of the numerous temples with which India abounds, that are remarkable for their grace and beauty.

It is constructed, in part, of vast granite blocks, possessing a tower one hundred feet high and a fine colonnade, and its elaborate courts and galleries render it very picturesque.

In books upon the East we have numerous evidences of the taste in architecture that prevails, which seems indeed music written in stone. And besides those that they have above ground, beautifying every place, there are subterranean temples, that rival these in point of elegance. The caves of Ellvia, which are about two hundred miles to the east of Bombay, consist of a great number of large and lofty apartments, cut in the solid rock, decorated with columns and statues. There is one also, at Corley, between Bombay and Puna, which resembles a gothic church, having a vaulted roof, and colonnades running like aisles along each side. What a vast amount of labor and patient industry it must have required to perform the task of excavation! We have an account of one at Salsette, that is upward of ninety feet long, thirty-eight wide, and of a proportionate height, hewn out of the solid rock, and forming an oblong square, with a fluted, concave roof. The area is divided into three aisles by regular colonnades, similar to the ancient basilica, a pile of building twice as long as it was wide, with one of the extremities ending in a hemicycle, while two rows of columns form a spacious area in the centre, leaving a narrow walk between the columns and the wall. At Elephanta, the excavations are still larger, the principal temple being one hundred and twenty-three feet broad. The spacious entrance to this is sixty feet wide and eighteen high, and is supported by two massive pillars and two pilasters, being thus divided into three passage-ways. The interior is so arranged that it presents a seemingly endless vista of huge columns cut out from the living rock, some of them broken by the Portuguese, who formerly possessed the island of Elephanta. The roof is generally flat, though not a perfect plane. The sides are excavated into compartments, all filled with mythological sculptures. Opposite the main entrance there is a bust, supposed to represent the Hindoo Trinity—Brahma, Vishnu and Siva. The heads are six feet long and well cut. The headdresses are curiously ornamented, and among other symbols, a human skull and a young infant are represented on that of finement of taste. Those at Agra, Delhi and Lucknow are especially remarkable for their delicacy, beauty and taste.

Next to their temples, their tombs are the most elegant. At Agra is the tomb of one of the sultanas, that is of surpassing beauty. It stands on a stone terrace, on the banks of the Jamna, and is surrounded by extensive gardens. It is built entirely of white marble, enclosed within an open screen of mosaic, which is wrought into wreaths of flowers of the most exquisite workmanship, and formed of agates, jaspers, lapis lazuli, and various colored marbles. This elegant memorial of the dead is protected and kept in repair by the British government.

Besides the superb specimens of architecture enumerated, the land abounds in kindred works attesting to the merit of the Hindoo engineers, by whom they are for the most

PAGODA ATRAMISSERAM, HINDOSTAN.

Siva, who also holds in his hand a cobra de capello. No record of the origin of the shrines can be found, and the general opinion of Europeans who have visited them is, that they date from a period subsequent to the birth of Christ, perhaps as late as the ninth or tenth century. Long deserted by the Brahmin priests, the temple is now visited only by married women praying for the blessing of children.

Hindustan abounds with architectural relics of the remotest antiquity, that present attractions to the explorer. Missionaries from thence bring back drawings of ancient temples that are grand and elegant, such as the Jain temples at Ajmeer and elsewhere, some of which were built long before the Christian era, and are distinguished not only for size and splendor of ornamentation, but for symmetry, beauty of proportion, and repart constructed. These consist of vast reservoirs or tanks, for the reception of water for purposes of irrigation, which exist in great numbers, and are frequently of great size and cost, being often magnificently built of stone. One of these tanks is said to be eight miles long and three miles broad. There are also the ruins of vast canals, built by kings of former ages, attesting to the progress of the past in this particular. The English are renewing these canals and building others, promoting irrigation and navigation, and working great improvement.

It is only in these developments of science and art, that the Hindostanees have shown much ability. In other arts they have attained but little skill. The better class of their private dwellings are decorated with paintings, but display poor taste in execution and arrangement.

DEERFIELD RIVER.

The tax-payers of the State of Massachusetts can console themselves, while handing over their cash each year to those authorized to receive it, that the Hoosac Tunnel, a bore of the greatest magnitude, has been the means of attracting thousands of visitors to the most wild and romantic scenery in the State. We grumble at the expense of the tunnel, and knowing well that we shall never again see the millions that we have laid out desire it can view Nature at but little expense. At least, such were our thoughts last summer, while wandering over Mounts Tom and Holyoke, and by the side of Deerfield River, one of the most romantic and beautiful streams in Massachusetts. After this region becomes known to our friends, there will be no occasion to rush to the White Mountain region for bold scenery and clear, fresh, bracing air. All this can be found nearer home, and enjoyed at less expense. Large hotels are alone wanted near the mountains, and in close proximity to the Hoosac Tunnel. When these are furnished, so that the travelling public can be certain of obtaining good accommodations at reasonable rates, there will be no lack of visitors. Already buildings are going up, and some capitalists, men who like comfort without much labor, are erecting cottages, and in the cottages families can live quite as happily as at Newport, and much more pleasantly, we are sure, for dress will not be regarded as a passport to good society. We hope that our million of readers will not suppose for a moment that we are interested in a land company, or are paid for advocating building in the vicinity of Deerfield River. We write from a sincere admiration of the scenery which we saw last summer. We remember the pleasant drives, the smooth roads, the neat, for the encouragement of enterprise, and the schemes of certain men who are nothing unless devising new debts for the people; yet when we stand on the summit of Mount Holyoke, and look over the surrounding country, where we see Deerfield River meandering through rich valleys and between high mountains, the towns of Hadley and Shelburne at our feet, with other villages on either hand, we forget the tunnel and its cost, and thank fortune that railroads are in existence, and penetrate into the White Mountain district of Massachusetts, so that all who white farmhouses, the rich meadows, the melodious murmur of the river as it swept past rocks and over gravelly beds.

We spent a week near the river, and we think that it was one of the most pleasant that we passed during the season, for we had a companion who was familiar with all the best views, and knew who kept the sweetest cream and raised the largest strawberries; and such a friend is valuable when the brain needs rest and the body is worn with the fatigues of office duty.

A local historian gives the following information relative to the mountainous region: "Mount Tom is 1200 feet high, and rises in rugged majesty, the sole object in the landscape, which frowns eternal defiance on the march of human improvement. It has been remarked that 'even here, if the not improbable theory of some geologists be correct, the modifying hand of nature has accomplished one of its most remarkable achievements in the excavation of a rocky channel for the Connecticut, between these two mountain heights, which are supposed originally to have formed a connected chain, at a considerable elevation above their present bases. The appearance of the bold cliffs at the Rock Ferry crossing, as well as the form of the vast alluvial basin which would be embraced within the sweep of this mountain range if only a connection here were formed, together with other geological characteristics, render this theory, extraordinary as it may seem, almost a matter of obvious demonstration.' The variety of the views they present, the mixture of wildness and cultivation, and the extent of landscape commanded from their summits, amply repay the expense and toil of a visit to Mount Tom and Mount Holyoke. Hadley is a handsome town on the east bank of the Connecticut River, united to Northampton by a fine bridge. The village covers a sort of peninsula formed by a bend in the river. The principal street is about a mile in length, and presents the usual features of a New England village. It is wide, and shaded by noble elms. Its Indian name was Nornotock. It stands in the midst of a fine agricultural region, and the annual overflow of the river renders its meadows remarkably productive. It is 88 miles southwest from Boston. It was the retreat of the regicide Judges, Goffe and Whalley, whose romantic histories in England and this country are so well known. The village consists of two principal streets running parallel with each other, intersected by smaller streets. The scenery between Greenfield and Shelburne Falls is diversified and abounds in beautiful views.

THE BERMUDA FLOATING DOCK.

On the next page will be found an engraving of more than ordinary interest. It represents a number of steam frigates and steamers towing the great Floating Dock of Bermuda towards its destination, nine thousand miles from the place where the dock was built.

For many years the island of Bermuda, surrounded by coral reefs and dangerous navigation, has felt the want of a large dry dock, so that ships could be repaired with expedition and sent on their way rejoicing. There were no facilities at Bermuda for building such a dock as was needed. The enterprise, the mechanics and the materials were wanting; so England was resorted to, and Messrs. Campbell, Johnson & Co., on the Thames, produced the monster, an iron one, without bow, stern or decks, 881 feet in length, 123 feet 9 inches in extreme breadth, and with a total depth of 74 feet 5 inches. At a distance of 24 feet from either end calissons enclose a dock space of 333 feet in length, by 83 feet 9 inches in width, which will receive a vessel of 3000 tons. The section of the dock is of U form throughout, except at the extreme ends, where, for the convenience of towing, there is a slight taper. The sides are formed of a cellular labyrinth of water-tight compartments, 20 feet in thickness, intersected by "ribs," "stiffeners," and "girders," and forming a huge mass of iron that is as strong as human hands can weld together.

Several vessels were required to tow the dock, the Black Warrior, an immense steam frigate, an iron-clad, the most powerful of her class, leading the van, with smaller slips on either side, and one steamer in the rear to push, and thus facilitate steering, for when the dock reached the ocean, where waves and winds were rampant, it was found that the huge mass had a way of its own that was extremely dangerous to those engaged in convoying it. Sometimes it would make a sweep like an avalanche, and then there would be lively times on board of the steamer for a while. The big ones tugged, and the little ones pushed and pushed, until the dock once more resumed its true course.

In this manner the ocean was crossed at the rate of five knots per hour. Madeira was reached in safety, and after a short rest anchors were weighed, and the fleet steamed for its port of destination, where it arrived in about one month from the time of starting. It reached port in good order, and was welcomed by the Bermudans with demonstrations of joy almost as wild as were expressed when a confederate blockade-runner entered their port laden with cotton, turpentine and agents to purchase war materials.

THE STRUGGLE FOR MAVERICK.

A Dramatic Story....In Three Parts.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

III.

THE two men sat facing each other without speech or motion for full five minutes after those four terrible words were uttered. I have somewhere seen a picture representing Satan claiming a lost soul; and something like the diabolic look of triumph on the face of the arch fiend in that picture must have been, I think, that of Augustus Maverick as he sat and watched the effect of his revelation. Alvin Roesselle was at first almost stunned. Dreading, at first, when Maverick introduced the subject of Levin's death, that he had in some way discovered something that might compromise him in the affair, he had throughout the interview, to this point, succeeded in repressing the worst of his agitation by the thought, "He cannot know the truth; he may suspect me, or wish to frighten me; but it is absolutely impossible that he has done more than to guess." So he reassured himself until the disclosure of Maverick's knowledge, in all its frightful completeness, came with its crushing weight. For an instant he was completely overpowered. Men's intellects do unquestionably wander sometimes for a single instant, under the pressure of some grievous burden; and Alvin Roesselle, stricken into mental blindness for a moment by those terrible words, "you are the man," sat looking in vacant bewilderment at the sinister face before him, struggling to grasp a knowledge of whose face it was, and why it was there at all. His eyes wandered around the room, looking at its familiar objects; but none of them seemed familiar to him. Maverick saw that he was well-nigh stupefied, and becoming alarmed for his condition, was looking for water to dash into his face, when the occurrence of a very simple little incident brought back his senses. Mrs. Roesselle was waiting tea when the two men entered the house, and had been patiently waiting since; but as the minutes went by and her husband did not appear, she naturally thought that he had found his business longer than he had anticipated, and likely to last some time longer; and so she rang her little bell as an intimation to her husband to bring his visitor out to tea. Disenthralled by the sound, as it reached them faintly in the study, Roesselle started to his feet, pressed his hands to his face, and was back again in the world of consciousness, face to face with the horrors of his position. In one moment he reviewed the past and contemplated the present. His boyhood—his college-life—his theological studies—his ordination—his settlement in this parish, and his labors here—his courtship, his marriage, and his happy home—the hideous, omnipresent recollection of the death of Horace Levin, as Maverick had just truthfully stated it, with all its circumstances—he thought of all this, and then of punishment, degradation, loss of everything to Helen and himself that was dearer than life; and then he fell back in the chair, groaning aloud.

"O God, help me! O God, help me!"

There was a light tap at the study door; it was slightly unclosed, and the gentle voice of his wife said:

"Wont you come out to tea with your friend, Alvin?"

With a strong effort, he gulped down his sobs and groans, and answered:

"No, Helen, don't wait."

The door was closed again, and Mrs. Roesselle returned disappointed to the solitary table in the dining-room.

In the agony of mind that now pressed upon Alvin Roesselle, he took no thought, at first, of the probable object of Maverick in making this communication to him, and in this way. The tumult of woe and despair possessed him, to the exclusion of all thought beyond his immediate condition; and turning from his visitor he paced the floor, sobbing and weeping like a child in the distraction of grief. Maverick watched him, coolly and without emotion, waiting until his first frenzy had passed before he spoke at all.

"Well," he at last said, "was I not right in insisting that you had an interest in this business?"

He was answered by a groan of anguish.

"And what do you say now about my laying this rather remarkable story before a magistrate?"

"Don't mock me—don't torture me!" the clergyman cried. "Man, devil, whatever you are, have pity on my woe, and do not sit there mocking me. If you wanted to see me swung to a gallows, why did you tell me at all of this, which I thought was known only to me and my God?"

"It's not quite as bad as you are making it," Maverick dryly remarked. "You haven't murdered any one, parson; if I used that ugly word a few minutes ago I used it in haste, and cheerfully take it back. There was no malice about this killing; it was not premeditated; it was done in a heat, on considerable provocation; it's clearly not a hanging business. Not at all justifiable, of course, for parsons have no more right than worse men to get so insanely angry as to push men off precipices; but it's no worse than a degree of manslaughter. I don't doubt that twenty years in the penitentiary will satisfy the law."

"Merciful God!" Alvin Roesselle covered his face, and the tears trickled through his fingers. And still his tormentor sat unmoved, calmly surveying him, and intent on a design that had its birth very soon after the discovery which he had related.

The clergyman sat down again, and wiped the tears from his eyes. The violence of his distress was spent; he sat now with haggard, hopeless face, like one who desperately waits to know the worst.

"God knows I did not mean to harm him," he said. "I hardly knew him at all; I had no enmity with him; and I was never so astonished as I was on that night when he came out from those bushes and laid his hand on my rein. 'You are Mr. Roesselle?' he said; and, without waiting for a word of answer, he led my horse to the bush, and tied him. 'Now get off, sir,' he said, 'and account to me for what you have done.' I did get off; but it was only because I had recognized him by this time, and thought he was out of his head, and I meant to get my horse loose, and leave him at once, to save trouble—for I saw something bad in his eye. But my feet had not touched the ground when he had me by the collar; and as I scuffled to get loose, we broke through the bushes, and came out where you saw us, near the edge of the bank. I shook him off, and listened to his abuse for a while without saying a word; and what I did say was mild, and could not have irritated him more."

Maverick nodded assent to this.

"Why didn't I leave him—why did I dare to trust myself with him for a moment, when I saw what a temper he was in? I meant to soothe him, if I could; I was waiting for a chance to explain to him that he was cruelly wronging me, and that I had not by intentional word, or thought, or act, done him any injury—when he struck me. I hardly know what happened next. You say I pitched him over; I must have done it, for that unlucky blow filled me with the spirit of hell, and made me forget my Christian training, my ministry, and everything except that devilish desire to have blow for blow. I know that I sprang for him—and then there is a kind of a confusion, and I only recovered myself as I crouched, giddy and weak, at the edge of the cliff, watching with horrible fascination his body as it fell through the air."

The unhappy man covered his face and bowed it on the table, as if to shut out the apparition that his words conjured up before him.

"I never meant to kill him," he said, a moment later. "I never meant to strike him; I was not myself at that mad moment, or I never should have touched him. And O Heaven, how his face has haunted me ever since! The secret that I thought lay between me and my Maker was hard enough to bear; I have had to mask my misery and go abroad among my parishioners and administer consolation, when none needed it as I did. I have risen in the night while my dear wife slept, and groaned and prayed, and wrestled with my sin; I have asked for peace, even if it must be the peace of the grave; and still its dead weight hangs to me and blights my life. But now that the world is to know it—now—"

He could not finish the sentence, and Maverick took up the words.

"There is not the least doubt, Mr. Roesselle, that you have committed a crime of which my evidence would convict you, and imprison you for a term of years for it. If I go on and lay my complaint before the magistrate, this will be the certain result. Nothing could save you but suicide. Now I deliberately ask you the question—shall I make this complaint?"

The clergyman looked at his interrogator and tried hard to read in his stern, selfish face some trace of pity for himself—for his wife. But there was no softening of those hard muscles; there was absolutely nothing in the whole face from which he could derive the least hope.

A door closed inside; Mrs. Roesselle had tired of waiting for her husband, and was at that moment ascending the stairs to their chamber. He thought of her, and he was again overpowered.

"If you have tormented me enough, you may leave me," he sobbed. "There is no pity in your face; there is none in your heart. Leave me, and I will try to make my peace with God. May he temper the wind to my poor lamb when she cannot lean on me."

He bowed his head, and sat with it bowed, silently pouring out his soul in prayer for strength and mercy. When at last he raised his eyes, he thought to find himself alone; but Maverick still sat where he had last seen him.

"Will you not leave me?" he asked.

"You do not yet understand the object with which I sought you," was the reply. "I came not only to acquaint you with your perilous position, but to show you how to escape from it. I have satisfied you that you are standing upon the brink of a precipice, more perilous than that over which you cast poor Levin. I offer you my hand, to lead you to safety. Will you accept it?"

Roesselle looked doubtfully, distrustfully, at him.

"What do you propose?" he asked.

The eyes of Augustus Maverick brightened at the question. To him, wrapped in his own selfishness, the honor or degradation of this man and his young wife was nothing; the punishment of a criminal, or his escape, was nothing; and had no plan of his own come into combination with the knowledge he had obtained of the manner of Horace Levin's death, Alvin Roesselle might have lived and died untroubled by aught but his own conscience about the story of that one black night. But through all the cunning of his tale, and the art with which he had practised upon the fears of the poor victim about whom his snares were winding, he had brought him to the eager inquiry for the way of escape; and just at that point the interest of the plotter begun. He motioned the other to bend his head; he bent his own until the two nearly touched; and then, not daring to speak the words aloud which he wished to utter, he whispered them in his ear. He whispered thus for some minutes, restraining the words of warm remonstrance that the other wished to utter, and whispering on until the whole nefarious design was explained.

"Man, man," cried the listener, starting back with horror, "do you ask me, a minister of God, to commit this shocking sin?"

"I ask you to do a certain act, easy to be performed, of no consequence to yourself or any other in whom you have any interest."

"My holy office teaches me to have an interest in all, the humblest of God's people."

"Stuff!" impatiently exclaimed Maverick.

"Will you do what I wish?"

"I cannot."

"You can."

"I dare not."

Maverick rose again.

"Either that, or disgrace and the penitentiary."

"Have pity on me!" Roesselle entreated, clasping his hands, and sinking on one knee before his persecutor. "Have mercy, as you will one day ask for mercy."

He might as well have prayed to the walls of the room. Augustus Maverick took out his watch and said:

"Decide in ten minutes."

The house was quiet at that hour; the domestic was asleep over the kitchen, and Helen Roesselle, little dreaming of her husband's agony and peril, slept in her chamber. There were none to hear the groans of mortal pain that burst from the heart of the unhappy man; there were none to hear the frantic supplications for pity which were poured forth in that study to that inexorable man who stood with his watch in his hand, repeating the words, "decide—your time is nearly up." And there were none but He who sometimes for his mysterious purposes permits the wicked to triumph, to know the enforced surrender of principle, the enforced yielding to sin, that occurred that night within that study.

It was well towards midnight when Augustus Maverick, more triumphant in this victory than he would have been in winning the hand of Augusta Traynor, left the parsonage. He mounted his horse and rode directly home. Rousing the hostler who slept in one of the barn chambers, he bade him take his horse, and also inquired:

"Has Mr. Oliver come in?"

The man sleepily shook his head.

"Good!" Augustus muttered. "Let him stay away a few hours more, and I'll lay a train that will end in blowing him out of Maverick." And he passed into the house.

Closing the door of the parsonage behind his ominous visitor, Mr. Roesselle took the lamp from the study and ascended to his chamber. His wife was quietly sleeping; but the flaring of the light disquieted her slumber, and she stirred uneasily, and murmured in her sleep. He bent down to catch the whispered words, and plainly heard his own name.

He started back from her innocent presence; he left the room; he left the house; and casting himself down upon the grass, wet with the dews of the night as it was, he sobbed forth despairingly the words, "My crime—my crime!"

The gloomy hours of the long night passed away; a thunder-storm arose, and the lonely wife awoke, and shuddered at the storm, wondering at the absence of her husband; and still Alvin Roesselle lay upon the ground, careless of the discomfort of his situation. A storm was raging within his brain, and again and again, until daylight warned him that this dreadful night was ended, did he exclaim, "My crime! my crime! my crime!"

IV.

ROGER BRILL was a loquacious man of about sixty years, fat and good-natured, and had always been indisposed to hard labor during his whole life. He had no kin that he knew anything about, and having never contracted the matrimonial alliance, he had no one to support but himself. It was well that this was so, since the slender salary allowed to him as sexton of the parish church and general grave-digger for the neighborhood was barely sufficient to feed him and keep him in tobacco and beer. As for clothes, he had worn the same suit of rusty black for many years, and nobody ever supposed that he would purchase any more. He came of a race of sextons, beginning with his great-grandfather, who held the position in old colonial times, when this parish church was first built; and it had duly descended through his grandfather and his father to himself. He had filled it for thirty years, and the little old shed of a house, near the church, in which he lived, solitary and alone, was a resort for the old gossips of the neighborhood of both sexes.

The chief pleasure of Roger's existence, next to beer and pipe, was to know more of what was going on than any one else; and he was generally able to rehearse more of the current news than any one else.

It was upon another summer evening, ten years from that on which occurred the scenes of the last two chapters, that Roger sat upon a bench in front of his humble habitation, smoking a long clay pipe and chatting with one of his neighbors, a crippled gardener who sometimes worked at Maverick House. They talked of the events of the neighborhood; and as what they said concerns some of those whose fortunes we have undertaken to follow, we will listen to their talk.

"And you buried one more to-day?" old Toby Small observed.

"Yes," responded the sexton; "and a proper fine man he was. We shan't see his equal very soon in this parish, I'm afraid. He was a clever, pious man, was Parson Roesselle, and allus had a kind word for a poor body—ay, and sometimes a gift. And he's the first grown man I've buried since old Ezra Maverick went to his last account."

"Who preached the parson's funeral?"

"I dunno his name; but it was the same man married him. He came up from York."

"What ailed the parson, Roger?"

The sexton always disliked to acknowledge that he could not answer a question; and after some coughing and smoking he said:

"Consumption, I reckon. I understand the doctor gives out that he don't know exactly what it was—a kind of puzzling disease; but them doctors don't know what's the matter quite as often as they think they do. I think it was consumption," and Roger oracularly slapped his leg. "Haven't we seen him going about among us, hollow-cheeked, hollow-eyed, and as hollow-chested as an old man, for these ten years, never complaining, but getting himself into the grave as fast as he could by hard work? Such a man for doing good I never see. I've known him to get up in the middle of a cold winter's night and ride two miles to comfort a poor sick crone. If a man ever deserved heaven, it's my opinion that he did. And I say he died of consumption, and hard work, and exposure."

"Likely," grunted Toby. "Seemed allus melancholy-like."

"Yes. I take it that was part of his duty as a minister."

"Wonder where the widow'll go?" Roger speculated, after a moment's silence.

"I know where somebody'd like her to go," Toby observed.

"Where?"

The gardener jerked his thumb over his shoulder towards Maverick Farm.

"Mr. Augustus would like her."

"Not to marry?" the sexton inquired, suspending his smoking.

"No—not he. He'll never marry; all broke down; don't think he's long to live, anyway. But to keep house. I know he wants some one; and she's a likely one now."

Roger grunted assent.

"Mr. Augustus has all the old man left, I s'pose?"

"Every copper. I used to think Oliver the favorite; but the old man never had anything to do with him after he married that girl down the river. Nobody pretends to know why it was; but he lost everything when he got her. Some queer things about them Mavericks, Roger."

"Awful queer."

The conversation here came to a halt; and the two sat in silence as darkness came down, and pursued their speculations severally. A gruff voice from before them suddenly startled them, and they saw the indistinct figure of a tall man in a cloak standing near.

"Is the sexton here?" the voice gruffly demanded.

"Here, sir, at your service," replied Roger.

"I want to look into the church. Get me the key." A more ungracious voice the sexton had not heard during the whole course of his employment.

"Wait a bit and I'll go with you, sir," he said, bustling about for his lantern and key.

"I don't want your company," the voice harshly replied. "Get me the key without any more fussing."

"Who is it?" the sexton whispered, to Toby.

"Don't you know?" the gardener whispered back. "It's Mr. Augustus Maverick."

"Bless my soul, so it is!" Roger exclaimed, aloud. "Beg your pardon, Mr. Maverick, for not—"

An ejaculation that sounded much like a curse interrupted the sexton.

"I'm not Mr. Maverick," said the man; "and I only want the key to get an umbrella that I left in the church to-day."

He snatched the key from Roger's hand, and strode off through the darkness.

"Did he say he wasn't Mr. Maverick?" Toby asked.

"Yes," answered Roger, somewhat bewildered.

"Well, I say he was. I can't be mistaken about his voice; he's cursed me too often in that same way for me to forget how it sounds."

"This is queer!" the sexton said. "If it is Mr. Maverick, I've nothing to say agin his going into the church, though I don't think he was ever seen there yet; but if it aint—and he says it aint—I ought to know who it is. Toby, you stay here; I've got to look into this."

The sexton took his hat and stick, and struck off for the church. The evening was quite dark, and as he approached the old edifice he could only distinguish it as a darker spot in the prevailing obscurity. He felt his way carefully up the steps and into the porch, and softly tried the door. To his surprise he found it still fastened, as he had fastened it after the funeral that afternoon.

But he took instant thought, that if the man who had borrowed the key had entered the church, the door must be locked on the inside.

A small stained-glass window opened into the body of the church to the left of the great door; and as he stood wondering what this could mean, and conjecturing that the man had probably not entered the church at all, as yet, he became aware, by means of the effect upon the glass of this window, of a flash of light within the church.

It was not a bright, or a broad flash, but a faint one, coming and disappearing in a breath; no longer than the flame of a single match would cause.

He continued to watch. Again and again, and yet again, those faint illuminations just tinged the glass of the window, coming at regular intervals of about half a minute, and disappearing as quickly as they came. The stained glass was impervious to sight, and there was no way that he could discover what was going on within the church without entering it.

He waited a few moments, in sore perplexity, while the flashes came and went with almost regular precision.

"I'm bound to know what all this means," Roger muttered. "I'll count these lights; and if there be ten more of them, I'll hammer on the door till he opens it; and then I'll find out about it."

He turned his attention fixedly to the window, and counted the next flash at once:

"One—two," he muttered, "three—four—five—six—seven—eight—nine!—"

It was the last. With the ninth feeble illumination the church faded into darkness for the night; and Roger conferred with himself as to what would probably happen next.

"If he comes out now," he thought, "I'll stand here and face him. That'll frighten him into telling what he's been up to in there."

The man did come out at once, and with very little warning. Roger had not thought that the heavy carpeting of the aisle would completely disguise the footfalls; and the intimation he had of the approach of the prowler was the rattling of the key in the lock of the door. Poor Roger's courage suddenly forsook him upon the emergency, and he hastened to conceal himself behind a high-backed bench which stood in the porch.

The door swung open, and the man in the cloak came out. He closed the door, turned the key, put it in his pocket, and then turning around, held up a small dark lantern, and closed the slide. He had no umbrella anywhere with him. As he held up the lantern, its light fell across his face, and Roger distinctly saw the features and recognized them. It was Augustus Maverick, without doubt.

He replaced the lantern beneath his cloak, descended the steps, and again disappeared from sight. The sexton emerged from his concealment and made all the haste that he was capable of back to his house; and there he found Toby still sitting on the bench.

"Did he come back?" Roger eagerly asked.

"Sartin," responded the gardener. "He came and left the key; here it is. I asked him if he found his 'brella, and he mumbled something, I couldn't tell what. Haven't you seen him?"

"There's some deviltry in this, Toby Small," Roger deliberately said. "I'm going back to the church, and I want you to come along. I'm going to know all about this before I go to bed."

But Roger Brill promised himself more than he could perform. He lighted his own lantern, and with Toby went to the church and searched carefully through it. Nothing in the least suspicious was disclosed by the investigation; nothing had been taken, and nothing left. Everything was in its usual order; and Roger Brill was puzzled.

"Well, I'm blessed if I ever!" he ejaculated. "Toby, what do you think?"

"I think he came to look for an umbrill, and didn't find it. I guess we'd better say nothing about it."

And yet, unsuspected by these simple souls, this nocturnal visit to the parish church was for an object of mysterious significance. It was to assure the visitor by the evidence of his own senses that Alvin Roesselle, this day buried, had been faithful to the pledge which he mercilessly forced from his lips ten years before. And Augustus Maverick returned to his mansion with the assurance of his senses that the minister had been faithful.

PART SECOND—I.

THE BATTLE OF LIFE.

THE lapse of ten years more in the progress of events brings us to the year 1850; and we resume the thread of our narrative at the cottage on the Hudson where we once found Augusta Traynor and her lovers.

The cottage has somewhat run to waste; the paint in many places has worn off, the lattice is broken here and there, and the beautiful lawn is overgrown with weeds and tall, rank grass. Signs of neglect are everywhere apparent; and the scanty furnishing of the cottage within gives token of poverty as well. We shall not find Augusta Maverick here now; but if we should visit a little graveyard near by we should have no difficulty in finding a headstone bearing the letters:

AUGUSTA MAVERICK,
Wife of Oliver Maverick,
Died January 7, 1844,
Aged 43 years.

We are revisiting the cottage on a morning of early May, and the sweet violet-breath of spring blows pleasantly through the windows. By a casement overlooking the Hudson a young girl is seated, gazing thoughtfully out upon the prospect. An entry made in a family record which she holds upon her lap tells us that her name is Laura Maverick, and that she is now in her nineteenth year.

We turn from her simple, unornamented dress, from the books she holds upon her lap, to look at her face and head. It is such a face and such a head as could not fail to arrest attention at once, because both are unusual and full of unusual marks of character. The dark brown hair shows for itself that it has never known the confinement of a comb; it flows in wild freedom, in heavy, glossy masses down upon the shoulders, and the motion of head and hand that tosses it back has become habitual. The broad brow and the whole face are fair; but the features are those of Augusta Maverick; one glance would show you that. It is a beautiful face; but beautiful with a cold, classic beauty; and here again it is the face of her mother. But there is that in it, which you never could have found in her mother's face. It has all the cold, haughty attractiveness of her mother's; but if you look from the firm setting of the lips up to the eyes you will see such eyes as are not often seen in human creatures. They are not black, nor blue, nor gray; you might say that in different lights they are all of those colors; but they are neither. They are as colorless under their heavy brown eyebrows as water; but they are always bright, translucent, mysterious. A man who did not love this woman, a man who had never been enthralled by her dangerous presence, would say that those eyes showed far more than should be seen in any woman; not alone firmness, but a hard, indomitable will; it might be, a cruel purpose, if occasion served, which she could easily mask with a softer, more winning look.

Her eyes turned from the river to a book that lay open in her lap on the family record. It was an old book, with quaint, strong binding, antique type, and paper turning yellow with age; and its expressions were couched in obsolete forms. She had found it that morning in one of her mother's trunks; and one of the fly-leaves bore the words, "Presented to Richard Traynor (her deceased grandfather) by John Derry, captain of his vessel Swallow." The title-page showed that it was published in London, in 1679; and it bore the name, "A Compound of Curious Fact for Curious Bodies to Ponder."

As the eye of Laura Maverick glanced carelessly through its pages, her attention had been arrested by a short paragraph which she had read, and to which she now returned. It read as follows:

"About poisons, however, what we do know is little enough as compared with what we know not. Thus, who would think that the deadliest of them all doth grow and flourish in our very gardens, in simple herbs and flowers, harmless of themselves, but of mortal power when mingled. An English traveller in Syria, a century ago, discovered this secret; and those who wish may find it now put down at page 104 herein."

The reader hastily referred to the page, and there read the names of four common garden plants, every one of which she could see in the little plat beneath the window.

"But it is most marvellous," the book continued, "with how little trouble death may be caused by this means. Thus, take three leaves of each, wrap them tight in a cloth so that they may have no air, and leave them to sweat together. In three hours the cloth will be so drenched with the poisonous property, that death follows the pressing of it to the nostrils."

She read the words again, very carefully, and then turned down the leaf and put the book carefully away. She had just seated herself in her chair by the window when she heard a heavy step on the veranda, and a man entered the room.

"The post brings two letters this morning, Laura," he said; "one for each of us." He tossed a white envelop bearing a wax seal into her lap. "I have read mine; it is of immense importance to both of us. Read yours, if you choose; and then I wish to talk with you about mine."

The speaker, who was Oliver Maverick, threw himself down in a low easy chair and leaning his elbow upon his knee he fixed his eyes on the carpet and waited for his daughter to read her letter. Laura glanced at the well-known superscription; her color changed, and she hastily placed the letter in her pocket.

"I will come back in five minutes," she said to her father, who merely nodded; and she left the room.

Back of the house, at the edge of her flower-bed, there was a large stone which was a favorite seat; and here she sat as she read her letter. More than once during its reading her color came and went; more than once a strange flood of light poured into her eyes, and her lips came firmer together and her face grew harder; and after the first hasty perusal she threw down the sheet and put her handkerchief to her eyes. She tried successfully to restrain the whole violence of her emotion; but she must have been less than a woman to have suppressed her tears.

"I might have written differently," she thought. "But how could I tell that he was as proud and impatient as this? And he informs me that his offer is withdrawn—that I am as free from him as though we had never met. How can I punish him? How can I make him feel my resentment?"

The wounded pride of the woman spoke in these last exclamations—in her tone much more expressively than in her words. She snatched the letter from the ground, and read it again. It was dated at New York the previous day; it began simply, "Miss Laura Maverick;" it was signed "Roscoe Grayle," and read as follows:

"The receipt of your letter to-day makes it necessary for me to write to you once more; only once. I find you have chosen to think my meaning and my purpose very different from what my first letter plainly expressed. Let us very briefly recall our acquaintance, and all that has passed between us. We met upon the occasion of my graduation, and your conduct showed an interest in me. That I admired you was natural enough; the whole college did. We met several times afterwards in the city, and I came to love you; or I fancied I did. You encouraged me, and did it by conduct and expression which were not at all equivocal. Upon the strength of this conduct and these expressions, I wrote to you shortly after your return to your home, frankly disclosing my feelings, and asking you to be my wife—some day. I wrote as plainly as words could say it that I was poor, and had my own way to make in the world; and I asked for your love to strengthen me for my struggle with the world. I waited eagerly for your answer, hoping that you could feel as I did, and bid me go on and hope.

"Well—you know what kind of a letter you gave me. I do not blame you for being what you are; I do not reproach you for saying what you have; but I do tell you candidly that since I cannot have your unconditional love, I withdraw my offer, and make you as free from me as though we had never met. Laura Maverick!—am I doing you a wrong when I say that your long, carefully-phrased letter means, in brief, just this? 'I will not bind myself to any man now; I must be the mistress of wealth. I don't deny that you are not disagreeable to me; work away, and when you have money enough, come back and ask me again. Somebody's gold must wed me; I rather hope it may be yours; but time will show.'

"You may be startled to have the mirror held up to you in this way; but your secret heart will confess the truth of the picture it shows you. But as for me, I peremptorily decline the position in which you seek to place me. Nature never made me a dangler or a time-server; I will run no races for hearts where gliding and not love must win. I tell you my mind plainly; it is better so. Let this be the last that shall pass between us. I leave the city to-morrow for a short visit to my aunt up the river. We shall probably not meet; if we do, let us say nothing to revive the past. In all kindness, farewell!"

Again, in a passion of disappointment, did the girl cast the letter to the earth; and now she ground it down with her heel. Frank and manly as it was, it touched her keenly, showing her to herself in an aspect that angered her the more because of its perfect truth. In ten minutes she had exhibited to herself the antipodes of her own impetuous, selfish, sinister self. "He insults me," she thought; and then her anger and vexation gave way to an admiring remembrance of the handsome and talented collegian, and regret that she had written so politic a letter as she had. And then, fighting out to its end almost the same conflict that her mother had fought here twenty years before, she took up the letter, tore it into minute shreds, and let them float off one by one on the wind.

"He is gone," she thought; "and I can well afford to let him go. He was only a passing incident in my life; he must go some day; better now. There shall be no more trouble about him."

It was only a thought; but her eyes spoke it, and her lips spoke it without utterance. She turned to the flower-bed, and stooping to it, selected a handful of green leaves here and there, and laid them in the palm of her hand.

"So harmless separately," she thought; "and yet so deadly when covered up together for a little time. I wonder who has used this subtle, terrible agent, and how many of all the people who have died in their beds, leaving no mark or trace of death's cause, have died from this!"

Suddenly scattering the leaves away, she returned to the house. Her father sat where she had left him; but a light doze had overtaken him, and the letter which he had received had fallen to the floor. The girl took it in her hand and looked at the address, which was written in a rough, sprawling hand, and at the Tarrytown postmark, bearing the date of the previous day. While she stood with the envelop in her hand her father awoke with a start. The twenty years that had elapsed had not made an old man in years of Oliver Maverick—far from it; but the emaciation, the wrinkles, the gray hair of age were all there. His face was sown all over with the footmarks of a searing disappointment that had entered into his life and blasted its best promise. It had been, twenty years before, a hard, unlovely face; it was so now, and tenfold more so by the addition of these canker-marks, and the sullen expression of misanthropy which had habitually settled there. But upon this morning there was something new and unusual in that face; it had brightened a little, and there was something in the dull eye that had a hopeful look, if it could not be called hope. His voice, too, was stronger and firmer than was its wont; and by these signs his daughter knew that something of unusual nature had occurred.

"Is that my letter?" he asked.

"Yes, father."

"Have you read it?"

"No; I just came in, and picked it up from the floor where you dropped it."

"Read it, then, for I wish to talk with you about it."

II.

LAURA MAVERICK took the letter from the envelop and read it. Purged of its many errors in grammar and orthography, it would have read thus:

"Maverick House, May 20.

"MR. OLIVER:—Things are getting worse with your brother every day. He took to his bed since my last, and has not left it. The Tarrytown doctor says he never will. I heard Mrs. Roesselle yesterday ask leave of him to send for a city doctor; but your brother only shook his head, and said, 'No use.' Four days ago he had a stroke of something pretty bad. They tried to keep it from the servants; but it would get around. I was going through the entry, and I overheard the doctor say something to Mrs. Roesselle about numb or dumb palsy, which I judge is apt to do the business up quick.

"Excepting the sickness, there has been nothing unusual going on here. David Terry manages the farm, and Mrs. Roesselle has control in-doors; and I reckon they carry on the place to good advantage. Should think there was money saved every year.

"About that thing you were so particular I should watch for—you may rest easy about it yet. I know it has not been done. No lawyer has been to the house; I could not help knowing it if there had been. I keep good watch. Send me ten dollars.

"SPT."

"P. S. He is apt to go off sudden, I think. If he gets worse all of a sudden, I will telegraph you. If you do not hear from me again for a few days, you may depend he is sinking slowly. I shall not write again for a fortnight, unless he betters. Mrs. Roesselle is sharp-eyed, and I have to watch my chances to write."

Laura laid down the letter, and looked inquiringly at her father. The latter was sitting upright, eagerly waiting for her to finish it. He began immediately, as soon as she looked up.

"Before giving you any explanation of that letter, my daughter," he said, "I wish to recall to your mind some facts which are interesting to us which you do know, and to inform you of others which you do not know. And first—you know too well that we are, and have been as long as you can remember, cursed with poverty."

Oliver Maverick spoke bitterly; and the bitterness reflected in his daughter's face was a sufficient assent. She did know it, she had felt it; and she had returned to her poor home from each visit to the city, among a few of her mother's humbler friends, with grief and heart-burning because of the lot that fettered her to this place. Naturally gay, brilliant, vivacious, with her mother's ambition for social triumph, this same poverty had denied to her her mother's accomplishments; and she realized full keenly that all the conquests she could hope to make must be made by the power of her own beauty, and grace, and tact, unaided by anything from artificial help. And Oliver Maverick, too, loving his bright, imperious child as even such men love their own flesh and blood, had felt keenly, bitterly, the necessity that entailed this poverty upon her.

"You know, my daughter, from hearing me say it, that the present master of Maverick House is my younger brother. You have never been to that house; I presume you have never spoken to Augustus Maverick, and perhaps you don't know him by sight."

"I have seen him once only," Laura interposed. "It was the year before mother died, and while she was able to walk out. We were standing by the gate one pleasant day in the fall, and a man rode by on horseback. I saw she turned pale, and I asked her what was the matter. 'I do believe that is Augustus Maverick,' she said. I looked at him, and as he went past he looked at us and scowled. I have not seen him since, that I know of."

A moody look settled upon the father's face as he continued:

"I have not seen him for three years; I have not spoken with him for twenty. We have been completely estranged; but while he has dwelt all that time on the estate of the Mavericks, in ease and plenty, I have lived here like an outcast, pinched with poverty, and almost heart-broken at my bad fortune. I wish to tell you briefly why this has been so.

"The Maverick estate has borne that name since the time, or almost the time, that the English conquered the colony. The lands were patented by the king to Colonel Maverick, and he built the mansion upon them. By regular descent this estate came down to my father, Ezra Maverick, who inherited it as the oldest son of his father, under the law of primogeniture, then prevailing here as in England. Augustus and myself were the only children, and I am some years the elder. Our mother died while we were quite young. Before I had attained my majority, the law I have spoken of was abolished; but that made no difference with my father's feelings or intentions. He liked all the laws and usages of the mother country; and I have often heard him speak of this one in particular, and declare that it was right that the oldest son should take the estate, and that he should conform himself to it, though it was abolished. He stated his design distinctly to both of us, and informed us both that he had executed a will, devising the whole to me.

"Knowing this, I looked forward to the ownership of the estate as a matter of surety. I thought the title was fixed in me, and that nothing short of my decease before my father, could possibly defeat it. And I had supposed that my brother, knowing the positiveness of our father's convictions upon this subject, would submit to what seemed inevitable with patience, if not cheerfulness. I do not remember that we ever had any conversation about it; we certainly had no hard words. I knew what my father's wishes were as to him; and if I had received the estate I should have made an allowance to Augustus out of the yearly profits. I supposed he understood this, and had no fears of any subterfuge on his part, until I found myself actually disinherited.

"The cause of my difficulty with him was my marriage with your mother; or rather, the success of my suit, and the failure of his."

Listening to every word that her father uttered, Laura rose and crossed the room. Thus far, she had heard little that was new to her; and leaning upon the casing of the open doorway she looked across the fields to the little cemetery that held the mortal part of her mother, and where she could almost distinguish the stone that covered her remains. Dying while Laura was as yet but little more than a child, the strong, passionate heart of the grieved and disappointed woman had moved her to tell the girl, unknown to her husband, of the bitter blighting of her hopes and plans in life, and of the wealth which she had coveted for her daughter as much as herself, denied to her by the crafty scheming of a disappointed suitor. For years had Laura known the bitter truth, and the wretched knowledge had added fuel to the flame of her desire for wealth. Yet one more remembrance came to her as she stood there in the doorway, listening to her father's story; the recollection of how she watched beside her mother, dying of a broken heart and a disappointed ambition, on that stormy winter night when she died. Her father had gone to bring the doctor, and she was left alone with the dying; before the morning she was alone with the dead. The mind of Augusta Maverick wandered as the end drew near; in death she seemed to grasp what had slipped her possession in life; she seemed to think that she stood with her daughter upon the back porch at the Maverick House, and was exhibiting to her the beauty of the estate.

"See, Laura dear," she said, pointing with her almost transparent hand to the blank wall of her bedroom, "see the fields and woods, the hills and dales, and all the buildings there are. It is all ours; it is your father's patrimony, and so of course it is ours. It is worth thousands upon thousands of dollars; I don't know how much. Now come in, dear, and let us look at the parlors. There'll be rare times here this winter, Laura; we'll have parties, and brilliant ones, I promise you; and mother's old friends shall come up from New York to see how grand and happy mother is, and how proud of her daughter and her great house. For it's all ours, Laura; houses, and lands, and—and—"

They were the last words she ever spoke; she passed away a few moments after. Maverick, which should have been hers—hers and Laura's—was the theme of her farewell words to the girl; and the lesson of the scene sunk deep in the impressionable mind of the latter. She had never forgotten it—she could never forget it; and when her father came to talk, a few moments later, of schemes to make Maverick their own, he had in Laura an eager and sympathetic listener, and one ready to enter upon the endeavor with enthusiastic energy, and a cunning far deeper than his own.

"Are you listening, Laura?" he asked.

"Yes, father;" and she resumed her seat.

"It is enough to say about the circumstances attending the marriage," he resumed, "that both Augustus and myself were suitors of your mother. She accepted me; and from that moment he entertained the bitterest, most revengeful hatred against both of us. He threatened me on yonder veranda, when he discovered that he was rejected, with pecuniary ruin, and hinted that he could and would make me an exile forever from Maverick; but the very extravagance of the threat, coupled with the furious rage that possessed him at the moment, caused me to wholly disregard his talk as idle raving. How little I knew him, and the depth of his revengeful spirit! I passed that night at an inn near by, and did not return to Maverick until the next afternoon; and I was instantly impressed with the coolness of my father's manner towards me. His last illness had just set in; and though he lived for eighteen months after that, he was abed most of the time. He never, after that day, addressed me; his replies were always short and surly; and he never would take my arm when he felt well enough to walk across the floor, or out into the garden, in fine weather. I felt that some evil influence was at work against me, and of course I knew what it was; but I waited, trusting to time to make it right, and never dreaming that I was being completely undermined. I very rarely saw Augustus about the house, or elsewhere; he would not and did not sit at the same table with me, and never spoke to me. One of the house-servants told me that he held long interviews with my father at night; and I suppose that the mischief was done while I slept. Your mother and I were secretly married, for I feared that the knowledge of such a step on my part, either proposed or accomplished, might tend to compromise me with my father. Augustus was much away from home at that time; nobody pretended to know much about his goings and comings, or where he passed his time. My father died; and then the blow fell. I was not prepared for such sweeping, calamitous villany as was then disclosed. A new will had been made, declaring in the most express terms that the first had been destroyed, and the new will, without the slightest mention of me, gave the whole property, real and personal, to Augustus! It was genuine, beyond a doubt; the witnesses were good and trustworthy men, and proved its proper execution by their oaths. If there had been any ground upon which to contest it, I should have done so, though I had been compelled to labor by the day to obtain money to enable me to do so. But there was not the slightest ground of opposition, and after the funeral Augustus took possession. With an incredible malignity, which I can neither forget nor forgive—never, God help me, never!—he ordered me to leave the house in two days. I went immediately; broken down and dejected, I came here, and have never since crossed the threshold of Maverick. My poor earnings in a small clerkship during six months of the year have scantily supported us; your poor mother married a beggar, instead of a man who could raise her to the social position for which she was born."

The feelings of Oliver Maverick were overwrought by his narrative; he was compelled to pause and choke down his rising emotion.

"And what could that man have said or done, to cause you to be disinherited?" Laura warmly cried, while her bosom heaved and her eyes burned with anger.

"I do not know, even to this day! We shall never know; the breast of Augustus holds the secret of that astounding influence, and we may never look to have it revealed. Some infamous, horrible falsehood, coined with devilish ingenuity, must have filled the old man's ears, and he was too old and weak to detect the lie or the object of it. In fact I care not much to know the means by which I was ruined; my brother was revengeful and satanic enough to accomplish it; it would not profit us to know how it was effected, if we could."

"So much for the past," said Laura, whose mind was already speculating with the probabilities of the future. "What next?"

During his melancholy narrative, Oliver Maverick had settled down to a crouching position in his chair, and sat with listless, folded hands and drooping head. But with his daughter's question he raised himself up, his eye brightened, and his voice took a firmer tone:

"Ah, the future, the future!" he exclaimed. "The glorious future shall right our wrongs; we shall have reparation; yes, we shall have all that fraud and hatred wrested from us! Are you with me, Laura? Do you feel as I feel? Does your spirit burn like mine with the bitter sense of our wrongs?—and will you join me in a bold, timely effort to right them?"

She came and stood by his chair, and smoothing back the thin gray hair from his wrinkled forehead, she said:

"I feel as you feel—I chafe as you chafe under this dreadful wrong. Tell me what is to be done, my father, and with hands or brain I will work night and day."

"I knew it!" the other joyfully cried. "I've been plotting for months, and my plan is all made; but I wanted to depend on your spirit and will, for we may need all of it to help us through. And I firmly believe that with ordinary luck, all will be as we wish."

The speaker paused a moment to collect his thoughts, and continued:

"The letter which you read was written by Jerry Small, the son of the old gardener at Maverick. He was a boy at the time of my father's death, and he became much attached to me for something I did once for him, I forget what. I have paid him some money now and then when I could spare it—and sometimes, I fear, when I could not—and from him I have had minute and faithful reports of what has transpired at the mansion. Not a person could put foot in the house, but I have known it, and as much of that person's business as could be known by any of the servants. Little as I have seen my brother since he turned me away from his house, I have known all that transpired within it that has been worth noticing at all, and all that has been heard at home of what he has done abroad, and where he has been. All that my informant could know by actual sight or hearing, or pick up from the other servants about the house, I know; and all this has gone on without a suspicion being raised at Maverick of what Jerry was about. For twenty years I have waited and watched for an opportunity; and the letter received to-day indicates that my time draws rapidly nigh. Augustus has led a notorious dissolute life for years; so frequent and extravagant have been his excesses that I had expected his death long before now. If I have been wrecked by grief and disappointment, he has been ruined by systematic debauchery. The letter speaks the truth; to-morrow may see his end.

"I know what persons are around Augustus now. Besides the house and farm servants, few of whom ever communicate with him, and none of whom can or would attempt to influence him, there is David Terry, the farm manager, a prudent, thrifty Scotchman, who minds his own business, like all of his countrymen; Mrs. Roesselle the housekeeper, whom I do not know, but who, as Jerry informs me, is a quiet, unobtrusive woman, who has never recovered from the grief occasioned by the death of her husband, ten years ago, and, I suppose, has nothing to do with Augustus, now that he is confined to his bed; Granny Wadhams, as she is called, the old hired nurse; and Anna May, the housekeeper's adopted daughter, who is about your own age, and who assists Mrs. Roesselle. I am not afraid that any of these persons have become familiar with Augustus Maverick, who is, indeed, a man of no familiarities at all; nor am I in the least afraid that any of them have any design on his property.

"You will perceive where these words lead me. We have designs on the property; we are the only relatives of its owner; assured of one thing, we might quietly wait for the tidings of Augustus's death, and take possession as his heirs."

"And that assurance is," eagerly broke in Laura, swiftly reaching the conclusion, "that he has not made and will not make a will."

"Precisely. It is to that contingency that the ambiguous part of Jerry's letter refers; and I am morally certain, for the reasons that the fellow states, that up to this time no will has been executed. The present condition of Augustus is decidedly favorable to us; he lies weak and helpless with palsy, almost at the point of death. If I am right, there is no one near him to suggest a will; and there is no one in existence to whom he would care to leave his property. Thus you see that all seems well. But we have not the assurance that we want. Were it any other man than Augustus Maverick, the chances would be that the approach of death would extinguish the hateful malignity that he feels towards us; but with him the chances are that it will last as long as he lasts; and I know that if he rallies enough to gain strength of mind for the purpose, he will think of a will—and then his malignity will live after him. Now what is our way to make sure that he dies instate?—as the lawyers would say.”

“If we had ever been received at the house, so that we could go there now—” Laura began; and her father hastily broke in:

“Since we have not been there, we must go now! I have thought carefully of the matter; and I plainly realize that the way of audacity is the way of safety. We must be at Maverick when Augustus dies; we must be there before he dies. Who is there to say us nay, or shut the door against us? Mrs. Roesselle? She is a housekeeper, paid for her services, like any servant; we are the only brother and niece of the dying man, and she will not dare to refuse us. What if we have not been recognized by Augustus as his relatives? She knows that we are such; and to a Christian woman like her that fact would be an additional reason for our admittance. In fact, I have not the slightest fear of any opposition in that quarter. Do you think Augustus will order us away? He will be too far gone to know or care who is in the house; and we will keep out of his sight and hearing. There is no one else there who can by any possibility be troublesome; and once we are in the house we will play our game carefully, shrewdly—with the help of Jerry Small, remember—and successfully, I hope and believe. Now, Laura what do you think of my plan?”

The girl enthusiastically clapped her hands, and her face glowed with anticipation.

“Excellent, father—excellent! ‘L’audace, l’audace—toujours l’audace!’ We shall be certain to succeed. I will be with you; I will help you; you can depend on me for all that a woman can do in this business. We have nine chances out of ten in our favor; and I long to be at work now. When shall we make the venture?”

“I am more in doubt about that than anything else,” was the reply. “I cannot expect to hear from Jerry again for some days; and knowing as I should by his silence that Augustus is getting worse, I should be in constant fear that he might go off suddenly, with the mischief done. On the other hand, I fear to take the risk of venturing to Maverick without further information, lest we find the object of our solicitude (with the faintest tone of bitterness in the sneer) so far from the grave as to defeat our purpose immediately and forever. Advise me, Laura; what do you think?”

“It may be—”

A double knock interrupted her, and going to the door, an envelop was placed in her hands.

“A telegraphic message,” she said, closing the door.

“Read it—quick!—read it!” her father whispered, weak with agitation.

Laura tore open the envelop, and running her eye over its contents, read aloud the words:

“He is dying. May live through the night.”

A PICTURE.

BY BRITOMARTE.

’Tis eventide, and the city’s dim
Through the close-drawn curtains comes faintly in;

How bright, in the parlors, the gas-lights glow!
How sweet sounds the music, soft and slow!
The ivory keys, how they dance and thrill,
With merriest tinkle and sweetest trill,
Under the touch, so dainty and light,
Of fairy fingers, slender and white!

And the maiden who touches the sweet-voiced keys,
With graceful abandon and lady-like ease,
Like a stately lily, so pure and rare
In its costly bloom, she is sweet, she is fair!

With violet eyes that flash and glow,
And flickering blushes that come and go—
Crimson banners that well compare
With the golden gleams of her yellow hair.

His haughty face, how tender it grows,
In his stern, dark eye, how the love-light glows,
Who stands beside her in stately grace,
Turning the music, and watching her face!
And the proud head bends, some word to speak

That sends the swift red to her beautiful cheek;

And a glance—that it breaks my heart to see,
For there’s none to whisper such words to me!

BESSIE'S HUSBAND.

BY LOTTIE BROWN.

THE summer sun was hours upon its downward course, and shining with a red, mellow light into the long windows of the white farmhouse, throwing its broad beams saucily across the painted floor of the kitchen, into the pan of red-streaked apples which Bessie Palmer held in her lap, and that young lady, with her brown curls tucked carefully away in a net, her sleeves pinned up to her shoulders, and her apron on, was still in the work which should have been performed hours ago.

"You're getting to be a careless, idle girl, Bessie," said grandmother, from her corner. "Since Squire Goldthwaite was here this morning, you have done nothing. What did he want?"

"Would you really like to know, grandma?" and Bessie held up the long red ribbon, which she had daintily pared from an apple, and peeped archly through, at the old lady.

"Of course I'd like to know. It's no everyday affair to me, child. The squire hasn't been here before for years."

"Well, grandma, he came to ask your little wicked girl to be his wife."

The ball of yarn fell from the trembling fingers, and rolled away into the ashes beneath the grate, and grandma took off her spectacles, wiped them carefully with one corner of her apron, and put them on again. Then she untied the broad ribbons of her cap, and sat up very straight and prim.

"What did you say, child?"

"I said no, grandma, just as plain as I could speak it!"

"I am glad of it!"

Bessie looked at grandma in unfeigned astonishment, and then out through the trees where the gray gables of Goldthwaite House were clearly visible, and wondered that she saw with her own young eyes, in spite of the wealth and power of the elderly suitor. It was more like grandma to favor a marriage which would bring riches into their family, for she was, and ever had been, a little grasping and penurious. Perhaps it was not really a fault with her, but it had ever proved a source of great trouble to Bessie, and her extravagant ideas.

"Yes, I see, child," said grandma. "You think it very strange that I disapprove of this man, but I do, for he is the worst enemy I ever had. I wonder at his coming here for you. It seems almost too strange to be true. But you are quite sure you said no?"

"Yes, grandma, I said no. How could I say otherwise? Do you forget that I said yes, six months ago, to Julian Rich?"

"No! I wish I could. I'm afraid he's no better than the other. I never fancied these city chaps."

Bessie said nothing, but the rosy ribbons fell faster from her plump fingers, and the yellow bowl of thin white slices rapidly filled.

All at once, across the belt of sunlight there fell a shadow, and looking up she saw the object of her thoughts.

He was flushed and heated by his rapid walk in the summer sun, and the moist gold rings of hair clung to his white forehead like a fair wreath. He was just the man to win a woman's heart—full of delicacy and manliness. The hands he held out were whiter than Bessie's own, and the ring which sparkled upon his finger was worth more than all her possessions, and yet he had—as many a man has done before—stooped from his high place to ask the brown-haired, blue-eyed girl to be his wife.

She glanced up shyly, a little tinge of red dashing to her cheek, and smiled.

"You here, Julian?"

"Yes, pet, but I'm in a confounded hurry. Good-day, grandma. Isn't that stocking almost done? Why, you are a perfect knitting-machine. Aren't she, Bessie? O, put aside those apples, and come into the orchard. I've a world to say. Excuse us, grandma!"

Bessie set aside the pan, washed her hands at the sink, put away her apron, and followed him, silently, out into the orchard, which stretched for acres behind the house, a perfect little forest.

"Bessie," he began, throwing himself down beneath a tree with a big golden sweeting in his hand, ready for his palate, "I am going away to-morrow morning."

"Why, Julian! And you never told me before." The tears came up slowly.

"There, don't cry! I can't bear to see a girl cry. I didn't know it myself. But I must go. I am sorry, of course, but father says I must come home—I have nearly completed my course with Squire Goldthwaite, and I can study through in a New York office. If it was not for you, Bessie, I would be glad of it, for he is a rigid, stern old brick, anyway. Well, I shall write often, and try to take a trip down here as often as once a quarter."

He took a good bite from the golden apple, and shied his hat at a swallow that flew past, with a perfect thoughtlessness, that showed how little the parting touched his heart, while Bessie, with her face hid in her hands, sat near, the picture of grief.

"I cannot bear to have you go, Julian. I am very lonely and unhappy. Until I met you, I have had no one to cheer me, since mother died. O, I cannot live without you."

"Yes you can, birdie. Why, there's grandma, she is jolly company." And he took another bite, and leisurely picked up his hat.

"You don't know all, Julian," Bessie said, without raising her head. "It is a dreary, dreary life."

"Don't I? Haven't I moped here these eight months? If it had not been for you, I should have been tempted to commit suicide."

Somehow, to Bessie there came suddenly a faint lack of warmth and sincerity in his words. But it was so faint, that she did not clearly understand it. It only made the parting a bitter one, without her fully knowing why it was so.

"Good-by, Bessie. Don't cry for me. I'll come in a few weeks, and I'll bring the smaller half of New York for your present." And he was gone.

The summer sun grew gray, and long shadows suddenly crept across the lawn. The broad belt upon the kitchen floor faded out, and Bessie forgot the unfinished work, and spent the rest of her afternoon under the tree in the orchard.

In three days an eight-paged letter came, beginning, "my darling," and ending, "faithfully, your own Julian," and was read through warm tears and fond kisses. O young girlhood! How easily it forgets every pain, every doubt, in these cruel, deceitful little black marks!

The next week there came two, the third one, the fourth none. In a fortnight there came a mere note, and then she waited six dreary weeks.

It was one evening, when the autumn had come with chilly nights and a harvest moon, Bessie, with a shawl wrapped carefully around her, sat in the doorway, her fingers clasping a thin bit of narrow paper—his last letter—and something like teardrops had left traces on either cheek. Grandma was in the kitchen, at the fire, and she sat out there hugging her loneliness and bitterness close to her heart. All at once the thick, dull fall of a horse's hoofs fell upon the grassy lawn, and looking up, she saw the iron gray horse, and Squire Goldthwaite before her.

"Bessie, little one," spoke the clear, firm voice, "is that you? It is rather cold to be out without warm wraps. Are you crying, child?"

This last was spoken in surprise, and he leaped from his saddle.

"No, no—I am not crying. I am only thinking."

The handsome face—for it was a handsome one, in spite of the gray hair which shaded his brow—at once grew sad and thoughtful.

"I have not lost hope yet, Bessie. I do not forget the question I asked weeks ago, or the answer you gave. I shall never forget it, and if you repent, remember that I am ready to take you to my heart. I am old enough to be your father, but I could be a tender, loving husband, Bessie."

He was in another moment far down the road, the iron gray horse spurning the dust with flying feet, and Bessie's heart surprised her, by the blessing that sprang up and followed him. He came past when she most needed a kindly word, when she hungered for sympathy and friendship.

"Kind Paul Goldthwaite. I can never forget your words;" and she went back comforted to the warm kitchen and grandma.

From her snug corner grandma sent a smile—for Bessie was always welcome. And why not so, since these two lone women were all in all on earth to each other? They were the oldest and the youngest of their flock—and out in the graveyard, a long line of low mounds marked the resting-places of those who had stood between them.

"Bessie!" Grandma held out her hand, and the girl sat down at her feet, and clasped it in her own. "Squire Goldthwaite has been here!"

"Yes."

"Did he say anything more about marriage?"

"Not exactly."

"I am glad. I don't want to think of it."

"Why, grandma! Is Squire Goldthwaite a bad man?"

"He has been to me—I will tell you the story, and you will then understand me: Years ago, he loved your mother. Don't start so, child! Well, we were very poor then, even poorer than now, for our farm was heavily mortgaged to the old judge, the young squire's father, and we all thought it a pleasant way of getting over a serious difficulty, and so we encouraged it. They were engaged, and everything went smoothly for a while, but he was young and flighty, and they were both high-tempered. Allen Palmer, your father, worked for the judge, and after a while your mother began to take a notion to him. I don't think she loved him at first, although he was steady, and as good as the squire, but she only did this to annoy and tease Paul. Night after night Allen came home from church or singing-school with her, and soon the squire's temper was aroused. We were unhappy enough in those days, I can tell you, for the interest on the mortgage took all we could scrape together, year after year, and your grandfather was helpless. I had all to do, and I heard Paul's story, and talked to your mother in favor of it. Finally, the wedding day was fixed, and Jennie bought her dress and fixings with the money I saved by making butter, and we hurried matters.

"It was just a week before the wedding day, that he came to me as white as a ghost, and told me that he would never marry her. 'Mrs. James,' he said, 'I am going away. I will never marry your daughter, for she only wants my money. Tell her to marry Allen Palmer, and work as she always has done.'

"He flew away like a madman, and before night we heard he had left town. I never really understood the why and wherefore, for I had a world of other trouble on my hands. Your grandfather kept me busy night and day, we had not even a cow or sheep, and the crops were a failure, and in less than a month Judge Goldthwaite's bill would be at our door. I believe, child, I was nearly crazy, for I saw nothing but hunger and want before us.

"That very night the old judge came, and talked bitterly to us all.

"You are a set of money-grasping, poverty-stricken fools, and ought to suffer! You have caused my son—the soft-headed ninny—to leave his home and disgrace me, and now you shall pay dearly for it. I shall be here with my mortgage, one of these fine days, Mistress James, and if the money is not ready I shall foreclose. We will see who gets the best of this matter. Not that I was pleased to know that my son was to disgrace himself by taking a wife from a hovel! O no! I'd rather he would be where he is, but the idea of your refusing him! Humph."

"Then he went away, and we were all in a terrible state of excitement and fear. Allen came, and Jennie and he went away in a few days and were privately married. But that was no help. He was as poor as we were. He had only his salary at the judge's, and he lost that before he had been married three days.

"Then it all came with a crash. I can indistinctly remember the bill, the judge's, the talk of foreclosure and poverty. I went to every one I knew, but the judge was too powerful, and we were too poor.

"The night before the note was due Allen brought me a package. It was directed to me, and on opening it I found a bank draft for three thousand dollars. My Maker only knows where it came from, or who sent it; but it was a blessing.

"The whole debt was cleared next day, and we were free, but I've always hated the name of Goldthwaite ever since. The young squire has never been here until last summer, and I hope he will never come again. I don't forget that, but for the kind friends who, pitying us, sent that draft, we might have been turned out into the world to starve and die. I could not bear to think of you becoming his wife."

"Did you never learn who sent that money?"

"Not really. Brother Daniel died soon after, and left me a little legacy from which I secretly suspect he extracted that money. He was rich and close. He refused me when I applied to him in my trouble, but I believe his heart rebuked him, and prompted him to send it."

Bessie sat very still and grave at the first, her fingers nervously toying with grandma's yarn, and her young face wearing a strange and thoughtful expression. At last she looked up.

"Grandma! Are you sure that Squire Goldthwaite was in the wrong?"

"I am very, very sure."

"Mother might have been wrong, too. There are always two sides to a story. Perhaps, after all, he is not so bad."

"Has that jackanapes turned your head with neglect, so that you are desperate enough to marry Goldthwaite? Plague the men, they make worlds of trouble! I hate the whole race!"

It was poor consolation, but all she was in any way likely to receive, and without another word she turned to the fire and her wild thoughts, and in the glowing embers saw, as only girls can see, strange faces and odd figures, which to her mapped out the future.

"You will have to take these herbs to Goldthwaite House, Bessie," said grandma, on the following day, "for I promised Mrs. Paine that I'd send them yesterday. It's queer that, with as much land as they have got, the squire could not afford a little room for his housekeeper to raise herbs for winter use. Well, thank goodness, he won't get a sprig of these, for Mrs. Paine hates him as bad as I do! She wouldn't stay there a day, if she had another home. But poor folks have to put up with everything."

Bessie looked wofully at the basket, and then at grandma. She had not been at Goldthwaite House for months, and she had no desire to go there now, since circumstances had placed so wide a barrier between herself and its owner.

"You'll have a fine chance to speak with the squire, Bessie. I've half a mind to think you are glad of the chance," laughed the old lady.

But Bessie was far away with her herb basket, before grandma saw the red blood that came up in a crimson dash to her cheek, and she never knew how painful a task her darling found it, that bright autumn morning.

The walk was a pleasant one, leading through a broad footpath, lined on either side by elms and bright-dressed maples, where the silence was unbroken, save for the crunch, crunch of the crisp brush beneath her feet.

Now and then the scarlet leaves fluttered down before her, and she watched them as they found a warm resting-place among the rocks, or floated down the brook, and half-wished that with them she could throw aside the burden of existence, and float out somewhere, anywhere, a mere speck in the world, away from herself and everything human.

It was as quiet as the grave around Goldthwaite House, and she found only a servant in the kitchen, with whom she left her basket, and thus got away without being compelled to hear a two hours' history of the wrongs of the housekeeper. In passing the front part of the house, one of the long shutters swung back, and the squire stepped from the window to the piazza, and spoke:

"Good-morning, Bessie, I saw you a moment since, as you came up the wood path! Have you been to see Mrs. Paine?"

"Yes, or rather brought a basket to her from grandma."

"Then your errand is accomplished; let me claim a moment of your time. Step in, please."

He spoke without a doubt in her acquiescence, and she complied, not wishing to appear rude, and entered the little parlor. On a table near the window, a delicate basket filled with purple clusters of ripe grapes, surrounding several pears and crimson plums, met her eye, and she saw at once that the gathering of them had been his morning's work.

"How very tempting, Mr. Goldthwaite!" she said.

"I am glad you think so, Bessie, for I prepared them for you. I intended to send them; shall I do so?"

"No, I will take them. I am very grateful. Our fruit is limited to our apples."

"You shall enjoy mine, for I have more than enough."

He came in his kindly manner and stood beside her at the window, watching her closely as she bent low over the basket, with an eager look in his face, as though there were words upon his lips that he longed, yet feared to utter.

A sudden lifting of the brown head brought his eyes full upon her own, and for a moment a blush mantled her cheek. It was an awkward situation for both, but she relieved it by saying, quietly:

"I must go. Grandma will miss me."

"Will you come again, Bessie?"

"I cannot promise. I may, some day." And she hurried down the road, with her discontent taking a deeper and more bitter hold upon her heart.

"There's a letter for you, Bessie," said grandma, as she entered the house, and on the table it lay, a white, perfumed missive, bearing Bessie's name.

"From Julian!" she thought; but tearing aside the envelop she recognized the delicate chirography of a city friend. With a total lack of interest she read one sheet entirely through. In the second she brightened a little.

"We are going to have a wedding next week, and only think, Bessie, I am to be bridesmaid. Such a lovely tulle as I have got, to be worn over rose-pink moire. The bride is my old schoolmate Clara Derney, and of course the affair will be a grand one. The bridegroom is a perfect Adonis, and he is—or rather his father is, very wealthy. His name is Julian Rich, and—”

The sheet fell from nerveless white fingers, and Bessie leaned back with that desolate, helpless loneliness, that only a love-bereaved heart can feel.

It could not be true! She picked up the unfinished letter. Yes, it was true, for there were three pages devoted to the coming wedding, and the bride and bridegroom's wealth and beauty.

And grandma found enough to tease her all the day and declared that never again should she darken Goldthwaite House.

Its owner thought differently, when he sat that night and read a little blotted, tear-stained letter; whose last words were:

“I'll try hard to be a faithful wife to you.
“BESSIE PALMER.”

Another month, and through the gray November light Bessie Goldthwaite, upon the strong arm of her husband, walked up the broad avenue, and entered her own home. A pale, grave bride she was, with heavy, downcast eyes and grieved lips, but a brave one for all that, and when he stooped at the door and kissed her, saying:

“My own wife, mine until death separates us,” she answered:

“Until death separates us, my husband.”

But the days and months dragged wearily. Before her eyes there came ever a proud, handsome Saxon face, and in her ears rang the music of a voice never to be equalled. It came up at those moments when her husband was near, and in some way made her know the depth of his love, when his arm was around her, and his tender words falling upon her ear, and bitterly did she feel and regret its presence. A most unwelcome and unbidden guest it was, but it never left her side. Like a spectre it followed her, and kept her heart from the resting-place so lovingly offered.

Sometimes she went to grandma, who still stubbornly lived in the farmhouse, and refused to acknowledge the relationship existing between herself and Bessie's husband, clinging with artful persistence to the old feud, but there she received no sympathy.

“You'd better have lived an old maid, than marry out of spite, child,” was all she heard.

“What did you marry for? For love, I suppose!”

O, Bessie did not know! For rest, she thought, for some one to protect and cherish her. But it was not found, but seemed since her marriage to have drifted further away than before. And thus the winter months passed, and summer came again, bringing back with tenfold force the memory of her one romance, and widening the gulf which stretched black and deep between herself and the man who loved her.

Once he said, gently but sadly:

“Bessie, can you never bury the past? Must I wait forever for the happiness I crave?” And when she turned her white, imploring face up to him he kissed away the gathering tears and added, “I can wait for your love. I am not the only sufferer.”

The summer was well nigh ended, when he came to her one day with a grave face and said:

“Bessie, I am suddenly called away. I have not an hour to give you, I must go at once. Will you try to pardon my haste? It is necessary that I should go.”

“I shall miss you, but if this business is necessary and demands at once your attention, you must go. May I know its nature?”

“If, my darling, it would add one atom to your peace of mind, I would tell you, but I know it would not. Have faith sufficient in me, to keep you at rest until we meet.”

A smile repaid him for his tender regard for her happiness, and with a kiss, snatched from cold, impassive lips, he left her. And womanly pride, and that readiness to harbor resentment came up, and made her miserable for days.

Of course she expected no letters, and therefore was not disappointed that they came not, but the hours dragged wearily, and she found herself more than once counting the days that might intervene before they met.

In her loneliness, she had but one resource—the farmhouse, her childhood's home, and poor dissatisfied grandmother, who, with the bound boy, lived there alone. When the one week lengthened into two, she went in to have a chat, and found her in her corner as usual, with that never-failing discontent plainly marked upon her face.

“Has the squire got home?” she asked, as Bessie came in.

"No. His business seems to detain him."

"Business! Poh! I should think it would detain him."

"Why?"

"Why? I should think you'd ask! Don't you know what took him to New York when all the village folks are talking about it from morning until night?"

Bessie's face was as white as the shawl she wore, and her fingers toyed nervously with the silken fringe.

"I am entirely ignorant of the business which took my husband to New York."

"Well, it's a pretty pass anyway. I should think he would rather tell you than have anybody else, but as he don't, I can do so for him. He has gone to keep that Julian Rich out of State's Prison?"

"Grandma!"

"It is true, child. He used Squire Goldthwaite's name and presented a check at the bank for ten thousand dollars. Of course the cashier was bound to look into the matter, and your husband was informed. He of course knew nothing about it, and so they arrested the scamp. Up goes our lord, and takes the greatest pains to make himself out a liar, and your Julian an honest man, notwithstanding that he has been presenting checks in his name for small sums and receiving the money for many months, until the squire is many hundreds poorer. If he was an honest man himself he would let the law take its course, and put the young villain where he ought to have been years ago."

"O grandma, you shock me. It hardly seems possible."

"Well, it is the truth, every word of it. Everybody in town has heard of it. If you would read the papers, or stir around like other folks, you would know all about it."

Bessie wound the white shawl around her, and turned her face homeward. She unconsciously took that same woodland path that she had taken a year before, when her life burden had been so heavy, but to-day, the falling of the scarlet-hued leaves, or the sharp crackle of brush beneath her feet, brought no gloomy thought of leaving all behind, and seeing from herself to a new existence.

Nothing but a happy song of thankfulness poured forth from her heart, and only a broad gleam of sunshine seemed to mark the way for her to walk.

"My husband, my true, patient husband!" she repeated, over and over.

Then came long days of waiting at Goldthwaite House, waiting for his return, that she might ask forgiveness for the hours of pain, and tell him how truly had the old love gone out.

The anniversary of her wedding night found her still alone, but with letters from him, and finding a long, cold evening before her, she went to the library and began a letter.

Her thoughts were anywhere but at her command, and finally in despair she threw aside her pen and looked elsewhere for amusement. An old drawer, which her husband had allotted to her use, was sadly out of order, being half filled with scraps of paper—and so with busy fingers she began to arrange it. There were old documents, bill-heads, envelops and torn letters, and one after another was carefully torn to bits, and deposited in the waste basket beside her.

Suddenly an old letter, yellow and crumpled, was in her hands and the destructive fingers almost upon it, when a familiar name—"James"—met her eye and she turned it over. Half of it was gone, but on the remaining sheet she read:

"The prompt appearance of Mrs. James, on the day I mentioned, bringing not only the interest, but sufficient to clear the debt, astonished me, but of course it was not my place to ask from whence the money came. Had I dreamed that it came from the purse of my son, I should have hesitated, yes—refused to have taken it. But it is over. If you saw fit to pay the bill, I have nothing to say, only that I congratulate you upon your release from the family. Let me say, however, that three thousand dollars is no small sum to throw away. You may need it before you die. When this unhappy affair is quieted, we shall be ready to welcome you home.

"Your father, JOHN GOLDTHWAITE."

"O my husband!" And Bessie's brown head lay upon the desk, and sobs loud and deep broke the silence of the room.

"My little wife, Bessie," said that dear familiar voice; and a pair of strong arms lifted her from the desk, and she found herself face to face with her husband.

"O Paul! Forgive me, forgive me!"

"For what, little one?"

"For cruelly, willfully forgetting your true noble love and unselfishness. See, I have even read this letter, of your good heart years ago. My poor Paul."

"Never mind, since it is all over."

"And Julian—"

"Is far away from his native land, to begin, with his young wife, life anew. He is bound for Australia. And you and I, Beaste—what of us?"

"Well, we are at Goldthwaite House, and to-night we will begin a new life, which shall, I trust, prove a happier one!"

The rain drops came up with a soft murmur against the windows, and the November wind swept by with a low, faint music, bearing with it the burden that had so long found a resting-place in the hearts of those two, who sat in the firelight, hand in hand, heart to heart.

THE DEATH TEST!

BY WILLIAM H. BUSHNELL.

"It is a foul and a bloody murder, and may God punish the one that did the deed! But may there not be some life remaining? May it not be in my power to rob the grave? It is a dangerous undertaking, and if I am found here I shall most certainly be accused of the crime. Blood upon my hands and clothes, and I have not touched the corpse! Ah! I see how it came. The bushes are stained with it. The body was dragged to this lonely spot. Lonely? Who would ever think of coming here unless he had some foul purpose, save, it might be, a geologist like myself, whom the simple people in this part of the country would call mad. Yes, it would go hard with me, especially as I am a stranger, and though poorly clad, as becomes my present occupation, have a considerable amount of money about my person."

He drew back a few steps from the corpse, upon which he had come suddenly and unexpectedly, and looked around. Without noticing his path he had journeyed to the bottom of a deep ravine before his progress was arrested. High hills rose upon either side, covered with a heavy growth of timber and tangled underbrush. A little stream found its way with great difficulty through the rocks at the bottom, and its waters were never gilded by a single ray of sunshine. Even in the brightest day it was gloomy twilight there, and a more dismal place would have been difficult to find—the very spot for dark deeds, for a murderer's hiding! And there before him, stopping the path, lay a gashed and bloody human body, as if to finish the picture and give gory evidence of its evil character.

His first thought was to pass on. What had he to do with the crimes of another? Why should he mix himself up with that in which he had not the most remote business? His clear head and logical mind foresaw all the difficulties that would arise should he be discovered and charged with the commission of the deed, and the fearful net-work of circumstantial evidence that would surround him, yet he was a man of the most determined firmness as well as a tender heart, and not for the sake of escaping trouble, or even danger, would he suffer a chance to relieve suffering or save life to pass unembraced. So he drew nearer and, bending away the bushes, looked scrutinizingly upon the victim of some fiend's cupidity or revenge.

The corpse was that of a girl who must have been under twenty years, and the face was one of more than common beauty. The oval of the cheeks was perfect, the nose straight, the mouth small and the lips, now parted by agony, were full and arched. The eyes, wide open and glassy, were blue as the depths of the ocean, and curtained by long lashes a shade darker than her glossy brown hair. The figure was tall and delicately proportioned, the feet petite and exquisitely arched, the hands white and slender, denoting good birth and freedom from manual labor. The clothing, now torn and stained, was of fine material, and the discoloration of the neck, ears, fingers and wrists—the piece torn from the bosom of the dress and the pockets turned outwards—told that robbery as well as murder had been committed.

At once deeply interested, the stranger knelt down, brushed back the tangled tresses, gazed sadly upon the sweet, pallid face, and examined both pulse and heart for symptoms of life, hoping against hope that at least a spark might remain. But his intellectual and usually sunny face clouded, and he shook his head in doubt. The marks upon the base of the skull, caused apparently by heavy blows from a sharp stone, seemed sufficient to have produced death alone, but, in addition to them, blood was slowly oozing from, and con-gealing upon several wounds, in one of which a knife was still sticking. His profession had taught him skill as well as coolness, and with extreme tenderness and delicacy he made a still closer examination, and began preparations to staunch the blood and dress the wounds.

"With this knife," he said, giving utterance to his thoughts as he drew out the weapon, "I could even thus kill all my enemies, make myself rich, and I—"

The sentence was never finished. Before it could be, a dozen men, who had been watching and creeping near, sprang out of the bushes and pinioned him beyond the power of resistance. Taken beside the corpse, with the blood-dripping knife in his hand, what could he say in defence? The situation he had foreseen had come upon him, and he stood convicted, in their eyes at least, as a murderer. To appeal to their reason he saw at a glance would be useless; they were not of the class that would look deeper than the surface. His defence must be made at another time and place, and in truth he was thinking more of the corpse of the murdered girl than of his own desperate situation, and drawing himself up proudly he asked that she might be cared for.

"Whatever may be your purpose with me," he said, "at least see if there is not life remaining. Take your hands off and let me see if my skill cannot be of some avail. I am a physician."

Scowling brows and clenched fists were the only answer he received. They paid not the slightest attention to his words, except it might be to grasp him even more firmly than before, and hurry him before a neighboring justice to be examined and exhibited as a monster! It was even a more unpleasant situation than he had anticipated, and the chances were desperately against him, but he retained his coolness and prepared to make the best possible defence.

The evidence was given with the utmost bitterness—honestly given perhaps, but without the slightest leaning towards the side of mercy, and with the morbid desire on the part of the majority to see a man hanged, for such a thing had never happened there! And what could he say to rebut the sworn statements of a dozen witnesses? What were his assertions, against the evidence of their own eyes and his bloody hands and clothes?

But he had the satisfaction, if indeed it could be called by that name, to learn who the supposed victim of his murderous knife was—learn that her name was Ethel Loring—that she was comparatively a stranger, upon a visit to an old uncle who lived near the scene of the tragedy—that she was an orphan, and rich in her own right—that she was known to wear costly jewelry and carry with her a considerable sum of money (all of which was missing), and that she had gone out to take a walk alone and was found as described. These facts, together with his having been detected bending over the body with a knife in his hand, the out-of-the-way place, the provocation for the deed in a pecuniary point of view, the almost certainty of remaining undiscovered, that he was poorly dressed, a stranger, had been seen lurking in out-of-the-way places for several days, and that in his pockets was found about the same sum of money and of the same description as that known to have been in the possession of the murdered girl, were dwelt upon by the prosecuting attorney with remarkable force, and the prisoner saw that it was next to useless to attempt a defence.

To all questions he replied in a simple and truthful manner, stating that his name was Alonzo Martin, his age twenty-five—that he was by profession a physician, unmarried, possessed of some means—that a love of geology had led him thither, and that those who had accused him of loitering in out-of-the-way places would have seen that he was innocently studying the formation of the earth if they had given proper attention to the matter. As for his being the murderer of the girl, he denied it in the most emphatic manner, and explained how he came to be bending over the body with the bloody knife in his hands.

"You will deny next," sneered the attorney, "that you threatened to kill all your enemies in the same manner."

"I believe I did use some thoughtless words to the effect that I could, with such a weapon, kill all my enemies and make myself rich, but none such as you would put into my mouth."

"I heard him distinctly," volunteered a strong, rough-looking man, who was said to have been among the first, if not the first, to discover the murder, who had guided others there, and had been the most willing and strenuous in his testimony against him.

Martin turned his gaze upon, and noticed him more closely than he had done before—caught his eye for a moment, and thought that he shrank back. It might have been mere fancy, but he became more and more convinced that the fellow had some object in getting him convicted, and tried to remember if he had ever been associated with—ever met him before, and given him any cause of enmity. If such was the case it had entirely slipped from memory, and his own position gave him little time for thought, as he was asked to account for the money that had been taken from him being the same in amount and of the same character as that of the murdered girl's.

"It is a case that might happen a thousand times," was the reply; "but permit me to ask if she is indeed dead?"

"You will soon see," growled the stiff-necked justice, "see more than you want to."

"If dead, I have no wish to look upon her again. The horrible sight I have had is fully sufficient, and I have seen enough of death not to be curious in such matters."

"No doubt of it! Murder and robbery is your trade!"

The old uncle of the murdered girl stepped to the side of the justice, and they had a short whispered conversation, but evidently an important one. The purport of it was soon made known.

"Alonso Martin," continued the officer of the law, "as you choose to call yourself, though no one here is fool enough to believe that to be your correct name, you deny all participation in the foul deed that has been done?"

"I do."

"And are willing to prove it by any means within your power?"

"I am."

"Officers, guard him safely and remove him to the next room. We will soon see his guilt clearly proved."

Without the most remote idea of what was going to take place the prisoner permitted himself to be led into another apartment, and saw, to his surprise and horror, the corpse of the girl stretched out upon a table, still as bloody and ghastly as when he first discovered her in the gloomy ravine! It was a sight that at any time would have caused him to shudder, but now it almost unmanned him for an instant, especially as the dress had been cut away so as to expose a wound in the fair, white flesh. His natural emotion was at once taken as an evidence of guilt, and he heard whispered comments to that effect.

The "I told you so" of the man who had before volunteered his testimony, particularly attracted his attention, and from that instant he watched him as closely as possible without being detected, and summoning his courage, he turned to the pompous justice and demanded what was intended by such an unusual proceeding.

"It is the death test!" was the solemn response.

"You will have to explain more fully. I do not understand."

"We believe that the corpse of a murdered person has power to distinguish between the innocent and guilty. Place one hand upon that wound, raise the other to heaven and assert your innocence—if you dare! If you are indeed without guilt all will be well. If not the blood will flow again."

At another time Martin would have laughed outright at the stupid superstition of which he now remembered to have often read. Yet there was something solemn in this calling upon the dead to give evidence for or against the living, and he would willingly have been spared the ordeal, for the most simple accident might cause a drop or two of blood to exude from the unclosed lips of the wound, and then his fate would be sealed indeed.

"If guiltless why do you shrink?" asked the man of law. "It is only the murderer that need fear."

He could hesitate no longer without convicting himself in their eyes, and stepping to the side of the corpse he laid his right hand upon the wound and called God to witness his entire innocence. Then he stepped back so that all could see that no blood had followed.

"God has attested your guiltlessness," said the uncle of the poor girl, "but see, the blood is beginning to flow, and the guilty man must be near. Let each in turn do as this stranger has done."

In the opening of the wound and the oozing of blood Martin saw far other things than did the afflicted old man, but he wisely held his peace, and managed to place his back against the door so that no one could go out, and watched each as they went through the death test. But there were no more crimson drops bubbling forth as a sign of guilt, and as the justice declared that all had gone through the ordeal, a sigh of intense relief burst from many lips.

"Not all," replied Martin. "There is one yet remaining," pointing to the one who had made himself so officious. "That man has kept in the background."

"John Kirkpatrick, is this true?"

"No! It is a lie!" was the hoarse answer.

"It is true," repeated Martin, firmly. "I have kept him under my eye all the time, and I swear that he has not been near the table."

"I have—you all saw me."

But upon reflection no one had seen him, and he was forced forward. Then an entire change was visible. His flushed face grew pale as ashes and his brutish lip trembled. He looked around wildly for a chance of escape—saw there was none, and putting on an air of bravado exclaimed with an oath:

"Well, I can do it again."

With the words he had raised his hand—was extending it—had nearly touched the corpse, when he shrank back with a fearful groan. His eyes had been the first to see that the blood was flowing freely again from the wounds—not one alone, but all!

A strong man at all times he was rendered doubly so now by desperation, and in his tremendous efforts to get away, his coat was torn to shreds and the jewelry and money of which the girl had been robbed fell to the floor, and, raving and cursing, he was carried away to prison.

During this exciting scene Martin had remained unnoticed. When the justice and the uncle of the girl thought of him again they found him with his hand upon her heart, and a smile playing upon his mobile lips.

"What is it?" they asked, in a breath.

"She is not dead! Show me where I can place her upon her bed, and summon some women. She is not dead—only stunned." And he lifted her in his strong arms and carried her to another apartment.

It was weeks before Ethel Loring was sufficiently recovered to appear in court. Then her evidence was conclusive. She instantly recognized the prisoner, and the simple manner in which she told the story of assault, robbery and attempted murder added much to its force. Without leaving the box the jury found him guilty, and he was sentenced to serve a long time in prison—a sentence cut short by death.

The trial over, the uncle of the girl called Martin aside and asked the bill for his professional services.

"It is a very large one," was the half-serious and half-quizzical reply.

"No matter, I will pay it. Will give you anything you demand."

"Here, then, is my charge," he replied, taking the hand of the blushing girl. "I came here to study geology, but never anticipated finding such a rare specimen."

O ROSE! O LIFE!

BY CLIO STANLEY.

O tender, budding Rose!

Whose leaf so brightly glows!

Truly, thou art called aright—the garden queen!

Yet, ere the twilight hues

Darken the diamond dew,

Thy rosy leaves shall wither in their nest of green!

O life! serene and fair,

Knowing no mortal care!

Scarce opening from the bud thine infant soul!

Yet, as the blossom sweet

Faded, when incomplete,

So life, dear life, too soon will break the golden bowl!

Yet, ah, the vacant air!

Fragrant, beyond compare,

Since my pure Rose drooped on its slender stem;

And life of mine, undone,

Ere yet thy love was won,

Thou, too, shalt bloom again in heaven's diadem!

ACCURSED. •

BY FENNO HAYES.

In all the world there has been, not one person only whom I loved, but one person only whom I did not hate. Mustn't I have a pleasant life to look back upon, here on my dying bed? Yes, turn your face away—doubtless my expression is not now my best, and even that is not so agreeable as it might be, you know. God made me something near a monster in face and form, and I and the rest of the world have made my heart quite match it.

Even a baby likes cuddling and kissing, and I wasn't much more when I began to notice that I got none, and missed it, and wondered why. The beautiful ladies who came to visit my mother took my sister on their silken laps, but never me; the servants petted and caressed her, while I stood by unnoticed; even my mother averted her eyes from the child she had borne.

My heart must once have been soft and warm, or these things wouldn't have hurt me, and I can just remember that they did, at first; and one day, o'erburdened with my questionings, I asked of Jane, the nursery maid, why all the kisses were Mona's. It must have been my customary evil genius that led me to ask this girl, who of all who liked me little seemed to like me least.

She did not answer a word, she only smiled, a curious, cruel smile that I remember to this day, and reaching her hand to a peg upon the wall, took down a small mirror that hung there, and held it before my face. Just then Mona came dancing up and looked over my shoulder, so that I saw reflected beside my own dark, ugly, shapeless visage the face lily white and sweet of my beautiful sister.

"Who made me?" I cried. "Did I make myself?"

"Lawk, no!" said the girl. "What a question! God made you, of course. A poor job, too," she added, a little under her breath; but I heard, heard with these terrible sharp ears of mine, as I always have heard any hard, and bitter, and cruel words that anybody had to say of me—and they've not been so few either.

The iron entered deep into my childish soul. I dashed the mirror to atoms upon the floor, and fled, as if I could flee away from myself, down the stairs and out into the garden, where I hid in a tangle of shrubbery. And behind me rung the harsh, mocking laugh of Jane, mingled with the little silvery tinkle of Mona's childish laughter.

Well, that was long ago, and I've agonies enough of the present, not to need to remember those past, for a mortification of the spirit. I only speak of this to fix a date—the date at which I found out that every one's heart was against me, and from which my heart was against every one's.

Be sure after that day I never put up my lips for a kiss, or sought any one's eye for a smile. I lived my strange, dark childhood apart and alone, sitting forever in my own gloomy shadow, hating all—myself most; for I, to whom beauty was the antipodes, loved it with a strength that was fairly a passion, and bore my ugly face and misshapen form with loathing unutterable.

I had one solace only. I, the accursed or God, as I deemed myself, had yet one gift—"a voice and talent for music that might have made my fortune," people said, "if I were not so frightfully ugly—a thousand pities they were not Mona's." A thousand pities that these could not be taken from me, me who had stark nothing, and given to Mona, who had beauty, love, everything, almost! O, how I hated them and her; yet even I never heard my voice rise sweet as an angel's without a bitter thought of my twisted mouth, my sallow throat, and when the music flowed as if my soul—no, not my soul, but some lovely celestial soul—breathed through my fingers, I shut my eyes that I might not see my dark, ill-shapen hands. So even this sweet was not without its bitter.

So the time went, the slow, dragging, painful years, till I who had never been a child in aught but years, was a woman.

One day I sat before the piano, which I had placed in a little, dark, curtained alcove off the parlor, for you may be sure I didn't want the light falling on my face as I played, when I heard Mona enter the outer room in company with some one, a gentleman, I knew by the strong, firm step.

"So you are as music-mad as ever, Gray?" she was saying, laughingly, as they came in.

I, behind the dropped curtains, roused from my listless musings, as the word "music" fell on my ear.

"Yes," answered a voice, light and gay, yet with a little, pathetic undertone of sweet sadness in it, just such as often underlies the gayest snatch of song, "I shall always be music-mad, as you call it. It's the oddest thing, too, Mona, I can't separate the art from the artist. There's a man I fairly detest at other times, but when he plays I love him absolutely."

"You'll fall in love with Agatha, then, Gray. She plays magnificently and sings divinely. If you were only blind—" And Mona laughed immoderately, as if the idea were too supremely and overwhelmingly ridiculous.

"Little danger," said her companion, "even if—well, no matter now, Mona. But if I'm music-mad, I'm beauty-bewitched."

Mother came in just then, and the conversation took another turn, but I heard nothing more. I only sat before the dumb keys, thinking, with a wild, vengeful thrill, of what this man had said—"I cannot separate the artist from the art." This must be Gray Arland, Mona's almost lover. What if it might be a possibility, that at which my fair sister had so sneered? Not that I dreamed of his really becoming my lover, but if I could only gain a little power over him through my music, it would so trouble Mona, who was of so jealous a nature, Mona whom I so hated.

And I sat there thinking, thinking, till the late afternoon faded into dusk, and they went away to tea (no danger that they would miss me at the table), and the lamps were lit in the parlor without.

The light, filtering in through the curtains, made a soft dusk in my retreat, and just as I heard footsteps at the further end of the hall I commenced to play. I broke off suddenly when they entered, as if just conscious of their approach.

"O, where was that lovely music?" exclaimed Gray Arland, with the eager impetuosity of a child.

"It must have been Agatha, in the alcove," said my mother. "Agatha, are you there yet?"

"Yes," I answered, not unmindful of the silver sweetness with which the syllable fell from my lips, for my voice possessed the rare power of being as peculiarly sweet in conversation as in song.

"O, then, pray keep on playing," said Gray Arland. "That lovely, lovely strain;" and he began humming the air in a light, sweet tenor, till he came to the broken strain, and then I took it from his lips to my fingers.

Heavens! how I played that night! It was an inspiration. How I sung, my voice soaring as if to the very gates of heaven. He was beside me, for I had not played a dozen bars before the curtains were lifted and he at my side. We did not speak a dozen words. I played and sang as my fancy led me; only when I paused he besought me for more, in tones strangely pleading. Sometimes, in soft, low passages, I heard his breathing, quick and hurried, and it touched and thrilled me. And in the outer room Mona sat, alone, neglected and forgotten. When had I ever tasted sweet like this?

At last I stopped. "No more, no more," I said, finally.

He caught both my hands in his. "Thank you!" was all he said, but there was a warm fervor in his tone that stirred my numb, frozen heart strangely.

I would not go out into the lighted room to shock him with the fearful contrast of singer and song. I sat with my head leaned upon the piano till far into the night, trembling with the rare excitement of the evening, thrilling again at the memory of that passionate clasp of my hands, triumphant, as I thought of neglected Mona; yet never before so bitterly conscious of myself, never before so loathing my person, for that one pressure of the hands had taught me the unutterable sweetness of that which was banned to me forever. It was as if the gates of paradise had swung open for a moment, just to reveal to me the heaven which should never be mine, for I never dreamed at first of aught beyond costing Mona a few jealous pangs.

But in the morning I looked from my window and saw Gray Arland for the first time. He was just below, mounted on a large, powerful black horse, waiting for Mona to accompany him.

I have said I loved beauty, but never before had I seen it embodied in a human form without hating its possessor. But this man and I stood, from the beginning, on a different plane from any on which I had ever before stood with any one. He had of me (for you must remember he had not seen me—he had only heard me) only a pleasant impression, and he had conveyed to me only the same. This was contrary to the first impression people usually made upon me—it is not so pleasant to see people shrink away from you, avert their eyes—or if one looked again, to feel that the second look was but an offence, instead of the compliment it usually is to a young girl.

He was beautiful, exquisitely beautiful, this Gray Arland. You don't like the word for a man, I dare say, but there's no other for that face, every feature of which was perfect in shape and tint. His complexion was that dusky white, if I may so call it, which is charm enough in itself for one face, that peculiar tint of skin that gives the face an effect as if seen by moonlight, as much beyond the blonde whiteness as depth is beyond surface, his hair dark and fine and a little waved about the forehead, the nose straight, with thin, sensitive nostrils, and the eyes a rich, velvety black—no sparkle, but soft and sad even when the perfect mouth smiled. His figure was slender, but straight and lithe.

As I looked upon this man I burst into wild weeping, the first time I had wept for many a year; for as I looked upon him I felt that I had within me the heart of a woman, and yet, and yet! It is sad to have our dreams broken, our idols shattered, our hearts blighted, but to be a woman, young, and with a woman's heart, and know that for you love is so impossible a thing you may not even dream of it, is sadder than broken dream, or shattered idol, or blighted heart.

Then Mona came, the sunbeams finding kin in her hair, her red lips smiling and sweet. There wasn't a tear in my eye. I only remembered how I hated her, how I hated myself, how I hated everybody, as they rode away together. But at nightfall some nameless influence led me to the piano again, and again he was at my side.

I did not sing at first. I played only Mendelssohn's music mostly, mingled with some improvised. There was, as before, only the dim light from the room beyond through the half-dropped curtains. I needed no score, for anything I had once played I could recall forever. The moments grew to hours as I played. "Good-night—I am going," called Mona, at length, from without, and I detected a troubled wonder in her tone.

"Good-night!" returned Arland, dreamily.

I rose as if to go.

"No, no! not yet," he exclaimed, catching my hand. "You haven't sung. Sing to me! sing to me!"

I had once found in a collection of old music some strange, wild love songs, despairingly sweet, and had learned them, but never sung them to any ear but my own. They came back to me at this moment and I sang them to Arland.

The songs were sad as death, the utterance of forbidden, hopeless passion, and my mood interpreted them perfectly. I knew he trembled as I sang—I think he even wept. There was one which I left for the last—a song which was the cry of a lost soul for its mate.

The song had scarcely died on my lips when he seized my hands and drew me to my feet. "Be comforted, be comforted, poor soul," he said, rapidly and fervidly; "one could almost follow such sweet strains into Hades." And he bent and kissed me—ME!

O heavens! how my soul reeled. Think of what you felt when first he you loved kissed you, you who had had other loves, other kisses before, even though none half so sweet, and think what it would have been had your lips never known before a kiss, had a ray of love or pity never shone upon your heart before.

I forgot, in that ecstatic moment, myself, and then it came back to me—that accursed face of mine, which he had never seen, and I bade him go, almost fiercely. And as he went I smote my breast in agony, I tore at my heart as if I could snatch away its pain, I grovelled upon the floor, hiding my face, and thinking if I could but hide it forever.

Then I rose, and opening the window, looked out upon the night. "O kindly darkness! O sweet, veiling night!" I said. "If you would never go! If the day's cruel light would never break!" And leaning far out into the odorous night I lived it o'er and o'er again, that thrilling kiss, that melting tone, till the gray light of early morn woke me from my delirious dreams, and drove me to my hiding-place, my own room.

Well, the days went, full of torturing consciousness, of misery, of passionate hatred, as I saw him, peeping from my window, walking, riding, with Mona, "beauty bewitched," and the nights came, delicious and heavenly, dusk, as I played or sung, while he sat at my side entranced, "music-mad." "Whom the gods wish to destroy they first make mad," you know, and I loved this man, who had never seen me and to whom I was only the embodiment of an art. I say Gray Arland had never seen me, for I hid all the day and he never found me except at night at the piano. A mortal fear possessed me of the hour when he should look on me. O, if it might never be, and I yet be near him!

I had solaced and whiled away the solitude of my childhood by the secret perusal of the wildest and most improbable romances. I knew nothing of real life; and some wild dream now came to me of a life with him, never seen, when I might hide away from the day, and singing to him in the evening's friendly dusk bind him thus to me forever. O, I was mad, verily, for I believed, at last, as he came more and more under my spell, that if it were not for the counter charm of Mona's beautiful face, he might in some way be mine. And my thoughts began to run—no matter, you will see whither.

One evening they were going out together, Mona and Arland, to some gay merrymaking, and Mona came to my room, beautifully dressed and radiantly fair, for me to fasten a rose in her curls, for I had an exquisite, mocking taste in things like this.

She stood before the mirror as I placed the rose in her hair, and as once before, long ago, the two faces—hers fair and sweet and mine distorted as if in an eternal pain—were reflected in it.

Of how much one may think in a moment. As my eyes met the mocking reflection in the mirror, I thought of him, looking upon her loveliness, lured away from me who loved him in my lightest thought worlds better than she in her fondest mood. I remembered her taunting laugh on that long-past day. I thought of what had been hers always, mine never, and then again I thought of him.

At that moment she raised her hand to her head to adjust a wayward curl. From her arm fell back the loose, flowing sleeve of her gossamer robe. There were two lights upon the dressing-table, one on each side. She began to move her arm downward from her head.

Satan is always within call. "Mona," I said, "take care—the lamp!" And I bent forward as if to save her.

It needed but a touch of the lamp, and that I gave it all unperceived.

There was a sudden blaze, a shriek, as the flames' swift, fiery tongues licked the fair arms, the bosom of snow, the face of lily and rose of the beautiful Mona.

I had wonderful presence of mind. I wrapped her in the woollen rug I took from the floor just in time to save her life, but all too late to spare her beauty! The snow, and lilies, and roses were stained and blackened forever.

Late that night, when all the house slept, save in her distant room Mona maybe tossed in pain, I stole down, and through the night air floated muffled but triumphant strains, joyous choruses, gay, rejoicing snatches, and all the while I thought of that wild dream of mine. Why might it not now come true? She could never more bewitch him with her beauty—that was gone forever—but I had still these enchantment-working fingers, this spelling voice. He has made me no vow—there is no honor to bind him, I recalled a thousand times in my transporting thoughts.

The next evening I heard Arland come in and go up to Mona's room, where he was admitted. After a little, he came down and joined me, sitting at my old place at the piano, on which I had laid my head as if sad and sorry.

"Sing," he said, sighing a little, "something soft and mournful. You could not sing anything else to-night, Agathia?" And there were tears in his voice. For her, I thought, bitterly. But why think of the past, when—

I laid my fingers on the keys, but there was not a bar of music in all the thousands that I had carried in my mind for years that I could remember. My fingers lay still and motionless upon the keys. The thought of a song came to me, and I opened my lips, but there was no sound. My voice was gone, suddenly, and utterly, and forever. You call it the judgment of God. I choose rather to term it the desertion of the devil.

Wild with despair I fled to the room without. Dizzy and blind I fumbled at the hall door, and this delayed me, and Gray Arland, following after, wondering and alarmed, saw for the first time my distorted face, still more distorted with my agony, full in the light of that brilliantly-lighted room.

I have never seen him since. That was months ago. He and Mona are to be married in a few weeks, and I shall be hid forever in the grave.

Mona is pretty, yet, for all her seams and scars. But do you think I love him less because I've found out that he fell on his knees by her bedside that first night he saw her and kissed her wounded hands, her blighted face? I know he never loved, or thought of loving me, but I feel sure if I had met his eyes that night I should have seen, for the first time in any human being's eyes, a pity rather than a horror for me.

Let me at least believe this. Let me, going down to my grave, feel that there is one person in the world that I do not hate. And when I am dead, close the coffin-lid close and tight above this face of mine, and lead him to my side, and tell him that I ask him to remember there, for a little moment, the songs I sang him.

I almost dare to think a tear will fall upon my coffin.

CAPTAIN BURRILL'S COURTSHIP.

BY FRANK H. ANGIER.

ONE cold, wet morning in November, 1855, Captain John Burrill, master of the fast-sailing clipper ship Dreadnought, left his vessel at her pier on South street, at the port of New York, and started for his lodgings in the upper part of the city. Although the rain was descending heavily, the captain, who had a contemptuous disdain for umbrellas, wrapped his greatcoat tightly about him, and as he trudged bravely forward over the glistening pavements, plunged his hands deep into his wide pockets and lost himself at once in profound meditation. It was not unnatural that, among the many busy thoughts which lingered in his contemplative brain, those of his ladylove should occupy, just at that time, a prominent place, somewhat to the exclusion of moral reflections and business schemes. For Captain Burrill was in love, and surely was scarcely to be blamed if his mind, during most of his leisure moments, did chiefly run upon the stately beauty whom he had asked to become his wife, and who had graciously accepted his hand and fortune, and promised to marry him within the month. Captain John, remembering his early days as cook's scullion, and his subsequent success, achieved by unremitting exertion and his own merit, could hardly help wondering how it came about that from the foot of the ladder he should so soon find himself at the top, and how fifteen short years could so metamorphose him from a pitiful mixer of "lob-scouse" to a captain of a ship and possessor of an independent fortune. To be sure, the latter had fallen upon him like a golden thunderbolt, launched by a distant relative who had taken a whim to leave him most of her money, and now that the captain came to think the matter over, he began to wonder whether, had it not been for the latter streak of luck, Jacob Marshall's daughter would have accepted him. It did not seem to him that she cared for him in the way he had seen some sailors' sweethearts care for their beaux, but then she was proud and aristocratic, and Captain John, being a seafaring man, concluded that, as he knew so little of such things, he had best trouble himself about them as little as possible.

"She's a grand young woman," thought he, "and I'm thirty-five—too old to expect her to play sweet on me much. I suppose it's all right. She's a handsome girl and better suited to me than a younger one would be."

Since the arrival of the vessel he had made the Marshall mansion his home, and had thus been able to pay his attentions at short range. He had done this at the earnest invitation of old Jacob Marshall himself, who owned the ship, and who had been particularly polite to Captain John since the latter found his pockets so unexpectedly full of money. Thrown thus into the constant company of a beautiful woman, the captain, to whom, through all his life, a woman had been a rara avis, fell immediately and irrecoverably in love. The result was an engagement, though whether Marion Marshall cared most for his heart or his pocket, the captain found himself in considerable doubt. And so the wedding day had been fixed, and Captain John had begun to debate in his mind whether he could find it in his heart to give up his ship and see her sail out of port in command of another master, or whether he could not persuade Marion Marshall to marry him, ship and all.

Thinking deeply of these things, he took his way steadily toward Peck Slip, with his eyes fastened upon the shining sidewalk and his chin buried in the great collar of his coat. There were few people in the streets, for the hour was nearly eleven and the rain came down in a continuous drizzle. Therefore it was with no little surprise that the captain felt the wet edge of a woman's shawl flirted into his face by the wind as its owner brushed swiftly past him.

"Some Water street girl," he thought, glancing toward her; "a hard life, poor thing."

The woman flitted quickly by, but when beneath the glare of the next street lamp, she turned her head and looked hurriedly behind her.

"Blast my toplights!" said Captain Burrill to himself, as he caught sight of her sad, white features; "that girl never came from Water street. Where is she bearing now?"

The woman, or rather the girl, for her lithe, supple movements denied the possibility of her being more than eighteen or twenty at most, paused a moment under the lamp and then darted suddenly across the street toward the shipping.

"Something wrong there," muttered the captain to himself, stopping to look after her as she disappeared among the shadows on the opposite side of the way. "Now I shouldn't wonder—"

He left his sentence unfinished, and regardless of the danger from river thieves and the night prowlers who haunt the dark corners among the wharves, crossed the street, also. He groped his way out on a long pier extending into the river between two huge vessels which cast their black shadows over it, and then paused for a moment to listen. There was nothing to be heard but the steady patter of the rain and the washing of the river under the piles, and so he walked softly on again toward the end of the pier. As he neared the extremity of the wharf, however, he heard a light step close by his side, and caught sight, of a woman's figure standing upon the string-piece, the dark outline of her form revealed against the lighter sky above the river. Stealing nearer to her, he saw that she had removed her shawl and had stepped back as though about to cast herself into the water. With a sudden exclamation he seized her quickly by the arm.

"For Heaven's sake, what are you about?"

She made him no answer, but sank down trembling at his feet.

"Were you going to jump to your death?" he asked, raising her gently.

"O sir, let me go," she said, plaintively. "What I do can be nothing to you. Let me go."

"What you do is a good deal to me, when you try such things as this," he replied.

"Where do you live?"

"Nowhere."

"Have you no friends?"

"Friends!"

She clasped her hands and looked down at the black water, dashing in sad, continuous surges against the wharf.

"No—no friends."

"I see," said the captain, picking up her shawl and wrapping it about her, "the old story. Well, I will be a friend to you, my poor girl, if you will give up your idea of going to Davy Jones's locker just at present. We can't stand here in this rain, talking about it. Come with me."

"O," she cried, passionately, "you don't know what I am. You are a good man I am sure, and you would never touch me, you would never speak to me, if you knew what my life has been."

"I don't care what you are," said the captain, decidedly. "I know you're a fellow-creature without a shelter, and I'm going to find a dryer lodging for you than the one you proposed engaging. Now put your hand on my arm and come with me."

She obeyed him passively, and without a word followed him down the wharf and out into the street. As they reached the street lamp again, Captain John stopped to look at his companion more closely, and could not help giving utterance to an exclamation of surprise when he found what manner of woman it was who leaned upon his arm.

It was no plebeian face that turned toward him as he did so. A pale, delicate complexion, with features finely cast, and a pair of wide, soft hazel eyes, deep and lustrous as those of a fawn, were what Captain Burrill saw, as he turned back the girl's hood to look at her. She was young, not more than twenty, and her brown hair, loose and wet with the drizzling rain, encircled with a shining halo a face that, though livid with mental suffering, was beautiful even now.

"There's more of a story here than I thought," he muttered, taking the girl's arm again and moving on. "I shouldn't be surprised, Jack Burrill, if you had put your foot into somebody else's history to-night, too."

He led her quickly around several corners, and finally stopped before a building at the lower end of Frankfort street and knocked upon the door.

"I have a friend here," he said, to the trembling creature at his side. "He was once an old shipmate of mine, and if he wont be kind to you, nobody will."

In a few moments there was heard the approach of heavy footsteps, rambling rather discursively towards the door, and directly the bolt was drawn back and a rough-featured individual, with a beaming red nose, presented himself for Captain Burrill's inspection.

"Well, Saddler, how are you?" exclaimed the captain.

"Tol'able, thank ye. What fetches you down here in this weather?"

"I want a lodging for this young woman, Saddler. She's had a notion of bunkin' in the East River, and I told her I could find her a better place. Don't stand there looking at us. Let us in and fix up a room and a fire."

"All right," quoth Saddler, slowly revolving a quid of tobacco in his cheek, "all right. The best in the house belongs to Jack Burrill and Jack Burrill's friends. Walk in."

He swung the door open and led the way to a little, dingy parlor at the end of the hall, and then without another word disappeared up stairs, leaving the captain and his charge alone.

"Now," said the captain, "my girl, I want you to promise me two things. I shan't ask you for your history, or for the reasons which led you to this attempt upon your life, unless you choose to tell me. I am going to provide you with a comfortable night's lodging, and to-morrow we will see what ought to be done hereafter. In the meantime you will be well taken care of here, but you must give me your word that you will try no more to destroy yourself, and that you will not venture away from Tom Saddler's house until I see you again to-morrow night. Will you promise me that?"

The girl looked at him with her wide, brown eyes for a moment, and then, burying her face in her hands, burst into tears.

"I will promise you anything," she said. "I know that you, at least, are my friend. If you knew what I have suffered, you would know that I am too happy to find any place of refuge, to leave it against your will."

"Well," said the captain, "whatever you are, or whatever you have done, you are safe here until to-morrow, at all events. Here comes Saddler again, and he will tell you what he will do with you."

The rubicund visage of the individual referred to appeared at the head of the stairs and beckoned to the visitors to ascend, but the captain, shouting that it was so late that he couldn't stop, and admonishing Tom to take care of the girl, took leave of his protegee and passed out into the street.

With his hands in his great pockets once more, Captain Burrill, as he wended his way homeward, cogitated more deeply than ever. At first, he conceived the intention of relating the whole of his singular adventure to Marion on the following morning. Then the thought crossed his mind that it would be well to ascertain something of the character of his charge before he made known any details of the affair, and this, with the condition that the girl had evidently desired to keep her story a secret, brought him to the determination to say nothing at present about the matter. So he dismissed the occurrence from his thoughts, and, reaching the Marshall mansion near midnight, found his room without disturbing the family, and retired to his accustomed couch of feathers and down in a most tranquil and undisturbed frame of mind.

The next day was a long one to Captain Burrill. His interest in his acquaintance of the previous evening and his curiosity to know her story, whatever it might be, effectually occupied his mind to the exclusion of all else. The magnetism of her eyes had taken possession of him, and he awaited the end of his day's business with all the impatience of a schoolboy. At last the evening closed in upon the city, and, making his excuses to Marion, he left the house and hastened again to the tenement in Frankfort street.

"What word, Tom?" he inquired, of that semi-nautical personage, as the door swung open to give him entrance.

"Well, nothin' special," replied Saddler. "The gal's doin' pooty well. She aint no ordinary customer, she aint. There's been some trouble there, and it's my private opinion she's been used to good clothes and havin' things nice."

"Has she been out?"

"No. She had a good cryin' spell after you went away last night, but I made up a good fire for her in the best room and my old woman lent her some dry clothes to put on, and to-day she's been pooty cheerful."

Pleased with this report in brief, the captain passed up stairs and knocked at the door of the room indicated by Saddler as the "best one." It was opened at once by his last night's acquaintance. So marked an improvement was there in her appearance that Captain John retired a step in some surprise. She had employed the day in drying and ironing her wet dress, and this was neat and clean. Her hair, gathered up into a light, braided coil, was bound in place by a bright ribbon which set off her white, delicate complexion to fine advantage. A snowy apron, loaned by Saddler's "old woman," completed her plain attire, but although the garb was simplicity itself, the real beauty of her face and form rendered it almost queenly. At least, Captain Burrill, as he took her hand, could not deny that she looked uncommonly well, and as the plaintive, soft brown eyes looked timidly up to meet his own, a vague feeling came over him that there was in this girl an indefinable something worth having, which Marion Marshall did not possess.

"I am glad you have kept your promise," he said.

"O sir, that was a small return to make for your goodness. You have shown me more kindness than I have had done me for a long time. How can I ever thank you?"

"Sit down," said the captain, "and let us talk about it. What is your name?"

"They call me Mary Marsh," she said, taking a seat on the opposite side of the fire from him, "but I will not deceive you into believing that to be my real name. It is not."

"Never mind the real name," he said. "Any name will do. I don't ask you to confide in me entirely, but if you will tell me something of what your life has been, I shall be better able, perhaps, to help you. And let what you do tell me be the truth."

She bridled somewhat at this, and revealed a little of what might have been the half-conquered pride of a better period of her life.

"Do I look like one who would tell you an untruth?" she said.

The captain looked into the frank, brown eyes which were opened upon him to their widest extent, and then replied:

"No. I do not think you do. Forgive me if I have hurt you. There is something strange about you that I do not understand. What led you to attempt your own destruction?"

She rose from her chair and her face flushed with excitement.

"What led me? Tell me whether you would not have taken the same course. Suppose that you had been, like me, a woman. Suppose that you had been reared, as I have been, in a happy and luxurious home, the spoiled pet of doting parents, the willful, capricious child whose will was law—who had but to ask in order to receive whatever you most desired. Suppose that when you were budding into early womanhood, with all your sensitive nature as yet unguarded by the hard folds which contact with the world learns you to use at last, with all your generous, impulsive heart open to receive impressions, whether for good or evil—suppose, I say, that at this most critical juncture of your being, there came across your life one to whom all your affections opened as a flower opens to the sunlight—one who threw around you a lustrous and magnetic halo, within which magic circle you learned to find your supreme and crowning happiness. Suppose you gave your life, your heart, your very soul to this man, and he cruelly betrayed the trust. What would you do then?"

The captain was silent. The excitement of her manner and the vehemence of her passionate words had heightened the flush upon her cheeks, until she appeared to him royally, divinely beautiful. Standing gracefully by the chair from which she had unconsciously risen, her soft eyes grown hard and sparkling with unnatural fire, she looked at him steadily as she continued:

"Suppose that another woman—your sister, whose comforting ministrations should have soothed and healed the heartless, cruel wound which his hand had given you—had loved this man in secret. Suppose she exulted in your disgrace, rejoiced in your fearful fall. Suppose, when the worst came, she cast you out from all claim upon her sisterly love and reviled you in terms selected for the refinement of their cruelty, and when, at last, broken-hearted and bowed down with grief and shame, you fled from the house which was a home no more, her jealous hatred followed you until you could find no resting-place for your poor, weary, aching head, except among the haunts of the low and vile, where you found at least some sympathy from the lost creatures who had half forgotten memories of similar sorrow. Tell me, had these things happened to you, would you have borne them with more courage than I?"

"Is that your history?" asked the captain, after a moment's silence.

"It is only a part of it," she replied. "The worst blow of all came to me last night. Throughout the whole, I had loved the man who destroyed me. He had deserted me, left me heartlessly to meet the discovery of my shame alone, but, though he sailed for distant lands and I knew he would never come back to me, still every chord of my nature clung to him with a despairing devotion such as a woman whose heart has been robbed of all its dearest ties and racked with a hopeless misery, alone can feel. Last night I heard that he was dead. She had known it long ago, but the news came to me with the crushing force of a death-blow. What was left for me then, but the dark and glistening river, that would take me upon its soft and yielding bosom and bear me gently away to my death?"

She sank into her seat again and leaned her head wearily against the mantel. Captain John, half-frightened at her passionate eloquence, gazed wonderingly at her for several moments before he ventured to speak.

"And your life since leaving your home?" he said, at last.

"O, ask me not about that," she said, bitterly. "My life since then has been no credit to me. What could I do towards preserving whatever of womanly purity I still possessed, among the wretched beings in whose society my hard fate had thrown me? Judge me not too harshly. I tried to save myself, and I failed miserably. At least I must have earned my daily bread."

"Poor child!" murmured the captain, softly, as if to himself.

She started at the words and, rising from her seat, came to his chair and dropped upon her knees at his feet.

"O sir," she cried, "I know that you are my friend. Save me from a fate that I cannot escape alone. Take me away from this life that my sin has brought upon me, and give me one chance to become more worthy of your goodness to me. I can work, if you will help me find employment. I will do anything to deserve your confidence in me, and to regain any part of what I have lost. Help me."

She bowed her head upon his knee and, bursting into tears, sobbed as though her heart would break; and Captain John Burrill, with tears in his own honest eyes, passed his great, rough, kindly hand backwards and forwards soothingly over the soft, brown hair, and gently whispered to her words of comfort. Then, bidding her bring a cricket and sit by his side, he took her hand tenderly in his own, and tried to lead her thoughts away from her past life and direct them towards the brighter and more hopeful future. And as she became more quiet and the peaceful influence of the flickering firelight enwrapped them both, he ceased to speak, lest he should disturb the reverie into which she had fallen, and, heedless of the flight of time, they sat thus before the glowing coals, while between them a human sympathy was cementing a mute, invisible bond which future events were destined to bind more closely about them both. And thus they were still sitting when the shining figure-head of Tom Saddler inserted itself at the door to inquire as to the necessity for more coal upon the fire. Then Captain Burrill, warned of the lateness of the hour, and somewhat abashed at being discovered thus by his nautical friend, quietly rose to take his leave.

"You shall have the chance to redeem yourself, Mary," he said, taking her hand. "I will do what I can to find work for you, and for the present you can give me no better proof of your gratitude and sincerity, than by making this your home and accepting and enjoying whatever poor little arrangements I may be able to make for your comfort."

And now, next to getting married, providing a means of rescue for Mary Marsh became the chief concern of Captain Burrill's daily life. Between the house in Frankfort street, his ship and the company of Marion Marshall, he divided his time pretty equally. The more he thought the matter over, the more strongly he became convinced that there was no necessity for mentioning his interest in the girl to his intended wife. A false construction might be placed upon his relation of the affair. His frequent visits might be viewed uncharitably, and on the whole he was not sure that Marion would sympathize with his feelings in the matter. She was a proud girl, and disposed in general to restrain these little benevolent descents from dignity on the captain's part. Therefore, from fear lest his course might offend, Captain Burrill resolved for the present to keep his secret to himself.

With Saddler's help, he found, after a search of several days, a manufacturer of cravats, who agreed to take her into his workshop at a small compensation, and although the captain knew that she was capable of better things than this, she was so anxious to be doing something, however little, that he consented to her taking the place until a better could be found. As she realized her security in this new position and began to feel that the old life was really left behind, she began also to appreciably improve in spirits and appearance. Numberless little contrivances of taste in dress, forgotten and uncared for during the dark days of her former wretchedness, began to offer themselves to the captain's notice on his visits, and it was with much satisfaction that he saw the bloom on her cheek gain brightness and permanency as the days went by. She seemed to regard his frequent visits as the chief pleasure of her life. As he ascended the dark stairs, he would almost always find her at the top of them, waiting for him expectantly. On those evenings, poor Mary Marsh would endeavor to appear at her best. But Captain Burrill never knew that her toilet on those occasions occupied half an hour longer than usual. He never knew how frequently before his arrival she had cautiously opened the door and listened for his step. He never saw the brown eyes fastened upon him, as the eyes of men sometimes fasten upon the women they love, and following him in his every movement about the room. He only knew at these times that somehow his hat would be whisked out of his hand, his overcoat removed from his shoulders, the best chair in the room wheeled up for him before the fire, and Mary seated in her old place opposite, almost before he had crossed the threshold.

It seemed somewhat strange to the captain, as he came to know Mary Marsh better, that he should so often find himself comparing her with Marion. There were no physical points of resemblance between them. Mary was light complexioned, petite in figure, and with little natural dignity beyond what her own hard life-lesson had given her. Marion was dark, of queenly presence and, as the captain himself inelegantly but forcibly expressed it, "proud as Lucifer, by George!" Yet, in spite of these dissimilarities in personal appearance, there was some subtle resemblance between them that obtruded itself upon the notice of even so unobservant a man as Captain John. When he thought of one, the image of the other inevitably floated before him, but whether this was because these two women now absorbed the chief interest of his life, or because there was really an undetected point of likeness between them, the captain, not being skilled in metaphysics, was unable to decide.

One evening—it was winter then—he came to Mary's room with a budget of news for her.

"We are in luck," he said, after he had warned himself by the fire. "I have got a place for you more adapted to your capabilities than a cravat-maker's shop. Look here!"

He took from his pocket a letter, upon which Mary, looking over his shoulder, saw the postmark, "Philadelphia."

"I have received this from a friend residing in Philadelphia," he continued, "who writes to request my services in finding for him a governess for his children, two little girls of six and eight years. He asks me to send him a person of refinement, well educated and not too old to have some sympathies in common with the pupils who will be placed in her charge. For a teacher who will fulfil these requirements he will pay the sum of eight hundred dollars a year, besides receiving her on an equal social footing with the members of his own family. And whom can I recommend, Mary, but you? You have had an excellent education, and in the work of cultivating these little, fresh hearts and intellects you will find the best assistance and grace for your own reformation."

He had expected her to overwhelm him with a profusion of thanks. He looked at least for some outward show of gratitude and enthusiasm. But she stood by his side gazing thoughtfully in the fire, and her cheek had grown white as the ashes beneath the grate.

"Mary," said the captain, reproachfully, "isn't this good news for you? Don't you rejoice at it, as I have done all day before I came here?"

Still she made him no answer, and the captain, a little disappointed, put the letter back in his pocket.

"O Captain Burrill," she said, coming to herself at last, "is there no other way? Must I really go to Philadelphia?"

"Certainly not," replied the captain, in some surprise; "certainly not, if you have any objection, but you will never have another chance like this. Are you in doubt as to your ability? I have no fears of that."

"No," she said, "not that—not that."

"And what then?" asked the captain. "I should suppose you would be willing to make any sacrifice to get away from the scene of your past life. I imagined this city to be odious to you."

She turned away from the fire abruptly and, walking to the window, looked wearily out into the night. The captain, after a moment's hesitating wonder at her strange manner, followed her.

"Mary," he said, "there is some weighty reason why you do not think favorably of this plan. Can you not yet believe me to be your friend? No one can have your interests more at heart than I. Will you tell me what this objection is?"

"O," she cried, burying her face in her hands, "it is because you are so good a friend to me that I cannot tell you. You would hate me, you would despise me, if I should whisper it."

"Can it be worse than what you have already told me?" he asked. "You have related some terrible things about yourself, and yet I have not hated or despised you."

"It is worse—a thousand times worse," she said, "because it betrays a weakness I thought I had conquered long ago. Spare me this, sir, and let me go on in the old way. I am earning very little, but let me stay here."

"You shall stay, if you desire it," said Captain Burrill, knitting his brow; "but you have disappointed me."

"O my God!" she cried, wringing her hands. "You will wrench it from me. Can you not see the truth?"

"No, on my life I can't," replied the captain, bewilderedly.

She turned to him and gently folded her white arms about his neck.

"I love you!" she whispered.

If a thunderbolt had come crashing through the ceiling and buried itself at the captain's feet, or Satan had risen, robed in all his blazing terrors, from the glowing coals in the fireplace, the captain could hardly have been more completely astounded. So great was his amazement that he involuntarily recoiled a step and seized the woman by the wrist. In an instant she tore herself from his grasp and sank down upon the floor, trembling like a leaf.

"I knew it," she cried, swaying herself to and fro in the intensity of her emotion. "Why don't you tell me that you hate me? Why don't you strike me from you in scorn and contempt? But you made me say it. You made me say it."

So bewildered was the captain still, that he remained gazing at her for several moments in a sort of stupefaction, without replying a word. When he came to his senses at last, he gently raised her to her feet and led her to a chair.

"Mary," he said, taking a seat beside her, "you have surprised me more greatly than I can express, but do not believe that I hate you or condemn you. Still let me be your friend—your sincere and faithful friend—as I have been since that dreadful night of long ago. More than that I cannot be, for whatever I may once have been, I am now no longer in possession of my freedom. I can blame no one but myself for this. I should have told you long ago."

And then, as gently as he could, he whispered to her listening ears his own story. He told her of his early life, his subsequent career upon the sea, his success and rapid promotion in his profession. He spoke of his little windfall of fortune, and, lastly, he told her of his approaching marriage, and described to her the virtues of his intended wife. Throughout the whole of the recital his listener sat motionless, her eyes fixed steadily upon the fire and her hands fast clasped in one another. As he ceased his story, she raised her head and asked a simple question.

"Will you tell me the name of your future wife?"

Simple as was the request, Captain Burrill could scarcely bring himself to answer it. Again the resemblance between these two women flashed into his mind, and an indefinite feeling of restraint in speaking of one to the other seemed to place a seal upon his lips. But still did Mary Marsh look into his face inquiringly, and Captain Burrill, unable to withstand the mute appeal of those deep brown eyes, turned towards them and answered her:

"She is the daughter of my employer. Her name is Marion Marshall."

The girl's features contracted as with a spasm of intense physical pain, but the feeling, whatever it was, passed as quickly as it came, and left her as before, gazing dreamily into the coals.

"Do you love her?" she asked, after a moment's silence.

"Yes," said the captain, wondering. "That is, I think so. Why yes, of course I do," and he laughed at his own absurdity.

"Would you die for her?" asked Mary.

The captain looked at her in some perplexity. He had never asked himself such serious questions as these. When he first met Marion Marshall, he had become lost in admiration at her royal beauty, her intelligence and her accomplishments. She was something as far beyond the ideal which had been the aim of his ambition through all his life—a woman so much superior to all his idle dreams of what his future wife should be—that, in the surprise and delight at finding her really in his possession, he had hardly stopped to ask himself whether his feeling was a love springing from the depths of the heart, like the deep-sea swell in mid-ocean, or only a transient emotion, like the breaking of a wave over a shallow bar in a passing gust of wind.

"I don't know," he replied, to Mary's question. "I don't see how I can tell until an opportunity offers. I suppose I would."

"If he loved her truly," thought Mary, "he would know that he would die for her."

Long after the captain had gone that night did Mary Marsh sit gazing wearily into the fire. On parting, he had left the imprint of his lips upon her forehead, and it seemed to her that the kiss was burning there like a coal of fire. Yet in her face was an expression of blank despair—the sorrow of desolation. She was alone again. A desire to leave the spot which had witnessed the extent of her humiliation, and to tear herself loose from the protection of him whose presence her own shame would henceforth render painful to her, took fierce possession of her heart. Once more to cast herself upon the mercies of the world, perhaps to seek even yet a home beneath the dark waters of the river, became her purpose now. Wearily, wearily sighing to think how wretched had been her failure to regain her fair fame once more; wearily pressing her hand to her aching heart to silence its burning throbs, she rose from her seat at last and began to collect her few scanty articles of dress. From place to place about the room she went, thinking, at every turn, of the happy memories with which each nook of the poor apartment was fraught—memories of the pleasant hours which she had passed with him and in listening to his kind words of encouragement and comfort. The things which he had given her she left untouched, and dressing herself in the faded gown and shawl which she had worn on the night of her rescue—a night which came to her recollection now with a distinctness that made her shudder—she sat down once more before the fire with her hood held carelessly in her hand, to dream one more dream of the things that might have been, before she loosed her grasp upon those golden possibilities forever. How long she sat thus she knew not, but the fire had deadened into a purple heap of mouldering ashes, and was sending a single spiral wreath of smoke curling softly up the chimney before she came to herself again. Then with a sudden cry she sprang to her feet and, with one lingering look around the room, passed quickly across the threshold and gently closed the door behind her.

On finding herself in the street, Mary Marsh stood still in momentary indecision. Whither she should go or what she should do was a question that, until now, had scarcely crossed her mind. The snow was coming softly down and already the silent streets were covered with a white and fleecy carpet. A dread of returning to her old haunts, and a lingering desire to breathe a last farewell to him whom she had made the object of her hopeless love, decided her to turn her footsteps northward, and wrapping her thin shawl tightly about her shivering shoulders, she turned her face against the cutting storm and started towards Jacob Marshall's house.

It was a long walk, and nearly an hour had passed before she arrived before the wide portal of the mansion. Although the hour was not far from three o'clock, a light was burning in one of the upper chambers, and rightly conjecturing this to be the captain's room, she looked towards it reverently and softly whispered a prayer for the future welfare of the occupant. Then with a sad farewell upon her lips and a cutting pain at her heart, she turned away to retrace her steps through the freshly-fallen snow.

As she did so, her eyes fell upon the figure of a man, seen indistinctly through the darkness and the blinding storm, emerging from beneath the shadow of a doorway on the opposite side of the street. The man stood for a moment on the sidewalk and gazed cautiously around him, while Mary, with a new feeling in her bosom which caused her to shrink from the possibility of being accosted at that hour of the night, herself withdrew behind a pile of bricks before an unfinished building and waited for him to pass on. As the figure slowly advanced towards the street lamp, however, a peculiarity in his halting gait attracted her attention, and as his face was turned towards her in the glare of the light, she, with a start of surprise, recognized the man as an old acquaintance. As she had hinted to the captain, her life, previous to his discovery of her, had not been especially creditable in its associations. Chief among those with whom she had been thrown in contact during those dark and dreadful days, was a noted thief and burglar, a man whose daring and cunning were only equalled by his ferocity and brutality. Pinky McGuire, hideous in feature and revolting in every aspect of his nature, had still a soft spot in his heart which Mary's beauty had touched, and he had made himself her compulsory companion too often for her not to have become thoroughly acquainted with his appearance. And if Mary Marsh was not greatly mistaken, Pinky McGuire stood before her now, intent, as she could have sworn, upon some mischief of no ordinary magnitude.

The Marshall mansion stood upon a corner, and had connected with it a large garden which extended some distance in the rear of the house, and which was hidden from the view of persons passing through the side street by a high brick wall. With this garden, communication was had by means of a small green gate, used chiefly by the butchers' boys and milkmen, as affording the easiest access to the kitchen. Pinky McGuire, after standing for some moments upon the sidewalk, listening for approaching footsteps, crossed the street and stepped cautiously to this gate. Then, pulling from his pocket a long, brass key, he gave one more furtive look up the street, and, unlocking the barrier, passed into the garden, leaving the gate ajar behind him.

All of these proceedings were perfectly visible to Mary from her place of concealment before the house, and it needed no great discernment upon her part to convince her that Mr. McGuire intended nothing less than a burglary. Shuddering as she thought of the consequences of being discovered by the monster, her desire to apprise the family of their danger outweighed every consideration of prudence, and she resolved, if the thing were possible, to thwart the bold rascal by alarming the household. She waited for several moments and heard nothing. Then she stole cautiously to the half-opened gate and was edified by the sight of Mr. McGuire's brogans just disappearing over the kitchen window-sill. After listening again until she felt sure that the coast was clear, she dropped her shawl upon the ground and followed him.

As if she were well acquainted with every inch of the premises, she sped swiftly across the kitchen to the hall beyond and ascended the broad stairs, stopping at each landing to listen. She knew that the captain was still awake, and forgetting the equivocal position in which she would be placed were she discovered, she wended her way as quickly as she could with any degree of caution, towards the guests' chamber, where from the street she had noticed a light still burning. So well did she seem acquainted with the house, that she lost no time in reaching the room. A little slanting ray of light streaming from the key-hole told her that the inmate had not yet retired, and with an unuttered prayer in her heart that her summons might arouse none but the captain, she raised her hand to knock upon the door.

But, noiseless as had been her movements, they had been heard. Before she could execute her purpose, two brawny arms closed tightly around her and she knew that she was in the grasp of Pinky McGuire. Turning partly in his embrace, she seized his hands with all her feeble strength and screamed aloud. With a fierce oath, the brute pushed her against the wall and, raising his arm, struck her senseless to the floor. In a moment more the door of the captain's room flew open and let a flood of light stream forth into the hall. Something glittered in the captain's hand, and the burglar had scarcely time to leap for the stairway before the report of a pistol rang through the house and a bullet grazed his cheek and buried itself in the plastering above.

Leaving Mr. McGuire to make his undignified escape, the captain stooped over the prostrate body of the girl. Raising her head upon his knee, he recognized her features with a cry of alarm. The inmates of the mansion, flocking to the scene in all stages of dishabille, had been too thoroughly frightened by the report of the pistol to notice the captain's position.

"There has been an attempt at burglary," he said, in answer to their excited questions, "and perhaps a murder. Search the lower part of the house, some of you. Where's Mr. Marshall? Somebody must do something for this poor child."

Marion, emerging from her room robed in a silken wrapper, was the only individual of the thoroughly alarmed household who retained any degree of presence of mind. Advancing in quiet dignity across the hall, she stooped with the captain over the senseless girl, whose brown hair was falling loosely across his knee. Then she, too, started back with an exclamation of surprise.

"Blanche!" she cried.

"No, not Blanche," replied the captain, "but Mary Marsh. I know her well. For Heaven's sake, Marion, have these stupid servants bring me some water. I fear she is dying."

"You know her well?" said Marion, slowly, without heeding his request. "And I know her well—too well. If you entertain the regard for me which you have hitherto professed, you will have her sent to the nearest police station."

"To the police station? She?" said the captain, in astonishment.

"Yes, at once." She stooped and whispered to him fiercely before turning away, "I hate her!"

"But, Marion," said Captain Burrill, "the girl is dying. Will none of you help me?" he asked, turning to the servants.

"You will assist him at your peril," she cried, to one or two of them who, with terror in their faces, had turned to go down stairs. "I appeal to the master of this house, Captain Burrill, for confirmation of my orders."

But the captain did not hear her, for the woman in his arms opened her eyes—those soft, brown orbs which had gazed into his so many times before—and a faint, fluttering sigh escaped her pale lips. Raising her gently, the captain carried her into his own room and laid her tenderly upon his own bed. Then, sitting by her side, he softly clasped her hands until she came slowly to herself again, and he was able to draw her head against his shoulder.

"My poor child," he whispered, as she looked into his face with a wild terror in her eyes; "no harm can come to you now. Don't explain anything. I believe in you still."

"Take me away from this dreadful house," she exclaimed, trembling with agitation as she became aware of the group around her. "Let me go. O don't, don't let my father see me here."

"Your father!" said the captain, in amazement.

"Yes. You have never known but half the truth. O, let me go."

She turned towards the door as she spoke, and her eyes fell upon the figure of old Jacob Marshall standing with Marion upon the threshold. With a wild cry she sprang from the bed and fell upon her knees before them.

"Father! Sister!"

But Marion looked down upon the kneeling, self-abashed girl with a cold, hard stare, in which was no feeling of kindness or charity.

"Never call me by that name again," she said. "Have you not disgraced us enough already? One would think the robbery of our domestic peace had been enough, without this attempt upon our money too."

"No, no," cried Blanche, wringing her hands in the agony of despair. "I am innocent of that. Believe me, I have only tried to save you. Let me go, I will never trouble you with my presence again. You shall never see me, never hear of me, but believe me that I am innocent of this."

Upon Jacob Marshall's face there came a red, hot flush. His whole frame trembled evidently, though whether with passion or emotion, Captain Burrill could not for a moment decide. As the old man's words found utterance, however, the captain's doubts were quickly put at rest.

"Harlot!" cried Jacob Marshall. "You have no claim upon our pity or credulity. Leave the house!"

"Stay where you are," shouted the captain, springing to his feet. "Jacob Marshall, whatever this girl may be, and whatever her life has been, she has called you by the sacred name of father. Remembering this, and remembering that this night she has saved your property and perhaps your life, can you turn her from your doors without one word of comfort or of pity?"

"Who asked you to interfere?" blurted the old man, bursting with rage. "D—n me! Can't I manage affairs under my own roof?"

"You are not what I thought you," said Captain John, forgetting, in the earnestness of his kindly heart, that by bearding Jacob Marshall, he was risking forever his future prospects. "Surely you, Marion, will not see your sister turned heartlessly into the street!"

"Since you know the girl so well, sir, and manifest such anxiety in her behalf," said Marion, scarcely less furious than her father, "you would do well to provide for her yourself. Marion Marshall can never forget an insult."

"I had no intention of insulting anybody," replied the captain; "but this poor child has been under my own protection for a long time, and I should consider myself false to my trust, and false to my word to her, did I stand quietly by and see her turned from her father's doors into the street. How she came here to-night, I know not, nor do I care. I have never yet found cause to distrust her and I believe in her now."

Poor Blanche had risen to her feet during this fiery controversy, and now stood in the middle of the room nervously wringing her hands and repeating, as if to herself, "why didn't he let me die? Why did I ever meet him?" Jacob Marshall, looking from one to the other, and purple with apoplectic fury, stamped violently upon the floor.

"This is all an infernal plot," he screamed, "an infernal plot to rob me. Leave the house, sir. Never again cross my threshold, sir, or command another ship of mine. I wash my hands of you. Marion, I command you never to speak to this man again. Do you hear? never speak to him."

"Your command is unnecessary, father," she said. "Our relations are at an end."

She turned haughtily away, and with the queenly step which Captain Burrill had once admired as the very embodiment of grace, sought her own apartment.

Without a word, the captain took down his hat and overcoat and slowly put them on. When this operation was finished, he turned to Blanche, who stood watching him in a kind of speechless bewilderment.

"We are both in for it," he said, smiling cheerfully to reassure her. "Come. I shall want you to take care of me now." He threw a heavy blanket shawl across her shoulders and, taking her by the hand, led her past her father and down the stairs.

"Send the rest of my luggage to Lovejoy's," he shouted, to the servants as he passed them. Then, unlocking the street door, he led his trembling charge out into the storm and, with a spiteful bang, closed the Marshall mansion behind him forever.

And so he brought Blanche Marshall back to the old place in Frankfort street and once more placed her in Tom Saddler's care. Shall it be told that before many months had passed, this rubicund visaged guardian resigned his trust into sifter and more sympathetic hands? Perhaps the reader has not guessed that during all this time poor Blanche had been warming Captain Burrill's heart for him. For his battle in her behalf, he asked her for his pay at last, and she gave him—herself.

THE FATE OF THE REDGAUNTLET.

BY W. H. MACY.

In the month of July, 185-, we anchored, in the barque Zodiac, within about four miles of the sterile coast of Siberia on the northern shore of the Ochotsk Sea. It had been calm since morning, and no whales had been seen. A boat expedition was at once despatched to explore further inshore, as the polar whale is often met with close in to the rocks in very shallow water. My place was with the second mate, as midship-oarsman, and we soon separated from the other boats; for we pulled on diverging lines, so as to approach the shore at different points, and thus "spread the chances" of meeting with our giant prey.

After two or three hours spent in fruitless search, we beached the boat in a snug little cove, and took a run on shore. The boat-steerer and I left the rest of the party, and climbed a high hill whence we could look seaward and command a more extensive prospect. But we saw nothing but the broad expanse of smooth water, and the Zodiac riding at her anchor in the far distance. Unwilling to return, we pressed onward, ascending and descending, sometimes jumping from rock to rock, until we mounted a still higher eminence which formed the headland of a small bay, until then unseen.

We had lost our own ship from view before we gained the western brow of this bluff, where we could look down into the bay. The scene before us was such as to transfix us with astonishment, expecting, as we did, to behold nothing but Nature's work, bearing the stamp of perpetual solitude.

The beach, as well as the tussock-land of the little valley beneath, was alive with strange-looking human beings in uncouth dresses, running to and fro, as if all in search of the same thing. There must have been more than a hundred in sight, though we did not make any actual count. Two small boats and a ship's long-boat lay at the water-side, and within less than a mile of the shore, a large ship had dropped her anchor. The sails were hanging in all sorts of festoons, no two alike, as if they had made a clumsy attempt to clove them up, and abandoned the job when half finished.

On the deck of the ship were another hundred, more or less, of the same description of beings, duplicates of those on shore. The vessel herself, though apparently of a superior class, showed evident signs of a want of seamanlike care about her sails and rigging. Her hull looked worn and rusty, and marine grass was clinging thickly along the bends.

"Who and what are they?" said my companion, Peterson. "The ship is no whaler, anybody can tell. And what would anybody else but whalers want here in this sea?"

"The ship has run away with them," said I. "or they with her; it's hard to say which. Can they be Russians?"

"No, there's no look of the Russian about them. There's too many of them to be the regular crew of a craft like that; for there are no man-of-war marks about her. She's either an emigrant ship or a transport with troops."

At this moment some one of those below caught sight of us standing on the brow of the hill. The word was quickly passed among the crowd, and their faces were all upturned at once, with wild clamor and speculation.

"Chinamen?" said I, at once. "No other people ever had their eyes set into their heads at such an angle as that."

"They've coiled up their tails and stowed them away under their hats," added my comrade. "That's why we didn't make them out sooner. But they've got terribly out of their reckoning, to bring up here in Siberia. What do you suppose they are hunting for?"

"Grub, to be sure; but mighty little of it they'll find here. They have run short of provisions. See! they are trying to climb up here to speak to us."

"We can do nothing for them; and I don't care to trust myself among two hundred hungry Chinese. They might eat us without salt."

"We had better hurry back and report what we have seen. I don't understand how such a ship as that (for she appears to be English) should be in possession of this mob. There must have been some kind of foul play about it."

We hastened back towards where we had left the rest of the boat's crew, leaving the Chinese to follow, which some of them appeared to be determined on doing, as fast as they were able. We arrived none too soon. The officer already had the boat afloat, and was waiting impatiently for us; indeed he would soon have pushed off with the men he had, and left us behind. Dark clouds in the south-eastern board betokened a wild night. The Zodiac was already under way and crowding sail hard to claw off from the land, while the most urgent signals were flying for our return. The other boats had been seen to start out long ago. We began to relate what we had seen, but were summarily cut short by the officer.

"Can't help it, now, if the whole Chinese race are starving over there! Pull ahead! Let's get aboard before it blows on a gale. It will be too thick in an hour from now, to find the ship, and we shall be half way between somewhere and nowhere."

We understood well enough that such a situation, wherever it might be, was an undesirable one. We plied our oars with a will, and luckily got safely on board before our ship was hidden in the mist. We saw three of the Chinese, who had climbed over the hills, run down the beach and extend their arms in air above their heads. But we could do nothing for them.

It blew a severe gale all that night, and we carried what sail our spars would bear to keep her off the lee shore. There was but little darkness in so high a latitude at that season of the year. But the mist was so thick that nothing could be seen. We talked over the situation of the poor Chinese among ourselves, and saw nothing but starvation before them in that barren spot; while all agreed that there was no possible chance of escape for the strange ship, lying, as she did, with her canvas loosed, and everything in confusion, when the gale came on.

When at length the south-easter had blown itself out, the weather cleared with light winds off the land, and it was not until the third day that we again approached the headland which Peterson and I recognized and pointed out. We passed it with the ship and opened to view the little bight beyond, where we had seen the strange vessel at anchor.

Our minds were, to some extent, prepared for the spectacle of utter destruction that met our view. The whole extent of beach between the two headlands was strewn with a chaos of wreck. Spars, cordage, sails, timber, casks, iron-work and all the thousand and one things comprising the material and fittings of the once proud ship, were heaped in wildest confusion. Not enough of her remained in the original form to point out the particular spot where she had struck.

The Chinese greeted us with yells, not strong but shrill, such as starving men might well utter. Our boats, loaded with provisions, were soon speeding away towards the beach on an errand of mercy. I could not fail to observe, as we neared them, that their numbers had been greatly reduced within three days. The whole force could hardly have been a hundred, in sight; while we had estimated it at more than double that number on the former occasion, including, of course, those afloat.

The poor ravenous wretches had to be kept back by force, that the distribution of food might take place in such a manner that all would receive a fair share. There was no lack of fresh water, and they had already managed to make several fires, which were burning fiercely. But of food there was literally nothing to be found here, save a few muscles at low water.

With some of the ship's sails, they had built a rude shelter, away up high and dry. Under this canopy, we found several poor fellows, who, weak from want of food, or disabled by injuries received at the time of the shipwreck, were unable to crawl out and join the rest, who appeared to care very little whether they lived or died. And, searching still further, we found, stretched out to die in an obscure corner of the tent, a boy, with fair hair and Anglo-Saxon features, emaciated to a skeleton by hunger and brutal treatment.

Tenderly we lifted the lad and carried him to one of the boats, which was at once sent to convey him on board the barque. We directed the Chinese, all who were strong enough, to follow the shore of the sea towards Ochotak city, where they would find succor at the hands of the Russians. We saw no way to dispose of the remnant but to take them on board for the present. We might divide them among the various whaleships when we should again meet the fleet. Just now, we had the burden all on our own shoulders; for the American ships had all gone, either up into the northeast gulf, or over to the Shantar side.

Hardly a man was found among the Celestials who could talk more than a few words of "pigeon-English," nor was it likely that what they would tell us was to be depended upon as truth. We supplied them with provisions to last them, with care, for a few days, and saw them started on their overland journey. Some ten or twelve of the wounded and infirm were taken on board, and we made sail to the southwest.

With tender care and judicious treatment, the boy was so far restored in a few days, as to be able to throw light upon the strange affair, and clear up the mystery that hung over it.

The ship to which he had belonged was the Redgauntlet, owned in London, and chartered at Macao, to carry a cargo of Chinese laborers to the Chinha Islands, to work among the guano deposits. She had sailed from Macao with nearly four hundred on board, all young and able-bodied men, but drawn from the most depraved and reckless class of the Chinese population.

It did not appear, from the boy's story, that the possibility of any trouble or outbreak among the coolies had ever entered the mind of Captain Duganne. For no extraordinary precautions had been taken, such as are always considered a matter of course in vessels employed in similar service, as Guinea slavers, and convict-ships bound to the penal settlements. The vessel sailed with only her regular complement of twelve men before the mast; and a watch which was barely sufficient to work the vessel, could hardly be expected to exercise much vigilance over an army of barbarians.

Nor did the commander show much discretion in his conduct towards his passengers. He was a hard, overbearing man, as well in his dealings with them as with his own crew. The coolies were kept on a very meagre allowance of provisions and water, even from the outset of the voyage. And at the first symptoms of discontent among them he had them all confined between-decks under gratings, and only allowed to take the air at stated periods, a few at a time. In vain the officers remonstrated, and enlarged upon the difficulty of enforcing such orders with the small force at their command. The captain became more and more tyrannical, and the coolies, who had embarked well-satisfied and in good spirits, were, day by day, inspired with deeper hatred towards him.

They met with much bad weather in the China Sea, but worked their way through it, and were, at last, as they thought, in a fair way for a pleasant run across the Pacific. But that very night, after the gratings had been fastened down as usual, an unwonted noise and stir was observable among the Chinese; and on investigation, it was found that they had forced their way through the bulkhead into the run under the cabin-floor, and had secured possession of two barrels of rum which had been stowed there.

Captain Duganne was now thoroughly alarmed, as well he might be. It was madness to attempt to recover the liquor from them; nothing could be done but to keep them confined below until they had swallowed it all, and got over their revel. The noise subsided about midnight, and the watch grew careless again, supposing the coolies were sleeping off the effect of their potations. But with characteristic cunning, they had thus thrown the crew and officers off their guard at the very time they had planned for their uprising. At six bells in the middle watch, when all was still both on deck and below, the gratings were suddenly burst upward, and the Chinamen, mad with rum and rage, pounced up at the hatchways like a volcanic eruption, making night hideous with their peculiar savage war-cry.

The few men in charge of the deck made a desperate resistance; but the struggle was short. The human wave rolled on and overwhelmed them, the coolies displaying the most utter recklessness of life, closing upon the seamen and bearing them down by sheer weight of numbers. In a few minutes, the Englishmen were thrown into the sea, some of them yet alive, and the deck of the Redgauntlet swarmed with mutineers in full possession.

Some of the watch below, who rushed out on hearing the alarm, shared the fate of the rest; but the mate and two seamen made their way into the lower hold. The captain, coming out of the cabin, was met and felled by the blow of a handspike. Andrew, the boy, who was directly behind him, was seized by one of the coolies, who seemed to be a leader among them, and pushed into the round-house. The door was closed upon him, and he was left undisturbed for a time, as most of the crowd supposed he had been thrown overboard.

He heard them beat the captain to death with all sorts of weapons, and saw them, through a chink, wreaking their vengeance upon the inanimate body before it was thrown overboard like the others. Then there was a rush of the Chinese to the main-hatchway, apparently attracted by some special alarm in that direction. Andrew pushed open the door and stepped out from his prison-house to see what was going on.

The crowd in and about the main-hatchway was very dense, and a confused jabbering, as of drunken men divided in their counsels, was going on, when suddenly an explosion was heard that appeared to shake the ship to her keel. The crowd surged back amid a sulphurous smoke, and shrieks of agony rent the air.

The boy, appalled at the sight, stood still as the coolies rushed aft. He was seized by two stout fellows, who lifted him on the rail, and were in the act of throwing him to the sharks, when the man who had already once saved his life again interfered. This man, who seemed to have some sway over his comrades, now took Andrew by the collar, and enjoining silence, made a loud speech, to which all the rest appeared to assent. He was then given to understand that he could go about unmolested.

At daybreak, the Chinese began to throw overboard such of their comrades as had been killed by the explosion. Had they been so many dogs or pigs, the survivors could not have disposed of them more coolly. They crowded into the hold, reckless of danger, where they found the mate and the two sailors, also killed by their own mine. Andrew heard the splashes as they were tossed into the sea, one after another; but the sight was too dreadful for the boy to look upon.

He supposed that the mate had arranged a keg of powder with a train, near the main-hatch, and had called the Chinese round it, with a view of destroying the greater part of them by this means. But he must either have miscalculated his fuse, or else have fired the train by accident sooner than he had intended; so that he and his men had no opportunity to escape.

The coolies now having full and undisputed possession of the vessel, gave themselves up for the whole of that day to feasting and revelry. With her helm lashed amidships, the ship went wherever wind and weather might carry her. But it held fine and moderate for twenty-four hours, by which time the liquor had been all drank or wasted, and more sober counsels prevailed.

The numbers of the Chinese were greatly reduced, fully a hundred of them having been killed or mortally wounded, in the first attack, and by the after explosion at the hatchway. But they seemed to care nothing about this; human life was of so little account, as to be hardly worth bestowing a thought upon.

Andrew's preserver, Kung-Chow, as he was called, now took the command, so far as any one could be said to do so. A man was put at the helm and an attempt made to keep the ship headed to the northward. They dared not return to a Chinese port where the ship would be known; but their idea was, to make land somewhere in one of the Japan islands, of which they possessed a kind of vague knowledge. But they only knew that they lay somewhere to the north of them, and had no skill in working or estimating longitude; while the boy himself knew little more about those matters than they did. The chronometer, not having been wound, had run down and stopped; so that he could make no use even of his limited knowledge.

The boy's account of the proceedings on board the Redgauntlet after this date was gathered at various times in disconnected fragments; and is necessarily rambling, like the cruise itself. The scenes among three hundred reckless semi-savages, adrift in the Pacific, with little or no knowledge of navigating, guiding or handling a ship, may be imagined. The Chinese took advantage of fair weather to take in the light sails and furl them, after a fashion, under the boy's direction. With the heavier ones they could do no more than Spanish-reef them; letting them run down when it blew fresh, and hoisting them up again when it moderated.

Almost every day, they had terrible fights among themselves in which all sorts of weapons were freely used; and at such times, the authority of Kung-Chow was completely set at naught. Many were killed in these brawls, and, as before observed, were forgotten as soon as they were put out of sight. The boy was frequently beaten and maltreated, living in constant fear; but his life was always spared, at the intercession of Kung-Chow.

Owing to the filthy condition of the ship, disease of an infectious character broke out among them, and the mortality, for a time, was frightful. But this abated as they drew into colder latitudes, and the between-decks became less crowded, in consequence of the great falling off in their numbers.

At length, after several weeks tumbling about, having kept a general northerly direction, land was discovered, to the great delight of the Chinese. They felt sure that this was one of the Japan islands, and that their wanderings would soon be at an end. The boy was now ordered to the wheel, to keep her headed in for a passage which lay open before them.

But the wind increased to a gale, and he was obliged to change the course for the safety of their lives. For two days they beat about on soundings, as they knew by the color of the water. They might literally be said to be groping in the dark; and when the sky again cleared, no land was to be seen. They did not know, of course, what was plain enough to us, afterwards; that they had overshot their mark, had got a glimpse of one of the Kurile chain, and had drifted through into the Ochotsk Sea!

From this time, they would seem to have abandoned anything like a definite object, and to have suffered the ship to take the bit in her teeth. It was strange enough that they should have drifted away up to the northern shore, across the sea, without having been seen by any whaler.

From waste and improvidence, their provisions now ran short, and they were reduced to very short commons; for they had actually been at sea more time than would have been necessary for the ship, under proper guidance, to have made the run across the Pacific, and landed them in Peru. Day by day they reduced the allowance of food; quarrelled and fought each other to the death for a bit of bread or meat; no land met their view, and still the Redgauntlet drifted on, none knew where.

Andrew was in actual danger of starvation when the food began to run low, for the stronger of the coolies did not hesitate to rob the weaker, and the poor boy was considered fair game for all. Many a time his morsel was snatched away from him and paid for with a knock-down blow. Maddened with hunger, he one day watched an opportunity to appropriate a whole biscuit from the limited stock in the cask, but was detected in the act. Two Chinese seized him to execute summary vengeance; Kung-Chow interfered to save him; and a desperate fight ensued. Four men were killed in the mêlée; the boy was hardened to such sights; but his last hope seemed to have deserted him when he saw his fast friend stabbed to the heart.

He expected, as a matter of course, to be killed and thrown overboard himself. But a greater refinement of cruelty was to be displayed in their disposal of this poor lad. He was shut up in one of the hen-coops, to be starved to death!

As may be supposed, after the master-spirit Kung-Chow was gone, there was no longer even a semblance of system or subordination among the famishing wretches. That day and the next sufficed to clean out the bread-cask to the last crumb, while several deaths diminished their numbers, as they fought for the last mouthfuls. Cannibalism must be their next resource, and woe to the weaker!

But the following morning found the ship becalmed with the land but a short distance off. They managed to clear away and drop anchor to hold her, and crowding into the boats, pushed ashore in search of anything that might sustain life. This was the day, on which Peterson and I had made the discovery, and the boy was, at that time, confined in his narrow prison on deck, waiting for death.

But that night when the gale came on, sensible that the ship must be lost, and gifted with the strength of desperation, he had forced his way out. Those on shore, holding the boats in their possession, refused to make any effort to save their comrades in the ship, and the distance was too great to attempt to pass by swimming in that temperature.

She dragged her anchor and drove, broadside on, against the rocks, with more than a hundred souls on board. Many of them, in their feeble state were washed away and drowned, but the boy escaped, almost by a miracle, reaching the shore more dead than alive. Nothing was found but a small bed of muscles, a mere mockery to a hundred or more starving men. Small parties of the strongest had started both east and west along the coast, the day before our timely arrival. But Andrew had been brought so low that he no longer made a struggle for life. He had crawled under the canvas where we found him, and another day of starvation would have placed him beyond the reach of help.

He remained with us and finished the voyage in the Zodiac. The others whom we had taken on board were distributed in various ships.

We afterwards learned that but a small fraction of the overland parties ever reached Ochotsk city, though doubtless the poor Russian settlers thought them quite numerous enough. Many gave out exhausted on the road, and some were found dead, who bore unmistakable marks of violence.

But few relics remained of the Redgauntlet when I again visited the place, on a subsequent voyage, three years afterwards. The fierce storms of Arctic winters had swept nearly all away, and, in some places had changed even the face of the beach. A few pieces of rusty ironwork were still to be found; and, at some distance inland, a piece of a ship's headboard on which the letters "GAUNT" were legible. And near by, more suggestive than aught else, a human skull, with a part of the hair attached,—plaited in a queue, as it is worn by all, high and low, in the Celestial Empire.

TO E. E. C.

BY HARRIET E. BENEDICT.

With the long and sunny hours, with the time of song and flowers,
Sweetest friend beyond the waters, all my heart goes forth to thee;
O'er the murmuring waves dividing, to the place of thy abiding,
Who no more may share the brightness of the summer time with me.

Ah! the years since we were parted; yet still glad and joyous-hearted,
Do I welcome each bright summer, with its music and its bloom;
For gladness fills its hours, and sweet hopes, too, like its flowers,
Have a fragrant resurrection from the depth of winter's tomb.

The breezes whisper to me, and the opening blossoms woo me
With sweet odors, to sweet visions, born of beauty and of grace;
For Nature, ne'er deceiving, mocks us not for our believing,
But keeps the heart that loves her in her glad and warm embrace.

And I wander in the valleys, where she calls me to her palace,
Arched with sapphire, floored with emerald, filled with glories manifold;
Gorgeous gems in many a cluster, waters bright with changeable lustre, Hoarding up the sun's spent arrows, glimmering, glancing shafts of gold.

For the gifts that she is bringing, doth thy heart break forth in singing, Joining with the winds and waters in their never-ceasing time?
 Brings it brightness at thy glances, happy hopes and blissful fancies,
 The glory that hath crowned us, with the coming of the June?

Think'st thou, sad and weary-hearted, of the summer long departed,
 Of the olden splendor vanished, that shall never crown them more?
 Of the snows that fell in whiteness, o'er the beauty and the brightness,
 That from earth fore'er hath faded, and which spring cannot restore?

Doth the voice that still doth murmur, of each unreturning summer, Whisper never word of promise for the days that yet shall be?
 Leaf and flower from darkness springeth, bud and bloom the season bringeth;
 Hath the miracle it worketh taught no lesson unto thee?

Is it not to thee a token of the day, by night unbroken;
 Of the land where never autumn comes with whisper of decay?
 Of the airs forever vernal, in the spring that is eternal,
 Where the brightness and the beauty ne'er shall fade and pass away?

TWICE IN LOVE.

BY MRS. R. B. EDSON.

THE cars were an hour and a half behind time, and some doubts were finding expression about their getting through at all that night. The roads and by-ways were blocked with snow-drifts, and though the storm had ceased, and here and there a star shone through the thin cumuli, the strong wind filled the air with fine icy particles that blew in one's face most disagreeably.

The half dozen waiters at the station had dwindled down to two, the station-master and a tall, stout young fellow, who, with overcoat buttoned about his ears, and trousers tucked into his boots, strode impatiently up and down the narrow platform, occasionally leaning over to look down the long line of track towards the city.

"Unfortunate, this storm," said the station-master, drawing his cap down over his ears.

"Yes," was the brief answer.

"Reckon there won't be a wedding to-night, any way."

"The cars are coming, Mr. Alden," was the quiet remark of the young man addressed, not apparently noticing his companion's suggestive remark.

There was a little silence, broken only by the labored puffing of the engine, and the steady, monotonous ringing of the bell, as the train moved slowly up, the huge snow plow tossing the light snow in every direction.

Five or six men sprang out onto the platform, the engineer rang the bell, and the train moved slowly away. The men came into the room, stamping the snow from their feet, and huddled a moment about the stove, discussing the storm, and the various detentions on the route.

By the light of a dingy lantern swinging in the wind under the narrow awning, the young man beforementioned had scanned closely each passenger as he alighted. After the train moved off, and the men had disappeared inside, he went round to the end of the little building, and unhitching a tall, powerful-limbed horse, sprang into the carriage and drove away.

"Guess there won't be a wedding at the colonel's to-night," said Alden, coming out of his little office in the corner of the room, and locking the door carefully after him.

"Why, what's up?" asked one of the men at the stove, and the storm—the matter under discussion—was instantly abandoned.

"Why, Morrill hasn't come. He was to be here in the noon train, but he didn't come. Russ has been here waiting for over two hours, as glum as a tombstone."

"I don't believe this storm would have kept me at home if so pretty a girl as Letty Thornton was waiting to call me husband," said one of them, laughing.

"Or any other girl, pretty or ugly," was the quick rejoinder, followed by a general laugh, the speaker's weakness for women being somewhat notorious.

"He wasn't on the cars when I got in, at Dalton, for I went through the three passenger cars. If it wasn't for that I should think he got off at Benton, it's about as near Colonel Thornton's," said the first speaker, after the laugh had subsided.

"But he never stops there, the road is hard; and of course he would expect some of the colonel's folks down here to meet him," interrupted Alden.

"What time was the wedding to come off? Rather a rough trick, I say." And the weather and the lateness of the hour were quite forgotten in the absorbing interest with which the wedding, the bride and the absent groom were discussed. The interest was the more remarkable from the fact that the party was composed entirely of gentlemen, who it is well-known never take the least possible interest in weddings—except possibly their own—or gossip of any kind.

In the meantime Russell Thornton had ridden home, a long two miles, through the drifted country roads.

"If it weren't that everybody in this miserable little town knew of Letty's expected marriage it wouldn't be so annoying," he muttered, petulantly, as he came in sight of home, and saw the great square house lighted from top to bottom. "The idea of Letty's name being in the mouth of every country boor—by Heaven! I believe I should like to horsewhip Mr. Lancelot Morrill."

The door opened, and a little figure, looking itself like a snow-wreath, leaned out into the darkness, and called in the softest and clearest voices, with a little upward inflection: "Lancelot?"

"He has not come—go in out of the snow, Letty," was the abrupt, almost sharp answer.

"Not come—O Russ!"

The young man sprang from the wagon and walked directly up to the startled, trembling little figure in the doorway. The pretty bloom had all faded out of the young face, leaving it as white as the robe she wore.

"What has happened, Russ? O, tell me at once! I have been nearly wild with suspense and alarm these two hours," she whispered, clinging to her brother's arm.

He passed his arm about her waist, and lifting her as if she had been a child, bore her through the long hall to his mother's room, and put her down in an easy-chair.

"I wouldn't tell you there, Letty," he said, holding the little limp hand tenderly in his, for some one might come out at any moment. The train was very late, owing to the storm, but three other men came through from Dalton, and he might have come as well as they. If he was ill he might have telegraphed, and so avoided this annoying contretemps."

"But some accident might have happened," she interposed, timidly.

"Or he might have been afraid of a few flakes of snow!" he rejoined, his haughty lip curling disdainfully.

"Russell, you are unreasonable," she said, drawing up her little figure. "I will not hear Lancelot slandered, even by you."

"Forgive me, Letty," the proud face softening instantly. "It is only on your account, darling, that I am angry. I presume there is some good reason for his detention, and doubtless to-morrow will bring it all right. I will go down and tell them that Morrill is detained by the storm, shall I?"

"Yes, O yes! And Russ, must I go down? I am so nervous!" And the little hands clutched each other convulsively.

"No, I'll make it all right with the company; thank Heaven they are only our friends. There, dear, keep up a brave heart;" and he stooped and kissed the drooping lids with caressing tenderness, and went out.

The trains came through regularly the next morning, but no Lancelot Morrill made his appearance in Blainford. They waited till afternoon and then telegraphed to Dalton. The reply came back that Lancelot Morrill had left Dalton on the 10 A. M. train of the previous day, for Blainford.

Poor Letty Thornton lay in hysterics all that night, and Colonel Thornton swore fearful oaths against the man who had put this shame and slight upon his beautiful, petted daughter. Russell started immediately for Dalton, to gather all possible particulars relating to the strange affair. They were, however, of the most meagre and unsatisfactory character.

Mrs. Boone, Morrill's landlady, said that he had told her several days before that he was to be married on the twenty-fifth of January. He had mentioned it again that morning, but had not said whether he should return there to board. His trunk and several suits of clothing were in his room just as he left them. He had also mentioned the fact of his intended marriage to his employer—he was clerk in a large clothing house—and he had advanced him two hundred dollars on his salary.

The latest and most direct testimony, however, was from the depot-master at Dalton. He had sold him a ticket the morning of the twenty-fifth of January for Blainford, and had seen him get on the train. And, strangely enough, no one seemed to have seen him afterwards. The conductor on the train was new on the route, and did not know Morrill, and had no particular recollection of the passengers who got on that morning at Dalton.

What could have become of him? In a car containing thirty persons, in broad daylight, he certainly could not have been murdered; and if any accident or illness had overtaken him, it must in like manner have been known. But no one had seen or heard of him after the car door closed upon him at Dalton. Detectives were put to work, rewards were offered, and every effort which human thought could suggest was made to get some trace of the missing man.

Months passed away, but skill and money were in vain, and the search was at length abandoned, and Lancelot Morrill was added to the list of "mysterious disappearances," which so puzzle and bewilder human sagacity.

It was admitted to be one of the strangest of all those strange occurrences. A young man in perfect mental and physical health, with the pleasing prospect of an advantageous union with one of the loveliest of women, disappears on his marriage day, and drops, apparently, out of existence in a breath, in the most invisible manner possible to human imagination.

Colonel Thornton had only lived in Blainford a year. He was not a popular man, from the fact that he considered Blainford people an infinite number of degrees below himself and family, and of very little account, any way. He was rich, and probably thought that fact sufficient to awe his neighbors and townsmen into respect and deference. Strangely enough it did not, Blainford people were so obtuse.

Russell and Letty were the only children of Colonel Thornton, but very unlike. Russell had his father's haughty pride, but tempered with a more generous disposition, and a gentler manner. Yet he had the same lofty contempt for common people, and the same aristocratic ideas of birth and station! Letty, on the contrary, was gentle and suave to all. A smile, a pleasant word, a graceful inclination of the head, and lo, all Blainford were her willing subjects. It was therefore with a mixed feeling of sorrow, and a sort of secret satisfaction, that they received the story of Morrill's failure to appear on his wedding night.

But as the strangeness of his disappearance developed itself, the suddenness and mystery awed them, and completely swallowed up the first more petty feeling.

A profound sentiment of pity and sympathy stirred in all their hearts, and they forgave Colonel Thornton all his coldness and haughtiness and pride, and spoke of him more kindly and respectfully.

But the sympathy of Blainford people was very annoying to both Russell and his father; and so one day the great mansion-house was sold at a great sacrifice (it had been a great sacrifice from beginning to end, for the former owner had ruined himself in its erection), and the Thorntons left Blainford and no one knew whither.

Twelve years after the incidents recorded above, a steamer, crossing Lake Erie one summer evening, brought among its passengers a quiet, retiring little woman, dressed in heavy mourning, who registered her name as Mrs. Dinsmore, Montreal. She was evidently a stranger in Detroit, and altogether unacquainted with the names or character of the public houses. She naturally shrank from making inquiry of strangers, and they were fast nearing the city and the faint summer twilight was creeping softly over the river and the lake they had just left, and casting a faint gloom over the roof and spires of the approaching town.

Something about her—her isolation and reserve, perhaps—attracted the attention of a gentleman standing near her. He had noticed her once or twice before, and once was vaguely conscious of a desire to look in her face without an intervening cloud of almost impenetrable crepe. Her hand, which was bare, was white and small, with faint dimples across the back. It was a very unusual thing for Mr. Montford to notice anything appertaining to a lady. He had been to Buffalo regularly four times a year for the last six years, and this was the first woman to whom he had ever given a second thought. Whether some unexplainable intuition revealed to her his interest in her I cannot tell, but with a sudden swift step she crossed and came to his side.

"Are you a resident of Detroit, sir?" she asked, in a low, clear voice.

"Yes; can I be of service to you, madam?" he replied, courteously, another strong desire to look in her face coming over him.

"If you would recommend some nice, quiet hotel where I could stay a few weeks, you would do me a favor. Not too expensive," she added, "but comfortable and pleasant."

"I think I can, madam, just the place you describe," he replied, with a feeling of unusual gratification.

He then proceeded to inform her concerning the house, its location, scale of prices, accommodations, etc.

"I speak thus warmly of the place because it has been my home for nearly nine years, and I owe it a good word," he said, smiling. "You had better, though, ask some of those gentlemen, perhaps. They are old residents—men with families—and it might be more satisfactory to you to have their opinion."

"Thank you; but I think I will rely upon your recommendation," she replied, and with a bow walked away.

Mr. Montford had been to Buffalo to purchase goods. He was a merchant, doing business in Detroit, and there was nothing unusual about that; but as he drove up to his hotel he was vaguely conscious of a feeling of intense satisfaction with himself and all the world. He had bought at very favorable rates—possibly this was the cause of his elevation. He, himself, believed it to be, and yet he found his thoughts continually straying from business, and to the surprise of his fellow-boarders he did not go to his store as usual that evening, but loitered about the office and parlors until bedtime. If any one had told him he was waiting in expectation of seeing the lady with whom he had spoken on board the steamer, he would have repelled the intimation indignantly, and honestly too, it is so easy to deceive one's self. He did, however, feel it his duty, as he had recommended the house, to look at the books to see if she had accepted his recommendation and arrived safe. It would be well enough, too, to know the lady's name, in case he should happen to meet her during her stay. He read it over twice or three times to himself, "Agnes L. Dismore, Montreal, C. W." This he knew was the name, for he had seen the initials, "A. L. D.," in the corner of a handkerchief she had in her hand when she spoke to him.

Mr. Montford was a thorough business man. Nothing ever distracted his thoughts from it, or caused him to neglect its interests for a single hour. He had come to Detroit with a small capital, but strict attention, energy and prudence had made him, after nine years' careful labor, one of the foremost among the merchants of that city. He was a bachelor, and likely to continue so, people prophesied, for, though courteous and gentlemanly, he was never gallant or attentive to women in the least possible degree. Of course, therefore, it caused some remark among the boarders when the next morning after his return, instead of breakfasting at the first table, as was his invariable custom, he waited until the second, and when the stranger made her appearance opened a conversation with her, and even accompanied her into the parlor, tarrying there several minutes. It was supposed that the lady was an old acquaintance of Montford's, at first, but some one who had been a passenger on the steamer, and had heard the conversation between them, revealed the circumstance to one of the boarders, and the fact was duly circulated and marvelled over, and as the days went by, and the intimacy increased, the interest in the subject was intense. Was it possible that this shy, quiet little creature, without any visible effort, had captured this grave, unimpressible man, for whom so many cunning snares had been set in vain?"

Mrs. Dismore was a widow of thirty, or thereabouts, it was judged. Her husband had owned property in Monroe, a lake town lying south of Detroit. She had preferred stopping in Detroit, as Mr. Gorman, a lawyer who had sometimes done business for her husband, lived in that city. She proposed putting the business in his hands, and waiting in Detroit until the sale was effected.

Fortunately Mr. Montford was a particular friend of Gorman's, and at once volunteered to bring him to the lady. Mr. Montford also thought Mrs. Dismore had better see her property, before she deputed even so reliable a man as his friend to sell it, and as he—very opportunely—had business in Monroe, and was going to drive down in his own carriage, if she liked she could go down with him, and take a look at her possessions, all of which was very kind and friendly in Mr.

Montford, and was so regarded by the lady, who already felt as if he were an old friend, and forgot her reserve and talked with him frankly of her affairs, saying little, however, of her previous life, save that she was without any nearer relative than an uncle, with whom she had been living since her husband's death, in Montreal. He was equally reticent regarding the past, but spoke freely of the present and future, of his hopes and plans—more freely than he often spoke of them to his closest friends.

During the next two weeks Mr. Montford's business at Monroe increased astonishingly. It was, moreover, quite a remarkable coincidence that it was always particularly pressing at those times when it was necessary for Mrs. Dinsmore to go down.

At length the business which had brought Mrs. Dinsmore to Detroit was settled, and the money received, and Mr. Gorman discharged from further duty in the matter. There was no reason why the pretty little widow—for she was pretty—should tarry longer; but being her own mistress, there was no reason why she should not, provided she chose. She did choose, and another two weeks passed, and then she decided to go back to Montreal. Not because Montreal looked particularly attractive to her; on the contrary she very much preferred Detroit, but after sitting down and cross-examining herself pretty closely, she decided, with a sudden blush, that it was best for her to go home immediately.

The next morning she mentioned, quite casually, of course, that she should leave on the following day. Mr. Montford, who was in the room in conversation with another gentleman, left him abruptly, and went out. He did not return at the dinner hour, but about four o'clock he drove up in his carriage, and went at once to the ladies' parlor. It was quite deserted, and ringing the bell, he requested the servant to ask Mrs. Dinsmore to come down. The servant soon returned from his errand with the word that the lady was out.

Mrs. Dinsmore was walking slowly through the busy, hurrying crowd, as perfectly alone as if she were in the most impenetrable forest. Men and women crowded past her in their haste, but she did not look up. Her eyes were sad, and her lips tremulous, and a faint sigh now and then fluttered over them. Suddenly a carriage which she knew drew up at the sidewalk a few rods in advance of her, and a gentleman sprang out. The blood surged to her face, but the friendly crape shielded her from observation.

"I was looking for you," he said, in a low tone, touching her arm, "will you ride?"

She gave him her hand and stepped into the carriage in silence. Very soon she became aware that they were driving away from the city. The noise, and smoke, and bustle fell away like a veil, and a soft calm brooded like a dove over the earth. The cold country road was sweet with wild roses, and pretty cottages and comfortable farmhouses were half hidden in the rank meadow-grasses. Agnes Dinsmore drew a long fluttering breath and put her hand to her face, but not before her companion saw that her eyes were filled with tears. Mr. Montford was entirely unused to women in tears, and besides he was a very sympathetic man, and so put his arm about her in a friendly way to comfort her. She shrank away a little, and a little, hysterical sob broke from her lips.

"I am so foolish, Mr. Montford," she cried, blushing. "But something about this country stillness brought back a memory of the past—the long-buried past. It is very beautiful and sweet here."

"Yes, very beautiful," he replied, looking straight in her face, instead of at the pleasant summer landscape.

"I wonder where I shall be to-morrow at this time," she said, leaning out, to hide the confusion in her face.

"I wish I dared prophesy!"

"Are you among the prophets, Mr. Montford?" she asked, lightly; "if you are I should be happy to listen to some of your predictions."

"Not yet. I brought you out here to tell you a story of the past, Mrs. Dinsmore. I want you to listen to it, and tell me when I am done what you think should be the fate of this man—the one whose story I am about to relate, will you?" he asked, with grave eagerness.

"I will try, but my judgment may be very faulty, and—"

"I shall be satisfied with it," he interrupted.

"I am ready then," she replied.

"Once upon a time," as the fairy stories say, a young man became very deeply in love with a beautiful girl. The girl was very wealthy and of high social standing. The young man was also of good standing, and believed to be rich, also, by the friends of the girl. He had not thought of deceiving them at first, but by some misunderstanding his identity was confounded with his cousin, who had borne the same name, but who had been several years dead. This cousin had been worth a large property, and somehow this girl and her friends had the impression that he was the same man. It did not take him long to discover that a poor young man would stand little chance of marrying into that family. He was a scoundrel, I think, for not declaring his true circumstances at once, don't you?"

"He did wrong, I suppose, but if he loved the girl very much—"

"He did—or at least he believed he did," he interrupted, leaning forward so as to look straight in her face, "but you have not heard the worst that he did. He won this girl's love, and believing him to be the rich, instead of the poor, cousin, her friends consented to their marriage. There would come a time when the truth must be made known, but she would be his wife, then, he argued, and he had faith that her love would be strong enough to blind her to him. Her father could not take her from him, and he should be sure of her. And so he gave them to understand that he was rich, and being a stranger in the State, no one was able to contradict him, and his accepting a clerkship in a store was cited as a proof of his energy and industry, and a bright example for other young men of wealth to follow. Well, what do you suppose this fellow did at last?"

"I—I don't know," she stammered, confused by his steady gaze.

"No, and you would never guess. When the wedding-day was fixed, and this beautiful girl all ready to bestow herself upon him, he left the country and fled like a second Cain."

"Fled?" she gasped, turning deadly pale, and trembling from head to foot.

He took her little fluttering hand between his to calm its throbbing pulses, but with little apparent success.

"Perhaps I had better not go on if you are ill," he said. "I wanted you to hear the story through."

"O, go on!" she cried with nervous eagerness.

He looked a little surprised at her emotion, but resumed:

"Yes, he fled out of the country, and staid three years, and people believed that in some inexplicable way he had dropped out of existence. He justified himself for taking this strange step, on the ground that it was better than deceiving them until the girl was his wife, and it was too late for her to escape the disgrace he knew they would call it. He was too weak to face the anger of her father and brother, and so he took this coward's way. Well, after three years he came back, for the face of this girl haunted him perpetually, and perhaps he had some sort of vague hope that fate might yet bring them together. He employed a man, a stranger to himself, to travel through the Eastern States and inquire concerning this family. The man returned with the news that the young lady had lately married a man twice her years, but possessed of great wealth. And so the dream faded, and he set himself to the acquirement of wealth, and succeeded, but still through all the long years there was a tenderness in his heart for this woman, and no other could ever take the place she had once occupied, and he fancied none other ever could. But one day he met a woman whom he loved instantly. He did not know it himself, but he did. He saw her day after day, and the truth at last dawned upon him that with all a man's most passionate love he loved this woman. But he resolved never to deceive, in the slightest thing, another woman whom he loved. She should know all his past weakness and duplicity, as well as the fact of his previous attachment. There, the story is told; do you think if he came to this woman and told her his love in a few bold, honest words, that she could forgive and overlook his past errors, provided she loved him?"

"I think she could—yes," she replied, softly, a faint bloom stealing into her cheeks.

"Could you do it, Mrs. Dinsmore?" bending over her till his breath swept her cheek, and looking eagerly into the downcast face.

"Yes, Lancelot, I think I could," she replied, lifting her eyes suddenly to his face.

"My God! Letty!" he gasped, dropping her hand, and turning deathly white.

Mrs. Dinsmore had no water, no volatile salts, and something must be done to restore him immediately. She adopted a novel remedy; she put one little soft hand about his neck and kissed him on the lips! I am happy to record the complete success of the experiment. Mr. Montford revived with astonishing suddenness, apparently strongly impressed with the truth of the old adage, that "one good turn deserves another," though certainly he could not have thought the pretty, blushing face held against his breast either cold or unconscious.

"You have not known me all this time, love?" he asked, a moment after, "in spite of my changed name, too."

"No; I only knew by the story, but I have been startled sometimes by some chance expression or tone, and—and I loved you for them."

"My sweet Letty!"

"But Lancelot," she said, gently, "I should never have given you up. It was very hard for me to bear, and life had little charm for me then. My father urged me to marry Mr. Dinsmore, and I finally consented, because I believed you dead, and I had little choice among men."

"It is a wonder I was not killed, for I slipped from a freight car while the train was almost at full speed. I think I was at that time, and for weeks afterwards, nearly, if not quite insane. And Letty, darling, I am not quite sure I am in my right mind now," he added, smiling.

"Nor I either," she retorted, trying to free herself from his arms.

"Ah well," he laughed, "it's a pleasant delirium, and I hope it will last forever. Suppose, though, you try the remedy which restored me just now," he added, wickedly.

But of course she did not.

THE PATH OF LIGHT.

BY MARIA LOUISA POOL.

CHAPTER I.

THE strong old Scotch blood in the man thrilled and beat in swelling currents, as he stood on the shore in the summer twilight. Though the line of coast was softly defined and tame in comparison with the rugged, upheaved rocks of those Scottish Islands, the swift, damp saltiness of the air was the same—and closing his eyes and letting the breeze blow over his uncovered head, he could fancy himself standing on the glittering sands of Mull or Skye, living again his long rambles over land he loved so well.

Standing thus, he thought of the Scandinavian woman who died ages ago, in one of the isles, whose wish it was to be laid on a high hill in the path of the Norway wind. So round the high cairn mourns forever the wind from the old Norse shore. The ardent young Scotchman extended his arms towards the east, exclaiming:

"So let my grave be, where the eastern wind shall blow upon it!"

Then, half ashamed of his ardor, his face grew reticent as usual, and he looked round, fearful that some one had heard him. But he saw nothing but the seabirds wheeling near him, while far down on the sandy beach half a dozen Yankee fishermen were lazily hauling up their boats or counting out the cod they had caught in the day's fishing. For it was in a Massachusetts village, an out-of-the-way sea-coast town, that the nomadic young man had lingered of late, and some influence of earth or air held him there, not so idle as he seemed; for though the thoughts in his brain were yet vague, they were forming into a shape that should fall pulsing and vehement from his pen.

Behind him the flaming occident glowed over the flat country, giving it a charm that made the scene stay in the memory like the beautiful expression of a plain face. The sea burned like a fire opal before him, its easy, ebbing waves sliding with a soft murmur along the sands, enhancing with that languorous diapason of all music the sadness and longing that possessed him—the spell the hour had cast upon him.

He was twenty-five, but younger than his years in many things—in fashionable vices, in swagger masked in elegance, in impudence.

Singularly pure his face looked now, defined against the bright sky, as he stood on the bluff that shelved down straight to the beach. He looked the fact that not a base or unworthy blood had flowed in the line of his Caledonian ancestors. Sturdy uprightness had been their characteristic; but they had nourished one deadly hate, one invincible heritage of their clanship.

In some son or daughter had flowed an impetuous current, that had descended to this man and made his Scottish traits at once vivid and tinged with romance. A drop of Spanish blood, perhaps—a souvenir of that mighty wrecked Armada—flowed in his veins; for some dark-browed sailor might have married the Scotch lassie who pitied him, cast alone upon a foreign island. But no such blood showed upon the man's face, save, possibly, in the sudden, furious kindling of cheek and eye, the out-flashing of some hot impulse. He looked the isleman, with his soft, yellow hair, his deep blue eyes, purpling in emotion—his face, when at rest, coldly and clearly cut, no beard hiding the whittling of lip and chin. His parents, reversing the old legend of the first Lord of the Isles, had made their only child his namesake, and so Somerlid Nicolson seemed doubly sealed to Scotch loves and hates.

He had left Oxford two years before, and possessed by a desire to travel, had passed by unnoticed the temptations to European journeyings, and come over to America, finding here a life as strange and new as his home-life was full of the signs of past centuries. The waves of this side of the Atlantic could not chant the wild songs of Ossian—the mists of these shores hovered over a country too practical to allow of a life of aimless musing.

The scarlet had faded from the sky, and with its disappearance came up a light fog that rose slowly and veiled the far-off ships, making the boats near shore look like ghostly craft upon a sea of gray mist. The summer air was cooled as if by a miracle. The dampness came down like heavy dew. Nicolson left his perch on the bluff and walked slowly down to the spot where a man sat on the sand, hooked knife in hand, skinning fish with that stroke so marvellous to the uninitiated.

"You can cut this fog with a knife in two hours more," said the man, looking up and nodding shortly.

Nicolson, sometimes a little taciturn, nodded also, and remained silent.

"I saw a brig the other side the light when I was out. Hope she'll stay out," went on the fisherman, whose name was Seabury, and at whose house Nicolson had boarded during his stay in the village.

"There's no wind. Of course they'll stay out. They know the coast, I suppose," said Nicolson, looking indifferently off into the gathering darkness.

"What good does knowin' do, when you can't see an inch before your nose?" asked Seabury. "If they only knew enough to keep still; but it's astonishing how they'll try to run a craft."

"There was a brig from Charleston, South Carolina, telegraphed as being down below the light, in the paper this afternoon," said

Nicolson, carelessly, sitting down in the sand and pulling his coat about him.

"Was there?" said Seabury, with sudden anxiety, dropping his knife and involuntarily bringing his hand above his eyes to peer off seaward.

Nicolson looked at him in surprise, but would not question him.

"Our Submit was a comin' home in a brig with Cap'n Nixon. Maybe she's in that. If Nixon ain't drunk he'll take care of his craft. No decent person ought to come to grief in a night as still as this, though there's a plaguy sight more wind out there than we know of here."

"Submit is your daughter?" asked Nicolson.

"Yea. She's been South for a year with my sister, and her last letter said she was coming home as soon as Nixon started."

"She'll not come in a steamer, then?" said the young man, more for the sake of responding than for any special interest.

"No, she ain't got much money, and it's cheaper in the brig."

Nicolson did not say more. He sat wondering what kind of a girl this daughter was, with her name smacking so strongly of Puritanism. A robust girl, whose physique overshadowed her intellect, but still possessing a shrewd and ready insight into the business of life. How curiously strange these people were to him, with their stories of the Mayflower, and of the old time of the Indian King Philip wars. Such an old time appeared to him but a few days back; for were not his old legends of the dim, unreal days of Fingal and the giants?

The night deepened and the fog thickened. It was fast becoming, as the fisherman had prophesied, of almost solid thickness.

Nicolson and Seabury walked slowly up to the house, half a mile away. A silence had fallen upon the old man, and the thoughts of the younger were out in the bay, where the unknown brig rolled upon the waters.

By nine o'clock, contrary to all expectation of the weatherwise, the fog had changed to a fine, driving rain, and the wind was blowing strongly from the northeast.

Seabury walked restlessly up and down the little kitchen, muttering to himself. At last he wrapped his shaggy greatcoat about him, with the exclamation, "I can't stand this, anyhow," and strode out into the wet darkness; while his wife stood at the door, her pale face peering after him.

Nicolson, smoking by the fire, threw his cigar away, a faint flush mounting to his forehead, the wild spirit of the night sounding a call to him. He plunged along the sodden road in the direction of the beach. The air, the night, the hurtling of the blast, all were like an intoxication to his youth and high health. The days of his childhood came back to him—those days when he had hung over the verge of rocky precipices, gathering with agile fingers his cap full of birds' eggs, while his tartan whirled in the air, the frightened flock screaming above him; and below, down hundreds of feet, the sea-foam swirled as if hungry for him. He had never been afraid, and now he felt the power of a dozen men within him.

There was no one on the beach save Seabury, whose figure he did not discern until he was close upon him. It was not the season for the fiercest storms and wrecks, and no one, save these two, thought of coming out.

Seabury turned and saw the young man beside him, and a look of thankfulness came to his face. He was half disabled himself, for rheumatism had stiffened his leg, and something of his old strength had gone. He looked with pride upon the stalwart youth near him, whose eyes seemed to emit flashes of blue lightning as they looked off seaward.

Neither attempted to speak. They walked back and forth, buffeted by wind and spray. An hour passed thus, and still something held them there. They heard from the waters no booming sound of distress. The rain drove on from the east blindingly. It had grown lighter within the hour, and they knew that the moon had risen.

Suddenly Nicolson grasped the old man's arm and pointed over the roaring waves.

They saw, like a vision in a dream, a boat filled with men, with only one woman in their midst; and even from that distance the fond old man fancied he could see with what a wild pleading her eyes were fixed upon that familiar shore, for in that one stormy glimpse Seabury recognized his daughter.

The two men on the beach had hardly seen that boat, before like a spectre it had vanished, and over it had rolled a bellowing, remorseless breaker, the heartless foam tossing gayly in the air.

"O my God! it is she," cried Seabury, in unconscious exclamation. "The men may swim; but I know she can't in this sea."

He was wildly tearing off his coat, forgetting his infirmities that would make him powerless in the water. Nicolson's nervous hand was on his arm.

"I can swim," he said, hoarsely, his lips to the man's ear; "but you cannot. I shall bring her to you."

His coat was off, his hat bared his yellow curls to the storm, and he caught up the rope Seabury had brought and flung upon the sands, knotting it deftly about his waist, then with an exulting and challenging fire on his face, he leaped down into the water, which rolled over him at the first plunge.

When he rose upon the next smaller wave, Seabury saw the boat appear again, turned over, with two men clinging to it. No others were visible; at least so he thought, for the semi-darkness tormented him now more than the wind or rain.

The phosphorescent, faint glare of the water aided the swimmer somewhat, and to Nicolson's accustomed eyes the boat showed when one unaccustomed to the sea would not have seen it.

He swam bravely, but his slowness was torture to him. Before him, in the dim light, he saw the floating hair of a woman, the wet locks shining on the water—then it was lost to him, and he struggled blindly after it.

Though the waves almost stunned him, though sometimes he lost a foot or two, he never for an instant doubted of his success, and the moment came when he grasped the woman with a grasp of iron, and giving himself up to less severe motion, he felt himself pulled through the water by the rope attached to his waist.

The welcome sand was gained at last, and he struggled to his feet to have the burden he bore snatched from his arms by Seabury, who waded in to meet him, regardless of the waves that nearly knocked him down.

Three of the men had already been buffeted up to the shore, and lay panting, conscious only of a sublime sense of safety.

Nicolson, seeing that Seabury held his daughter with monopolizing clasp, that he would repel with fierce paternal instinct any offer in that first moment of meeting, walked to the side of one of the men, bending over to peer into the sea-wet face.

"D—d coast this," said the man, with the unmistakable intonation of a Cape Cod sailor, as he struggled up to a sitting posture. "Who'd a thought ye could a got up such a blow this time o' year?"

By the time he had ceased speaking he had extricated a small flask from the side-pocket of his jacket, and had found the mouth of it with celerity.

"You carry your comfort with you," said Nicolson, curtly.

"You may bet on that. How's the gal?"

"The lady is safe," replied the young man, experiencing a slight feeling of disgust that "the gal" should be mentioned in such a fume of whiskey.

"Give some of that stuff to the other fellows. I see they are able to move about," he said, and walked to where Seabury was kneeling on one knee, holding his daughter clumsily but very tenderly, trying roughly and in vain to restore her to consciousness.

Nicolson stooped to look at her, then ran back to the man he had just left, whom he found assisting his wrecked companions. He asked for the bottle, and offered it to Seabury, saying:

"It won't harm her. It does not appear to me that she has swallowed much water."

He saw that the old man's hands trembled pitifully—that he could not force the warm drops between the girl's pale lips.

"I'm all unstrung," he said, in a quavering voice. "Do give it to her."

Nicolson's steady hand introduced the liquid into her mouth. Its unaccustomed fire awakened the dormant energies. Nicolson stood near until in the semi-darkness he fancied he saw signs of returning life, then he walked away and devoted himself to the assistance of the men, while Seabury carefully called into full life the suspended animation which had so frightened him.

"I can help you home now," he said, eagerly, tenderly smoothing back the wet hair. "Mother's waiting—fearfully 'fraid of dreadful news. Lean on me, my darling."

The rough fisherman's reticent heart was opened by the danger, and he who was so chary of words of endearment, lavished them now on his rescued child.

Nicolson, looking where they had stood, saw two figures moving slowly from the place. His first impulse was to follow them, but he knew she was safe, and his work for the moment was with the poor wretches on the beach.

Two hours later, having seen the men safely housed in the fishing-huts that stood among the rocks a little above high-tide mark, Nicolson strode up the stony road that led to Seabury's house. He felt a natural curiosity to see the girl he had brought from the water, and in addition, it had been so long since he had seen a new face, that there was a trifle of excitement visible in his appearance as he gently pushed open the kitchen door and walked in.

The glowing fire there made him for the first time sensible of the dripping clothes beneath his greatcoat. The room was empty. He stood a moment by the fire, upbraiding himself for the selfish but fleeting feeling we all know when shut out as strangers from some great joy. Then he turned and went up to his room, where he put on dry clothing, saying to himself that he believed he had lingered long enough here; he would push on now to the great cities of this new world. He could not explain why he had already stayed so long.

A voice at the foot of the stairs called his name.

"Well," he said, in a surprised tone, for he had not expected to be remembered again that night. There was still so much of youth, almost of childhood in him, that his heart was open to loneliness or joy in an unusual degree.

He had forgotten the service he had rendered; but the very act of that service had rendered his soul painfully alive to emotions intense than ordinary.

"Come down," said Mrs. Seabury; and he heard the gladness in her accent. "Come down with dry clothes on. I must take care of you, or you'll be having a fever."

Nicolson went down stairs, sat by the stove and drank the steaming tea she gave him, until the moist glow told of the efficacy of her prescription. He sat and watched the little woman as she bustled about, going every few moments into the inner room, from whence Nicolson heard the murmur of talking—the sound of a voice womanly and refined—at least so it seemed from that distance.

Mrs. Seabury's face bore upon it a light that almost made the plain features beautiful; but, though absorbed, she was not unmindful of Nicolson, and occasionally cast nurse-like glances upon him, with which was mingled a devout gratitude.

"Your daughter is quite recovered?" questioned Nicolson, with slight diffidence in his tone.

"She is weak, but to-morrow I think she'll be well. Would you like to see her to-night?" looking at him as if now he had but to ask anything of them.

"She should rest at present," he hastened to say, with the shy politeness that was peculiar to him. He added, "I shall be happy to see her when she is entirely recovered."

"She will want to see you. She is not an ungrateful child," responded her mother.

Nicolson sipped his tea in silence, wondering if the child was such a plain, matter-of-fact person as the father and mother, and if she had as good a heart.

"She will consider it her duty to thank me with great fervency," he inwardly said; "as if I deserved such gratitude for an involuntary sea-bath; though in truth I did save her life, and being young, she is glad of it."

"I am not expecting thanks," he said, aloud. "If the service was great to her, it cost me very little to perform it."

Mrs. Seabury expostulated against such a view of the case; then, unable to keep away, she disappeared within the room from whence came the sound of conversation.

Nicolson desisted from herb tea and betook himself to his cigar, vacantly watching the smoke wreaths until they grew dimmer and dimmer, and he was asleep in his chair.

He roused himself at last, and rose to go to bed, fancying with clouded brain, as he lit his candle, that he saw a woman's drapery, and not that of Mrs. Seabury, sweeping by the open door of the kitchen.

CHAPTER II.

THE next day when Nicolson came down to breakfast, he looked quickly round the room in search of the woman he had seen, yet not seen with any idea of her appearance.

He was alone in the kitchen. He saw Seabury driving his cow down the road, and his wife going through the barnyard with her basket in search of fresh eggs. He was standing by the window, looking beyond the barn to the fleecy horizon. It was a pleasant day which had just begun. The west wind of summer stirred the trees, with no memory of yesterday's fierce northeaster.

A girl came quickly from the other room, and hesitated a little as she saw the kitchen was only occupied by Nicolson. But he had heard her and turned, and at sight of her—for he was not used to female society—his unbackneyed face kindled faintly.

The slight awkwardness she had felt at first disappeared, and she said:

"You are Mr. Nicolson?" advancing and holding out her hand as she spoke.

He took the hand and held it while she said:

"I am Submit Seabury, as I suppose you know."

His tongue refused to frame any conventional expression of pleasure, and he only bowed, dropping the hand, thinking, "now she will thank me."

And indeed it was in accordance with all rules for her to thank her preserver then and there. But she did not do it, wisely resolving to defer it until some time when her thanks would be better received.

She made some ordinary remark about the beauty of the morning; and the man, while he responded, was surprised again at the depth of sweetness in her voice—not sweetness alone, but holding a suggestion of strength, a hint of fervid emotions he had been taught not to expect in New England. It was Rossini who so loved the contralto voice, and gave to its singing those strains of harmony which only such a voice can express—the sweet passion, the pure sensuousness, the tone which appeals through all the exquisites of our senses to the divine within us. Something in the girl's voice made Nicolson remember vividly the contralto solos of Rossini's music he had heard in London. Then he looked again at her face. Did that hold anything in unison with her voice? The eyes were lowered as he looked, and the pale, dark face made him say, "nothing," with disappointment; but even as he thought the word, she lifted her eyes to speak to him, and he recalled the involuntary thought, for her eyes might have been the fires from whence her voice drew its peculiar power.

It is a pity you can only tell the color of eyes and there stop. Those of this girl were large and softly brown, but they were also full of light, capable alike of flaming or dreaming, and being also exponents of her character, they revealed that if she attracted at all, it was for a lifetime, and that attraction would be to a man either his safest or most dangerous experience.

Nicolson had not expected to find this girl with the aroma of society about her. He had been prepared to meet a Yankee girl whose bashfulness would put him immediately at his ease, for he was not a ladies' man. With fashionable life it was apparent Submit Seabury had had nothing to do. But it appeared as if her breeding came by inheritance, "from some English or Scotch great-grandparents," Nicolson thought, with natural complacency.

She stood before him now in the plainest of dresses, her hair arranged simply, a marked pallor on her face, and dark circles about her eyes, the lingering effects of last night's danger; but she impressed Nicolson with a sense of dignity and power, even with something more subtle, a feeling of some æsthetic force, sweet and fine, that entered his being unconsciously, only to know afterwards, and never to be analyzed.

"You are entirely recovered, I hope," he said, not so much from politeness as in the hope to detain her, as she was moving towards the outer door.

She paused and looked back, saying:

"Thank you—yes, save for a little languor. And you—" looking at him earnestly, "I am not acquainted with your face, and do not know but it is always colorless. You look fatigued."

The young man was conscious of a deep pleasure in knowing that her eyes were upon him. The warm glow at his heart mounted slowly to his face, faintly tinging its marble-like hue, that was only slightly bronzed by sun and air.

"I have the misfortune to lack color," he said. "It is something acquired as a student, and which I cannot discard. I am not at all fatigued."

During the time he was speaking, he was endeavoring to think of something by which he might detain her; but, bending her head in reply to his remark, she walked down the path that led to the road, stopping every few steps to greet with caressing fingers the old-fashioned shrubs and flowers that bloomed in the little, unkept garden.

"She walks well," said the man, thinking himself very critically and coolly judging her, as he leaned forward to watch her, a sparkling light in his sea-blue eyes that made them like the sheeny water.

Submit looked out over the level, sandy country spread between the village and the beach. But she was not thinking of that resemblance. As she stepped again slowly over that dear old path, the perfume coming to her like the tenderest of greetings, she had thought, "The young Scotchman is a gentleman, with a patent of nobility in his face." Then she had forgotten him in the quiet gladness of her recognition of home surroundings. Her look kindled as it roamed over the limitless blue; in the pure sunshine of that moment she could not even shudder at the thought of the night before. But that time came to her with a glow of enthusiastic gratitude to the hand that had saved her.

"How can I frame words to thank him?" she asked herself. "He does not look like one who would care to have me walk up and thrust my thanks in his face."

One or two neighbors passed by and stopped at the gate, where Nicolson saw her cordially greet them—noted how the rough hands grasped the shapely hand of the woman.

With a little foolish fastidiousness, Nicolson slightly objected as he saw, furthermore, how she talked with them with an ease and cordiality that made their weather-beaten features relax from their setness. "Of course they like her, and yet she does not look like one who would be a general favorite."

An uncouth open wagon drove slowly up to the gate, and the farmer on the seat, after heartily greeting the girl, said:

"I didn't know you was to home, but I guess this letter'll be just as welcome as though I'd brought it thinkin' to find you. They wanted to know at the post-office if I was goin' by here. Who ever wrote that was posted about your movements, eh? Bold hand, too." And the man glanced significantly at Submit as she took the letter.

Nicolson heard the words, and savagely muttered an expletive below his breath:

"Why do the boors always talk to a girl like that?" he muttered. "She ought to have her letters in peace—and her lovers, too," with a grim smile, turning away and sauntering slowly into the barnyard, where the hens were chattering over their corn. They did not fly at his familiar presence, and he stood there, absently watching Seabury as he did his morning "chores." He heard a near step, and Submit came towards him, with something of her pallor gone.

"I was still in love with life," she said, standing a moment silent, "and I like to tell you that I am glad to be alive on such a morning as this. I never was facile with spoken thanks, Mr. Nicolson. You will greet this with love, I know—let it speak for one who is awkward at speech, particularly when deeply moved." She put in his hand a tiny bouquet of heath and broom-blossoms, then turned to fondle the dog who had bounded to her side; but she saw the sudden access of emotion, the uncontrollable and beautiful softening of his eyes, the tenderness of his mouth.

He bent over the flowers, the years of his childhood coming back to him, then he took the girl's hand with an impetuous gesture:

"I love them! They belong to my very life! I do not know why I stay away from home so long." Then, his reserve returning to him, he said, "Where did you get them? You have not a magic wand to call them into bloom the moment you appear?"

"I am not an enchantress, or I should have rescued myself last night. I also love the flowers, and mother cherishes two or three plants of them in her own room, and they were in bloom to greet my return."

"They ought to be sentient enough to know of your coming," he said, earnestly, and then in the silence that followed, he added: "Why do you like them so especially? Is it not strange in an American girl?"

"But American girls have whims," she said, in a light way that he thought veiled some deeper feeling, "and one of my fancies is to have Scotch wild-flowers."

"You pay a Scotchman the greatest of compliments," he said, thinking a shade of thought had settled on her face, an intangible melancholy in her eyes.

Seabury came lumbering down from the barn, his bluff face glowing.

"You know that young man saved your life, Submit," he said, in his tactless way.

"Pray do not let us speak of it," said Nicolson, carefully adjusting his bouquet, and angry with the intrusion.

"Yes, I know it," said Submit, quietly, "and I hope Mr. Nicolson understands that I am grateful."

"Wall, I am glad of it," Seabury said, looking in some surprise at the two who took things so coolly. "But there aint words to tell what I feel about it. I could go on talking to the end of time, and then not have said half, either. He did the noble thing, by George! and he did it splendidly, too! You ought to have seen him jump into the breakers, Submit. What little strength there is left in my poor old legs seemed to leave me then, when I knew you was in that boat—and I did know it, as if the Lord had told me."

Submit's eyes were dewy as she said, in a voice that made the common words thrilling:

"I know all you felt, father; for the nearness of death made me know fully how much I loved you and mother." She put her hand on his shoulder as she spoke, then softly touched the grizzled locks below his hat. It was evident from her face that she could not talk of her rescue yet—it was too thoroughly in possession of her heart. She had not lived so long on the shore without being able to know the terrible risk Nicolson ran when he came after her.

After a little silence Seabury said:

"I saw Deacon Moss give you a letter. Is it from Florian?"

Nicolson, strangely sensitive concerning Submit, raised his eyes to her face, listening for her reply, and trying to read in her eyes something deeper than the lips said. That was simply "yes."

"He guessed pretty nigh when you'd be here," remarked Seabury. "He'll be on now, I s'pose. Haven't seen hide nor hair of him all the time you've been gone."

Nicolson thought there was an air of vexation in the way he stooped and picked a pebble, throwing it spitefully in among the hens, scattering them with loud cackling.

"He knew when I was to start, for uncle told him," said Submit. "About his coming—you can read his letter, and arrange it to suit yourself."

Seabury took the letter and walked towards the house, putting on his spectacles as he went.

"Your friend has the music of the South in his name," remarked Nicolson, having changed his resolve to go in the house, to one to stay as long as she remained.

"He is Southern; though you would not be safe to judge of people or names in that way," Submit replied.

"But you are certainly a Puritan."

"In name, yes."

"But you are almost in the shade of Plymouth Rock. That must have its influence—one's birthplace hangs a banner over one's life; we cannot forget it."

"Witness your emotion at sight of this heath," she said; then with uncalled-for earnestness, "One's birthplace is indeed different from any other spot, though only our baby eyes have seen it; therefore these souvenirs of the Pilgrims must have set an invisible seal upon my character."

Stooping to pat the tangled terrier that so besieged her skirts, Submit went slowly towards the house, and Nicolson leaned against the well-curb, ruminating with a stinging spice of self-scorn in his thoughts. It was that kind of feeling which men know when they are suddenly interested in a woman who is openly kind to them, and for whom they fancy some other has intentions likely to be successful. The surprise her appearance had excited in him—for she was entirely opposite in face and manner to his preconceived idea of the daughter of Seabury—left his fancy unguarded, his sensibilities open to the deepest impression. He had only thought that she was one of those keen gray-eyed women of intelligence, but no ideality, that abound in the United States. He judged of the middle class, of the comfortable working people, as though he were in England, though his perceptions told him how erroneous that judgment was; but the habit of his life clung to him.

In the little low-browed porch, or "sink-room," he paused for a drink of water, and holding the cocoanut shell in his hand, the irritated tones of Seabury, who sat within the kitchen, came to his ears.

"D—n that Florian!" Seabury said, harshly, bringing the palm of his hand forcibly to the table. "No other man ever had such a plague of a nephew. What does the fellow mean by following Submit so? I won't have it! I'll put a stop to it!"

"You can't stop such things quite so easy," said his wife, anxiously. "He aint the man I'd choose for Submit, but he aint quite so bad as you think him, Silas; he's got some good in him."

"You women," said the husband, sneeringly, "can't see evil in a slim, handsome feller like Florian. Let his goodness keep him out of scrapes, if he's got any goodness, I say."

"I s'pose he'll come," said the wife, waiving the discussion.

"Come! of course he'll come! What does she think of him?" lowering his voice as he asked the question.

"I'm sure I never could decide," was the despondent reply. "I can't always read Submit. She aint our kind, exactly, Silas," she said, mournfully.

"I'd like to see a more dutiful darter, that's all," was the reply, somewhat belligerently.

Nicolson, absorbed in the interest he felt, forgot he was listening for the moment, then, as they went on talking about her, he silently left the porch, wandering down across the coarse-grassed fields to the beach.

He had not frittered away his heart in the ten thousand things which spoil a young man of society, and the girl he had just left was to him a presence he had never felt before—had imagined only vaguely. He did not love her; if he did not see her again, he would remember her as something that colored his dreams beautifully for a while, that left his soul purer for her influence. Now, as he lingered by the shore, idly lounging on the sands, her face faded from his mind, and in its place—or rather it seemed as a continuation of thoughts of her—came pictures of the home he had left; but they were pictures dearer than their wont, with an indescribable charm, a flush of sunny hues upon them. At noon, when he returned, he did not think of Submit until he had started for the house, then her personality sprang into life again, and he wondered with a slight vindictive feeling concerning Florian, with whom the woman dealt so tenderly.

"A graceful scamp, doubtless," he said to himself, leisurely climbing the ridge of the beach, then turning to "scale" a stone over the rippling waves. Another stone whistled after his from some hand behind him, and a gay voice cried:

"You are born an athlete! No one ever beat me before."

Nicolson turned quietly, and encountered a brilliant face, whose smile glanced like the shining waters beyond him. A slight figure below the medium height, dressed in the extreme of fashion, a diamond glittering in the spotless linen, and upon the slender white hand; long, dark hair blown by the fresh breeze, all shaded by a Panama hat, which was deftly and carelessly lifted, while the owner bowed to his companion and said:

"I am sure I know you—the young Scotchman whom aunt mentioned as boarding here. I am happy to see you. We shall be fishing comrades, I predict."

Nicolson rather coldly touched the extended hand. It was not usual with him to fraternize quickly with any one, and he was peculiarly distrustful of this tropical looking bird, though he felt there was something very winning about him. He replied graciously enough:

"You have guessed who I am. I have become expert at that art myself, since my sojourn here. You are called Florian—whether as surname, I know not."

"Florian Hunt," with another bow, averting his eyes, as he said satirically, and yet with a question in his tones, "my wise relatives have not said my name with an accent of praise, I'll wager."

"It was mere accident that I heard your name at all, as an expected guest," replied Nicolson.

"I am glad my letter has preceded me," said Florian, walking on with nervous steps, twirling his cane rapidly. "I came down in the morning train. Has Submit arrived? not yet, I suppose." His curious-colored eyes glanced rapidly over his companion's face, then off again, while his lips seemed to tremble with eagerness.

"Yes, she has arrived."

"Ah!" Florian's step grew quicker; then he turned back, saying apologetically, "That is a surprise I hardly looked for. I did not expect her until to-night at the earliest. Pardon me, I must make my greetings at the house;" and he sprang on, disappearing round a curve in the road.

Nicolson looked after him, then he turned back to the beach again, crunching the wet gravel with a decided heel. A sudden blow had come over the soft visions of an hour ago. He pushed off a boat and jumped into it. This staying so long on this shore would soon be wearisome. He must go to the great cities yet to be seen. Then why linger in this fishing hamlet? He rowed off, and made a pretence of fishing, until a salt air hunger forced him in shore. It was evidently past the dinner hour, for Submit and Florian were in the yard, sitting in the shade of lilacs. Florian's face was glowing undisguisedly as a child's; his yellowish black eyes were dilated, his lips crimson. Nicolson's clear-cut face showed very coldly beside the versatile fire and play of Florian's. When the latter saw Nicolson, he left Submit's side, and came to him, grasping his hand with warm pressure, exclaiming:

"Fortunate fellow! If I only could have had the happiness of doing Submit the service you rendered last night! They have been telling me about it. But I—I am never lucky." He spoke the last words with discontent, even with genuine sadness.

"Yes, I was fortunate," said Nicolson, unable to prevent a feeling of warm admiration, and a vague pity for he knew not what; for he felt for the first time an undertone of pathos in the character of the man before him—the vaguest sense of a helpless appeal for happiness. It was that, perhaps, which was one secret of Florian's power over women. He appealed to them; he besought them by some undefinable characteristic—never by words to drive a wretched existence from him, to exorcise the despondent moods that swayed him. And he was fascinating in person, always graceful, attentive, gallant; his dark, irregularly-featured face was capable of expressing a fire which fair heroines had only read about, and which they found dangerously bewildering; for one of Florian's methods of killing time was to play upon girls' hearts, a pastime in which other men have indulged. But Florian could never coolly do that. He was attracted by a tone,

"Her look, her way
Of speaking gently—for a trick of thought
That falls in well with mine, and, certes, brought

A sense of pleasant ease on such a day."

And he paid his court with such devotion, genuine, though ephemeral as flowers and as winning, until the charm was over, and he had flitted, leaving the woman, if perchance she was young and undisciplined, to awaken startled over an idol broken, a heart roused and forsaken. Such girls, with few exceptions, make bitter women. Florian had had his hour. Ask him not for repentance and amendment. But such a life left him dimly alone and unsatisfied.

His cousin, Submit Seabury, had been his companion two years ago for six consecutive months, and the wayward, winning Florian had cast his hopes upon her. He should live or die as she said.

Curiously, he did not appear to have the same effect upon Submit as upon other women. She was cool, she did not yield to his extravagant advances, she did not melt at his entreaties, and consequently she unconsciously secured the deepest love he could know; she became the ruling power of his life. He loved her with a fierce impetuosity he did not try to disguise. Could a woman fail to be influenced by such a devotion?

In that first half-hour, Nicolson easily read Florian's heart and character, and judged him harshly as a man would. Possibly not more harshly than he deserved.

But Submit did not carry her heart upon her sleeve. He could not read her, but he admired her with a tinge of something that thrilled in his unsullied blood, while he watched furtively for the sign of her love for Florian. But her eyes maintained their calm, or only started into some special brilliancy at command of something sheerly intellectual.

"She is worth reading," Nicolson thought, that night, sitting in his room by the table which held his heath-blooms. "How delicately she thanked me. Yes, she is worth studying."

The young man slept upon what he thought a cool resolve to study human nature in the person of Submit Seabury.

Florian, in the next room, did not sleep so easily. He leaned out under the glimmer of the stars, his brow clouded, his eyes fiercely flashing.

"If this soft wind would cool my head!" he exclaimed. "There's a cursed heat and fury in it! I have sat too long with Nicolson and Submit in the same room. The man of ice! He does not know it now, but I know that he will love her—love her! And what then?"

He turned round, and paced softly up and down the room, his head thrown back, something in that handsome face and figure that remind one of a leopard, agile and graceful, not too trustworthy, in spite of a heart full of good impulses.

CHAPTER III.

It had been a summer of fearful heat, and hardly a shower had cooled the earth. The stillness of the air had settled upon the village. Men and women did their usual work, but did it in languor, with no energy to strengthen them. Older people talked of a summer years ago, when heat ruled, and no rain came for weeks and weeks. The crops grew parched and shrunken every day, sinking and shrivelling beneath that bronze sky ever glaring down upon them. There secured always that expectant hush in the air, as if earth and man were waiting for something that did not come—something they would soon die without. Sometimes on the air was the scent of burning bushes, gathered to clear the land. The scent hung over the village, mingling with the salt breeze, for the ocean was true to itself and the town, and gave a little dampness from its eternal waves.

It is at such times that country people shake their heads and say—"It will be a sickly season." And in truth, many sickened, just as the foliage and crops did. Submit wandered often into the woods that lay back of the village. There was a sense of dampness there; the shade kept the greenery of moss and underbrush fresher than anything anywhere else, and the air retained a refreshing smell of growing vegetation.

She walked slowly, pressing her feet against the soft moss, sitting down at last by a pine tree, her face turned toward the place whence the ocean wind blew. She was pallid and looked oppressed. Shadows were upon her eyes, and the smile which she bestowed on the terrier at her feet was hardly a smile, so slow and lifeless was it. A weight of something more than the weather appeared upon her, or perhaps she, also, was ill.

A voice from a path in the woods was all at once heard singing some old-tune, pathetic ballad of the sea and a wreck it had made. The shadow on Submit's face deepened; she passed her hand wearily over her eyes, then turned toward the direction in which that path led. She knew he would find her now, though the place had thus far been sacred to solitude and to her. A man appeared among the trees, slowly fanning his heated face with his broad hat. The woman, watching him, could not but see how haggard he looked, with what a jaded air he walked. But the weather was horrible enough to account for languor or pallor. His roaming, restless eyes saw the folds of her muslin dress against the green leaves. He came to her side, bent and took her hand, the action flushing his cheeks, and giving a better lustre to his eyes.

"Submit," he said, "we find the good when we seek it not. I have been looking for you ever since I returned, until now. I came back to see you again. I cannot leave you."

Florian sat down at Submit's feet and forcibly retained her hand. "You were cruel enough last week when I left, to allow me to touch your hand now," he said. "Is the Scotchman gone?"

"No."

There was a lurid darkening of his face, then it fitfully flashed. Submit thought him now like a torrid night, holding dreadful lightning and destruction. His constant presence, always calling for what she could not give, had sapped her, bodily and mentally. She was undefinably conscious of the fact that he drew life from her, that physically he oppressed and weakened her. And yet she liked him, was strongly interested in him. Now she was singularly out of patience, she felt in that passive state when one feels it is but a step from quietness to madness. The hot sky above her had stifled her. She could not bear anything.

"You should have staid in Philadelphia," she said, "you cannot have accomplished your business already."

"Don't talk to me in that way!" he cried, throwing her hand from him. "You kill me! I came back to plead once more with you. I am so abject that I can beg of you to marry me for pity only. I shall never be anything without you. I am going to hell as fast as I can."

She looked at him coldly. "And you wish to take me with you," she said. "I do not love you, save as a sincere friend might do. All my influence has been used to make you leave your weak ways of killing time. You have not reformed. You gamble, you drink, you are, I know not what. Florian, for the love of Heaven, let me respect you!"

Her voice had lost all its coldness, and was vibrating with an almost passionate entreaty, the sight of her seemed to madden him. He could not look at her and know that she could never be his. He attempted to seize her hands, exclaiming:

"Help me, then! Before God, I tell you, you are the only power who can save me from utter destruction. Promise to marry me—in five years—in ten years; let me have it to look forward to!" His eyes, imploring, burning, fearfully eager, besought hers.

"Florian, listen to me," she said with solemn earnestness, "and believe what I tell you. If I marry you without having anything but a strong friendly feeling for you, I should save you from nothing bad. I should be a curse to you—a curse beyond your imaginings. I should, being bound to you, learn to hate you, and myself as well. I am not too good," with a strong shudder, and a fiery flash of eyes. "Such a bond would be a chain forged by the infernal devils. If I did not love a husband, words have no power to describe the intensity of my dislike. Now, as my friend, I am sincerely attached to you. You are very winning, Florian, you are very attractive; I can easily imagine that girls should love you. But I—I cannot."

Her last words were uttered with a soft imploring in them, an entreaty for nobility and strength in him. She rose from her seat and said:

"Shall we not go home, now?" She extended her hand, lightly touching his head, her own face too sad for tears. He rose also, his wretched face becoming fixed in a look of unutterable misery.

"I think, if you will excuse me, I will take a stroll on the beach before I come up to the house."

His unnatural tone, his whole appearance alarmed her. She took a step toward him saying:

"You will take care of yourself, Florian? You are so impetuous, I am continually worried about you."

"Am I looking remarkably impetuous?" smiling ghastly upon her.

"No. I am not frightened about you. You look as if you might harm yourself. You will not?"

"I promise you," and not looking at her again, he disappeared behind the trees. Submit stood many minutes looking at the place where he had stood. Now that he was gone, she was weak and faint. She was near the edge of the woods, and puffs of sultry air came from the fields to her; that air seemed stifling and fatal to her. The red sunlight beyond the wood, pitiless and unobscured, was like a doom to her. A dreadful oppression was upon her, nameless, and from which she could not escape. A mantle of misery enveloped her. Her lips were feverish, her hands burning. She took her hat and went vaguely forward, deeper into the woods, conscious only of one wish—for rest, and peace, and coolness. "They say it is a deep and thick wood further in," she said; "there, surely, I shall find rest from this heat and drought."

The sun, deeply westering, glanced rarely between the rugged boles of the old pine trees. She would soon have a world of gloom to herself. If only it would grow cooler!

"Submit looks pale, lately," said Seabury to his wife.

"She's under the weather, like all of us, I s'pose," said Mrs. Seabury, with a worried look.

"Where did she go this afternoon?"

"O, I don't know; down to the woods, I guess."

"She ought to be back by this time, she'll get a fever."

Seabury stood at the door, his hands behind him, looking off beneath the mild starlight to the long stretch of woods that lay in an unearthly stillness in the warm air. The atmosphere was full of a strong scent of burning wood, and to the right, several miles away, a bright and growing light shot into the sky, rising, dying, but wonderfully calm for such a spectacle, for there was no wind.

"The woods in the south district will all have to go, wont they?" asked the wife, gazing toward the light, remembering two other times when she had seen just such a glow in a sultry summer.

"Yes, and everything else, too, I should say," responded Seabury. "Squire Tilton was round there to-day. It only begun this morning, but he says it's awful. Unless there's rain, I don't see why the fire should stop as long's there's any stuff to burn. Thank the Lord, there's no wind!"

A tall figure came from the lilac tree where it had been standing. Nicolson's face was full of anxiety; his hand, clasped over a willow stick he had been peeling, was shut with a strain.

"Has Miss Seabury returned?" he asked.

"No; and I'm worried about her," spoke up Mrs. Seabury, quickly.

"She went to the woods, yonder?" pointing with his stick.

"Yes; but that is five hours ago, sure, and Submit is more than half sick."

"Where is Mr. Hunt?"

"I'm sure I don't know."

Nicolson thought he had seen him going toward the wood, but that would not deter him. As he walked down the path, he heard Seabury say:

"I shall harness up and ride over to the south to see how the fire looks, sir. Over the hill there it shoots up in tongues."

Nicolson looked off as the fisherman pointed. Scarlet flames leaped up, piercing the dark, hot atmosphere, and wreaths of beautiful smoke curled slowly in the glare, then the flame flickered low, leaving a lurid glow on the horizon. Nicolson reached the woods and plunged hurriedly in, thinking as he went, of the stories the village people had told him of people lost in Duxbury woods. A horror of the night and time was upon him. It made no difference that he repeatedly told himself that it was not probable that Submit, who had lived here all her life, would allow herself to get lost in the woods. He would, at least, penetrate the darkness here. The low, throbbing heat of the night, the smoke, the faint, dry mist that half-obscured the stars, enveloped his brain in a deep despondency, and burning through every other feeling, electrifying the languid life this weather gave him, was the love he felt for Submit. The days that had passed since she first came had made all clear to him. He loved her, and the whole resolve of his being, the mightiest purpose of his life, was to win her for the loving, regnant wife he had dreamed of since earliest youth. Hope and uncertainty possessed him. He could not yet utter words never to be recalled, never to be said again, until the impulse overmastered him, and he trembled at the power within him.

With head bent, and eyes dilated painfully, he pushed on between the branches, thinking how foolish and unsuccessful his search must be, but compelled to go on with it, for his restlessness would not allow him to pause. More than a mile from the place where Submit had met Florian, Nicolson saw a handkerchief hanging silently on a branch of a saffras bush. Its texture and delicate perfume made him sure it was Submit's. She had, then, wandered thus far. He hurried on with headlong speed, not knowing where he was going, and indeed it would not have mattered, for he had not the slightest clue that should lead him to take a special direction.

The sound of crackling wood grew more distinct; the report of falling trees had sounded like guns of doom ever since he had started. Now the air was sultrier, more suffocating, and filled with the strong exhalations of pine, that at a distance had been pleasant. He reached a slight elevation, and found to his surprise that, below him, instead of woods, lay a dry and parched field, over which a fire had run, leaving it blackened and smoking. The glare of the fire was plainer and plainer; the field lay sullen in the flickering, strong light, and every moment made objects more horribly distinct. At the right was the fire, not yet to the boundary of the field, but striding onward. He stood irresolute a moment, then dashed across the field in the direction of the fire.

"I cannot find her—I cannot rest," he said, trying to find comfort in the thought that she had gone to a neighbor's, or had already reached home. The fire was burning over a series of low hills, or more properly knolls, sweeping up their sides, seeming to devour the very earth itself. One of these hills, the first which had been burnt over, Nicolson climbed, and standing on the charred and heated ground, looked to the fire. That sight stirred him to an almost intoxicated excitement; the terrible heat made his blood boil, and the novelty of the moment gave him a factitious strength. Below him, further from the flames, which receded rapidly, so dry was the fuel, he saw a group of men from the villages about. They stood still, sometimes shading their faces with their hats, speaking but rarely, all garrulousness subdued by the power before them. In that moment many even of the most practical forgot that the fire was consuming hundreds of their dollars, forgot everything but the vivid grandeur of the scene. Nicolson saw Seabury in that red glare, his face toward the flames, staring with all his soul. Restlessly Nicolson's eyes roamed from one direction to another. He could not forget that he had not found Submit, that he had started in search of her, and he could not shake off a foreboding of something evil, something he must strive to arrest. Yet, how? His face, even with that light upon it, looked pallid and strained from the emotion that made him suffer. He felt as if struggling in a dream which held him in a grasp of horror. The fearful beauty glowing up to heaven made no other impression on him at the moment than to intensify the maddening doubt and gloom of his soul. His reticent nature was roused to a pitch unknown to mercurial temperaments. Passion and fear for his beloved held possession of him. The feeling which had hitherto only shown itself in flashes to Submit now blazed with a force that overcame his will, strong as that was.

His eyes had left the fierce shining of the fire and had dwelt for the last five minutes vaguely upon a peninsular-like point of woods that ran out toward the field behind him, and on the other side of which in spring was a deep, swift brook rushing rapidly seaward. Tall, slender pines stood here in the direct line of the fire, and Nicolson's excited eyes dwelt there, until upon their strong vision grew into a partial distinctness the sight of a figure reclining against a fallen tree. After that first fancy, the fickleness of the flames put that place in gloom, and Nicolson dared not leave his position until he had seen again whether the thing were a fantasy of his imagination. Now a flame shot up with diabolical brilliance, and in the yellow glare of light Nicolson saw what he thought was a woman in light clothes, motionless against the log. Why did she not move? Did she not know death was tramping toward her, a death too dreadful? Was not that heat too great to be borne in that place? Was it not, in truth, some play of light upon birch bark? Nicolson could not stay to decide any question. He fled down the hill as if the demon of the fire pursued him. Over the blackened field which had been so lately burned that the ground scorched his feet as he sped on. The distance was greater than he had thought, seeing it by the light of the fire, and as he went on the heat increased, so that his panting breath hardly relieved his lungs, and the floating aches half checked him.

"O my God!" he thought, "she must be dead, or she could not stay in such a place."

Struggling and stumbling on, he at last knelt exhausted by the tree where she sat. It was she, pallid, senseless, her dark hair drifting over the log, her hand lying heavy and inanimate on the hot earth. An exclamation of love and despair passed his lips as he took her in his arms and felt how helpless she was. He staggered back, preferring to cross the stream, now so low that but a few inches of water ran in its course. A tongue of terrific light shot upward nearer them; it reached forward as if eager for the fleeing mortals. Its light made the pallor, the immobility of Submit's face still more visible to the man who carried her. He laid her down on the bank of the stream and filled his hat with water, bathing her head, dashing it upon her brow, a piercing joy in his heart as he saw a languid movement of the eyelids. He waited for nothing more; seizing her in his arms again, he hurried on, plunging through the briery fields across a marsh, out upon the still, quiet beach where an ebbing tide was rippling slowly out to sea. Here a faint wind refreshed him. He sat down on the sands, and Submit, in a hurried, weak way, withdrew herself from his embrace, drew her hand vaguely over her eyes and asked in a bewildered voice:

"Where did you find me?"

Raising her eyes to his face as she spoke, the glance she saw there drew her soul upward to meet it. She could not withdraw her eyes, and an unusual physical weakness made her lack self-control. More than all that, the time decreed in heaven had come when love should know its own. He did not appear to have heard her question, and she instantly forgot it. His eyes glowed with a purple fire on her, and his face, with features strangely still, was yet transfigured with an inward light that burned with pure intensity.

"I have been silent until I must speak," he said, leaning forward as if to take her hands, then restraining himself, and slightly withdrawing from her.

"Do you know what I would say to you?" a thrill of tenderness exceeding even the passion in his voice. "My entire being cannot have been so voiceless as not to tell you. I love you."

Her eyes, which were so marvellously beautiful and dear to him, as brown eyes only can be to some gray ones, were upon his with an expression he could not mistake. That deep, exquisite and faithful feeling of her soul was there. She loved him. He took her hand, holding it with a pressure that told more to the girl than any stormy demonstration could have done. The light of the burning woods made his face plain to her. In it she read surety of a noble love, human with passion, divine with tenderness and truth.

They sat there for a while, uttering detached words, looking at each other in the radiance of a just confessed love. Then Nicolson saw a shade of some remembrance fall like a dusky veil over her face.

"You love the Yankee girl Submit?" she asked, some unuttered sadness in her tone.

"I love you, whoever you are," he answered; then said, "you cannot surely think I would hesitate one moment because you are not in the same grade in which society has placed me, that that has made a difference to me, has deterred me? I think you know me well, know a nature that could not soon speak of its strongest feeling."

She smiled to think how well she knew him, better even than he thought.

"No, I could not have loved a man whom I had seen hesitating out of regard to my station. Contempt would have smothered any affection."

Again she paused, as if unable to utter what she must say. She withdrew her hand from his and pressed it upon her heart. She turned her face away, not daring to meet his gaze. Then speaking slowly she said:

"My childish fancies and remembrances did not err when they told me later how you have been brought up in the beliefs, the hates and loves of your clan. I have imagined many times your face when I should tell you that I am a child of a clan whom the Nicolsons deem it a virtue to hate. My name is Jean McDonald of the clan of McDonalds against which you are sworn."

For us, whose growth is of to-day, whose feelings, happily, are not nurtured to perpetuate enmities, few of us can understand the emotion with which Nicolson listened to the girl beside him. For centuries it had been almost a religion of his family to hate the race to which this woman belonged. Deep rooted as his life, bound to the feeling by every consideration of his past, this sudden revelation sent out all hope from his soul. Torn by terrible feelings, his heart convulsed by this sudden revealing, he saw only one path before him, the path he was to walk alone. It seemed to him that honor itself called him away; his entire education could not so suddenly combat new ideas. Submit saw the struggle and the wrench of resolve. She sat dumbly, looking her fate in the face. She had hoped for nothing else, and yet she loved him profoundly, with all the strength of her nature, which was always constant, while there was something of southern fire and intensity in the dark eyes that saw separation in the face of the man she loved.

With a sudden fierce gesture, a sudden up-flaming of strongly burning fires, Nicolson turned and clasped Submit's hands, pressing his quivering hot lips upon them, murmuring hurried words that she understood without distinctly hearing. Then after a moment he said, "Let me take you home, I cannot leave you here."

"I will remain," she said, feeling a return of the prostration that had attacked her in her wanderings in the woods.

"Go," she said. "The sea is my friend; I will stay here."

He had not the strength to stay; his eyes embraced her, his colorless face seemed unable to turn from hers, but the next moment he was gone, quickly tramping over the sands in the direction of the nearest railroad station. Submit saw his tall figure in the crimson glow of light; it hurried on and turned a curve in the beach.

A wild, white face upturned to the skies, deep eyes with unutterable grief in them, then Submit's head sank slowly and she said:

"After all, men cannot love as women do—though he loves me—loves me."

The last words were half inaudible, the stupor of the disease that had been upon her all day came again to her. She sank down, quiet and senseless, in the glare of the element that swept up the woods.

CHAPTER IV.

It was not until months after that they could speak to Submit of the time when the woods burned. Not on account of Nicolson, for his unexpected departure was of minor consequence in the eyes of the Seaburys and of the village. It is true they commented on it, and surmised that he had been rejected by Submit in favor of Florian Hunt.

"She loved Florian, I think," said Mrs. Seabury to her husband; "how can I ever tell her?"

"You may never have to tell her," was Seabury's reply as his face darkened with fear.

"You don't mean—" whispered his wife in a tremulous tone, her heart seeming to stand still as she listened.

"The doctor thinks it's a hard case, she's got the fever bad," said Seabury, rising and walking softly up and down the room. "Don't worry about telling her anything."

Mrs. Seabury did not reply. She stole in softly to sit in the darkened room, faithfully, as if the child there had in verity been her own flesh and blood.

Later, when Submit was better and sat up a little in the old-fashioned armchair, having it always turned toward the sea, to Mrs. Seabury's surprise, the first question she asked was not of the two men who had gone, but of her own childhood.

"You said my mother left me with you before I was a year old," she said, looking up at the sky long ago cleared by sweet rains.

"Yes," replied Mrs. Seabury, who never cared to discuss that topic, always liking to think this proud girl was really her own, childless as she was.

"Tell me of it again, please," said Submit.

"There aint much to tell. You know it all. Your mother came over from Scotland for the sea-voyage on account of her health. She wanted a quiet place, and one of my cousins in New York who saw her there sent her here. My own little baby had just died then, and she wanted me to nurse hers. I took you. Soon the doctors ordered her South. She had only two servants with her, for her husband was dead, and she had no relatives whom she liked to ask to travel with an invalid. I remember when she came here to bid you good-by that she said you were the last of that line of the McDonalds. She could not take you with her, her health was so poor. She said she should be back in a few months, and take you to Scotland with her. Not six months after, I saw her death in the paper; she died in Cuba. By that time I loved you as if you were my own little girl. I dreaded the time when one of the servants should come, but no one came. I learnt, almost to a certainty, that they were lost on a ship which was wrecked coming from Havana about that time. To quiet my conscience, I advertised, but not widely, I was so fearful. I have been afraid I've kept you from property in Scotland. It's haunted me like a sin, but I couldn't help it."

Submit hardly noticed the sadness of her foster-mother's voice.

"I should like to go to Scotland," she said.

Nothing more was said on the subject. Submit grew gradually better. The clear, soft, and yet crisp days that sometimes come in the last of autumn were now shedding their smiles of balm on the sea-side town.

Submit began to walk slowly up and down the beach with her mother to support her steps. Suddenly she asked:

"Where is Florian? You do not speak of him."

Mrs. Seabury looked frightened. "We did not think you were strong enough," she began, hesitatingly. "It is dreadful; I can hardly tell you. You remember the fire."

Submit's shudder replied for her.

"Poor Florian, he must have got lost in the woods—"

"Tell me!" cried Submit, "is he dead?"

Her companion bent her head. "The men found him the next day. They knew it must be he, the fire had suffocated without burning him much."

A bond of iron loosened from Submit's heart with the copious tears that came. At last she said:

"I can go home alone, mother; you need not wait." And Mrs. Seabury left her, she thought, to mourn over her dead lover. But it was rather to be thankful for his death, horrible though it had been. Submit walked to a point of rocks and sat down, drawing her shawl close about her, for the sun could not thoroughly warm the winds of November.

A subtle hope of gladness was in her heart, why, she knew not, for a happy love was shut from her. The sinking sun colored the fleeces through which it sank, and they doubled themselves upon the clear water. Invigoration and strength were in the air and scene, and a slight color came to Submit's thin cheeks.

"O, let this be a sign of peace," she thought, extending her clasped hands towards sky and sea. But it was not peace she felt. It was a tumult of pulses, a hurrying of red blood, a thrilling of some unaccountable emotion. The glory in the west deepened to intenser colors, and still she sat there, moved by some power she could not recognize, for was not he whom she loved forever parted from her?

A figure sprang over the rocks, stooped beside her, devoured her with glances at once powerful and soft.

"I could not stay," whispered Nicolson, sitting down by her and drawing her to him. "Love and holy nature are stronger than fends and traditions. I claim what God has given me, and knew that I am right."

"Our path opens in light," softly said Submit, pointing toward that stream of sunshine. And with such a chiasm of love descending on them, it is well to leave them.

SINK OR SWIM:

—OR—

HARRY RAYMOND'S RESOLVE.

BY HORATIO ALGER, JR.

AUTHOR OF "LUCK AND PLUCK," "RAGGED DICK SERIES," "CAMPAIGN SERIES," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER IV.

AFTER THE FUNERAL.

THE grief of Mrs. Raymond and her two children, for the death of the husband and father, was very sharp and poignant. Had he died at home of some lingering illness, their minds would have been prepared in some measure for the stroke. But cut off as he was in an instant, the blow fell upon them very heavily.

On the third day after the body was found, the funeral took place. Harry attended as chief mourner, for his mother was compelled to remain at home on account of illness. But when the funeral was over other cares forced themselves upon their attention. It is only the rich who can afford to give themselves up unreservedly to the luxury of grief. The poor must rouse themselves to battle for their bread. In Mr. Raymond's death his family had not only lost an affectionate husband and father, but the one upon whom they had leaned for support. How they were to live in future was a question which demanded their earliest consideration.

They were gathered in the little sitting-room one evening about a week after Mr. Raymond's death. Mrs. Raymond was looking sad and pale, while Harry's face was sober and earnest. He already began to realize that his father's cares and responsibilities had fallen on his young shoulders, and that it was his duty to take that father's place as well as he should be able.

"It is time, mother," he said, "that we began to talk about our future plans."

"I am sure I don't know what we shall do," said his mother, sighing, for to her the future looked formidable.

But Harry was young, healthy and sanguine, and his spirits were lighter.

"Whatever we do, mother," he said, "we won't despond. There are a great many ways of getting a living, and I know that we shall get along somehow."

"I don't know," said Mrs. Raymond, dubiously.

"Do you remember that piece I spoke the other day?"

"The one you got the prize for, Harry?" said his sister.

"It wasn't for that only, but for speaking the whole term. The piece began with 'Sink or Swim,' and I told you then that I meant to take that for my motto."

"What do you mean, Harry?"

"I mean this, mother," said Harry with energy, "that, sink or swim, I am going to do my best, and if I do that I think it'll be swim and not sink."

"But you are so young, Harry," said his mother, not very hopefully.

"I am fifteen," said Harry, drawing himself up. "I am well and strong, and I can work."

"I don't know what you can find to do."

"O, there are plenty of things," said Harry, cheerfully, though rather vaguely. It would, perhaps, have puzzled him to enumerate the plenty of things, but he was hopeful and confident, and that was in his favor.

"Do you think you could build houses, Harry?" asked Katy.

"None that would be worth living in," he said, smiling. "I don't mean to be a carpenter. It would take too long to learn, and the pay is never very large. But the first thing to do, mother, is to see how we stand."

"There's this house. That is all we have, and Squire Turner holds a mortgage on that."

"The mortgage is seven hundred dollars. How much has been paid on it?"

"Three hundred dollars."

"Then we own it all except four hundred dollars. It is worth fully twelve hundred dollars, so that we are worth at least eight hundred dollars."

"That won't last very long," said Mrs. Raymond.

"Not if we spend it, but I hope we shan't have to do that. Still it gives us something to fall back upon, in case I don't succeed very well at first. Then there is the furniture. That must be worth at least two hundred dollars."

"It cost considerably more."

"Never mind, we will call it two hundred dollars. You see," he added cheerfully, "we have got up to a thousand already. Now, mother, have you got any money in the house?"

"About twenty-five dollars."

"That is not much, but it is something. I suppose that is all."

"Yes, I suppose so."

"Well, it isn't so bad as it might be. Think of those who are left wholly destitute, with starvation staring them in the face.

When you think of that, we are quite rich in comparison."

"I might have had something to help along," said Mrs. Raymond, "but my father lost what little property we had before he died, and left nothing at all."

"Wasn't he a soldier in the war of 1812?" inquired Harry.

"Yes, he served for over a year."

"Didn't he get any pension, or anything else from government?"

"No, he got no pension. He got a grant of land—eighty acres, I believe—somewhere out in Wisconsin."

"What did he do with the land?"

"He never did anything. Land was only a dollar and a quarter an acre, and nobody would give him that. An agent offered him twenty-five dollars for his grant, but he would not take it. Then he put away the paper, and never did anything more about it."

"Have you got the paper now, mother?" asked Harry, interested.

"Yes, I believe so. I think I have it somewhere in my bureau."

"If it wouldn't be too much trouble I would like to see it. Can't I find it?"

"No, I will go for it."

Mrs. Raymond went up stairs, and shortly returned with a paper yellow with age, setting forth that Henry Mann, in consideration of services rendered to the government, was entitled to a quarter section of land, the location of which was specified.

"A quarter section?" said Harry. "That's a hundred and sixty acres—more than you thought."

"Is it?" said Mrs. Raymond, listlessly. "I suppose it doesn't make much difference now which it is. After so long a time there is no chance of getting it, and I suppose it wouldn't be worth much."

"I don't know about that," said Harry. "At any rate it's worth looking into. Shall I keep the paper?"

"Yes, if you wish."

"I will go round to-morrow, and see Squire Turner, and perhaps he can give me some information about it. But we haven't talked about our plans yet."

"I have thought of nothing."

"But I have. I will tell you about it, and see what you think. First, I thought of hiring some land, and turning farmer, but that's hard work, and requires more knowledge than I have got. Besides, I don't believe I could earn much."

"No, I don't think you could earn much that way."

"Then I thought I might go to the city, and get a small stock of goods, and go round peddling. Or, perhaps, I might get the agency for some popular article, and travel about with it."

"I am afraid it would be a great undertaking. Besides, you have no money to invest."

"That's true, but I could raise some. Squire Turner might advance me one hundred dollars, and increase the mortgage to that amount. A hundred dollars, or even less, would buy all the goods I should want at one time. That would be my capital in trade. As soon as I made money enough I would pay it back, and then we should be as well off as we are now."

"I don't know what to think," said Mrs. Raymond, sighing. "I never had any head for business. I always left those things to your father."

"But you will consent to my asking such a loan?"

"Yes, if you really think it will do any good."

"I do. Remember my motto, mother, 'Sink or swim' I've made up my mind to swim."

Thus ended the conference. Harry saw that it was as his mother said—she had no head for business. He must form his own plans, and carry them through without assistance.

CHAPTER V.

SQUIRE TURNER.

BEFORE doing anything else, Harry determined to consult some one about the land warrant. It might be worth nothing, or very little, but in their present circumstances they could not afford to give up even a little.

As he had suggested in his conversation with his mother, he decided to call on Squire Turner and ask his advice. He did not particularly like the squire, who was not popular in the neighborhood; but still he had the reputation of being well acquainted with matters of business, and, though not a regular lawyer, was accustomed to draw up deeds, and conveyances, and wills, and in fact supplied the place of a lawyer so far as his neighbors were concerned. There was no one in the village so likely as the squire to advise him correctly about the land warrant. So Harry put on his cap the next morning, and with the document in his breast pocket set out on his way to Squire Turner's residence.

It was a large, square dwelling-house setting back some distance from the road. There were two gates, at the right and left hand, and a semi-circular drive-way extending from one to the other passed the front door.

It was half-past eight o'clock, and James Turner was standing on the front steps with his books under his arm. He had just come out, and was about to start for school. James surveyed Harry's approach with some curiosity.

"Halloo," said he, "what do you want?"

This was not a very civil or cordial greeting, and Harry did not feel compelled to satisfy his curiosity.

"My business is not with you," he said. "It is with your father."

"I suppose you've come for a job," said James, coarsely. "I suppose you'll be awful poor."

"I don't know about that," said Harry, coolly. "I guess I shall be able to make a living."

"Maybe my father'll hire you to saw wood."

"Thank you, but that isn't the business I am thinking of following."

"Perhaps you are going to be a merchant," sneered James.

"Very likely I may be some time."

Harry was not much troubled by the rudeness of James, for he cared nothing for him or his good opinion. James was a little nettled to find that his taunts rebounded so harmlessly, and this led him to one parting shot.

Harry had ascended the front steps, and was about to ring the bell, when James said, "You needn't ring. You can go round to the backdoor."

"Is that where you go in?" asked Harry.

"No."

"Then, if you use the front door, I shall," and Harry rang a peal a little louder than he would have otherwise done.

James muttered something about his not knowing his place; but before the door was opened marched off for school.

The door was speedily opened by a servant.

"Is Squire Turner in?" asked Harry.

"Yes, he is. Wont you come in?"

Harry entered, and passed into a room on the right, which the squire generally used as a sitting-room. It was provided with a desk, studded with pigeon-holes, most of which were filled with papers. Here it was that the amateur lawyer received business calls, and transacted such business as came to his hands.

He looked round as Harry entered.

Squire Turner, whom I may as well describe here, was a tall man, with iron-gray hair, and a slight stoop in the shoulders. His face, which was rather harsh, began to show wrinkles. It was not, on the whole, a very pleasing or encouraging aspect, but Harry Raymond, who was used to the squire's looks, did not waste much thought upon this. It was his nature to go directly to the point.

"Did you want to see me?" asked the squire, adjusting his spectacles, and looking at our hero.

"Yes sir."

"Given in return for his services in the war of 1812."

"Yes sir. Is it worth anything?"

"Didn't he ever take up the land?"

"No sir."

"Why not?"

"I don't know, sir, except that Wisconsin was a good ways off, and I believe he had some property at that time, so that he did not need it. Mother says he was offered twenty-five dollars by an agent, but wouldn't accept it. After that, he appears to have put it away in his drawer, and forgotten it."

"Humph" said the squire, reflectively, running his eyes over the document.

HARRY'S INTERVIEW WITH SQUIRE TURNER.

"Yes sir," said Harry.

"I'm rather busy now. Be as quick as you can."

"My father's death," said Harry, his lip grieving a little as he said it, "makes it necessary for me to form some plans about getting along. I was reckoning up yesterday how much we had to start with, when my mother showed me a paper which may be worth something. Probably you will know. So I have brought it along to show you."

"Where is it?" asked Squire Turner.

Harry drew it out from his pocket, and handed it to the squire.

"I see it's a land warrant in favor of your grandfather," he said, after a little examination.

"Do you think I can get anything for it?" asked Harry.

"I am not prepared to say positively," said the squire, slowly. "My impression is, that after this length of time, it would be impossible to get anything for it."

"I was afraid that might be the case," said Harry. "Is there any way of finding out about it?"

"If you'll leave it with me, I will take steps to ascertain," said Squire Turner.

"Thank you, sir. If we get anything for it we shall of course be willing to pay you for your trouble."

Most men would at once have assured Harry that no payment would be necessary, but Squire Turner was never known to refuse a fee—he was too fond of money for that—nor was it his intention to do so now. He accordingly answered, “Well, I will see about it. It may take some time.”

“There was something else I wished to speak to you about,” said Harry.

“Proceed.”

“You hold a mortgage upon our place.”

“Well?”

“It is now reduced to four hundred dollars by payments made by my father.”

“Do you wish to pay the remainder?”

“No sir, I am not able to. What I want is, to get another hundred dollars from you on the same security, making it five hundred dollars instead of four.”

“What do you want with the money?”

“I have been thinking that I might get a stock of goods in the city, and go about selling them. I have got to do something, and I think I might make money that way.”

“I couldn’t let you have the money,” said the squire.

“No sir, I suppose not. But mother is willing, as she will tell you herself.”

“I don’t know but I can do it,” said the squire, after a little pause. “Mind, I don’t give any advice as to the plan you have in view. You may make it pay, and you may not. Perhaps it would be better to get something to do about here.”

“There isn’t much chance in Vernon,” answered Harry, “and there are plenty to do what little work there is.”

“Well, that’s your affair. About the money, I will consider the matter, and if you will come round to-morrow, I will let you know what I have decided.”

“Thank you, sir.”

“And about the land warrant, I will write out to a lawyer I know in Milwaukie, and ask his opinion. When his answer comes, I will let you know.”

“Thank you, sir,” said Harry, and his business being at an end, he took his cap, and with a bow left the room.

On the whole he was better pleased with the result of the interview than he anticipated. Squire Turner had not been very cordial or sympathetic, it is true, but he seemed disposed to grant the request which he had made, and though Harry did not like him, he had a very good opinion of his business abilities.

“If we can only get a hundred dollars or so for the land warrant,” he said to himself, “it will be a great help.”

CHAPTER VI.

HARRY OBTAINS A PLACE.

ON the way back from Squire Turner’s Harry stepped into the village store, as he had one or two small articles to purchase for his mother. This store was kept by Jonas Porter, a man over fifty, in rather poor health. On this account he was obliged to depend considerably upon two young men, whom he employed as assistants. One of them, John Gaylord, was twenty-five years of age, and an efficient salesman. The other, Alfred Harper, was about eighteen, and of course less experienced and valuable. The last was employed partly in driving the store wagon with goods to different parts of the village.

Harry entered the store, and going up to the counter, said to the proprietor who was standing behind, “Mr. Porter, I want two pounds of brown sugar.”

“How is your mother?” asked the store-keeper.

“Not very well,” answered Harry.

“No, I suppose not. Your father’s death must be a great blow to her.”

“Yes sir. It is to all of us.”

“I hope she will soon be feeling better. Health is a blessing we don’t appreciate till we lose it. I have not been feeling very well, lately. In fact I am not fit to be in the store.”

“Where is Alfred Harper? I have not seen him for a day or two.”

“He has been taken sick, and has gone home. He may be sick some weeks. It is unlucky just now, for I am not fit to be in the store. I wish I could get somebody to take his place for a few weeks.”

Here an idea struck Harry. He was not as old as Alfred Harper, but he was strong, and he thought he might be able to do his work. He decided to suggest it to the store-keeper.

“If you thought I would do,” he said, “I should be glad to come into the store. I have got to go to work now.”

“I am afraid you are too young,” said Mr. Porter, doubtfully. “How old are you?”

“Fifteen, sir.”

“That is young.”

“Yes sir, but I am pretty stout and strong of my age.”

“You look so. Can you drive a horse?”

“O yes sir. I have done that a good many times.”

“I don’t know,” said the store-keeper hesitating a little. "You couldn't do as much as Alfred; still you could help a good deal. I have always heard good accounts of you. Mr. Gaylord, how will it do to engage Harry Raymond a few weeks while Alfred is away?"

"I think it would be a good plan, sir," said John Gaylord, who was familiar with Harry's good reputation, and had a very favorable opinion of him. "It would lighten your labors a good deal."

"Very true, and I am really not able to be in the store. Well, Harry," he proceeded, "I guess you may come."

"When shall I come?"

"The sooner the better."

"Then I'll come this afternoon," said Harry, promptly. "I want to go home and split up a little wood for mother, enough to last her."

"Very well. About the pay, I will give you six dollars a week."

Six dollars a week! This seemed to Harry a large sum. His father had only been paid two dollars per day, and therefore received but twice as much. He had hoped, to be sure, to earn more as a peddler, but then his expenses would be large, and, after all, he might fail, for it was but an experiment. Here there was no risk, but a certain weekly income. Besides, and this was an important consideration, it would enable him to continue at home, and he knew that just at this time his mother and little Katy would feel his absence more than at any other time.

Good news always quickens the step. Harry entered the house briskly, and placed the parcels he had brought from the store upon the table.

"Here are the sugar and butter, mother," he said. "Now I'll go out and split you some wood, for I've got to go to work this afternoon."

"What kind of work?" asked Mrs. Raymond, looking up.

"Alfred Harper is sick, and so is Mr. Porter. So he has engaged me to take Alfred's place for the present, at a salary of six dollars a week. I think that's pretty lucky."

"Then you won't have to leave home," said his mother, brightening up for the first time. "I was so afraid you would have to, and that would make it very lonely for Katy and me."

"No, I shall be at home, only you won't see much of me, for I've got to go to the store early, and I suppose I shall get home late."

"At any rate you won't be away from Vernon. I don't think I could bear to part from you just now."

"Did you call and see Squire Turner, Harry?" asked Katy.

"O yes, I almost forgot to tell you. He has taken the paper, and is going to write to a lawyer in Milwaukee about it."

"Does he think it is worth anything?"

"He doesn't give much hope, it's so many years ago, so we won't count upon it. I asked him about letting me have a hundred dollars to start in business with, and he said he would let me know to-morrow. I didn't know then that I could get a place with Mr. Porter."

"I would rather have you with Mr. Porter."

"Yes, I would rather stay there for the present. But you must remember that it won't last but a few weeks. After that I may have to do as I proposed."

Harry went out, and labored manfully at the woodpile for a couple of hours. Then he got the basket and carried in considerable and piled it up in the kitchen, so that his mother might not have the trouble of going out to get it.

Meanwhile Squire Turner was writing a letter to a Mr. Robinson, a Milwaukee lawyer, whom he knew. He stated the matter fully, giving his correspondent, however, the idea that the warrant had come into his own possession. In fact he had made up his mind, in case the paper should be worth anything, to turn it to his own benefit, by hook or by crook. He was a rich man already, to be sure, but he was not contented with what he had, nor was he likely to be. He was, as I have already stated, a grasping, avaricious man, and as long as money went into his pocket, he cared very little that it was at the expense of the widow and orphan. He did not build any very high hopes on the warrant. Still he was not a man to let a chance slip by.

In the course of a fortnight he received an answer to his letter. As it is of some importance, I will transcribe it here.

"Milwaukee, Wis., May 27, 18—

"MR. TURNER:—Dear sir, yours of the 21st, asking information as to the probable value of a certain land warrant in your possession, has come to hand. It appears that the land was located, though the owner never appeared to take possession of it. In consequence it has fallen into the hands of others. The tract in question is a valuable one, being situated only a few miles out of Milwaukie, and has upon it several valuable buildings. My own opinion is, that if the matter is followed up, though you might not be able to get possession without a protracted law suit, so much value being involved, the present holders would be willing to pay a considerable sum by way of compromise. It might be worth while for you to come on, and see about the matter yourself. I will assist you to the best of my ability. Yours respectfully,

 "FRANCIS ROBINSON."

Squire Turner read this letter with lively interest. So the neglected yellow paper promised to be valuable, after all. Perhaps, indeed, it might be worth thousands of dollars. In that case, Mrs. Raymond would be very well off, after all.

The main question in Squire Turner's mind was, how could he manage so as to profit by it himself. He was meditating upon this as he walked home from the post-office, when he met Harry Raymond, driving the store-wagon.

Harry paused, and hailed the squire.

"Squire Turner," he said, "have you found out anything yet about that paper I left with you?"

"Not yet," said the squire, falsely, for he had no intention of disclosing the truth at present. "I am afraid we can't get anything for it after so many years. When I hear anything I will let you know."

"I was afraid it was too long ago," said Harry; "so I am not much disappointed."

"I am thinking of taking a little trip to the West before long," said Squire Turner. "I may be able to find out something about it then."

Harry started the horse towards the store, and thought so little of the land warrant that he quite forgot to mention the matter to his mother in the evening.

JESUS BLESSED THE LITTLE ONES.

BY S. V. S.—.

Often, in my little Bible,
 I have read the story o'er,
 Of Christ blessing little children,
 And I love it more and more;
 For it seems so sweet and tender,
 With the love he only knew,
 When he blessed the little children,
 Saying, "Heaven is like to you."

If I could have stood beside him,
 And have heard him gently say
 "Little one, receive my blessing," While his hand upon me lay,
 O, I should have been so happy,
 And I should have loved him so,
 As I know the little children
 Did, so long and long ago.

Every time I read the story,
 Kneeling low, I try to pray
 That I may receive his blessing,
 Though Heaven seems so far away;
 And I feel a gentle quiet
 Stealing o'er me, and I know
 Jesus loves the little children
 Just the same as long ago.

LOST AND FOUND.

BY MISS CAMILLA WILLIAN.

ONE day there was a great show of soldiers in Broadway, New York, and everybody ran to see it. Men, women and children crowded forward, pushing, treading on each other, making a muss generally. And when at length the regiment had gone by, some people found that they had lost their company, or lost their way, or lost their purses, or their clothes. Scarcely anybody came out of that crowd as they went into it.

NINA AND THE LOST CHILD.

A pretty French nursery-girl who had run down from the Fifth Avenue hotel to see the soldiers, lost her bonnet.

Now French nursery-girls do not usually wear bonnets, they wear white caps; but Nina Berger was a nursery-girl without any one to nurse, and could do as she pleased. The little girl who had been under her care was dead; and the parents kept Nina because they were fond of her.

"Well, that is fine, to lose one's bonnet," she said, with a laugh. "But then a veil is better than nothing."

So she threw her veil over her head, and was scampering back to her hotel again, when at a street corner she saw just in front of her a pair of eyes. I don't mean to say that she saw only one pair, and I don't mean to say that there were nothing but eyes. But these eyes were so large, and bright, and sorrowful, and frightened, all together, that she could not help noticing them. There was a boy to them.

"He was a very pretty boy, white and delicate, with wavy black hair, and he was very prettily dressed in a Turkish costume.

Nina stopped and looked at him, and when she did that he went nearer to her, and tried to speak. But he was so near bursting right out crying that he couldn't say one word.

"Poor little boy!" says Nina, taking his hand in hers, and pushing up the brim of his hat a little, that she might see his face better. "Are you lost, dear? Tell me all about it."

Then the little boy told his story as well as he could. He and Tom had come out to see the soldiers, and Tom had been so saucy to a policeman, and the policeman had taken him by the shoulder, and lifted his billet to strike him, and the crowd had pressed between them, and the boy had been pushed, and pushed, till he couldn't find Tom. And that was all, only that he was lost, and didn't know where to go to.

"What is your name, little boy?" Nina asked, wiping his tears away. "And how old are you?"

"My name is Rubber Ball," said the boy. "But I don't know how old I am.

My father's forty years old. I heard him say so. But some days he says he is most a hundred."

"I should think you might be about seven years old," says Nina. "But what a name it is—Rubber Ball! What is your father's name?"

"His name is Bouncing Bill," answered the little boy, sighing.

Nina held up both her hands.

"My sakes!" she said. "I never did hear such names! Where do you live, little Rubber?"

The boy hesitated, as if he didn't know what to say.

"Can't you tell me?" asked Nina.

"We live most everywhere," answered Rubber, in his soft voice.

"Well, come home with me, and we will find out where your father is," Nina said, not liking very well to give such a beautiful boy up to a policeman, and not liking to stand there in the street any longer. For besides the great crowd, there was a tall man in a sugar-loaf hat and a cloak hanging back from his shoulders, who had been standing close by ever since she stopped, and staring at her or the boy, she did not know which. But since Nina was very pretty, she took for granted that he was staring at her.

So she took the little boy by the hand, and led him away, just glancing back once over her shoulder to see if the tall, black-whiskered man was still there. He was, she saw, and was looking after them with large, steady eyes. But now she perceived that the eyes were fixed on the boy, and not on her.

A thought struck her.

"Is your Tom a handsome, tall, pale gentleman in a cloak, and with a beautiful diamond in his shirt-front?" she asked.

"O no!" said Rubber. "He wears a red shirt, and his face is red, and he isn't tall."

So she led him home to the hotel, and in by a servants' door, and up to the parlor where her mistress was.

"See what I have found, madam," she said, leading the little boy to Mrs. Blake.

The lady was very pale and sober, and she was dressed in deep black for her little girl; but she held out her hand to Rubber, and smiled faintly when she asked his name.

"What lovely hair he has!" she said, when Nina had told his story; "and how oddly he is dressed. And such names, too! I cannot imagine what they mean. What does your father do, dear?"

"He rides horses," said the boy, looking all about the room, which was the most beautiful he had ever seen.

"Has he many horses?" the lady asked. "Is he rich?"

"O yes! He has lots of horses. And there are the black ponies, and the red ponies, and the white ponies."

"He must be rich if he has horses and ponies in New York," the lady said. "Take him to the table and show him the pictures, Nina; and when Mr. Blake comes in, he will see what is to be done for him."

The lady turned her head away, and looked out into the avenue where a steady stream of carriages was going up; and Nina led the boy to a table not far away, and opening a book, began to show him the pictures.

It happened that she had opened a book full of pictures of animals, elephants, camelopards, and such, and the moment he saw them, the boy exclaimed with delight.

"O, that's Sultan!" he said, pointing to the picture of the elephant. "He takes me up with his trunk, and puts me on his back."

"O, that's an elephant!" said Nina.

"Our elephant's name is Sultan," the boy said. "And we've got a camelopard like that, and we've got lions in cages, and tigers, and—"

"Mercy on us!" cried out Mrs. Blake, turning round from the window. "That accounts for it. He is a circus boy! Don't keep him here. Take him out somewhere, and send for a policeman to carry him to his people."

"Do your people have a circus, and wild beasts?" asked Nina, as she led her little foundling out of the room.

"Yes," he answered, with tears in his eyes. He was very much hurt at being driven away so, and at the lady's voice, which was almost cross. "But I don't want to go to them. I want to stay with you."

Nina's eyes were full of tears; for she was already fond of the child, and ever since she found him had been thinking how glad she would be if Mr. and Mrs. Blake would adopt him for their own. It cut her to the heart to have to send him away with a stranger, and never to see him again.

"Don't they use you well, my darling?" she asked, kneeling down by the child in the large hall, and putting her arm around him.

"No," said he, and began to cry. "Sometimes they whip me, and they make me ride the big horse when I am frightened, and they make me dance when I am tired. I want to go to my own home."

"Where is your own home?" Nina asked.

"I don't know. It's where papa is," the child answered.

"What is the matter with your little boy?" asked a voice close to them; and, looking up, Nina saw the same tall man who had stared at them in the street. But she wasn't afraid of him now. She was glad of some one to tell her story to.

As she told it, the man's face, that had been pale, grew very red; and he seemed to be weak all at once, for he sat down on a chair almost as if he fell into it, and drew the child to him, holding him by both hands, and looking at him in the strangest way.

Nina didn't know what to make of it; and when she looked at the boy she saw that he had stopped crying, and was staring steadily at the gentleman.

"Look at me! Look at me!" cried the gentleman, grasping the little hands close. "Do not you know me? Do you know your own name? O, my little one! My dear little Eugene!"

Every word of this was said in French; and when the little boy heard it, his pretty face blushed and brightened up, and he threw himself into the gentleman's arms, with his little arms around the gentleman's neck, and cried out, "O, my dear papa!"

And what the little boy said was also in French.

Well, such a crying and kissing as there was! and all that Nina could do was to stand by and hold up her hands, her heart full of wonder and delight.

"He is my own little boy!" said the gentleman, at length, holding the child tightly in his arms. "He was coming with his mother from France to live with me in Cuba, and the vessel was wrecked, and his mother was drowned. I thought that my child must be lost also, though I heard that a poor sailor tried to save him. But here he is, after three years! I saw him in the street, and I could not take my eyes from him, nor help following him. I knew my child!"

And again the gentleman hugged and kissed the boy, and laughed and cried over him.

Well, to make a long story short, it turned out as the gentleman said. A sailor had saved the child, not knowing his name, had brought him to New York, and left him with some poor people, and had gone away to sea again. The circus man had seen him, and had carried him off, thinking him a prize, he was so pretty and bright.

I don't think there was ever a happier father and son than those two; and when Monsieur Lablanche, for that was the Frenchman's name, asked Nina to be his boy's nurse, then there were three happy ones.

And by-and-by, when the gentleman found that Nina was not only pretty but good, and that she had a little education, he married her, and the three were happier still. And I don't see but the bride appears as nice as if she had been brought up rich.

But Mrs. Blake is sorry that she hadn't made more of the little foundling, for his father is a rich man; and now she can't make Eugene like her for her life.

BOB THE COSSET.

ONE cold night in March, my father came in from the barnyard, bringing a little lamb, which lay stiff and still in his arms, and appeared to be quite dead. But my mother, who was good and kind to all creatures, wrapped it in flannel, and, forcing open its teeth, poured some warm milk down its throat. Still it did not open its eyes or move, and when we went to bed it was lying motionless before the fire. It happened that my mother slept in a room opening out of the sitting-room, and in the middle of the night she heard a little complaining voice, saying, "Ma!" She thought it must be some one of us, and so answered, "What, my child?" Again it came, "Ma!" and, turning round, she saw by the light of the moon the little lamb she had left for dead standing by her bedside. In the morning it was found that the own mother of "Bob" (for we gave him that name) had died of cold in the night; so we adopted the poor orphan into our family. We children took care of him, and though it was a great trouble to bring him up by hand, we soon became attached to our charge, and grew very proud of his handsome growth and thriving condition. He would go into every room in the house, even mount the stairs and appear in our chambers in the morning, sometimes before we were up, to shame us with his early rising. But the place which of all others he decidedly preferred was the pantry. Here he was, I am sorry to say, once or twice guilty of breaking the commandment against stealing, by helping himself to fruit and to slices of bread which did not rightfully belong to him. But Bob, though playful and somewhat mischievous, had never any serious disagreement with the dogs, cats, pigs and poultry on the premises. My sister and I used to make wreaths for his neck, which he wore with such an evident attempt at display, that I sometimes feared he was more vain and proud than it was right for such an innocent and poetical animal to be.

But our trials did not really commence until Bob's horns began to sprout. It seemed that he had no sooner perceived those little protuberances in his looking-glass, the drinking-trough, than he took to butting, like any common pasture-reared sheep, who had been wholly without the advantages of education and good society. It was in vain that we tried to impress upon him that such was not correct conduct in a cosset of his breeding; he would still persevere in his little interesting trick of butting all such visitors as did not happen to strike his fancy. But he never treated us to his horns in that way, and so we let him go, like any other spoiled child, without punishing him severely, and laughed at his sauciness.

One day our minister, a stout elderly gentleman, solemn-faced and formal, had been making us a parochial visit, and as he was going away, we all went out into the yard to see him ride off on his old sorrel pacer. It seems he had no riding whip; so he reached up to break off a twig from an elm tree which hung over the gate. This was very high, and he was obliged to stand on tiptoe. Just then, before he had grasped the twig he wanted, Bob started out from under a large rose-bush near by, and ran against the reverend gentleman, butting him so violently as to take him quite off his feet. My father helped the good man up, and made a great many apologies for the impiety of our pet, while we children did our best to keep our faces straight. After our venerable visitor was gone, my father sternly declared that he would not bear with Bob any longer, but that he should be turned into the pasture with the other sheep, for he would not have him about, insulting respectable people and butting ministers of the gospel at that rate.

So the next morning Bob was banished in disgrace from the house and yard, and obliged to mingle with the vulgar herd of his kind. With them I regret to say that he soon earned the name of being very bold and quarrelsome. As his horns grew and lengthened, he grew more and more proud of the consequence they gave him, and went forth butting and to butt. O, he was a terrible fellow!

One summer day, my brother Charles and a young man who lived with us were in the mill-pond washing the sheep which were soon to be sheared. I was standing on the bank, watching the work, when one of our neighbors, a hard, coarse man, came up, and calling to my brother, in a loud voice, asked if he had been hunting a raccoon the night before. "Yes sir, and I killed him too," answered my brother. "Well, young man," said the farmer, "did you pass through my field, and trample down the grain?" "I crossed the field, sir, but I hope I did no great damage," replied Charles, in a pleasant way. "Yes you did!" shouted the man, "and now, you young rascal, if I ever catch you on my land again, day or night, I'll thrash you!—I'll teach you something, if your father wont!" As he said this, stretching his great fist out threateningly towards my brother, he stood on the very edge of the steep bank. Just behind him were the sheep, headed by the redoubtable Bob, who suddenly darted forward, and, before the farmer could suspect what was coming, butted him head over heels into the pond! My brother went at once to the assistance of his enemy, who scrambled on to the shore, sputtering and dripping, but a good deal cooler in his rage. I suppose I was very wicked, but I did enjoy that!

For this one good turn, Bob was always quite a favorite, with all his faults, and year after year was spared, when worthier sheep were made mutton of. He was finally sold, with the rest of the flock, when he left the farm, and though he lived to a good old age, the wool of his last fleece must long since have been knit into socks and comforters, or woven into cloth—must have grown threadbare, and gone to dress scarecrows, or stop cellar windows, or been all trodden out in rag carpets.—Grace Greenwood.

THE HOUSEKEEPER.

CHICKEN BROTH.—Joint a chicken, wash the pieces, put them into a stewpan with three pints of water, and add two ounces of rice, two or three blades of mace, some white pepper whole, and a pinch of salt; let it come to a boil, skim frequently, and simmer for three hours; boil for five minutes in the soup some vermicelli, and serve with it in the soup.

BAKED COD.—Cut a large fine piece out of the middle of the fish, and skin it carefully; stuff it with a stuffing composed of the yolks of two eggs boiled hard, the roe half-boiled, bread crumbs, grated lemon-peel, butter, pepper, and salt to taste. Blind it with the undressed white of an egg, and sew in the stuffing with white thread, bake it in a Dutch oven before the fire, turn it frequently, and baste it with butter; serve with shrimp sauce, plain butter, or oyster sauce. A tin baking-dish is preferable to any other for cooking this fish.

COD FISH PIE.—Take a piece from the middle of a good sized fish, salt it well all night, then wash it, and season with salt, pepper, and a few grains of nutmeg, a little chopped parsley and some oysters, put all in your dish, with pieces of butter on the fish; add a cup of good second white stock and cream; cover it with a good crust, adding a little lemon juice in the gravy.

A SALT ROUND OF BEEF.—Use the spice as for the fillet of beef, but salt as usual for a round of beef. Let it lie for a week, frequently rubbing it; boil it in a cloth; send up carrots, and turnips, and suet dumplings, and a little gravy from what it was boiled in, adding a little consomme, or it will be too salt. Young cabbage in a dish, send up.

SCALLOPED OYSTERS.—Beard the oysters, wash in their own liquor, steep bread crumbs in the latter, put them with the oysters into scallop shells, with a bit of butter, and seasoning of salt, pepper and a little grated nutmeg; make a paste with bread crumbs and butter; cover and roast them before the fire, or in an oven.

STEWED OYSTERS.—The oysters should be bearded and rinsed in their own liquor which should then be strained and thickened with flour and butter, and placed with the oysters in a stewpan; add mace, lemon-peel cut into shreds, and some white pepper whole; these ingredients had better be confined in a piece of muslin. The stew must simmer only, if it is suffered to boil, the oysters will become hard; serve with sippets of bread. This may be varied by adding a glass of wine to the liquor, before the oysters are put in and warmed.

FILLET OF BEEF ROASTED.—The fillet, which comes from the inside of the sirloin, may be larded or roasted plain; for high dinners it is larded. Baste with fresh butter. It must be a large fillet which takes longer than an hour and twenty minutes; serve with tomato sauce, and garnish with horseradish, unless served with currant jelly, then serve as with venison or hare.

MACKEREL.—Clean the fish thoroughly, remove the roe, steep it in vinegar and water, and replace it; place the fish in water from which the chill has been taken, and boil very slowly from fifteen to twenty minutes; the best criterion is the starting of the eyes and splitting of the tail—when that takes place, the fish is done; take it out instantly, or you will not preserve it whole. Garnish with parsley, and chopped parsley in melted butter, serve up as sauce.

RUMP OF BEEF.—Cut the beef in pieces, half boil them, put them into some beef broth or thin stock, unseasoned, and boil; when half done, stir some butter and flour moistened with broth in a stewpan over the fire until brown; put the beef into the pan with a dozen onions previously parboiled, a glass of sherry, a bay leaf, a bunch of sweet herbs, parsley, pepper and salt; stew till the beef and onions are quite done, then skim clean, cut an anchovy small, and put it with capers into the sauce; place the beef in the centre of the dish, and garnish with the onions round it.

TO FRICASSEE COLD ROAST BEEF.—Cut the beef into slices (which should be very thin), and put it with strong broth into a stewpan; add parsley chopped small, an onion scored, and a piece of butter; simmer fifteen minutes, then add a glass of port wine, a tea-spoonful of pyroligneous acid, and the yolk of a couple of eggs; mix well, stew quickly, pot the dish, rub it with a shalot, pour fricassee into it and serve.

CURIOUS MATTERS.

HIGH-HEELED BOOT DISEASE.—I treated myself the other night, says a Paris letter-writer, to a seat at the Gaite, to witness the spectacle called "La Chatte Blanche." I there met a medical friend, who told me that he had been called in to attend one of the fairy young ladies who had met with an accident. There was nothing wrong in it, but our conversation turned upon the clever eye and flesh painting, false hair, costumes, and strawberry cream-colored undress of the dozens of young ladies who in this incomprehensible but glittering drama represent the unearthly beauty of the fairy world. I observed that they now painted their ears as well as their eyes; some of the ears of the euhantresses or sylphides of the dance were of a pale pink coral tint, the eyes of course framed with a dark pencilling, the eyebrows heavily colored, and the flush of the rose laid on with no sparing hand. There is harm in all this; and my medical friend pointed out also the languor, the uncomfortable and fatigued attitude of some of the ladies in their magnificent costumes.

"Do you know why?"

"Tired, I suppose, and have played the part until they are careless."

"No," was the reply; "they are suffering from the high-heeled boot malady. This absurd fashion," continued my friend, "has produced distinct diseases, not only of the distorted foot but of the body. As the frame is thrown permanently into an unnatural position, it affects the spine, and as it is a question of balancing, nervous irritation sometimes occurs. You see by the expression of the face how much a woman suffers who has walked about or even stood long in high-heeled boots. Besides, we have accidents from falls very frequently."

There, ladies, will you cease to endeavor to trip up our indifference or invite our affections with a high-heeled boot torture which throws your figure out of drawing and affects your bodily health?

FASTING.—The Welsh fasting girl, who was first thought to be a prodigy, but subsequently something more than suspected of being an impostor, has had predecessors, whose capabilities of existing without food have been genuine and not feigned. There was of old one Samuel Clinton, of Timbary, near Bath, who often slept for a month at a stretch, of course fasting; and once he dozed from April to August. He awoke suddenly several times during this long nap, but fell asleep again before food could be administered. Another case was that of Eupheme Lindsay, of Forfarshire; she slept eight weeks, taking nothing but a few drops of water. Most wonderful of all, however, was Angelica Vlies, of Delft; she was insensible from 1822 to 1828, six years at least, and only took the most minute quantities of tea, whey and water at intervals. No doubt man could exist for a long period without sustenance, provided he did nothing; once let him work, and his analogy to the steam-engine will forcibly present itself in his want of fuel. Shipwrecked mariners and buried miners have survived for many days without nourishment; and is there not a story of a prisoner in the Tower of London who gained a free pardon by abstaining from food and drink for six weeks?

A MASSACRE.—In a certain Lancashire village there lived an ancient maiden lady, very rich and very eccentric, who, among other peculiarities, was remarkable for her affection for cats and her aversion towards dogs. After her death a report was circulated, apparently on good foundation, that she had left a legacy of ten pounds to every householder who should thenceforward desist from keeping a dog; but as a proof of their bona fides, they were to bring the dead bodies of their favorites to the lady's baillif on the morning of the opening of the will. Accordingly, over night a general massacre of Snaps, Carlos, Rovers, and Flosses took place. The unlucky owners discovered too late that the report was a hoax, got up for the purpose of diminishing the canine population of the village.

AN IDEA FOR CRIMINALS.—A curious idea is started by a correspondent of the English periodical, Land and Water. He proposes that criminals be fed on horseflesh for meat. The advantages would, he thinks, be numerous. The flesh is good, wholesome and cheap. The criminals, as well as most others, have a great objection to eating it, however, and the restriction of the animal diet to this meat would, therefore, be a punishment and a mortification of the flesh without working any real injury to the culprit, while the prospect of having to live upon horse meat would be an excellent deterrent from crime, and the use of it would serve to utilize what it now wholly wasted.

FACTS AND FANCIES.

ONE OF GOUGH'S STORIES.—Mr. Gough tells the following as one of his experiences:

On one occasion I had made an appointment in a small town in Massachusetts, and, accompanied by a friend, I rode seven miles and arrived at the church as the people were assembling. Not knowing any one, I approached a plain-looking man, and asked if there was to be a lecture there.

"Yaas."

"Who is the lecturer?"

"Gough."

"Can you tell me where I can find the president of the society?"

"I spect I am the president."

"Ah! my name is Gough."

"Waal, it's most time to go in."

So in we went, and I sat in a pew till he came to me and said:

"You'd better go in the desk."

"Is there any one here to offer prayer?" I asked.

"No; the minister's away."

"Is there no deacon?"

"I spect I'm a deacon."

"Can't you pray?"

"No; I don't speak in meeting."

As I passed into the desk, he stood below and announced:

"Mr. Gough is in the desk, and is going to lectur."

So I "lectur'd" as well as I was able, and had no sooner taken my seat than I heard from below:

"We'll now proceed to take up a collection for the benefit of the lecturer."

As no one seemed inclined to move, he passed round with his hat, while the people were going out, and, dumping the contents on the table in front of the pulpit, and shaking the lining of his hat, said:

"There! that's all for you, and we shan't take nothing out for lights."

The amount did not exceed a dollar and a half, principally in cents; some of them the tokens that were then in vogue, and passing as current coin, stamped on one side with a jackass running away with the sub-treasury.

"I don't want it," I said.

"Why, there's a lot of it."

"I don't want it."

"Yer don't?"

"No."

"Waal, then I'll take it."

And sweeping the coin into his hat, and holding it before him, he dipped his head into it, exclaiming:

"Waal, I guess I can carry it."

"You've got more cents in your hat than usual," I said.

"Waal, yes; I don't generally carry cents in my hat."

"But some of it is jackass cents."

"Waal, yes; I see there was some bung-towns in the heap."

And without another word he marched off, leaving me to laugh, which I did most heartily.

A PLEASANT PATCH.—Jack Whaly's wife one day chanced to find an elegant piece of white leather on the road, and she brought it home with her in great delight to mend Jack's small clothes, which she did very neatly. Jack set off the next day little suspecting what was in store for him; but when he had trotted about five miles—it was in the month of July—he began to feel mighty uneasy, in the saddle—a feeling that continued to increase at every moment, till at last he said, "It was like taking a canter on a bee-hive in swarming time;" and well he might, for the piece of leather was no other than a blister that the apothecary's boy had dropped that morning on the road.

ONE IDEA OF BAPTISM.—There lives in the village of E—, in Indiana, a good Baptist clergyman, whose son, four years old, had never until a few Sundays since witnessed the rite of baptism. On that occasion his father was called upon to immerse a lady convert; and as his wife wished to be present, the children were allowed to go and sit upon the shady river bank and witness the ceremony. On returning home Freddy approached the paternal and inquired why he put the woman under water. The father asked:

"Did you understand what I said to the lady?"

"O yes; you put your hand on the top of her head, and said, 'I baptize you in the name of the Father, and the Son, and here she goes!'"

A LECTURE ON POTATOES.—"Potatoes," said Pompey, a learned darkey, conversing with another gemman of color, "is a barboicious, zoological vegetable, what grows all under ground, 'cept de top, an' dat bear an carnivorous flower at de bottom. Potatoes is berry good biled, an' den dey am better roasted; but if you can't 'teal de lard, de bes way of all is to fry him, becasse den de potato am meat, drink and sleep. Such am de great merits of dis 'ere esculent!"

JOHN JUMPSEY'S FITS.—It takes a person with very sharp wits to tell a drunken man from a man afflicted with fits. At all events it so appeared in a southern court the other day. John Jumpsey was accused of disturbing the peace, of being under the influence of liquor, and of several other minor misdemeanors.

"Are you guilty?" inquired the court.

"No, your honor."

"You deny being drunk, then?"

"Assuredly, sir."

"What was the matter with you, then?"

"I had fits, sir."

"Fits?"

"Fits, your honor. I have them very bad. They come upon me very suddenly. I have a rush of blood to the head—my eyes lose their sight—I grow dizzy—I foam at the mouth, and fall to the ground."

"Why, that's hydrophobia!" said the court, turning pale.

"Just look at my eyes!" said the prisoner, seeing the impression he had made, and approaching his mug very close to the judicial countenance.

"Keep away from me, man! keep away from me!" screamed the court, hastily vacating his chair, and taking refuge in a corner of the room.

"O, I feel the fit coming on me now," moaned the prisoner, beginning to stagger and roll his eyes; "I have very queer feelings!" And the man rapidly discovered symptoms of his dangerous disease. But the officer by no means designed his prisoner to escape so easily, and informed the court that when arrested the man was certainly drunk, for he smelt of whiskey.

"Is that so?"

This was a clincher. The judge began to contemplate the invalid with evident suspicion, and demanded to know how that was.

"Well, your honor, whenever I have fits I smell of liquor," replied the ingenious prisoner.

"Yes, and whenever such a man comes before me I send him to the workhouse;" which was accordingly done.

ANECDOTE OF MACREADY.—Mr. Macready was never popular with stock actors. He annoyed them exceedingly at rehearsals by giving every man his particular place on the stage, so that in the picture presented he should be the centre. This actor must stand here, that actor there—it was his will. On one of the nights of his last engagement in New Orleans, when he was to play Hamlet, he was very particular at rehearsal in the disposition of characters at the fall of the curtain. He had selected the most commanding place on the stage well down to the lights, and declared that there he intended to die. It so happened, that as the fatal moment was approaching, just after Hamlet had stabbed the king, his majesty took it into his head to die on the spot selected by the philosophic Dane. The poison was burning in Hamlet's veins, he was in the agonies of death, but still he found time to say otto voce to his stepfather:

"Back, back, I'm going to die there."

The blood of outraged royalty was up, and the stabbed monarch replied:

"I'm king, and I'll die where I please—pick out a place for yourself;" and Hamlet was obliged to let out his soul further up the stage.

A RARE CLIENT.—A good joke is told of a young lawyer who sports a shingle in the vicinity of Wall street. On one of the days of last week, he was called upon by a Frenchman, with a request that he would immediately accompany him to his house, as he wanted his advice. Without a moment's loss of time our lawyer threw down his books and started, consoling himself, during a long walk up Hudson street, with the vision of a $5 retainer, and a long bill of costs. On arriving at the domicile of his client, he was ushered upstairs, introduced to the wife of the Frenchman, and very complacently waited the opening of the business.

"Monsieur," said the client, "they ave got the small pox like de deuce down stairs, and up stairs they ave got it a great sight worse, and they have shut up my gangway."

Without waiting to hear more, the lawyer caught up his hat, and giving the Frenchman a not very polite benediction, bolted the house, returning to his office in no very enviable feeling, after his walk of three miles, to give his advice to a man surrounded by small pox patients.

POPPING THE QUESTION.—Going over on the ferry boat the other day, the water was a little rough, and a lovely and estimable young lady, as the boat gave a sudden lurch, clung affrightedly to the extended elbow of her male companion. Looking up into his fond orbs she murmured, "O Henry, this is terrible!" "Yes, it is," he responded, "but lean on me and I will protect you." "Do you think it will be as rough as this all the way across?" anxiously inquired the female. "I do," responded Henry. "Then I guess I'll have to lean on you," said the lady. "For life?" whispered Henry, turning pale at the thought of refusal. "I—I don't know—the water is awful rough—I guess—yes—ask papa."

THE LORD MAYOR OF LONDON.

The City of London—that which is known as the centre of the vast metropolis, dating from the time of the Romans—contains but six hundred acres, and a population of less than 50,000. It occupies, according to act of Parliament, a radius of but three miles, and was formerly a walled city, and to distinguish it from the external city, it was called "London within the walls." The wall, however, has for the most part disappeared, yet enough remains to show the old-time bound. To speak of "The City" to a Londoner, the locality is recognized at once. The only remaining city gate is at Temple Bar, a name very common in literature, which was designed by Sir Christopher Wren. The streets of the city are narrow and crooked, characteristic of old places everywhere, and London is old enough to be a model for almost all the other crooked places in the world.

The government of the outside portion of London is vested in a home secretary, but "London within the walls" maintains its old position. It is under the exclusive superintendence of the corporation, one of the most influential and wealthy organizations in the world. This consists of the Lord Mayor, the Court of Aldermen, having 25 members exclusive of the Chief Magistrate, and 206 Common Councilmen. The Lord Mayor is elected annually from the Court of Aldermen, he having previously served as sheriff, and may be reelected. The aldermen hold office for life, and are elected one for each of the twenty-six wards of the city. The Lord Mayor is the representative of royalty in the civil government of the city, and on the death of the sovereign he becomes pro tem. a member of the Privy Council. He has the free use of the Mansion House and a salary of £8000 per annum, and is expected to maintain the reputation of the city's hospitality. Those filling the office are rich men, belonging to some of the many wealthy guilds that compose the corporation, and the inadequate sum is made up from the private purse of the incumbent. The day on which he enters into office (Nov. 9), "Lord Mayor's day," is kept as a partial holiday in the city. There is a state procession to Westminster Hall, and the parade of the state carriage, when he takes the oath, and in the evening he gives an entertainment at Guild Hall, at which all the foreign ministers and other big men air their vocabularies.

The present incumbent of the office, Robert Besley, Esq., is a very worthy member of the printer's profession. That is, he begun in that direction, serving his time in learning the arts and mysteries, but after a time, feeling that his energies might be turned to better account in a wider field, he came from Exeter, where he was born, in 1800, to London, and in the year 1820 abandoned the art of "setting" for that of "casting" type, and a lucky change it proved both for himself personally and type-founding generally. He at once applied himself to the task of improvement and development in this interesting branch of the printing business. It is not necessary to enter into details, which would be only understood by the technically initiated; but it may be said that his types gained a wide popularity all over Europe, and to his taste and enterprise letter-press printing is indebted, there, for the present elegant ornamentation which it is capable of. He it was who first saw the superiority of the French artistic designs and introduced them into English printing. His zeal, taste and energy may be said to have entirely reformed the style in the art as practised in England and on the Continent. We do not know how far we may be indebted, in this country, to the taste of the new Lord Mayor.

After working most successfully from 1820 until 1852, he took what men of his type call relaxation in endeavoring to be of some public use. In that year he was returned as one of the representatives of the ward of Aldersgate in the Court of Common Council, where he was distinguished by the sound sense and practical wisdom he brought to bear upon the various matters discussed. Nine years later, Sir Peter Laurie, the alderman of the ward, died, and so favorable an impression had Mr. Besley created, that nearly every elector signed the requisition to him to become a candidate for the vacant gown. He accepted the invitation, and was returned without opposition. In 1864-5 he filled the office of sheriff, his colleague being Mr. Alderman Dakin. Mr. Besley is a man of considerable ability and shrewdness. His speeches are generally brief and pointed, with a dash of humor, which is none the less effective from being associated with a slight degree of provincialism. At various times the alderman has taken an active part in several important social and political movements, in which he has had for his colleagues some of the most eminent men of the day.

The City of London, though nominally the capital of England, has a wider importance than that. It is associated with the most interesting facts in the world's history, and hence it is invested with a living interest in the estimation of the American reader, of history or romance, with whom it has long been a familiar point. Even the nursery story of Whittington and his cat fixes it in the child's mind to quicken the eagerness of the youth or man in after time. In romance how often have we threaded it with Scott, and Ainsworth, and Dickens. Who has not read with delight of the gallant London Apprentices and their prompt and ready union in defence of the right and of each other? The battles of the Apprentices date back to the earliest days of London, and it was a bold crew that would encounter their weapons.

It is no wonder, therefore, that, with the consciousness of this musty glory, the honor of being Lord Mayor of London should rank above other earthly distinction. "He not only represents," says his chronicler, "the present city—the strong-beating heart of the world's commerce—but the piled-up ages of the past, when the pen and the sword, side by side, showed how fields could be won in honor's cause. And in view of all this and its wide range of suggestion, it is not surprising that the ambition to be Lord Mayor of the chief city, not alone of the kingdom but the world, should yet be one of the inspirations that conduct men to position and fortune through long years of toil, fortitude, cultivated intelligence and unblemished character, for it is scarcely possible for a fool and a rogue to attain to the dignity. There is a solid grandeur about the office which invests it with the richest value to men in ripened age, and to those about to shake the dust of time from their feet, for it is the civic crown that graces and rewards honorable age. And from the wish to obtain it who can estimate the good that has been wrought for families and society? For hundreds of years it has been the incentive to exertion among all classes of the industrial community."

WINTER SPORTS.

Our Canadian neighbors know how to pass the long winter months in an agreeable manner, even if they do have to contend with cold, ice and heavy snow-storms. They slide down hill (or tobogganing) often at railroad speed, when the thermometer marks many degrees below zero, and when the ice is in good order they skate and have all manner of fun with ice-boats, a representation of which is given on the preceding page. The speed of these boats, when the wind is fresh, is something wonderful. A mile in a minute, or a minute and a half, is of common occurrence. They can be tacked or worked to the windward, like any sail-boat, yet they make some leeway when the ice is quite smooth.

A ride in an ice-boat is quite exciting. Even the fastest trotter in the country is slow compared to the speed of one of these boats under full sail, with plenty of wind. Within a few years, some enterprising people on the Hudson River have constructed ice-boats, and sail them with great skill and confidence. Sometimes matches for speed are made, and great is the excitement when a race is announced. Bets run high, and each boat has its backers. Skill and care are necessary to ensure success.

Reading Pond, a few miles from Boston, has its ice-boats, and they are liberally patronized. A ride in one is fully equal to a spurt over the Mill Dam behind a pair of fast trotters, and just enough snow on the ground to make a sleigh slip along without an effort on the part of the horses.

The scene of our engraving is the Bay of Toronto, where there is plenty of room for any quantity of boats to manœuvre, without coming in contact.

THE MADEIRA ISLES.

These are an island group belonging to Portugal, situated in the Atlantic Ocean, about 440 miles from the coast of Morocco and 210 miles north of Teneriffe, of which Madeira is the largest. This island is 34 miles long and about 5000 feet high, on which is an extensive plain, called Paul de Serra. The easterly portion of the island, though elevated, is less so than that of the west. From the central mass, are steep ridges extending to the coast, where they form perpendicular precipices of from 1000 to 2000 feet high. These cliffs are interrupted by a few small bays, where a richly-cultivated valley approaches the water between abrupt precipices, or surrounded by an amphitheatre of rugged hills. These narrow bays are the sites of the villages of Madeira. The most striking peculiarity in the mountain scenery of the island, is the jagged outline of the ridge, the rudely-shaped towers and sharp pyramids of rock which appear elevated on the tops and sides of the highest peaks, as well as on the lower elevations, and the deep, precipitous gorges which cut through the highest mountains almost to their very base. The most remarkable of these gorges is called the Curral or Coural. The road round the island is, in many places, exceedingly picturesque, being led often between lofty cliffs, or along the front of precipices overhanging the sea. One of the most remarkable portions of this winding road is the Estroza Pass, on the north side of the island. Although the island is rough and mountainous throughout, its steeps are clothed with rich and luxuriant verdure. Terraces are visible on every side, and every available and accessible spot is turned to advantage. On leaving Funchal, the capital of the island, fruits, flowers and vegetables crowd upon the sight; in the lower portions, groves of orange and lemon trees

This is the dry account which the encyclopedia gives of Madeira, but visitors and sojourners are eloquent in praise of its climate and the many delightful things to be enjoyed there, saying, "What a man seeks more than Madeira affords, savoreth of evil," and as Plato, they say, placed his Atlantis somewhere west of the Columns of Hercules, it is probable that Cape de Verdes, the Canaries and Madeira compose the Isles of the Blest, where the Grecian poets were wont to send their heroes when they were done with them. "In beauty and sublimity of scenery," we quote from one, "it is unsurpassed by lands more famous for both, while the matchless moderation and salubrity of climate are world-renowned. Its soil produces, spontaneously, the fruits of the tropics—the orange, the pomegranate, the banana, the guava, the citron and olive—and, with cultivation, are mingled with the vineyards; higher up, bananas, figs, pomegranates, etc., are seen; and again, still higher, the fruits of the temperate zone—namely, apples, currants, pears and peaches. Coffee and arrow-root, both of excellent quality, are also grown. Wheat, barley, rye and Indian corn are raised, but only to the extent of about one-fifth of the quantity consumed; consequently, the almost total destruction of the vines in 1852 brought the inhabitants into the greatest distress. The people are industrious, sober and civil. They are of the old Arabian stock, and have little if any mixed blood among them. The men are very muscular, rather above the medium height, strongly built, and capable of enduring great fatigue. The women are generally very ugly. The houses of the lower order are wretched huts, the door being the only aperture for light and smoke. The language is Portuguese, spoken rapidly.

though not in equal perfection, the pear and the apple, as well as other productions of colder latitudes. The grape that is nourished in most favored spots affords a wine of richer color and superior excellence to any of sunny France, or the boasted vineyards of Germany; while the fish of its waters, the game of its mountains, its herbage-fed and luscious beef, turkeys, and various web-footed birds, supply a rich and abundant table. What can one find more, in any country of Christendom, to gratify a well-informed taste?" Besides these advantages, it is spared the enervation of tropical countries, and culture, taste, refinement, control society as in lands nearer the social centres. Man never wants here occupation or amusement who is true to his own nature.

The city of Funchal, the capital of Madeira, is built upon the base of a large range of mountains, which rise to the height of 4000 feet above the level of the sea, and protecting it, like the sides of an amphitheatre form a magnificent background to the view from the deck of a vessel when approaching it. This is the best view of Funchal; in this the fact that "distance lends enchantment" is verified. At close contact it is prosaic. The streets are for the most part narrow and irregular, with little regard to symmetry or convenience. They are paved with cobble-stones gathered from the beach, and the clatter of horses' iron-shod feet along the way is not in harmony with the peaceful beauty and grace of the surroundings. Carriages are seldom known, the kind of vehicle most in use being a sort of sledge for transporting pipes of wine from one place to another. Travelling is performed in sedan-chairs or on horseback. There are several churches and convents, and in the centre of the town is an open square planted with exotic trees. The town is defended by four forts. The English and Portuguese merchants have elegant villas in the suburbs, upon the terraced hillsides, where all fruits and flowers abound, and where the morning is ushered in with the songs of myriads of birds and the plashing of cool water from the mountain springs.

The views from these hills are of the most picturesque description. On the westerly side of the town is a road encircling the hills, that affords one used to being on the levels of life an indescribable feeling on travelling it. On one side it abuts upon the sea, and the traveller looks down several hundred perpendicular feet upon the beaches that vex the shores, and hears their angry murmurs as they break upon the repelling rocks. It is more fearful than at the Palisades to cast the eyes below. This road, at times, seems almost incapable of foothold, but its apparent danger lends it additional attractions. But compared with other roads, all over the island, that span fearful chasms with tottering bridges, and descend almost perpendicular declivities, this road is an easy and agreeable promenade.

The road most coveted by sojourners—not by invalids whom the hope of health has sent to Madeira, but by the strong—is that leading to the "Mount Church," as it is called, standing on an eminence 2000 feet above Funchal, which is paved throughout, and which affords grand exercise for the aspirer. One of these thus describes it: "From the top of the church you have a panoramic view of surpassing magnificence. The church fronts the ocean. Between yourself and this ocean lies Funchal, with its white walls and chimneys glistening in the sun. Distance gives it beauty; for whatever of incongruity, disorder or imperfect architecture may appear to the nearer view—whatever is in any way liable to criticism, or repugnant to severer taste—is lost to the eye, thus removed. From this station, castle and cathedral, fortress and monastery, blend and harmonize with the lazaret-house and the prison, the broken wall and the vacated hut; while before, behind, and everywhere around you, precipice and ravine, crag, forest, and weather-scarred mountain, rush on the sight."

The road on the east of the town affords a very agreeable ride. This hugs the cliffs all the way till you reach a ravine that unites with the sea, beyond which the cliffs rise almost perpendicularly, about which the road winds, less picturesquely, ending at the cape upon the ocean that forms the eastern horn of Funchal Bay, from which a view is had of a long range of cliffs rising on either side, one above the other, with furrowed features and grotesque heads innumerable. This cape, with a corresponding projection on the other side, forms a bay in which navies might ride.

The ride and scramble to the "Waterfall," another local attraction, is very difficult and exhausting. At a short distance from the church of San Roque, excursionists descend the side of a precipitous ravine, on reaching the bottom of which the pathway is altogether impracticable for horses. Then ensues a struggle against difficulties that nothing but enthusiasm on the part of the excursionist can enable him to overcome. The path lies through the bed of the torrent, and boulders must be climbed and puddles must be waded for two hours before the waterfall is reached, which then compensates for all the trouble—to an enthusiast. The effect is grand. When the stream above is filled by rains, the fall breaks through the opening gorge, and descends nearly three hundred perpendicular feet, dashing tumultuously through the glen below and filling the sunlit ravine with the glory of a thousand rainbows.

The mountains which overlook Funchal are not the highest of the island; still they are some four thousand feet above the water-line, on the summits of which are plateaus, or table-lands, that are agreeable resting-places after the tedious climb. It was the remark of a crazy sojourner that go where he might he would not desire a better climb than that of Madeira! whereat the burroqueros all laughed as though they understood it. Nowhere amid Alpine scenery are views better calculated to excite and gratify the poetic fancy than those of Madeira, and none more terrible to excite the wildest fear while awaking within one all that is sublime.

Madeira received its name from the fact of its abounding with wood—the name, in Portuguese, signifying wood. The south side has been devastated, but the north retains its pristine characteristics. The trees remain untouched, save by Time. But Madeira is associated in our minds with the cultivation of the grape, and wine has hitherto formed the most of its commerce, but of late years, owing to disease of the vines, the stock has greatly diminished, causing ruin to proprietors and want to the people. At present not more than half a crop is attainable, and the quality has deteriorated. The grapes that furnish the best wines are not agreeable to the palate; there are other grapes, however, most grateful to the taste, that are highly prized. The wines of Madeira need no brandy to protect them, their own alcoholic properties being sufficient. No sea-change can affect them. Though all are known as Madeira wines, there is a great difference betwixt them—some dry, some full-bodied, some fruity, some light, some heavy. The wines of the South are the best, and comprise the Sercial, the Malmsey, the Bual, the Tinta or Burgundy Madeira, and the Tinto. These are the normal varieties, and there are many shades of quality besides. "A glass of Sercial," a writer says, "after soup confirms the grace before, and predisposes the soul to the fullness of gratitude—the sense of favors to come." The Malmsey is too luscious a wine for ordinary use, and is used by women and children only. It is produced nowhere else but in Madeira.

The gathering of the vintage, in September, is made a half-holiday of. The women and girls, with a portion of the men, go into the vineyards with their baskets and gather the grapes very carefully. These they bring on their heads, nicely balanced. The grapes are then picked over, the best reserved for the costliest wine. They are then thrown into the wine-press, a wide, clumsy trough of wood, into which men jump, barefooted, with their trousers rolled up, and trample out the juice. This mode of expressing the juice with the feet is said to tread out the seeds and stems without crushing them and giving their tastes to the wine. The pulp is then squeezed under a lever, when the liquid is conveyed to the juice-houses in goat-skins, and there emptied into casks for the process of fermentation, which usually lasts four or five weeks.

The equable climate of Madeira is well suited for pulmonary complaints. It knows no extreme of heat nor cold, and no sudden atmospheric reverses.

THE MESSENGER OF PEACE.

BY B. P. SHILLABER.

O sweet the holy pity of a child!
That melts at sight of misery and grief,
Budding in airs of glory undefiled,
To fructify in action and relief!

The old man sat within his humble cot,
The bleak winds moaning by the open door;
By friends, by fortune, e'en by death forgot,
He bowed his head and wept in sorrow sore.

Grim poverty sat waiting by his hearth,
In rags his vestment, falling to decay;
There seemed no beam of kindness on the earth
To light his darkness with one hopeful ray.

Alone! how sad the fate to be alone!
Even to fortune's pampered, cherished sons;
But how more sad where bitter want is known,
And life's chill river in the shadow runs.

He mused in anguish, while his silver hair
Waved in the breeze that wandered idly by;
No one his lot of bitterness to share,
No one to pity with the tear-dimmed eye.

A step within the door—a gentle tread—
A sweet face, like a glory, lit the room!
A childish hand lay on the hoary head,
Like Spring's first touch, the harbinger of bloom.

The soul of kindness spoke in accents clear,
Breathing rare words of comfort and of trust,
That fell in grateful cadence on the ear,
So soon to lose its office in the dust.

Something celestial seemed the tender voice,
Reaching his spirit with its pleading tone,
Until he felt his inmost heart rejoice,
And all the darkness of his mind had flown.

Then upward looking in the beaming face,
His clasping hands in ecstasy of prayer,
He felt the transport of illuming grace,
And triumph over misery and despair.

She was his angel through the wintry chill,
The blessed messenger of joy and peace,
To bid his stormy, troubled soul be still,
And all the tempests that beset to cease.

No white-winged being from supernal spheres,
Floating through ether in celestial light,
But just a tiny child, with pitying tears,
To lift his spirit up the heavenly height.

And wheresoe'er the human lot is cast
Such angels are, to minister and bless,
To give a zest to life in joy's repast,
Or light impart in hours of dreariness.

GENEVA, SWITZERLAND.

Geneva, upon Lake Leman, Switzerland, is situated on the declivities of two hills, in the centre of a basin, the sides of which are formed partly by the lower slopes of the Jura, and partly by secondary chains of the Alps, at the westerly extremity of the lake, where it narrows almost to a point, and receives the blue Rhone, here crossed by several bridges, there are many handsome villas. The views from Geneva are very charming—the lake spreading far away to the north and west, and the nearer mountains of the south side of the lake showing to the southeast, with Mt. Blanc and the other giants of the snow range always visible in fine weather.

The public buildings are not numerous, but dividing the town into two portions, the larger and more important of which is on the left or south bank. The environs are covered with handsome villas, and the town itself, when approached either by land or water, has a very imposing appearance. It is surrounded by walls flanked by bastions, which, though altogether unfit to sustain a regular siege, have repeatedly been effectual against a sudden assault, and is entered on the land side by three gates. The town is divided into two parts, an upper and a lower. The upper town is occupied chiefly by the burgher aristocracy and contains well-built houses and handsome hotels; the lower town is the seat of trade and residence of the poorer classes. The houses of this section are indifferently built, and are of all heights, the streets dark, narrow and irregular. There are exceptions to this along the banks of the Rhone, where individually possess much interest. The more important are the cathedral or church of St. Pierre, a gothic structure of the 10th, 11th and 12th centuries, occupying the highest site in the town, and by its three towers forming the most conspicuous object within it, somewhat defaced externally by a very incongruous though magnificent Greek peristyle, but interesting within, from the purity of its style and the number of its monuments; the town-house, in the Florentine style; the Musée Rath, a neat building named after its founder, and containing a collection of pictures and other works of art, few of them of much merit; the arsenal, with a collection of ancient armor; the public library, founded by Bonnivard, the prisoner of Chillon, containing 50,000 volumes, 500 MSS., and a collection of autograph letters by Calvin and other distinguished reformers; the museum of natural history, enriched with the geological collections of Saussure, and the fossil plants of Brogniart and Decandolle; the botanical garden, astronomical observatory, theatre, the old prison, originally the bishop's palace; the casino, penitentiary, hospital and house of correction.

Geneva is associated with the church in remote ages. It was here that Calvin labored, though the site of the house where he lived is not positively known, and the place of his sepulture is lost entirely, showing how much superior the spiritual man is to his accidents. The canopy of the pulpit, however, beneath which he preached, is said to be preserved in the Church of St. Pierre, as if it had become indued with a portion of the spiritual life of the great reformer, and was destined to share his spiritual duration. In speaking of Calvin, it may be well to mention the difference of recompense for preaching the Word betwixt then and now. With all his labor and devotedness to duty, he had at his death but 225 crowns, which he divided among his relatives and poor foreigners. On his reappearance in Geneva, after years of absence, and after six months of preaching, the town voted him six crowns as a compensation, because he had received nothing. This was his pay for that grand dogma which has so divided the world—Justification only by faith, and faith the gift of God—then pronounced the "Talmud of heresy."

The manufactures of Geneva consist in making watches, music-boxes and toys, in which the larger portion of the inhabitants are engaged, expending vast quantities of the precious metals and jewels. Much of this product finds its way to this country through the avenues of trade, and Geneva and Boston have long been on very intimate terms. This is lessened somewhat by the growth of American manufacture of watches, but there must be a great trade here even in Swiss watches, owing to the increase of our population and the demand for good time-keepers.

In keeping with its theological reputation, Geneva has an eye to public education, and its schools are excellent, the population being generally very intelligent. Among the institutions for disseminating learning is the celebrated college that Calvin founded over three hundred years ago, that is to-day in a very flourishing condition. There are, besides, theological schools of various denominations, in which young men are prepared for preaching or the learned professions.

The origin of Geneva is unknown, but its antiquity is proved by the reference which Cæsar makes to it. On the invasion of the North, it was successively occupied by the Bourguignons, who made it their capital, the Ostrogoths and Franks. It next formed part of the second kingdom of Burgundy, and became incorporated with the Germanic empire. By a grant of the emperors, the temporal was added to the spiritual power of the bishops, and the counts of Savoy having succeeded in controlling the nomination of the bishop, became in a manner masters of Geneva. The state of matters was suddenly interrupted by the Reformation, to which the Genevese are indebted both for their civil and religious freedom. The celebrity which they afterwards acquired, chiefly under the guidance of Calvin and his distinguished associates, is matter of European history.

Lake Leman, or Geneva Lake, the largest of the Swiss lakes, measures on its north shore 55 miles, on its south shore 40 miles; its central breadth 6 miles; greatest depth 900 feet. It is in the form of a crescent, with its horns turned south, and is 1150 feet above the sea. Its scenery, though grand, is surpassed by that of several of the Swiss lakes. On the north the shore is low, and the ground behind ascends gradually in beautiful slopes, covered with vines. On the south, and particularly on the east side, the shore is rocky and abrupt, and lofty precipices often rise sheer from the water's edge. The numerous small boats on the lake, with their lateen sails, add much to the picturesqueness of the scene. The steamers have rather a different effect, but afford excellent facilities for visiting all that is interesting on the shores of the lake, or its immediate vicinity. A remarkable phenomenon in the lake is a sudden rise and fall, sometimes of five feet, but usually only two feet, and never lasting more than twenty five minutes. It is not produced by the wind, for it takes place when the air is perfectly still. Many conjectures have been formed as to the cause. The most probable is that which attributes it to the unequal pressure of the atmosphere on different parts of the surface. Owing to the depth of the lake, it never freezes entirely, though in severe winters its lower extremity becomes covered with ice. It contains various species of fish, and its water is remarkably pure, and of a beautiful blue color; a phenomenon, however, which is not observable in small quantities.

THE THRONE OF RUSSIA.

We present a view of the throne of Russia, the centre and symbol of a dominion over upwards of seventy millions of people. This is in the Kreml (not Kremlin) of Moscow, and upon it the emperors of Russia seat themselves after coronation, and receive the homage of state officials and such of their subjects as may be admitted. The throne is a very elaborate and elegant piece of work. The two escutcheons forming a square are the arms of states successively united to the empire, represented, in the centre, by a two-headed eagle, surmounted by an imperial crown. This eagle is repeated at the top, above the St. George and St. Michael, which emblemizes the emperor personally. The richness of the columns, arabesques and embroidery needs no description. It is one whole of superb and ornate magnificence, as should be so august a seat, at once the symbol of temporal and spiritual power, for the czar is at the same time their emperor and their pope, the chief of their bodies and their souls. He bears the name of father, rather than emperor, which better expresses their sentiments of submission. The Emperor Nicholas tested this feeling in a very practical manner. At the time of an insurrection that threatened his throne, he rode, alone and unarmed, into St. Petersburg among the insurgents, and brought to their knees those who were in mutiny against him.

The present emperor is worthy of all the conventional and personal regard of his people, and we as Americans feel attracted towards him for his many acts of kindness to our country and countrymen. The last instance of his kindly regard for the latter was in the case of the visit of the Quaker City pleasure-party that visited his majesty at Valta, on the Black Sea, where he was sojourning in summer recreation, an account of which is given by Mark Twain, one of the party, in his capital book, "The Innocents Abroad." After all sorts of imaginings regarding etiquette in the premises, and the preparation of addresses, the party found themselves in a circle before the door of the royal residence, where the emperor and his family received them very graciously, "punctuating his speech of welcome with a bow, thus: "Good-morning—I am glad to see you—I am gratified—I am delighted—I am happy to receive you!"

"All took off their hats," he says, "and the consul inflicted the address on him. He bore it with unflinching fortitude; then took the rusty-looking document and handed it to some great officer or other, to be filed away among the archives of Russia—in the stove. He thanked us for the address, and said he was very much pleased to see us, especially as such friendly relations existed between Russia and the United States. The empress said the Americans were favorites in Russia, and she hoped the Russians were similarly regarded in America. These were all the speeches that were made, and I recommend them to parties who present policemen with gold watches, as models of brevity and point. After this the empress went and talked sociably (frau empress) with various ladies around the circle; several gentlemen entered into a disjointed conversation with the emperor; the dukes and princes, admirals and maids of honor dropped into free and easy chat with first one and then another of our party, and whoever chose stepped forward and spoke with the modest little Grand Duchess Marie, the czar's daughter. She is fourteen years old, light-haired, blue-eyed, unassuming and pretty. Everybody talks English.

"The emperor wore a cap, frock-coat and pantaloons, all of some kind of plain white drilling—cotton or linen—and sported no jewelry or any insignia whatever of rank. No costume could be less ostentatious. He is very tall and spare, and a determined-looking man, though a very pleasant-looking one, nevertheless. It is easy to see that he is kind and affectionate. There is none of the cunning in his eye that all of us noticed in Louis Napoleon's.

"The empress and the little grand duchess wore simple suits of foulard (or foulard silk, I don't know which is proper) with a small blue spot in it; the dresses were trimmed with blue; both ladies wore broad sashes about their waists; linen collars and clerical ties of muslin; low-crowned straw hats trimmed with blue velvet; parasols and flesh-colored gloves. The grand duchess had no heels on her shoes. I do not know this of my own knowledge, but one of our ladies told me so. I was not looking at her shoes. I was glad to observe that she wore her own hair, plaited in thick braids against the back of her head, instead of the uncomely thing they call a waterfall, which is about as much like a waterfall as a canvas-covered ham is like a cataract. Taking the kind expression that is in the emperor's face and the gentleness that is in his young daughter's into consideration, I wondered if it would not tax the czar's firmness to the utmost to condemn a supplicating wretch to misery in the wastes of Siberia, if she pleaded for him. Every time their eyes met, I saw more and more what a tremendous power that weak, diffident school-girl could wield if she chose to do it. Many and many a time she might rule the Autocrat of Russia, whose lightest word is law to seventy millions of human beings! She was only a girl, and she looked like a thousand others I have seen, but never a girl provoked such a novel and peculiar interest in me before. A strange, new sensation is a rare thing in this humdrum life, and I had it here. There was nothing stale nor worn out about the thoughts and feelings the situation and the circumstances created. It seemed strange—stranger than I can tell—to think that the central figure in the cluster of men and women, chatting here under the trees like the most ordinary individual in the land, was a man who could open his lips and ships would fly through the waves, locomotives would speed over the plains, couriers would hurry from village to village, a hundred telegraphs would flash the word to the four corners of an empire that stretches its vast proportions over a seventh part of the habitable globe, and a countless multitude of men would spring to do his bidding. I had a vague desire to examine his hands and see if they were flesh and blood, like other men's. Here was a man who could do this wonderful thing, and yet, if I chose, I could knock him down. The case was plain, but it seemed preposterous, nevertheless—as preposterous as trying to knock down a mountain or wipe out a continent. If this man sprained his ankle, a million miles of telegraph would carry the news over mountains—valleys—uninhabited deserts—under the trackless sea—and ten thousand newspapers would prate of it; if he were grievously ill, all the nations would know it before the sun rose again; if he dropped lifeless where he stood, his fall might shake the thrones of half a world! If I could have stolen his coat, I would have done it. When I meet a man like that, I want something to remember him by.”

He concludes by saying, that, after seeing the Emperor of Russia, he shall never believe in the kings of the stage again. “When they swagger around the stage in jewelled crowns and splendid robes, I shall feel bound to observe that all the emperors that ever I was personally acquainted with wore the commonest sort of clothes, and did not swagger. And when they come on the stage attended by a vast body guard of supes in helmets and tin breast-plates, it will be my duty as well as my pleasure to inform the ignorant that no crowned head of my acquaintance has a soldier anywhere about his house or his person.”

Such fill the throne of Russia.

MACE OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

On page 218 we give our readers a correct picture of a “bauble,” or, in other words, the Mace of the House of Commons, the governing council of England. We all remember Cromwell's words, when he turned the members of the House of Parliament into the streets, for he had no further use for them. They impeded progress and his schemes. They quarrelled among themselves and kept the nation in confusion, so one day he entered the House, followed by some of his “iron-clads,” and said, pointing to the mace, “Take away that bauble;” and it was removed, and the Long Parliament was scattered like a flock of frightened sheep.

In these days, the mace is the ensign of the authority by virtue of which the House of Commons sits to hold “high converse and fierce debates” on the affairs and destinies of the nation. Richly carved and gilt, with its massive golden-headed crown, it is, when placed on the table before the Speaker, the symbol that the House is in full sitting. When it is removed in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, the Speaker takes his departure, and the House is then adjourned or in committee. The theory of the mace is that it represents the Royal person, which is always supposed to be present at the full deliberations of the House. The Commons are elected by the people; but by a principle, or if you like, a fiction of the law, they sit under writs issued by the crown. Therefore the sovereign, as the legal incarnation of the legislative functions, is always presumed to be present.

What became of the mace which Cromwell removed is not certainly known. The London Royal Society claims to have possession of the “bauble,” so does the Corporation of the City of London. But it is not improbable that the Puritan soldiers of the Protector sold it to some dealer in old curiosities, and years afterwards rival maces were introduced to the public as the real Simon Pure. But whether the present is the mace used in the time of the Long Parliament, and for generations of previous Houses of Commons—the officers of the House stoutly contend that it is; but they have only tradition to support them, as with the Royal Society and the London Corporation—is quite immaterial, for if the present mace were lost, the House would quietly order the Chancellor of the Exchequer to supply it with another. And that would not involve any constitutional change or innovating precedent, for it is well known that James II. carried one original Great Seal with him on his flight, and Lord Thurlow had another original Great Seal stolen from him, that was never brought back by the daring thief. So a new one was ordered, and that, we believe, the present Lord Chancellor has in his possession.

As our antiquarian readers are aware, the mace, as a badge of magisterial authority, dates back to a very ancient time. No doubt it is derived from the first weapon that man fashioned—the club.

Hercules was the first mace-bearer in history. The Romans borrowed it from the Greeks, and the Britons from the Romans, and it has remained an honored guest among us ever since law was set up on its legs, and the country brought into subjection to wholesome discipline; for the mace bears a part in every corporate body in the land—even the beadle carries it about in decorous solemnity.

To the Speaker of the House of Commons it is the life of his official existence. It is borne before him on all state occasions. Whenever a person is called to be examined, the constant practice both in the House and at committees of the whole House is that the bar is down. And whenever any prisoner, already a prisoner, whether in custody of the sergeant or any other person, is brought to the bar as a witness, or to attend to the hearing of any case, he must be brought in by the sergeant, and the sergeant must stand by him at the bar with the mace during the time he continues there. So long as the mace is off the table no member can speak, not even to suggest questions to the chair. It is a mighty club, but seldom used for offensive purposes. No one is knocked down with it. Even the most unruly member of the House does not dread it, any more than representatives in Congress during an exciting discussion care for the Speaker's gavel. In Parliament the Commons may howl, cough, laugh and indulge in cat-calls, to their heart's content, and the Speaker and his mace of authority are unmoved by the blast that sweeps through the House.

HUDSON'S BAY.

The recent rebellion at Red River, a part of the Hudson Bay possession, and about the only post where the authority of the Company is not absolute, has attracted attention towards that territory, which, with a few reservations, has just been ceded to the New Dominion, Canada. The old English monarchs were always lavish of the property that did not attach to their crowns, but which, belonging to the heathen round about, they took possession of in the name of the Church and Civilization, backed their acts by power that was irresistible, and made all valid at the cannon's mouth. These gifts were awarded to trading companies, the crown not even reserving to itself a due proportion of the jewels and valuables that might be found during their excavations into these terra incognitas, of which the world has hardly heard. Hence the Virginia Company, the East India Company, and, nearly as great as the latter, the Hudson Bay Company. This was a grand and wholesale gift to a few favorites, by Charles II. in 1670, and comprised nearly all the British possessions in North America, bounded north by the Polar regions, east by Labrador, Davis' Straits and Baffin's Bay, south by Canada and the United States, and westerly to an undetermined point, as far as they chose to go. The purpose of the Company was to encourage the prosecution of search after a new passage to the South Sea, and to establish a trade in furs, minerals, and "other considerable commodities," and grant was made to the Company of the "sole trade and commerce of all the seas, straits, bays, rivers, lakes, creeks and sounds, in whatsoever latitude they shall be, that lie within the entrance commonly called Hudson's Straits, together with all the lands and territories upon the countries, coasts and confines of the sea, bays, lakes, rivers, creeks and sounds aforesaid," that had not been granted previously to any British subject, or were not held by those of any other Christian prince. It will be seen what vast power this gave the Company, that has never been relaxed, except, measurably, at Red River and Labrador, where free trade is allowed, that is withheld at all other ports, trade being exclusively enjoyed by the Company's agents to the present time. All that was asked by the crown to confirm this charter was the annual payment of "two elks and two black beavers," which was setting the affair remarkably low. They could establish stations, erect forts, form a government and do all the acts of a state, conforming simply to the organic law of England.

The original charter party is composed of great names—viz.: Prince Rupert, Christopher Duke of Albemarle, William Earl of Craven, Henry Lord Arlington, Anthony Lord Ashley, Sir John Robinson, Sir Robert Viner, Sir John Griffith, Sir Philip Carteret, and a half-dozen other names not bearing a noble prefix. It is safe to say that none of the original members retain any interest in the Company, except maybe in an incorporeal capacity.

The Hudson's Bay region has been regarded as fitted only for fur trappers and hunters, too remote from civilization to be desirable by any lover of comfort, and that it has been so regarded is owing to the exclusiveness of the Hudson's Bay Company itself. The region comprehends in its vast extent many descriptions of soil, and a variety of climate betwixt temperate and frigid, admitting of the growth of cereals in abundance, and all sorts of vegetables. From a company, however, that at one time controlled the fur trade of the world, of late years fallen off into a state of semi-syncope, that augured its demise, and on the establishment of the New Dominion, the Company ceded its vast territory, with the reservations mentioned, thereto, for the consideration of £300,000 cash, the reservation being that the Company should still possess its trading stations, and have, around each, hunting-grounds as large in extent as average English counties. The Company by this means saves itself from extinction, which was threatened, lessens its liabilities, and enables the Dominion to stretch itself to the Rocky Mountains, and, over them, to the Pacific Ocean. One of the stations thus retained is Fort Yale, Frazer's River, a view of which we are enabled to present to our readers, which will be interesting as the scene of gold discovery a few years since, which sent thousands of Americans into that territory, and where one at least remained in stone, like the Cardiff giant, made such by drinking a fluid that was imprisoned in the quartz which petrified him! The scene of our illustration, though small, is a very busy trading station, and a description of it by a recent visitor may prove interesting to our readers:

"At six o'clock in the morning the massive bolts and bars are unlocked from the entrances to the stockade, and the English, Scotch, Irish, half-breeds, dogs, pigs and chickens begin to make their appearance. At a later hour in the morning the door of the saleroom is opened, and from that moment trade is unceasing, and a continuous stream of coin flows into the till of the Company until noon. After dinner business is resumed, and the same monotonous and unchanging routine is gone through until six P. M., when trade is again brought to a dead halt, the crowd disperses, and the business portion of the day is ended."

The hunters pitch their tents outside of the fort, and the scene presented is generally wild and picturesque. Among the many nationalities represented, who are eagerly pursuing trade, the poor Indian is a loser as he ever was. His skins are sold by barter, and we dare say a hand weighs down a pound of his skins and a foot two pounds, as in the honest days of our own early settlements. But the Indians and the Bay Company are on the best of terms, ostensibly, the former rendered harmless by a wise separation of them and keeping all the males on the hunt.

The Red River settlement was made by Lord Selkirk, a Scotch nobleman, in 1812, for which he obtained a grant of 12,000 acres from the Hudson's Bay Company, the right to which had long been disputed by the Northwest Fur Company, between which and the Hudson Bay Company there had always been rivalry and some serious quarrels. Between the two the Red River settlement declined, and with varied fortunes at last became amalgamated with the Hudson's Bay Company, retaining some of their original rights. Its existence, since the settlement of British Columbia, has not been vigorous, and we were surprised the other day to hear of a rebellion having broken out there, which threatened very serious results. The occasion of the rebellion was the attempt on the part of the New Dominion to take control of the Red River colony, through the cession of the Hudson Bay territory, including that, and Governor McDougal was sent to assume the government, backed by official authority. The rebellion was led by Louis Rielle, a native of Red River, but educated in Montreal, in the same college that graduated General Dix. Though but twenty-four years old, he incited the poor and sparse population to resistance, which was successful, General McDougal being driven away, the government property seized, and independence declared.

The Hudson Bay territory will prove but a cumbrous load for Canada. It belongs of right to the United States, in spite of all the unreasonable grants that should have been annulled as unwise monopolies.

SCENE OF THE HUDSON BAY TROUBLES.

THE STRUGGLE FOR MAVERICK.

A Dramatic Story....In Three Parts.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

PART SECOND.—III.

ABOUT the same hour that Jerry Small's telegram was read to Oliver Maverick, the young girl of whom the latter had spoken to his daughter as Anna May, the adopted daughter of Mrs. Roesselle, came down the broad gravel walk beneath the rows of magnificent elms which in summer time almost hid the house at Maverick from the roadway passer. She had passed the night before in watching at the bedside of Augustus Maverick, to relieve the nurse, whose vigils had worn her down; and as often happens after a sleepless night, the next morning found her wakeful and restless. Her foster-mother saw that her nerves needed quieting, and bade her go out for a walk.

She was a slender but symmetrical girl, and looked very shapely in her plain morning-dress, with a rustic hat upon her head. Her face was a type of a large class of our American female faces; a fresh red and white complexion, round outlines, small nose and mouth, low forehead, and set off by hair that was brown in the shade and golden in the sun. Eyes, too, of dark brown; very tender, handsome eyes, full of expression and thoughtfulness, which could sometimes kindle with generous fervor or glow with indignation. It was not a bold face; it must have been a rare occasion that could set its lineaments into a decided cast of firmness; but it was the face of a good, pure girl, whose soul was full of kindness and womanly gentleness to all.

She reached the broad gateway, and paused a moment, leaning upon one of the stone pillars to decide whither she should turn her steps for her walk. A little distance to the west was the Hudson, flashing brightly through the trees in the morning sun; the road along its bank would bring her with a short walk to Tarrytown; but her thoughts turned in another direction. A little less than a mile to the east ran an irregular range of low, rocky hills, which she had never visited, and which she had often wished to explore. Seen from the mansion they presented the boldest feature of the landscape. Fantastic shapes and profiles could be seen or imagined in their rocky projections, which were interspersed with scattered clumps of trees and bushes. It was only a fancy that prompted her to visit the place on this morning; but no human foresight could have directed her so well.

Her way for half a mile was along the highway upon which the mansion fronted; and then she took a path which led across the fields to the base of the hills. Threading her way upward among rocks and briars, and tangles of fallen trees which in some places barred the narrow track which the feet of hunters and excursionists had worn, she came to an enormous mass of rock that at this point crowned the hill. As she stood beside it, she saw that it projected out several feet above her head, in irregular shelves, which seemed to bar any higher ascent; but passing around it, she found a place where these shelves projected at the base, and rose towards the top in something like a rude flight of stairs. Clambering up with some exertion, she reached the summit; and seated here upon the very crown of the hills, she looked abroad and enjoyed the magnificent prospect that lay spread out like a map before her. There was the winding river, visible for miles, like a broad white ribbon, variegated with moving craft and the green mixture of foliage; the mountains soared up beyond, piercing the clouds, and looking blue and hazy in the distance; Maverick lay almost beneath her, and her eye lingered long on its massive stone front, its high-pitched roof and quaint gables and chimneys and windows, the stately pillars of stone that supported the front, approached by wide stone steps, the ample wooden wings, painted gray to harmonize with the stone of the main part, which had been added in later days, the noble elms that surround and embowered it, and lastly, on the broad expanse of meadow, forest, uplands for grazing, and arable fields, watered by a creek which ran through the entire farm and emptied into the Hudson. There was no more valuable nor more slightly property in the neighborhood than Maverick Farm; it had been her home for eight years, and all her homelike affections were centered in it. Her dear foster-mother (than whom she had never known any other) had brought her here when she came; and here her years had passed in quiet domestic happiness, and in study under the tuition of Mrs. Roesselle. No wayward mood of the moody owner of the place had ever affected these two; their lives were as much apart from his as though they were passing under another roof, and whatever might have been the evil ways of Augustus Maverick, he had scrupulously sought to cloak them from the knowledge of these two.

Anna May might have sat there for hours, absorbed in the reveries which the contemplation of her home suggested, but a low rumble of thunder suddenly aroused and startled her. She rose to her feet and looked at the heavens. The sun, which had all the morning been shining warm and bright, was now concealed by a great black mass of clouds which had rapidly driven down from the northwest, and the air suddenly grew cold and dense. Almost in an instant an obscurity like that of twilight settled over the earth; the wind moaned dismally among the trees, and great drops of rain began to patter upon the rock. Anna soon made her way down the side of the rock; but the storm grew so fierce that she at once decided she must wait until it had subsided before she could venture to return home. A thought of the great cavernous opening under the rock, which she had seen a few moments before, befriended her at this critical moment, and she determined to take refuge in it. Feeling her way along the opening she quickly sheltered herself under the friendly projection, and rested from the exhaustion of her efforts and fears.

In any other situation than her present one of dubious safety, she would have enjoyed the magnificent spectacle which the warring elements now presented. The first darkness of the storm had passed away, giving place to a dusky gloom; the air was still chilly, and the thunder frequent and startling. But the wind now came sweeping down with almost the force of a hurricane, dashing the rain in torrents to the earth, and shrieking with an appalling uproar. Now and then as a brilliant lightning-flash illuminated the whole hillside, the girl looked down from her covert and saw huge tree-trunks splintered and strewn in pieces by the subtle element, and others uprooted by the force of the tempest and hurled more than their length among the rocks. The rain could not reach her in her retreat; but for the hour that the storm lasted the wind drove in upon her, chilling her with its keenness. She wrapped her light shawl more closely about her shoulders, and waited in anxious expectancy for the end of the storm.

It came at last; the wind sullenly died down; the rain ceased; and almost as abruptly as it had appeared did the black mass of cloud open and disperse. The sun came out again with his warm, bright rays, the frightened birds began their songs again, and the heart of the maiden was lifted in thankfulness for her preservation from the dangers of the tempest.

But her peril was not yet over. She was about to crawl out from the cavern, when a low, snarling sound fell with startling effect on her ears. It seemed to come from behind her. She looked around, and gazed into the darkness of the cave. At first sight it was all dark to her; she could distinguish nothing, and thought that her imagination had deceived her.

It had not. Again that snarl, fierce, more alarming than before. The warm, active blood of a vigorous man would have chilled at that ominous sound, heard in such a place; and the heart of the girl stood still an instant with fear.

She looked towards the direction of the sound. Her eyes were becoming accustomed to the darkness of the place; and out of that darkness, apparently a few feet from her, two fiery balls glowed and scintillated upon her! They were quite near together; and back of them, a dark, quivering mass, other than the darkness of the cavern, was partially defined.

Realizing with a flash of thought the horrors of her position, the girl sank to her knees from the half-upright posture in which the moment found her. A full minute more passed thus, she waiting in dreadful expectation while that low snarling sound continued.

"If it were only light, so that I could know what it is!" was her unspoken thought.

A tall growth of trees, a little way down from the mouth of the cavern, had hitherto thrown it in shadow, doubling the natural obscurity of the place. But moments in such crises of danger as this often change the aspect of the scene; and the thought was hardly conceived in her brain when the moving sun, rising to the zenith, passed above the treetops, and threw a vivid burst of light directly into the cavern, lighting it up on the instant, and revealing the peril to her gaze. And she, kneeling there upon the rocky floor of the cavern, looked at the sight in terror—terror which was nearly coupled with admiration, at the beauty of the creature before her.

It sat upon all fours not seven feet away; and at sight of her its eyes seemed to burn alternately with ferocity and fear. It was an object four feet long at least, with a long, waving tail, which stroked its sides. Its body was covered with fur, of a deep brownish color on the head, back, neck and sides, changing to a yellowish tinge under the belly and down the nose and chin; while along the breast it was of a pure white. Its paws were armed with claws, and an occasional lifting of the lips showed a row of sharp white teeth. Its ears were actively in motion, now erect, and now down; and its lithe body was extended flat, but continually in motion, agitating the fur upon it, and causing it to show different shades as the animal continued to glide a few inches backwards and forwards by the muscular force of its paws. The head was held straight up; but the snarling had ceased, and a gentle though deep purring succeeded it.*

With all the stoutness of heart that she was able to summon to her aid in this emergency, Anna fixed her eyes steadily upon those of the animal, and remained perfectly motionless. She well knew that any attempt to fly precipitately from the cavern would be likely to bring the brute upon her; and she hoped to escape gradually, by retiring a step at a time, continuing to face him.

He grew uneasy as she looked steadily into his eyes, and the purring rose louder, and deepened in volume until it filled the cavern; while the animal's tail lashed his sides incessantly.

Still kneeling, Anna worked herself back a few feet with her hands. To her terror and dismay the puma rose and followed her till she ceased to move; and then he took his former position, at about the same distance from her as before.

* The puma, a smaller species of the jaguar, or American tiger—of which the above is an excellent description, although infrequently found in northern latitudes, is by no means extinct. It is still found in our Northern States and the Canadas, is carnivorous and fierce, and has often been known to attack man.

She dared not move again; she dared not cry aloud—though cries in this wild place could be expected to bring her no aid; and she dared not remove her eyes for an instant from the terrible eyes of the puma. Her limbs ached with the constraint of her position, but she dared not change it; she dared do nothing now, but stay there and wait for the spring of the ferocious creature, which was certain to bring her death.

Death in such a place, and alone—death by the jaws of a beast of prey, within sight of her home—such a death for her, this fair, good maiden! The terrible, sickening thought had the pang of death in it, and brought to her such mental agony as all her life had not known. She offered a brief prayer; and then, overcome with fear and despair, she covered her face in her shawl and hopelessly waited for the end which seemed inevitable.

The purring of the puma rose louder and louder, increasing almost to a roar; his body quivered in every muscle, his tail lashed his sides in rage, and his head was bent between his paws. His body was gathered for a spring; and feeling that her last moment had come, Anna sank down prone upon the stone. She had not heard the words which for the last minute had been whispered and repeated behind her, "Lie down! Lie down! Don't look nor speak—but lie down!" She heard nothing of them, for the loud, angry purring of the puma drowned the whisper, and she did not know that a deliverer was crouching on one knee at the mouth of the cavern, his rifle to his shoulder, and his eye glancing steadily along the sights, but unable to cover a vital spot of the animal while she remained kneeling.

"Lie down! Lie down! Quick—"

She fell upon her face at that instant, as if in obedience to the command which she had not heard. An explosion seven times louder than the report of a single rifle in the open air reverberated through the rocky chamber, and the smoke rolling inward filled it, and prevented the deliverer for a moment from seeing that his bullet had fairly split the puma's skull. Fearing that the animal might only be wounded he sprang in; and seizing the prostrate girl, dragged her more roughly than carefully out of the cave. She had not fainted; she stood upright with the assistance of his arm, and as the smoke gradually emptied itself from the cavern, she looked in the direction of his outstretched finger, and saw and realized through all the bewilderment of her fright, that the animal was struggling upon its back, its glossy white breast streaked with its blood. The timely bullet had done its work well, and with a few wild jerks and cries the creature expired.

IV.

THE person to whom Anna owed her timely deliverance was a tall, well-formed young man about twenty-five years old, with a thoughtful face which bore marks of study, but which showed, too, that there was behind the student a nature of freem, exuberant humanity, with an ample breadth of kindness and manliness. He was evidently not one of the mere book-worm kind, but loved the world and its people, and its innocent pleasures. He was dressed in a plain suit of gray which had a city cut, and his bearing and manners were those of the best city-bred people. He interrupted Anna in her fervent expressions of gratitude by simply saying:

"I am glad indeed, miss, that chance or providence sent me here as it did, so that I could be of service to you. Sit down on this fallen tree until you entirely recover your composure. You have passed through a terrible ordeal, and I am bound to say that you have borne it with extraordinary bravery."

"I assure you I nearly died with fright, nevertheless," said Anna, still pale and trembling from fear. "Are you sure the creature is quite dead?"

"He'll make no more trouble," replied the other, glancing at the motionless body. "Now I'll reload; though I hardly expect a chance to kill any more such game hereabouts. It was decidedly lucky that I brought my rifle instead of the shot-gun; the bird-shot would have spoiled Mr. Tiger-Cat's handsome skin, and hurt him very little."

The speaker finished charging his rifle, and then continued his talk with admirable ease and readiness.

"We have met very unexpectedly, and under remarkable circumstances; and as I wish to know who it is that I have saved, I will take it for granted that you are not unwilling to be told who I am. My name is Roscoe Grayle; I graduated at the last commencement at Columbia, and I have come up here to find an aunt, a sister of my mother, whom I haven't seen for years. My mother wrote to me that she was living somewhere near Tarrytown, and to be sure to see her before I came home; and thinking that the search might prove a long one, I brought my hunting apparatus along. I came up on a lumber sloop, for the variety of the thing; but after the old craft had lain in all night in the cove down yonder, discharging part of her cargo, which proceeding promised to consume all of to-day, I took my gun and came ashore, to kill time. I had rambled over a good part of these hills, without finding any game, when the storm came up, and I crawled into one of the crevices near by until it was over. I heard the purring of the puma as I was about to proceed; and having heard just such a noise before when I shot one in Texas, I knew what it was, and began to look about for it. And what followed then, you know."

"I must thank you again, sir," said Anna, "for your promptness and bravery. You have saved my life. My name is Anna May; I live at that mansion yonder." And she pointed to the roofs of Maverick, which were visible through an opening in the trees from where they sat.

The other looked and bowed; hesitated, lingered; and then said:

"I should be happy to be of farther service to you."

"Thank you; I think you have done quite enough for me. And as I have no wish to hunt pumas any more to-day, I think I will return home."

Mr. Grayle laughed and said:

"I think I have found diversion enough for one morning. It is about noon, and what they are pleased to call dinner on the sloop doesn't wait for anybody. My way lies in the same direction with you; shall we walk together?"

Anna was glad to consent, and they made their way down the hill together. His hand was often found convenient to assist her over the fallen branches and large stones with which the storm had littered the path, and some moments were occupied in getting back to the fields. Anna was inventing some appropriate form of words in which she might delicately explain the situation of affairs at home as an apology for not inviting him to the mansion to dine, when he exclaimed:

"You may be able to tell me, Miss May, something of my relative. Never having seen her at all, I must confess that I was not at all anxious for myself to come up here to find her; but it is so long since mother has seen her that I can't go back home to Maryland without carrying her some news of her sister.

They haven't corresponded for years, and without any reason at all for it, there has grown up a complete silence between them. This shouldn't be so, of course, and I am commissioned to find my aunt. I hope I shall like her when I find her."

"What is her name?" Anna asked.

Mr. Grayle laughed again, and now with some confusion.

"I am quite ashamed to say that I don't know," he replied. "I used to know the name, and my last letter from her contained it; but unfortunately I have lost the letter, and have nothing to depend upon but my mother's maiden name, which was Westcott. Ah—I do recollect that my aunt's Christian name was Helen. The name she took by marriage was a strange one—a very unusual name. I am afraid I shall be much troubled to find her, for she was married all of twenty years ago, and it is quite likely that she has removed somewhere."

Anna May's eyes were wide open with surprise.

"Did she marry a minister?" was her question.

"Yes, I think she did."

"Was the name Roesselle?"

"That's it exactly!" Mr. Grayle cried, clapping his hands. "Roesselle—Roesselle—Roesselle—I'll not forget it again. You know her then?"

"She is my best friend on earth," was the reply. "You have but a brief search now; she is my foster-mother, and the housekeeper at the mansion where I live."

Placed upon a footing by this unexpected discovery which gave them a common interest in acquaintance, and which removed all shadow of embarrassment, the two walked on towards the mansion; and the fifteen minutes occupied in reaching it sufficed to Anna to explain briefly to Mr. Grayle the peculiar relations of the people who dwelt at the mansion, and the situation of affairs there at the time. He listened attentively; and intimating nothing to his companion, his conclusion with himself was that the dying condition of Mr. Maverick would make it imperative upon him to satisfy his mother's instructions with a half hour's call, postponing a better acquaintance until a more favorable opportunity.

They entered the gateway shortly after meridian and walked up to the front of the house. The sun was quite warm for the season, and there was nothing stirring about the grounds; but the vigilant eye of Jerry Small, peering up from the basement window, took note of their approach, and the spy was instantly on the alert to discover who the stranger was.

Ushering Mr. Grayle into the parlor, Anna went to find her foster-mother; and she met her descending the stairs. The sweet, delicate beauty of the Helen Roesselle of other days was now merged in the pale, serious, matronly face, shaded by its widow's cap, and paler by contrast with the dark garments which she would not discard. Some women preserve at the middle age of life a beauty which is hardly second to that of their girlhood; but not those women whom death and care have saddened. Faint tokens of silver threaded the hair over her brow; and while she was perfectly erect and vigorous, and while the consciousness that she had still a useful sphere to fill was evidenced in her appearance, yet that appearance chiefly conveyed the idea of a Christian woman who had met severe sorrow without breaking under it, and whom the grief of herself and others had not unfitted for a foremost place in the ranks of those who valiantly fight out to the last this great battle of life.

Anna waited for her at the foot of the stairs, and met her with the question:

"Is there any change?"

"None for the better," was the reply. "Doctor Thurman went away half an hour ago, saying that there would be no marked change before night; and he will come back then. Did somebody come in with you?"

"Yes; please come into the parlor, mother."

Mrs. Roesselle was surprised as well as gratified to find her nephew there; and the next hour was devoted to mutual inquiry, mingled with regrets that so long a silence had occurred between the families. It was easy for the widow to plead her troubles, which had, wrongly, she knew, drawn her too much within herself; and the nephew had to say that the cares of a large family had done the same for his mother. Both were pleased; and each was able to trace some family resemblance in the other; and it was only after a long and pleasant chat that Mrs. Roesselle remembered with regret the reason which would at this time prevent her asking her nephew to pass some weeks at the mansion. Mr. Grayle gracefully anticipated her, and alluding to the information that Anna had given him of the domestic affairs of Maverick, he declared that it was a sufficient reason why no further hospitality should be offered to or expected by him. And he arose to make his farewell.

"O no, Roscoe—not quite so sudden as this," said the aunt. "I cannot allow you to go in this way. We have a nurse up stairs who relieves us of much of the watching and care, and we should be badly off indeed if we could not ask you to stay to dinner. Our patient is quite certain to linger through the day, and you will not embarrass us at all. It is now one; we will not dine till four. Will you stay?"

Mr. Grayle accepted the invitation; and the words of his acceptance were followed, before further remark could be made, by a stroke of the muffled knocker. Leaving her nephew with Anna, Mrs. Roesselle went to the door. An elderly man and a young lady were outside—both strangers to her. The man carried a portmanteau; a carriage was driving away from the gate.

"Is this Mrs. Roesselle?" asked the gentleman.

"It is, sir." And with the words the housekeeper remained where she stood, the door-knob in her hand, awaiting the announcement of their business.

"You are of course unacquainted with us," the explanation began. "I knew you only because I had heard that there was such a person here, and I judged that you were that person. I beg to present myself as Oliver Maverick, the brother of Mr. Augustus Maverick; and to present my daughter, Miss Laura Maverick."

The housekeeper stood, still motionless, amazed at what she heard and saw. Knowing, as all the neighborhood knew, that the people before her were the objects of the bitter hatred of Augustus Maverick, and that he had been, that he was, as completely estranged from them as though they had dwelt in another planet, the suspicion of such an occurrence as this had never crossed her mind. A great deal of thought passed through her mind in a half minute, during which she barred the way to the visitors. She knew that the man who lay in the weakness of approaching death up stairs would rage like a maniac did he know of the presence of these two beneath his roof; that he would be very likely to die in the convulsion caused by that knowledge. She knew that they had never dared to come to the mansion while Augustus Maverick was on his feet. But here they were now—his brother and niece—his only surviving relatives. What could she do?

She would temporize, and make delay until she could come to a conclusion. She still stood there, expecting, not inviting further conversation.

"May I inquire the present condition of my brother?"

"He is very low." And then there was another pause.

Mrs. Roesselle was a woman of penetration, and she had already pierced the veneering of deference and sham politeness which Oliver Maverick had thought necessary to show for this occasion. With every word that he uttered, with every motion that he made, it was plain to her that he was acting a part. Knowing nothing of these people, had she seen before her, upon the announcement of their names, a man and a young woman exhibiting faces of concern and anxiety, if not real distress, she would have instantly conceded to herself that there was reason for the visit. She saw nothing of the kind. The man was plainly simulating something that he did not feel; the girl, not entering into the conversation, stood in her own nature, with a cold, defiant face. Mrs. Roesselle instantly determined that no feeling of kin for the dying man brought them here, and that they came for a purpose. Other thoughts, and features of other faces came with that determination; and as she stood with the door-knob in her hand she wished to bar them out.

"Has my brother asked for me during his sickness?"

The question was propounded as a forerunner of another; not that there could be any doubt about the answer, but the housekeeper promptly answered it.

"He never has."

"Let me speak plainly with you, madam," Oliver Maverick said. "We are the sole relatives of this man; we wish to be with him in his last moments. You surely will not refuse to admit us here? You would say that he does not wish us here; that he would drive us forth if he knew that we stood here now, and had the strength; in short, that my brother is my mortal enemy. Would you say this? O madam, madam—I beseech you as a Christian woman, as one who has suffered, and who can sympathize with the sufferings of a bleeding heart—I beseech you, madam, to remember how loudly does this unhappy enmity plead for our admission to the deathbed! My brother is about to die; his heart may relent; he may forgive and bless me in his last words, if I am beside him to crave it. He need not, he must not know of our presence until the last agony approaches; we will remain secluded from him till then. Think, madam, as a Christian woman, what you would refuse in denying us admission at this awful hour, and then say nay if you can."

As a Christian woman, hating hypocrisy as all good Christians hate it, Mrs. Roesselle said to herself, "Oliver Maverick, you lie. You are brought here by a purpose; not by the spirit of brotherly love." As housekeeper at Maverick, standing as much in dread of the opinions and judgments of the world as do my reader and myself, and desiring to avoid for herself any cause of reproach connected with the feud of the Mavericks, she opened the door and allowed the unbidden guests to pass in.

She at once cut short the hypocritical expression of gratitude which began to pour forth, by summoning a servant from the basement. It was Jerry Small who appeared; as he had been waiting below with his hand on the door-latch for some moments, it could not well be any other. But no word or sign of recognition passed between him and the guests.

"Jerry," said the housekeeper, with a carefully measured voice, "Mr. Oliver Maverick and Miss Maverick will lodge here to-night; he in the blue chamber, third floor, she in the one opposite. You will take up their portmanteau, show them the way, and call them to dinner at four o'clock."

She had addressed not one word of welcome to them; her directions were entirely formal; at least, there was no hypocrisy with her. Jerry picked up the bag, and was half way up the first flight, followed by Laura, when Oliver Maverick paused and returned to say something further to the housekeeper.

"I may venture to hope, madam, that proper precautions will be taken to prevent any whisper of our presence here from reaching my brother."

"You have no occasion to fear anything of that sort," was the reply, given in a tone of voice that instantly gave him to understand that he had trespassed. "None but the doctor, the nurse, Miss May and myself have access to him. I shall not overlook it."

Up the first flight of stairs the guests went, preceded by Jerry; up the second; and not a word was spoken until they were inside the blue chamber, with the key turned. Then Oliver Maverick turned eagerly to Jerry and said:

"Tell me anything—everything."

"Precious little to tell," was the reply. "The doctor seems to think he won't stand the night through. He's coming back in the evening. Nurse says he lies on his back, stiff and dumb, looking more like a corpse than a live man, and only opening his eyes once in a while to show that he is alive at all. No lawyer, no will; that I know."

"Good!" The eyes of both father and daughter sparkled with excitement. "Here's your ten dollars, Jerry; you're a good fellow; serve me faithfully in this business, and you'll be richly rewarded before long."

"I'll do it," said Jerry with a horrible squint out of his little weaselly eyes.

"Which is his chamber?" Laura asked.

"Inner chamber, green rooms, second floor," was the reply.

"I know it well," said the father. "It is a suite of three rooms, at the end of the hall. Is there anything new about the house?"

"No. Yes, there is, though; Mrs. Roesselle's nevy came along an hour ago, and is down in the parlor now. Don't know who he is, nor where he comes from, nor what he wants."

"Probably of no importance. But keep your eyes and ears open; and watch especially for messages to Tarrytown. Let me know as quick as you hear anything that I ought to know."

Jerry nodded and disappeared, and Laura retired to her chamber. The man without any explanation, understood the precise meaning of the presence of these two here, and was prepared to serve them with watchful fidelity.

Mrs. Roesselle turned away from the foot of the stairs as the new-comers went up, and entering her sitting-room, which was opposite the parlors, sat down and devoted some minutes to serious thought. Without at that moment forming any distinct conclusion as to what was the object of these people in coming here, for the reason, perhaps, that she was too seriously disturbed by the occurrence to allow a conclusion, she was still upon the track of the discovery. The project which could induce them to such a step as this must be a matter of magnitude, she knew; and with the faint shadowing of it in her mind came other thoughts which made her start uneasily in her chair, and regard the presence of these strangers with jealous watchfulness. Resolving to keep a vigilant eye upon them, and feeling the need of a helper in the trouble that she feared, she returned to the parlor and told her nephew and Anna May of the arrival of the Mavericks. Without stating any suspicions or inferences, she said to Mr. Grayle:

"For reasons that I think imperative, Roscoe, I have changed my mind about asking you to stop. It will be a service to us, not a hospitality from us, if you will stay to-night, and perhaps to-morrow; in fact until the death that we are waiting for has happened. Will you?"

Mr. Grayle immediately consented, and his trunk was brought from the sloop the same afternoon and placed in one of the chambers—a little chamber on the second floor. Which fact was duly noted by Jerry Small, and by him immediately repeated to his employer. The information made the latter at once uneasy.

"What do you think of it?" he asked his daughter, after telling her.

"It looks like a counter-match," was her reply.

The father nodded.

"We must be wary with that housekeeper," he said. "There is something in her eye that I don't like at all. Can it be possible—"

He stopped abruptly, startled by the thought.

"Can she have wormed herself into the affections of Augustus, and already induced him to make a will in her own interest?"

The question was a startling one. Laura promptly answered it.

"No," she said, decidedly. "We need not fear that. I watched her face, and saw that she was astonished at first, and afterwards anxious. She is cool, ready and clever; but she could not hide that deep look of anxiety. If what you fear had been already obtained, why should she be anxious?"

"Right," exclaimed the other, "and cleverly answered. I am more than ever convinced that nothing adverse to us has as yet been accomplished. Be hopeful, my daughter, for I feel almost secure that we shall outgeneral them. Jerry Small is himself the game half won; and when the critical moment comes, if it does come, you will find that I have some knowledge in reserve that will wonderfully aid us."

The afternoon passed on, and these two kept their rooms; Mrs. Roesselle was in the sick chamber, which she instructed the nurse to keep locked, and on no pretext to admit any person excepting herself and Anna. Promptly at four o'clock, Jerry Small came up to inform the Mavericks that dinner waited. So unsuspecting was the housekeeper of the doings of Jerry that she had detailed him to wait upon them during their stay, the housemaids being otherwise busy. Jerry communicated the fact to them with a chuckle at his own sharpness in keeping his operations hid.

The dinner was brief and rigidly formal. Both Anna and Mr. Grayle were absent from the table (at Mrs. Roesselle's request), and the housekeeper sat in silence, except when she answered a question in monosyllable, or inquired with laconic brevity after their wants. She ate nothing herself, reserving herself for the dinner which was to be eaten an hour later, by herself and the two absent ones. Such a meal could not last long; the guests perceived that the house had been put under repression with their coming, and their anxiety for the events of the hours which were close at hand left them little appetite.

"You will be informed when his last moments come," Mrs. Roesselle said, as they rose to retire. "Until then, you will please make no effort to hear of his condition from time to time. At present, it is unchanged."

Oliver Maverick bowed.

"We are playing shrewd games, Madam Roesselle," he thought, as he observed her watching them on their way up stairs. "Shrewd games; but you know little of my hand."

Swiftly and silently the hours sped away—the hours which brought on a night that was to become forever memorable in the story of the Mavericks.

V.

THE second dinner, eaten by the housekeeper, her nephew and Anna May, was concluded about half past five. Mrs. Roesselle conducted Mr. Grayle up to his room immediately after, and went herself into the sick chamber. The young man remained in his room but a few moments, making some slight changes in his attire, and then came into the hall, with the intention of taking a short walk through the grounds before night.

The possibility that he might find Anna May outside the house might have influenced him; but whatever was the motive, he went out with this pretext. At the same time Laura Maverick, restless and eager with anticipation, not fully understanding the procedure which her father meant to adopt, and leaving him pacing his chamber in an excitement which he was laboring in silence to repress, came from his room, shut the door, and walking to the balusters, leaned upon them and looked over into the hall below. She heard a man's step, and then a man's voice softly humming a line. Something in that voice startled her; she leaned further over, and presently saw the man appear at the head of the stairs below. He cast his eyes casually upward, and they met hers.

"Mr. Grayle?" she exclaimed, unable to repress the words that came quickly to her tongue.

He recognized her and paused, astonished and annoyed. Had his frame of mind toward her continued the same as it was when his letter was written, he would have desired to greet her civilly and give her a few moments of trifling talk; but other faces, other scenes had intervened, and he now bowed and wished to end the meeting there.

Laura Maverick's pride struggled an instant with the strong feeling that urged her to go down to him and say to him what her heart prompted; and pride succumbed. Poor woman, poor woman! She had thought that her love for him was obliterated forever when she destroyed his letter; she thought that no sight of his handsome face, no thought of his graceful, winning ways and his manly intellect would ever trouble her again; and in thinking so she had wofully deceived herself. The battle which she was to fight with her heart had been postponed, not won; her love was stronger than pride, stronger than herself; and as she saw that he meant to give her nothing but that cold, formal bow, she dismissed her maidenly reserve.

"A moment, Mr. Grayle, if you please."

He paused, and she came slowly down the stairs to where he stood.

"You did not know I was here?" She tried to speak carelessly; but he was not deceived by her tone.

"I did not," he replied. "I knew there were guests in the house, but I had no reason to suppose that you were one of them."

The girl hesitated, and nervously pulled her handkerchief. "Did you receive an answer to your last letter?" she asked, studiously averting her eyes.

"An answer to it?" was the surprised question in return. "Do I understand you rightly, Miss Maverick? Have you written to me since you received my letter?"

"I have not," she said, becoming agitated.

"Then why your question?"

"Why did you not wish to speak to me just now?" she asked, evading his question, but raising her eyes to his face.

Roscoe Grayle looked at her curiously, almost compassionately. "Do you not realize, Miss Maverick," he asked, "that it will be better for both of us—for you, certainly—to pass no more than the common civilities of life while we are under the same roof?"

The intimation contained in his words was unmistakable, and showed that he had penetrated the secret of her heart. She did not resent it; she forced herself to be calm, and to look into his face.

"I do not know that," she said. "You did not understand the meaning of my question. I meant that you should understand that I wished to say something more to you. Something that I did not say in my letter."

The man to whom she spoke had studied human nature, and knew its manifold phases. In one moment he had discovered that this girl loved him in spite of himself. He leaned back defiantly upon the baluster, and waited to hear more, quite certain that nothing he could hear would now surprise him.

"Perhaps I said too much in my letter," she added. Her voice trembled, and she spoke fast, as though fearful of breaking down. "Perhaps you did not wholly understand me. No matter. If my letter told you that I could only marry with wealth, I take that back, too. You judged me rightly when you wrote that I had given you reason to think that I felt more than kind to you. I have felt so; I do; I cannot check the feeling, nor disguise it. I wish you to understand that there are no such obstacles in your way as my letter fancied. Something has happened since I wrote it."

She paused; her communication seemed to have no effect whatever on him to whom it was addressed. He stood looking coldly into her face, and exhibited no interest whatever in what she was saying.

"Roscoe Grayle, you are stupid or heartless!" she angrily cried. "Why do you not hasten to tell me that what I say rejoices you?"

"Because it does not," was his calm reply. "Because I feel no interest in you that I do not feel in most of God's creatures. Because, Miss Maverick, I fell into an ugly error in thinking that I loved you, and gladly took the chance you gave me to extricate myself. I shall not err again."

"Do not talk so," she cried, almost wild in her earnestness. She laid her hand upon his arm, and elevated her voice. "You cannot understand me; I must speak plainly. All this property is to be mine; all that Augustus Maverick owns is to be mine. Man, man, don't kill me with coldness; tell me now what you wrote to me first, and I will ask you to share it with me. I cannot help saying this; it is because I love you."

"I am sorry for you," was all that he replied; and while he was saying it, the door opening into the hall from the suite of rooms which embraced the sick room opened, and Mrs. Roesselle came out. Laura Maverick saw her, and fled up the stairs and into her chamber. She bolted the door, and throwing herself upon the bed, burst into a passion of tears and sobs. When she rose, the tears were dry upon her face, and her eyes glittered with a stern, unwomanly light. She bathed her face, and went to the glass to arrange her hair.

"He despises me; he never loved me," she thought. "I have been foolish and incautious. But it shall not happen again. I covet two objects, Roscoe Grayle is the least of them. Him I can do without; Maverick Farm I cannot. There will be some heart-pain about it; but women were made to suffer. I will conquer it, and think only of what brought me here."

The glass at that moment showed her a weary, wistful face; her hands were clasped over a weary, toiling heart. Her father tapped softly at the door; and banishing the last trace of emotion from her face, she admitted him.

Roscoe Grayle waited for his aunt after the flight of Laura, and Mrs. Roesselle's first question was, as she approached him:

"Have you met her before?"

The young man answered:

"In New York. Not elsewhere."

The housekeeper looked carefully about her, to see that there were no eavesdroppers.

"Did I hear her say," she added, "that she was to own all that belonged to Augustus Maverick?"

"She did say so," Mr. Grayle replied; and then, discovering that his aunt wished to know what had led to such an extraordinary statement on her part to him, he frankly told her all he knew of Laura Maverick, and his own relations with her.

The housekeeper began to be enlightened. She uttered an exclamation, and her face grew stern and determined.

"Roscoe," she said, "please stay within call. Do not leave the house for more than a few minutes at a time; I may want your help on a moment's warning. I don't know what is to happen in this house to-night or to-morrow night; but I have fathomed a conspiracy that frightens me. You shall know more of what I have discovered in an hour or two; until then, remember not to be out of the way."

The young man promised, and in a few minutes was back in his room. At sunset Oliver Maverick was with his daughter in his daughter's chamber. Mrs. Roesselle and Anna, with the nurse, were at the sick-bed, and Mr. Grayle was thoughtfully pacing the back piazza, having notified his aunt where he could be found. The servants were at supper in the basement, excepting Jerry Small, who filled his plate and took it to the back windows, where he could, unobserved, watch Mr. Grayle. And thus the night found them all.

VI

THE lamps had been lighted, and Jerry Small, coming up to bring one to the guests, whispered as he delivered it:

"The doctor has not come, as he promised. They have sent for him; but Mr. Maverick is no worse."

Twenty minutes later he came again.

"The doctor has come," he said. "He has gone in to see him. The nurse just came down, and says he is no worse."

And one hour later he came again.

"Mrs. Roesselle just came down and asked for me. I was out at the stables, looking to see if any of the horses had been taken out, because I was bound to be sure that nobody left the place without my knowledge, and so she did not find me. When I came in, the girls told me I had been wanted, and not being found, she had spoken with my father. Where had he gone? Out to the barn, they thought, and so he had, and a very round-about way, too, so anxious was he to get away secretly. I went straight back, and found him there, sure enough, saddling the roan pony. The old man has got fretful and cross lately, and I was afraid I couldn't get anything out of him. 'Where are you going, pop?' says I. 'None of your business, boy, if I must tell you,' says he. 'Now that aint kind of you, pop,' says I. 'You're too old to be riding around nights. Let me go for you.' 'Yes, you're mighty kind and officious, young 'un,' he growled. 'Why wasn't you eager to make that patch of wall-garden last week, when I wanted you to? Curos'ty, curos'ty—nothin' else. The servants say you're worse than Roger Brill, now-a-days, to ask questions. You'd like to know where I'm going, and what for, wouldn't you?' 'Yes, I would,' says I. 'Well, you wont, then—not for some time, anyway. Ma'am Roesselle told me to go, and if she'd wanted you, she'd told you.' 'She did look for me,' says I. 'No matter, she told me to go, and what's more, she told me to go fast, and say nothing, except to him I'm going to. I reckon I can go fast on the roan; and when Ma'am Roesselle tells me not to blab, it's pretty likely I shan't.'

"With that he trotted out of the yard. But I think I'll know whom he brings back."

For more than an hour longer the father and daughter waited for another report. They waited in anxious, nervous suspense, which was too anxious for conversation. Then they heard through the narrow opening of the window the trampling of horses below, and voices. In a few minutes more Jerry Small came softly up, and was admitted. They could see that his news was important, in the grimace with which he prefaced it.

"Mrs. Roesselle told me to tell you that Mr. Maverick is easy, and the doctor thinks he will live over to-morrow. He's been stimulating him; but I didn't get that from her. She says you need not expect to hear anything more from her to-night, and that you'd better go to bed. The doctor has gone again."

"This is not all?" Oliver Maverick eagerly said.

"No, but the rest I saw myself. The old man has come back with Mr. Jenks, the Tarrytown lawyer. The housekeeper met him at the back door, and took him straight up stairs. They went right into Mr. Maverick's rooms."

"Are the doors locked?" was the eager question.

"I was going to tell you. They were all locked last night; but I suspect she's managing different to-night. Pretty soon after she had showed the lawyer in, she came out and knocked at her nevv'y's door, and took him back with her. Now I don't think it likely that the nevv'y's been taken into Mr. Maverick's sick room. He's a stranger, and I don't think she'd bring any more strange faces around him just now than was necessary. So I think he's to watch to-night in one of the outer rooms."

Hard as he tried to repress the signs of his excitement, Oliver Maverick was now trembling as if with an ague-fit.

"Can you find which one, Jerry?" he asked, beseechingly. "Find that, Jerry, and we may not have to trouble you any more; and we'll pay you more than you could ever expect. Do that for us, Jerry, and I'll give you a thousand dollars!"

"I'll try it," the man replied with alacrity; "but it's dangerous. I may be discovered—"

"Do your best; all that we are working for depends upon my knowing this."

Jerry was leaving the room, when he was called back.

"You know the closet at the right, in the first of those rooms?"

"Yes."

"Find if it is locked. Come back as quick as you can; time is worth everything now."

Jerry left the room, and Oliver Maverick sat down in a large easy-chair. "I ought to be strong now, stronger than ever before," he said. "But I am not; this terrible excitement weakens me; my nerves are all gone." He held out his hand, and his daughter saw that it shook to and fro without his own volition.

"I am strong, father; I am ready for our work. Tell me what I am to do, and you will find that I have the strength of will and nerve to try it."

"My brave Laura!" he said, looking up admiringly into her firm-set face, and noting the spirit that lurked in her eye. "My own girl, I know you will not shrink! It will be hazardous and difficult—"

"But it is to give us back our own," she interrupted. Her father drew her face down to him and kissed her; and with his weak, trembling hand clasped in her strong one, they waited for Jerry's return. He soon came.

"It was risky," he said, "and Ma'am Roesselle almost caught me at it; not quite. I listened at the first door till I thought there was no one inside, and then sneaked in. Nobody was there: it was dark, too. I made for the closet first; the door was locked, but the key was in it. Here it is. I'd hardly taken it out, when I heard some one at the door I had just come through. I had just time to unlock the closed door, open it, jump in, and close it, when Ma'am Roesselle came through with a lamp and her square black box. I can tell you what she keeps in that box: pen, ink and paper. I held the closet door just a crack open, and I saw through into the next room as she passed in. There was a table in the middle of the floor, with a large lamp lighted; old mother Wadhams was nodding back in her rocking-chair, and the navvy, Mr. Ball—Snail—hang the name—"

"No matter. Go on."

"The navvy sat by the table, reading a book. Ma'am Roesselle went right through into the sick room, and shut the door behind her."

"Was the door left open between the closet-room and the other?"

"At first; but Mr. What's-his-name got up and shut it."

Oliver Maverick took a pencil from his pocket and dashed off a few words on a scrap of paper. "I hope to redeem that within a week," he said, pushing it toward Jerry. "You need watch no more for us to-night; you have done your part. It is all with us now. I will see you in the morning."

The man took the hint, and retired. By the light of the stationary lamp in the hall he examined the contents of the paper, and read it as follows:

Due to Jerry Small One Thousand Dollars.

OLIVER MAVERICK.

Shutting the door after him, Maverick returned to his seat.

"A few words, Laura," he said, "as quick as I can speak them. We must discover what is happening now in the sick room below us. The information that Jerry has just given makes it certain that we can discover it, by boldness and promptness. I am not able, in my present condition, to dare so much; my miserable nerves fail me when I most need them; I am all a-tremble, and I should surely be discovered. Detection would defeat us at once and forever. If—"

"I am ready and willing," Laura interrupted. "Only tell me quick what your plan is."

"Listen! This house is older than the Revolution; that is, the main part, which we are now in. It was built well back in the colonial days of New York, when this region was not free from savage marauders, and when there was much trouble with the French. It was built to be used as a fortress, as well as a dwelling, if there should be need of it; and the inside of it was arranged in a peculiar manner. Many things about it I think Ezra Maverick never knew; Augustus never imagined what I am about to tell you. I learned it from an old soldier of the Revolution who used to hang about here. He was coaxing me for a little money to buy tobacco, and promised to tell me something that he thought nobody knew but himself. He began by saying that once during the war, when a British general had his headquarters here, the deliberations of a council of war were overheard by one of the servants: and he thought the information then obtained, which was transmitted to General Washington, enabled him to take Stony Point. When I tell you that this council of war was held in the very room in which Augustus Maverick now lies, you will see what the importance of this story is to us. The old fellow let me into the secret; and I have reason to think that it is a secret with me. Certainly, there is no one here now to suspect the existence of this means of discovery.

"It lies through the closet, of which Jerry brought us the key. The three rooms of that suite were built to correspond exactly, excepting as to the closets, which in the other two are on the opposite side. The outside walls of these rooms are on the same line, and you will find the closet let into the west wall, northwest corner of the first room. Do you perfectly understand it?"

"Perfectly," the compressed lips were opened to say.

"You must find it in the dark."

"I can. Go on."

"If everything remains as Jerry left it, you will have no trouble—unless you should be discovered in entering or leaving the closet. The sides of the closet are panelled; feel for the centre of the lower panel, at the corner nearest the left of the door, and by pushing steadily with both hands it will open in like a door, making a place large enough for you to get through by stooping down to it. The panel does not work with springs; it has hinges out of sight, but shuts tight into its case. Swing it clear back and it will not shut again of itself; but lest it should, you had better put something in the aperture. Once through it, you will find yourself in a passage of the uniform height of the rooms, three feet wide, and extending back their whole length. Go back far enough, and you will be next to the sick room, and able to overhear every word spoken there. I hardly dare hope you can see; the furniture may be arranged so as to prevent, by covering one or two very narrow cracks where a little strip of plastering had fallen off between the lath. Or the room may have been replastered and repapered. In either event, I think you can discover all we wish to know."

Laura Maverick quietly removed her slippers, and pinned back the skirts of her dress so that they could not rustle on the carpets. Without waiting to exchange another word with her father, she left the room. She listened at the head of the stairs; there was not a sound, except the very faint noise of a door shut in the basement. Swiftly descending the stairs, she flew to the hall-lamp and extinguished it with her breath; and on the instant she heard the door of the suite open, and the voice of Mrs. Roesselle say, "How could the wind blow out that lamp?"

She heard the rustle of her dress as she came toward it; but the hall was now so dark that nothing whatever could be seen in it. Crouching close to the wall upon one side, Laura waited until the housekeeper had well passed her on her search for some suspected open door or window, and then crept noiselessly to the door from which Mrs. Roesselle had emerged. The door was partially open, and the room dark; that leading into the second room was close shut. Laura swiftly crossed the floor in the direction of the closet; and as she did so, a sickly thrill shot through her nerves. She had forgotten the key.

Had Jerry locked it, or left it locked? With loud beating heart she felt for the latch and softly lifted it; the door opened without noise at her pull. Fortune was favoring her nobly. She hurried into the closet and closed the door; and sinking to the floor to rest an instant from the effects of her excitement, she heard the opening and closing of doors outside, and the sweep of a dress. Mrs. Roesselle was returning.

The girl's heart still throbbed painfully with the revulsion of feeling caused by her two narrow escapes from discovery, and she wished to rest where she was, and gather strength; but time pressed, and every flying moment might be weighted with the fate of Maverick. The lawyer had now been in the house not less than fifteen minutes; she had not one minute to lose.

Feeling about with her hands, in the darkness of the closet, she found that a pile of rags and rubbish, evidently the accumulation of some years, covered the floor at the left hand corner, and concealed the panel. Choking with the dust which rose as she moved them aside, and restraining a fit of coughing only by the most painful effort, her hands came in contact with the panel. It moved in readily at her push; time had warped the wood, so that it fitted loosely. She passed through the aperture with little difficulty, securing the panel behind her by shutting a fragment of loose cloth into its insertion. Rising to her feet, she found herself unrestricted in room, and in a pure air, which she eagerly inhaled.

A murmur, a faint sound of human voices, deadened by the intervening partition, came to her ear. She listened intently, but she could make out no words. But very quickly her attention was drawn away from these sounds by the sight of a thin, feeble glimmer of light that played upon the rough boards of the passage in front of her, to the right. It was so faint and fitting as she watched it, sometimes ceasing entirely for an instant, that she began to fear that it was an illusion; and she stepped softly toward it, feeling along the sides with both hands, bating her breath as she approached it. She was not deceived; it was light, blessed light, sent into that secret place, she thought, to guide her to the discovery she wished. Moving a little further, it fell across her hand as she held it up; and she now perceived that it came through a minute fissure in the partition just above her head. She dared not feel for supports for her hands, to help raise herself till her eyes were on its level; but leaning carefully against the partition, she rose on her tiptoes, and painfully maintained herself in that position, while she applied her eyes to the crack. With an exulting heart-bound she was in the sick room, with those who then occupied it.

SNOW FOLIAGE.

BY ANNA M. TOMKINS.

When Venus, as the poets feign,
 In Rhodes with bright Apollo dwelt,
 The conscious sky shed golden rain,
 And the cold earth such passion felt
 That roses, mixed with lilies, pressed,
 In full-blown beauty, from her breast.

In commerce sweet, what heavenly powers
 Are met beneath our northern sky,
 To bring these pearl and diamond showers
 Last night in splendor from on high,
 And this ethereal flowerage fair
 To charm from branches brown and bare?

The morning breaks, and trees of snow
 Spread whitely on the roseate air,
 The elm's long tresses downward flow,
 Enwrought of alabaster fair,
 The sun, with rose and emerald, gems
 The maple's mist of pearléd stems.

The poplar stands, a frost-built tower,
 The pine a pallid splendor leans,
 Each weed hath such a diamond flower
 As burns not on the breast of queens.
 It is as if the summer-tide
 Sprung from her grave beatified!

The busy man, the maiden gay,
 Cold age, and careless childhood stand
 Enraptured with the bright array,
 The airy pomp on every hand,
 And gaze with sweet solemnity
 On the white earth and sapphire sky.

And all that's best of life and love
 Returns upon the tranquil heart,
 Sweet thoughts of spirits fair above,
 From whom we feel no more apart.
 A sudden glimpse of heaven's heights,
 And angels on their far free flights!

O, surely Hope hath wed Despair
 And wiped his latest tear away,
 And therefore are the lawns so fair
 And all the woods in leaf to-day,
 In snowy leaf and snowy bloom,
 To deck their world-wide bridal room!

TWO GOOD MEN.

BY LOTTIE BROWN.

WE were all there—Nettle, Kate, Max, Harry and I—and each one striving to outdo the others in his or her contribution to the evening's entertainment.

It was in Deacon Plummer's barn, and every youngster in town, from twelve to fifty, was there, snuggled away in the shadow of the haymow, or sitting out boldly upon the cornstalks, and stripping dry husks from golden ears.

There were our spinsters, at once the terror and pride of our set, sitting side by side with Deacon Plummer, Aaron Stebbins and other crusty bachelors. There were our staid married ladies, with eyes sharpened for the benefit of rascally sons and too happy daughters; and last and best of all, our rosy, merry girls and their admirers.

I could not keep my eyes from one couple, sitting cosily away from the others, in a little corner, formed, of course, purposely for them, and my blood quickened and my heart beat faster with every glance.

Nettle, my dead mother's baby, was my pride, and Max, handsome, true-hearted Max, was the man of all others I should have chosen for her. I watched them. I saw the pretty wreath of chestnut curls droop lower, to hide red flashes that shot across her round cheek. I saw him push them back with his brown hands, and once—when he had looked in every direction save mine, to see that there were no curious eyes—he put one hand beneath the pink chin, and drew her face up close to his own and kissed her.

I was care free. If they married, my darling was sure of life-long happiness, and I relieved of the burden I had borne patiently for many weary years. I thought of the pale, puny baby I had taken from mother's arms, and dragged, through long, sleepless nights, up to healthy childhood, and following swiftly behind came thememory of my self-denial, of the turned and darned dresses, of bonnets trimmed with home-dyed ribbons, of scanty meals and cheerless rooms.

For winters I denied myself every luxury. I ate the simplest food, and kept but one fire in the house, in the little back kitchen, and sat there day after day, because the sitting-room and parlors were large, and required great fires to heat them. I piled my books in the old secretary and curtained the glass doors with thick cambric, that I might never see them, and with my needle went to work. Every sewing-woman could tell the same story, and I will not repeat mine. It was the old recital of deprivation and heart-straining, of long hours spent in misery and tears, of happy moments only when she came, with her joy bubbling up in merry child laughter, to thank me for some pretty trifle.

And in the midst of all, Max came. He was Uncle Richard's only child, a little four-year-old boy, motherless and neglected.

What could I do but open my heart and promise to be a mother to the handsome rogue until his father came back from his long and perilous voyage? Nothing; or at least I could think of nothing, and so I promised.

This was the turning in the road, long and patiently travelled. Uncle Richard was generous to a fault, and left the foundation of my future comfort by advancing for Max's board. At once my hitherto unoccupied rooms were fitted up, and, with perfect confidence in my ability, and with a surety of success, I advertised for pupils.

I was eighteen. I knew more than people gave me credit for, and could teach the frowzy-headed youngsters as well as Miss Plummer the deacon's sister, and consequently I filled my rooms. Money flowed in like water—I thought so—and my prospects quite dazzled me.

Next came news of the loss of the ship Argentine, and soon after Uncle Richard was brought up from the Cape in his shroud, and Max was fatherless, and without a friend in the world, save myself and our little baby Nettle.

I am afraid I wandered so far away from the husking-party, in imagination, that had not Kate tumbled a heap of cornstalks over into my lap, I should never have got back with them.

"Miriam, what are you doing?" she said, gayly. "I have been tossing ears of corn at you for ten minutes. See Nettle."

I looked over in the corner, but she had vanished, and Max was stripping the husks aside with a will, and looking straight down into the measure before him. Nettle was standing in the centre of the room, directly under the wreath of lanterns—Max's chandelier—and some one was talking to her. Some one, too, who was very interesting, for she was rosy and smiling, and played with the tangle of corn silk, which she held in her hand with that girlish, nervous way she always practised when pleased or slightly embarrassed. Of course I looked for her companion. He was close beside her, holding a red ear in hands whiter than her own, and turning a face—the handsomest I had ever seen—towards her—with a saucy air that made my blood boil.

I did not know him, but I knew at once that he was a gentleman and a man of the world, and, like a frightened hen in search of her chicks, I hurried towards her.

"Nettie, Max wants you," I called, abruptly.

"Did he send you, Mira?" she asked.

"Yes."

The lie hurt a little, but I wanted to get her away from this handsome, black-eyed stranger, and could think of nothing else to say.

"Well, let him wait a while. This is my sister, Mr. Prince. Mira, this is the nephew of our kind friend, Captain Prince."

"O yes; and this is my schoolmarm that was to have been, Miss Weston. I cried my eyes out at the suggestion, and lived on bread a whole week rather than face you. That was good ten years ago. Ah, I did not know as much as I now do."

I looked at him sharply. Yes, I did remember the time, years before, when his uncle proposed to send his nephew to me, but the extreme unwillingness of the boy prevented. Humph! I wish he had never come!

"I see you remember," he said, gayly. "Well, you will forgive me? I'll come regularly and take lessons, if you will let me."

His good-nature was contagious, and, in spite of myself, I laughed, saying:

"Yes, you may come every day, if you choose. There, Nettie, run to Max. He wants to see you."

She looked at me with her pretty face fairly ugly with vexation, but turned to go.

"One moment, Miss Nettie. There'll be a dance, by-and-by. Uncle and I have overcome the deacon's prejudices, and you must dance with me."

"O yes." And she ran away.

I knew at once how it would end, unless I put forth my energies to order it otherwise, and, with my head as full of match-making as only a woman's can be, I walked my gentleman around to Kate Parlin, the handsomest girl in town, and introduced him. But he was used to style, and dash, and saucy fire from brunettes, and he did not mind her, but let his eyes wander after my darling, and neglected Kate in a shameful manner. After a while, when Kate had run away for a moment, I said:

"Isn't she pretty?"

"She is the sweetest, dearest little woman I ever saw. I should believe in angelic women, if they all had her face and voice. I have seen only that sort of creation for the last five years," and he actually pointed to the very person of whom I was speaking—my pupil Kate.

That sort of creature! Poor Kate! And Nettie was the sweetest, dearest little woman! Poor me!

Max filled and refilled his basket, and worked until the perspiration stood out upon his forehead, and when the barn-floor was cleared and the bell rang for supper, he insisted upon waiting, and helping Deacon Plummer carry to the granary the baskets of corn.

Then came the dance in the long kitchen—a real old-fashioned contra-dance, in which many of our prime spinsters and staid mothers participated, and Nettie, with handsome Charles Prince—or Prince Charlie, as Kate had named him—flew like children up and down the floor, through the quaint figures of Ladies' Chase.

Before it was over, Max came in, and, stealing up close behind me, said, testily:

"Miriam, I don't think well of this flirtation. I advise you to take Nettie home."

It was a good idea.

"Yes, Max, I'll take her home as soon as the dance ends. Go get the sleigh and bring it round."

"Bless you, Mira!"

"I don't want to go, Mira," pleaded Nettie. "It is early yet."

"Don't take her home, Miss Weston," put in Prince Charlie, leaning his head a great deal nearer than occasion demanded.

"It is all nonsense," put in my kind old friend, Captain Prince.

"I must go," I said, firmly.

"Well, I shall come to-morrow," said Charles. "You gave me permission."

"Yes, yes, Miss Nettie, Charlie shall come around to-morrow with our horses, and you can chat out on the Cleadon Road."

After this speech, Nettie's face brightened, and she graciously allowed herself to be shawled by gallant Prince Charlie, and was exceedingly kind to Kate and me, and even to Harry Brett, who was our only gentleman boarder, and who divided his time between his medical studies and our bonny Kate, and who managed to quarrel continually with Nettie.

When the sleigh came, we were all at the door. Kate and Harry bundled under one shawl, Prince Charlie and Nettie near enough to each other to be wrapped in another, and I, tired and sober, standing alone.

Max was cross, or he would have brought the double sleigh up nearer. As it was, there was a big drift to climb over.

"Can't you manage to drive nearer the door?" asked Prince Charlie.

"No!" was the short reply.

"Never mind," said Harry; "I can carry Kate and then come back for Mira, and I think that Mr. Prince—"

"Will follow suit."

And in a moment Nettie was in his strong arms, and he following Harry and his fair burden. I laughed, it was such a novel mode of conveyance, but refused their proffered aid, and clambered over the drift—or rather through it—and Max put me in the front seat beside Nettie.

He was in with us in an instant, and forgetting everything but his desire to leave the scene of his misery, he lashed our horses, and away we flew, leaving Prince Charlie in the very act of bidding us a graceful good-night.

"You are a noodle, Max Wentworth," snarled our Nettie.

"Thank you."

"I don't want your thanks. We might have stayed an hour longer, but for your jealous notion. But I don't know as it has done you any good. I am going to ride to-morrow with Mr. Prince."

He did not speak, but the hands upon the reins were clenched tightly, and a long, deep breath escaped. She laid her head upon my shoulder, and when we reached the door she was fast asleep.

"It don't trouble her—thank God!" he whispered, as we paused. "It would kill me to see her suffer as I am suffering."

We went in, and, sleepy and cross, gathered around the parlor fire.

"Max is a— How I hate him!" growled Nettie, as she fidgeted with the ribbons of her hood. "He made a fool of himself to-night."

"So he did, Nettie. He don't begin to look as well as Prince Charlie."

"Of course not. Mira, isn't he a beauty? Dear me, he knows everything."

With this, the girls went up stairs, and I waited for Max. He came in a little while, with his handsome face wrinkled and gray with this new sorrow.

"O Mira!" he began, throwing himself in the old way down at my feet; "I believe Nettie was right. I am a fool! She don't care a snap of her white fingers for me. This fellow, Prince, as you call him, will step in, and she will love him, as sure as fate. Well, Mira, I cannot help myself. If he loves her as I do, I suppose it will be all right."

"Don't give up, Max; she is young and gay. You must not lose courage, because she looks favorably upon another gentleman. Nettie has known you for years, while her acquaintance with Prince is only of a few hours' standing. Don't be jealous, or, if you must be, don't let her see it. You know how she loves to tease you. She will not forget that you both have been lovers from childhood. Don't give up, Max."

"You are a blessed comforter, Mira, yet I cannot be happy to-night. It will undo me if I lose her."

He should not, I said to myself, when he stood up in the full glow of the firelight and I saw the beauty and nobility of his face. He should not lose my sister.

He went up stairs, and presently Nettie called me, and I went up to my nightly task of undressing my helpless little sister, and tried to forget that Max was in his chamber, walking up and down, striving to put away the terrible demon that tortured him. Before I left her, I leaned down and whispered:

"Nettie, Max hates a flirt."

"Stuff!" And the curly head was turned resolutely away.

I dreaded to see Prince Charlie come, but he did, early on the following afternoon, driving up with a grand flourish, and running in like an old friend, shaking hands with us all, and chatting like a schoolgirl.

"Not ready, Miss Nettie? Ah, somebody monopolizes your valuable time, or you would not have so soon forgotten."

"I am all ready, and have been since early morning. It is you who should be called the tardy one." This all for Max's ears.

When they drove away, his arm was around me, his head on my shoulder, like the great baby that he was, and he said, very like a lovelorn girl:

"It will ruin me, Mira."

I did not laugh—I loved him too well; but I patted his head, and thought him a great silly boy.

I could run on for hours in telling you how this flirtation grew into love, but it is easier for us both, to simply say that before the springtime, they were engaged, and Max worn to a mere shadow of his former self. Night after night, when Prince Charlie and Nettie sat in the parlor, talking of their future, he sat at my side, patiently reading, or untangling worsted and silk, his eyes wandering away to the door which separated us from them, with an expression that made my heart ache. He had loved so long and hopefully that it was not easy to give her up. It was tearing away one-half his life, and I, with pitying eyes, plainly saw it.

"O Max, my boy," my heart said, "I pity you. God send a gleam of sunlight to dispel this fearful cloud!"

Prince Charlie and my darling never quarrelled. He was proud, tender and obedient, she loving, coquettish and yet reasonable; but there came at last a change. I saw it first. It came slowly—only a little frown now and then, or a fretful exclamation, but I saw it.

It was weeks before it arrived at any definite state, at a period proper for me to offer sympathy. I first found her lying with wide-open eyes, late at night, and ventured to speak of it.

"Awake! Was I awake? If I was, I must have been thinking how I should trim my blue merino."

This was my first answer, and I waited.

A few nights after, I stole in. She was sitting at the table, with a wrapper thrown over her long night-dress, and reading through tears something like an old letter. I walked softly. I reached her chair, and saw one word, "Baltimore," upon the white paper, and then she raised her eyes, and seeing me, crumpled the letter in her hand and dashed away a shower of tears.

"What are you doing, child? What were you reading?"

"An old composition," she answered, firmly; and it was far from my mind to doubt my little sister, so I went out to my own room.

Three years before Max had been in Baltimore, and that fact, combined with the word written upon the paper she held, gave me the best night's rest I had enjoyed for weeks. It might be—it might—O, I did not dare to think what might be.

The next thing Prince Charlie came to me.

"What troubles Nettie, Mira? She is not herself. She seems half-crazed at times."

I opened my eyes.

"Is she troubled? If so, I cannot tell you the cause. I cannot answer you. I hoped, that is I thought, that you were perfectly happy."

He was puzzled, and went away with a troubled face, and I turned my back to my labor, with an impression that there was a wrong somewhere.

Days after I again found her with those old letters, and I put my hand firmly upon her arm and held her there.

"Nettie, in all our lives there has never been a secret between us. It is rather hard to begin it now. I cannot bear it, darling."

She threw the letter from her and clasped me in her arms, crying, through her tears:

"Mira, sister, don't blame me. Love me, love me, for my heart is breaking!" Then she ran away from me, crying like a child, and I, more troubled than ever, went back to my work.

In April they were to be married. Captain Prince did not believe in long courtships, and Prince Charlie, nothing loth, urged Nettie into giving her consent, and preparations went slowly on. Somehow it all fell upon me. She never spoke of an article, and when they were brought to her, she laid them aside with a mournful expression that drove sleep from my pillow. The spring came on apace, the snow gradually melted, and the ice on the river fell away from the shore, and gave unmistakable signs of breaking up, and our trees began to shoot forth tender buds.

Before the ice broke up our young folks held a skating festival, as they had done for many years, and as usual everybody was there. There was, away at the lower end of the river, a long creek, which was never frozen over, but otherwise was a clear, shining surface, and the skaters were in high spirits.

Prince Charlie and Nettie drove down in the handsome little cutter, and sat there watching the lithe figures as they glided over the polished ice, the admired of every beholder. I could not keep my eyes from them. I fancied that Nettie looked fairer than usual, in the worsted hood, with its pale-blue border shading her blonde hair, but there was a little cloud upon her face that spoiled my pleasure. It would be but a few weeks before I should have to give her away to her handsome Prince Charlie, and I should be sisterless. O, I should be content to give her to Max!

I was thinking this over, when there was a quick crash and a cry from a hundred frightened men and women, and then a sight met my gaze which made my strength forsake me and leave me almost helpless.

Straight across the ice fled the light horse, bearing the cutter on with fearful strides, and Prince Charlie standing up, pulling on the reins with all his strength, vainly trying to check the furious animal. He was making straight for the creek, where the dark, deep water flowed swiftly and steadily on to the sea.

"Lost!"

I heard the word with limbs fast benumbing and eyes growing dim, and saw faintly the distance lessening between the sleigh and the water.

My darling, my precious sister! O God, will no one save them!

Kate was holding my arms on one side and Harry on the other, when some one drove up with a sleigh and lifted me in. I did not need it, did not want it, but when a crowd of swift skaters suddenly struck with an idea of rescue started with lightning-like speed across the ice, I was thankful and begged to follow them.

The frightened horse was almost across, when from the shadow of the pines a figure shot forth and sped towards them. He was nearer the river than they were, and a shout went up as his intentions became positive. He would reach the water before they did, and stop the horse.

I was on my knees, praying and crying, yet never moving my eyes from them.

"Who is it? Who is it?"

"Max Wentworth!"

"Ah! Hurrah! They are safe! He has the horse by the bridle! See, they have sprang out! Father in heaven, the horse is in the water, and dragging Max with him!"

We were nearly there, but before we reached them they had dragged my hero from the wreck, and he was stretched lifeless on the ice. Somebody was kneeling beside him. Somebody was crying:

"Max, Max, my darling, speak to me! He is dead! Don't you see? Why don't you take him home? O Mira!"

They lifted poor Nettie from him, but she followed, holding his hands when they bore him to the sleigh, and with a face as white as his held him tightly in her arms, in spite of all we could say or do, during the long ride home.

I did not dare to ask for Prince Charlie. I knew that he was far behind, and far from her thoughts, just then.

"O, he saved me, Mira! We should not have thought of springing out, but for him. He called to us, and we were out in a minute. Then O!—he went down—O Mira!" And the tears fell like rain upon the white face.

At home, in the warm kitchen, Kate, Harry, Nettie and I worked with hotdrops, warm flannels and spirits, until he opened his eyes. Then she forgot us all. She caught his hands in her own and kissed his lips.

"Max! Do you know me? Do you know your little Nettie? O speak, Max, just one little word to me!"

"My darling!"

That was all he said; and his arms were feebly raised and clasped around her, and his face was transfigured with the joy his heart felt.

A hand, cold and trembling, caught mine, and when I turned Prince Charlie stood beside me, looking at the pair with all of Max's hopelessness in his eyes.

"Mira, that was the trouble. She did not love me, all the while. And he, great, handsome, noble fellow—Mira, I am going to—"

I did not understand him, but he explained by springing forward and shaking Max by the shoulder.

"Max, God bless you! You saved my life and hers! and now—Well, Nettie has always loved you best. I cannot say more. You know the rest. I'm going away. Mira, give me your blessing."

I did so, and he, for all the world like my boy Max, looked back to me, with great tears almost blinding him.

In April we had a wedding, but Prince Charlie was far away, and sent sad but kind wishes for us all.

And my two children in their happiness are so selfish that I do not believe they ever think of him and the great sacrifice he made, when he gave Nettie up to Max.

JENNIE.

BY HELEN WOOD MANVILLE.

The sunlight falls down in a wondrous smile,
 And glints all the sweet valley o'er,
 The robins are winging their home way and singing,
 But we heed not their cadence, we see not the radiance
 Of gold on the hilltops, for the shadows before.
 We weep for our Jennie, the fairest of any
 And all of the band of earth-angels has Gone from our hearth evermore.

There's a little low mound in the sunlight to-day,
 But we see not the sunlight thereon,
 For the tears that are falling, the while we are calling:
 "Come, fair little blossom, come back to our bosom,
 Our darling, our birdling, our beautiful one!"
 Vain call, for our Jennie, the fairest of any
 And all of the band of earth-angels, to the Land of the angels has gone.

The earth was too rough for her delicate feet;
 Now they're sandalled with sapphire and pearl,
 Which round her are shedding their light as she's treading
 The far fields Elysian, too bright for our vision,
 And God will protect her, our own little girl,
 Our little lost Jennie, the fairest of any
 And all of the band of the angels who Walk with their sandals of pearl.

CAPTAIN DARRELL'S WARD.

BY W. H. MACY.

I AM, in this instance, telling a story, not making one; in fact, I am trying to repeat one, as it was told to me. My townsman and neighbor, Captain Darrell, is now an elderly man, in comfortable circumstances, of the strictest integrity, and not at all given to romancing. The Jessie Cameron of the story, the happy matron who presides over his household—ask her, if you will, whether Priam's word is to be relied on?

Thirty years ago, I was second mate of the Warsaw, lying in the port of Auckland, New Zealand. As we were bound on Japan the next season, touching at the Sandwich Islands, we received on board as passengers, a Scotchman, who had been for several years a resident of the colonies and his only child, a little girl of twelve.

David Cameron had recently lost his wife, who had long been in delicate health; and, closing up all his affairs, determined upon a change of residence, with a view of pushing his fortunes elsewhere. He had been a seaman in his youth, and was, of course, able to adapt himself easily to such accommodations as we could offer him in a whaler. He was tenderly attached to his little daughter, who soon became a favorite with every one on board.

It needed not the assurance of the stricken widower to satisfy us that Jessie had been in the hands of an excellent mother. She was an interesting and intelligent child, and had made the most of her opportunities, in a situation where educational advantages were necessarily very limited.

Thrown into daily contact with her, as I was, it was not strange that I found a strong attraction drawing me to her. She was a study to me; for I could not help contrasting her, every hour in the day, with a little sister of mine, about the same age, whom I had left at home. It is true, Maria was a bright and pretty child, and so proud and fond of me, her sailor-brother! She believed that Priam Darrell was the incarnation of all that was grand and noble in manhood. But she had nothing of the quiet self-reliance to be observed in this child, who had been thrown so much upon her own resources. In book knowledge, as well as in the thousand little graces and arts acquired in society, she was, of course, the superior of Jessie Cameron; but in strength and force of character, she might well have been several years the younger.

When near French Rock, we encountered a gale of wind, which exceeded in violence anything which I have ever experienced, before or since, in the Pacific. But our little passenger was quite at home on shipboard, and appeared to have little fear or uneasiness. She remained on deck nearly all the time, until the wind and sea increased to such a degree that her father was compelled, by fears for her safety, to order her to keep close in the cabin.

The old Warsaw, owing to her stiffness, was a very ugly seaboard in a gale. And on the second day of the blow, all her storm canvas having been torn from the bolt-ropes, she lay wallowing at the mercy of the elements. It was found quite impossible to bend and set any new sails, and our situation became really dangerous.

We lay thus for several hours, occasionally shipping the top of a sea, but no material damage had been done. Towards night, we were favored with a lull, and advantage was taken of it to set a new mizzen-staysail, that we might have something to keep her head up to the sea.

All hands were above deck at the time; and I myself was on the mizzen-stay, half way up the mainmast, doing the last work of bending the sail to its hanks. The halyards and sheet were strongly manned, and every one in readiness, waiting for the word to "hoist away."

I was just about to slide down from my perch, when a great wall of water came roaring down upon us, and I knew, by the feel of the ship under me, that she would not rise clear of it. On it came; I clung involuntarily to the stay, hearing confused cries of "Hold on!" "Look out!" It met us with a shock that seemed to have driven in the whole broadside of our stout craft.

It combed in nearly the whole length of the ship, fore and aft, giving no one time to escape, or to do anything but cling instinctively to the nearest support. All below me was a raging gulf of water, in which men and inanimate objects were promiscuously dashed about. I had enough to do to retain my hold where I was, looking down upon the dreadful sight. I felt that my fate would be decided in another minute or two. It must be the same as that of my shipmates, who were vainly stretching their hands towards me for succor, while here and there a cry rang in my ears, breaking the ceaseless roar of sea and wind. We were all to die together, unheard of; the simple record attached to our names, "Probably foundered at sea."

But, shuddering in every timber of her ancient fabric, the Warsaw rose again triumphant from what seemed her death-struggle with the elements. Her bare deck came into view as she shook herself free of the burden; for nearly all the bulwarks were swept away on both sides, as well as everything of a movable nature. But not a human being was to be seen, as, still clinging in my elevated position, I looked about me. All had been swallowed up and gone to their final account.

I had no time for sentiment; indeed I think the leading emotion in my mind was one of astonishment at feeling the ship still buoyant, for I had had no idea that she could ever rise again. I slid down to the deck, and watching my opportunity, darted below into the cabin. Everything was afloat there; for the companion-way had been dashed into splinters, and the sea had poured down in a cataract. I stood in the doorway leading into the after-cabin, drenched and shivering, looking up at the now open hatchway, and wondering how long it might be ere I should be engulfed; for the next sea that boarded us would probably fill and water-log the already shattered hull.

"Where's father?" said a tremulous little voice, behind me.

Until then I had not thought of the child. I turned at the sound, and saw the bright head protruding from the narrow opening of a state-room door. The blue eyes were unnaturally expanded with wonder and anxiety; but there was none of the childish weakness of fear that might have been looked for under the circumstances.

"Mr. Darrell, where's father?" she repeated.

How could I answer the question? Only by a sign to her to keep close within her room, as I moved forward out of her range of vision, that my telltale face might be hidden.

Powerless, as regarded any effort I could make for safety against the storm, I awaited the moment when the ship should be engulfed, with little Jessie and myself. But as if the demon of wrath had been satiated, she now appeared to make better weather of it than she had done for hours before. Hope again revived, and I hastened to explain our position to the orphaned girl.

I knew not how to begin, rough seaman that I was, to break the sad intelligence to her. But I found it unnecessary to speak; she had already guessed the truth, in part, and a single look in my face was sufficient for her quick comprehension to take in the rest.

After the first burst of grief, which I suffered her to indulge unchecked, she became calm, wonderfully so, and was prepared to look the matter squarely in the face with a coolness and resolution far beyond her years.

"Do you think we shall be drowned, Mr. Darrell?" she asked.

"No," I answered. "At least I have strong hopes that we may be saved. I think the worst of the gale is over, and if we only don't happen to ship an unfortunate sea like that which—"

"My dear father! He was all that I had?" she moaned; and once more her miraculous fortitude gave way, and she broke down again.

The gale abated at midnight, and though the ship labored terribly in the tumbling swell, for want of canvas to steady her, we shipped no more heavy seas. I staid near my young charge all through the night; for, of course, neither of us could sleep. I promised her that I would ever be as a father to her, and that, come what would, she should share my fortunes and be to me as a sacred legacy.

Of course, no such idea as marriage with her had anything to do with what I said or felt at that time. I was twenty-five years old, and Jennie a child. Besides, I was under promise of marriage to a young lady of suitable age. She jilted me for another, during my absence—but that has nothing to do with my story.

With the morning light came the necessity for effort, and a sense of responsibility new and strange to me. I sounded the well and found only two feet of water in the ship, this having worked down from above. I did not attempt, alone, to pump her out; but rejoiced in the assurance that I still had a tight vessel under me; for, had she sunk, I should have had no dependence beyond such a raft as I could have extemporized. Every boat had been swept away.

I loosed and let fall the foresail, and succeeded in setting it, with the child's assistance and the power of the windlass. The spanker I could easily manage with the brails; and these, with the lower staysails, were all the canvas I intended to make use of. I could do nothing with the loftier sails without more help.

The sun had come out brightly after the storm, and the aspect of the skies indicated a continuance of fine weather. I took observations and shaped my course towards the Hervey Islands, hoping to make Mangea or Raratonga. I had a good general knowledge of navigation, though I had little practice, and was unused to anything like responsible control of that department.

Of course, I was obliged to be at the helm most of the time. But I soon taught Jessie, so that she could steer well enough in fair weather, which gave me time to attend to many other matters. But as we could not steer all day and all night, the ship was necessarily left to her own guidance some part of the time.

I soon discovered that my knowledge of navigation, though it might tell me where I was, would not enable me to go where I wished. The winds and currents headed me off, so that we were making a drift to the westward; and it was impossible to remedy this, unless the ship were manned so as to be well steered and enabled to carry all sail. Spite of all that the child and I could do, she must go nearly where the elements might carry her. We should be more likely to make land somewhere among the Tongas or Feejees than in the direction I had hoped at first.

There was no fear of our running short of provisions or water, as we had more on board than we two could consume for years. The weather continued fine, and we were daily drifting into milder latitudes; but no sail could be seen. A dozen times every day I climbed to the masthead, in the vain hope of descriing a ship; and as often descended to cheer up my little shipmate with the hope of seeing one to-morrow. Thus week after week wore away monotonously, while Jessie and I were all the world to each other, and every hour served to fasten the tendrils more firmly about my heart, as she leaned in her childish dependence upon me. I thought how miserable I might have been if entirely alone in a similar situation; and in return, clung to her, and gave thanks as for a blessing, heaven-sent, to become a part of my whole future life and being. I do not think I could have entertained the thought of ever parting with her.

My observations satisfied me that we had passed beyond the latitude of the Tonga and Feejee groups without having seen them. This knowledge was rather a relief to me; for we should, most likely, have fallen into the power of savage cannibals, who would have shown us no mercy. We could hardly fare worse by drifting on towards the equator; while there was still the possibility of meeting a ship with civilized men on board.

At length, on going aloft, as usual, one beautiful morning, the horizon line along under our lee presented the irregular, broken appearance which I had often seen before, and knew so well. The bunches or tufts of cocoanut trees growing upon very low land were the first objects that came into view; so that, as we neared them, the slender stems seemed to be rooted in the ocean, and to shoot up directly from its watery bed.

We were setting, by the force of a current, directly towards the island, and there was no possibility of propelling the ship away from it. But there was a chance that it might be uninhabited. If so, we could not land upon it, for we had no boat, and it was out of the question to think of managing a raft in the intricate channels of a coral reef.

But we had been seen, as it appeared, even before we had discovered the land. For within an hour the triangular sails of half a dozen large canoes rose into view coming rapidly up towards us. To escape with the ship was simply impossible. But it occurred to me that the savages could know nothing of our defenceless condition, though the appearance of the ship, under so little canvas in fine weather, must be strange and suspicious to them. They would not attempt any foul play with us, if they believed the vessel to be fully manned and armed. They had come off to drive a barter trade with the white men, as was their usual custom.

I at once set to work, with the help of the child, who showed a ready comprehension of the situation, to manufacture a crew for the vessel. Seamen's clothes were abundant, and in a short time, every handspeike was rigged up in a motley suit. These were all stuffed out into shape, and topped with hats or caps. I disposed them in the most natural positions about decks, in the various parts of the ship, so as to give the whole the most lifelike appearance.

I loaded all the firearms we had on board, which amounted to only three muskets; and then went aloft to loose the mainsail, which had never been set since the gale in which the crew were swept overboard. I had felt unable, alone, to control such an immense sheet of canvas. But I must have it ready for use now, in case I should want to give the vessel more headway.

While on the mainyard, engaged in loosening it, a sail appeared in sight over the point of the island. Not a canoe—one could not be seen at that distance in range of the trees, but a ship! My heart leaped at the thought that help and deliverance were within a few miles of me.

"Bring up the ensign from the cabin, Jessie!" I shouted, as I let fall the bunt of the mainsail, and hurried down on deck. I caught it from her eager little arms, bent it to the halyards, and ran it up—half-mast, as a signal of distress.

I brailled the spanker, while the child put the helm up, and by the power of the foresail wore the ship round so as to be on the same tack with the strange vessel. I could not steer directly at her, without running the ship ashore; nor could she work to windward much against the force of the current. But my hope lay in her sending boats, as soon as those on board should see my flag of distress, and the strange trim of my sails.

I managed to swing the head-yards round, and set the foresail, after a fashion. But meanwhile the savages were fast closing with me, and I had not sufficient confidence in my sham seamen to believe that I could long deceive their sharp eyes. I might gain a little time; but the trick must be discovered, and I feared this would be before succor could reach me from the strange ship.

I kept Jessie at the wheel, steering as much off the wind as I dared; but I was fearful of getting embayed, and not having room to clear the point. I let fall the mainsail, and gave it a kind of flying set, as well as I could. The ship felt this added power at once, and gathered headway, which I determined she should not lose; for if the barbarians once succeeded in getting on board, it would be too late for any attempt of boats to rescue us, even if we were not instantly put to death. It was no time now to think of the question whether I could ever get the sails in again. I must have the use of them now, at once; and I sprang aloft to loose the topsails.

I had only time to do this and let go the gear, so that they filled and bagged out in mid air; for of course I could not hoist the yards up. The leading canoe was now drawing very near me; and the ugly-looking wretches stood staring in silent bewilderment, as the ship drove past them. I saw by their gestures as they pointed at the handspike men, that they were already suspicious; probably from having noticed that they did not move about. But they rested on their paddles to confer with the next comers, and I had thus gained so much time, while I was doing what I could to push the Warsaw ahead.

I knew these people well enough to be sure that they would never attack, unless all the circumstances were overwhelmingly in their favor. They would move warily in reconnoitering; but, as soon as certain of the true state of things, they would make a dashing attempt to board the ship by force.

I had thus shaken off the first canoes, and left them in the wake. A stern chase is proverbially a long one, though their canoes would sail much faster than the ship could, under her bags and festoons. But other pursuers were fore-reaching upon me, and fresh reinforcements putting out from the shore as we neared the land obliquely. None seemed to care to visit the other ship; but all were attracted by the mysterious manœuvres of mine.

A large canoe, which contained one whom I judged to be a leading chief, placed herself in my track. I was obliged, necessarily, to pass her so closely, that their suspicions, already aroused by telegraphic signals from their baffled comrades, were rendered certainty. Our real weakness was now understood, and almost instantly communicated through the whole flotilla. All those which had been left in the rear gave chase under full power of sails and paddles; while five or six late arrivals, who had the advantage of position disposed themselves for boarding the ship on both bows at once.

There was no alternative for me but to stand boldly on my course; and I had time, before closing with the enemy, to run up in the main rigging, and cast an anxious glance towards the ship, which was hugging the wind under all sail, in the endeavor to come to my relief. Better than all, I could see that two boats had left her side, and were pulling towards me.

But a crisis must come before they could arrive on the stage. I sprang on deck again, seized a boarding-knife, a terrible two-edged weapon, which would be far more effective at close quarters than any firearms, and took my stand on the fore-hatches, where I could jump quickly to either side. The bulwarks, as before said, had been nearly all swept away by the sea that boarded us. But this circumstance was quite as much in my favor as in that of the assailants.

I watched the approach of two canoes, which were nearly abreast the fore-chains, one each side. It seemed that they would both attack at the same instant. If so, I might be overwhelmed by one party boarding in my rear, while I was upsetting the other. I dropped the boarding-knife, and seizing a musket, the only reliable one I had, I took a hasty aim at the man in the head of one of the canoes and fired. He dropped his paddle, struck, as I suppose, in the arm. I was safe on that side, at present, as the confusion and loss of headway would be sufficient to cause her to lose her chance of grasping the chain-plates.

I rushed across the deck just in time to meet the other canoe as she fell alongside. One of my Quaker mariners with a hickory backbone stood conveniently at hand. I lifted it and dashed it full upon the heads of the savages, felling two of them. They also lost their hold and drifted astern. But, by this time, a third and fourth were almost upon me. I was ready, with weapons on both sides, and, now that I was fairly in for it, felt far less anxiety than when the fight was only in anticipation.

One of them made clumsy work of it, dashing her prow violently against the ship's side, and being thrown adrift on the rebound. But while I was observing this, the other, on the starboard side, had secured a firm hold, and two grinning warriors had made good their footing on the plankshear. A rush, with the thought that I was striking for my own life and the child's; a single sweep of the keen boarding-knife, and the two mangled barbarians fell backwards upon their comrades. I was clear of that crew, by a single cut dividing their warp of cocoanut cordage. I had received a wound in the side from a spear thrown at me—a ragged cut by a series of shark's teeth—but I hardly felt it then.

Meanwhile, the brave little girl had stood at the helm, steering the ship as well as I could have done it myself, and carefully noting my orders, conveyed to her by a wave of my hand. There were still two more canoes ahead; but I led one of them into a trap by directing Jessie to make a broad yaw, and then suddenly bringing the ship back to her former course. Taken by surprise, he had no time to get clear from under our bows. The canoe was crushed and sunk instantly, though it was quite impossible to drown her amphibious navigators. Her consort kept out of reach, and fell in abeam of us at a safe distance, not daring to make an attack unsupported.

I felt now comparatively safe; for, although all the canoes astern were steadily gaining upon us, they must approach at great disadvantage, and, besides, they had lost confidence and prestige; for, with savages, the first surprise is everything. I could now take my stand aft, near my little companion; and could use firearms with deliberation.

But while doing so, with deadly effect upon the man whom I supposed to be the high chief, as beforementioned, I was startled by a cry from Jessie; and turning, beheld the shabby head of a stalwart savage rising into view on the other quarter. He had poised his spear for the act of darting at me, when, quick as thought, the little girl, who had let go the helm, slung a small billet of wood directly in his face. He was thrown off his balance and fell backwards, while the spear dropped harmlessly in on deck. I was on the spot before another man could climb up; and the danger was over. The breeze was freshening a little, and the two boats were now plainly in view and fast nearing us. I directed Jessie to keep a little more off, so as to head directly for them; for I had more sea-room now, and felt that I could afford to laugh at the whole bloodthirsty pack, who, now in full cry, were hovering in our wake.

The warps of the two fully-manned whale-boats were skillfully thrown up to me, and with those twelve resolute seamen on her deck, the Warsaw might bid defiance to any number of piratical canoes. The topsails were hoisted at once, and everything trimmed. We closed rapidly with the other ship, and I soon had the pleasure of shaking by the hand my former shipmate, Baylies, now in command of the Calypso, and of presenting my heroic little lieutenant, Jessie.

A gang of men were spared sufficient to work the Warsaw, and together the two ships bore away for Sydney. Here the damages were repaired, a crew shipped, and the consul put me in charge of her to take her home.

The little Scotch girl, thus left upon the world, became a member of our family. My mother and Maria would have assented to any arrangement, if I had suggested it; but their whole hearts were enlisted in the orphan's welfare, when they learned the whole story of the adventures which she had shared with me. The small sum of money found among her father's effects was carefully applied towards her clothing and education; and bidding her a tender farewell, I left her, to follow up my profession.

I made two long voyages after this, and at each return I found Jessie all that the fondest and most careful guardian could desire. In all respects she was equal, in some, superior, to my sister; and, had they been twins, they could not have loved each other better.

Jessie was twenty years old at the time I arrived home in command of the Greenwich. I know not at what particular time during that voyage I began to think it were possible that she and I might love each other. I think this feeling came upon me very gradually. Perhaps it may have been something in the tone of her letters; for she always wrote to me. Much as a sister might write to an elder brother; but her letters, on this voyage, were not quite as affectionate as at first. There was a little embarrassment in the manner and style.

Yet this was but natural, when I reflected upon it. But it must have been this very change that put me in the way of reflecting. There was, after all, nothing very awkward or anomalous in our position towards each other. She was simply a member of our family, an adopted daughter, as it were, of my mother. But, wishing to support herself, she had found employment as a teacher, and insisted upon paying her board. This I had learned from the various letters received; and, of course, I admired her independent spirit.

I kept pondering upon this matter till it formed the chief subject of my thoughts through many a long night-watch. I did not know of any other woman whom I could love so well—I was only thirty-three, even though I had been a bearded second mate when she was a wee sprite of a child. After all, the disparity of age was not so very great, and perhaps—

But I could not bear the thought of having her marry me—as perhaps she might, if I asked her—from any feeling of gratitude or obligation. Though I am satisfied since that I wronged her, even in thinking that she might do so.

She had developed into a beautiful woman when we next met. She was evidently as fond of me as ever, for the tears came into her eyes at sight of me. But she did not, of course, rush into my arms and kiss me with the old childish abandon. All of which was natural enough, when I came to consider upon it.

I took occasion very soon after my arrival to speak to my sister, alone, about Jessie. I think I asked if she had any suitor. And perhaps I was transparent enough to betray a little of the interest I felt in Maria's answer. At any rate, she looked at me very roguishly.

"No," said she, "none that I know of. I wish she might have—that is, an accepted or acceptable one. I didn't mean to say that no suitors had applied—only that she has none now."

"Is she so hard to suit, then?" I asked.

"Very," said Maria. "Yet I think I know a man whom she would not refuse."

"Indeed? Who is the favored one?"

"You are the last person who ought to ask the question. Go look in the glass," she added, as she rose to leave me.

"But I am too old, Maria." This in spite of having long ago argued myself into the belief that I was not.

"Too old to look in the glass, do you mean?" asked my sister, innocently. "She doesn't think so," mischievously, again.

"Stay!" said I, detaining her, and becoming very imperative and serious all at once. "I am your brother, Maria. Do not jest or trifle with my feelings."

"Not for worlds!" she returned, even more seriously than I myself had spoken. "Neither with yours, Priam, nor with hers, for is she not as my twin sister?"

"But how do you know all this?"

"O, the unreasonable inquisitiveness of man! To ask a woman how she knows, in a case like this! There, let me go, now. But, Priam," added the dear girl, turning back, and striking a tragic attitude, "thou canst not say I did it!"

Of course I couldn't; but I thought I might do it myself, on this hint. And I think I was hardly happier myself than were Maria and our mother, when they learned that Jessie and I were to sail the voyage of life together. She doesn't know, any better than I do on the other hand, at what particular time she found out that she loved her old guardian. But we both agree that it is of no great consequence.

SWEET SLEEP.

BY CLIQ STANLEY.

Come—let us seek sweet sleep!
 Embalmed in tears,
 Lie on her tender bosom through the night,
 And when the shadows take their lingering flight,
 Forgetful then to weep,
 Let us awake to greet the day's dear light!

There, in the land serene,
 Calm all our fears,
 And, waking, feel some genial influence
 Binding us sweetly to a world of sense;
 Bright heaven and earth between,
 Bless the good angel, Sleep, who led us thence!

SOMEBODY'S FORTUNE.

BY MISS CAMILLA WILLIAM.

WE had done everything that we could think of to make the time pass happily to us in our nest among the hills. We had climbed every mountain of the gigantic ring that shut us in, we had dived into every dell, we had viewed every waterfall, traced every path, fished in every brook, sat on every lover's seat; we had wandered about the valley by moonlight, promenaded on the veranda of our hotel, danced, sung, flirted, told stories, read, slept, sulked, eaten, drunk—O! I don't know a thing which we had not done, except one. We hadn't had our fortunes told.

And now the time of our departure was near at hand. September had come, the trees were putting on scarlet and gold, the air had got a frosty sting, and we began to find our dresses and wrappings too thin. Moreover, the city, which we had shrunk from in August, which had seemed to us the embodiment of dust, heat, noise and desolation, now assumed to our minds' eyes quite other characteristics. O, the bright, broad pavement, the gay crowds, the play, the church, the concert, the shopping.

Still, the country held us a little with its gorgeous beauty, and, like a passé and half-discarded mistress, painted herself with carmine and powdered herself with gold to entice us yet a little longer.

"One week, then we will go," was the agreement. "One week; and let it be a jolly one."

Reader, did you ever say, or hear any one else say that "Let us be jolly," and observe at once that a wet blanket seemed to have descended on the company? The gods give merriment, and we must take it as it comes. If we reach to snatch it, they withhold. So it was with us. No sooner did we propose to crown our rich draught of the summer with a week all bubble, than everything became stale, flat and unprofitable. The lovers all got out with each other, the unengaged persons all took colds in their heads, mosquitoes came suddenly, unannounced, and in one night made us look as if we had highly pronounced cases of the measles, and, to cap the climax, the store of Java coffee which our host had laid in for the summer gave out, and we were reduced to Rio, fit only for tobacco-chewers.

I think that the nucleus of all these troubles was plain to every eye. If Professor Cranston and Althea Dorman had not turned the cold shoulder on each other, none of the ills which we deplored would have come upon us. They had been the life of the party all summer. Looking back, we could see that under their happy piloting we had gone over greater rocks and reefs than those we now stuck fast on. In June, July or August, we would have laughed at mosquito-bites, we would have made a merry trip to the nearest town for coffee, we would have mediated between the lovers and reconciled them, and we would so affectionately have dosed the invalids that they would have enjoyed the sickness so much, nothing but gratitude would have induced them to get well. Now, the sunshine withdrawn, our clouds were clouds, damp and chill, and no longer rosy mists.

We were disappointed about the professor and Althea. After all the ladies had tried to get the professor, and failed, and all the gentlemen had tried to get Althea, and failed, we all, with one consent, gave them to each other, and our blessing into the bargain. How lovely was her smile and her brightening face to him! How charming it was to see her frank preference, with its faint tinge of shyness! How we liked our cavaliers to see the model admirer in one who delighted to do his lady honor, who wasn't afraid to present his flowers to her in the face of everybody, who asked for her when she was missing, and greeted her with joy when she came. Evidently there had been no love talked between them. But when they had returned to the city, and each felt the restraints of conventional life closing between them, we knew that he would break through that silence, dash aside the barrier, take her to greater nearness than ever, and that she would not say him nay.

Now the dish was upset. By what slight nothing, by what word, glance or act, or what omission of word, glance or act, we knew not, they were drifting apart. Althea professed herself weary of the country, but determined to stay the allotted time, if she had to sleep through it. The professor took a sudden interest in geology, went about clipping rocks, and smoked unlimited cigars. Not cigars alone; he smoked a pipe, at which Althea put her handkerchief over her nose and withdrew as far as possible from his vicinity. Seeing the motion, the professor frowned like a thundercloud, refilled his pipe, and strode off to smoke it in the woods.

"I'll tell you what I think started it," Bertie Lynn whispered to me, drawing her shawl closer, and wiping her little red nose, which was nearly wiped away already. She was one of those who had a cold.

"Do you recollect John Morton saying weeks ago that Professor Cranston thought the German ladies excelled the American ladies in modesty. They always waited to be sought, the professor said. Althea hasn't been the same since then. And it was only the next day she said before us all that she did not approve of mixing nationalities, and thought it better an American girl should marry an American."

Professor Cranston had a German mother, was born in Germany, and had lived there till he was near twenty-five years old. He was now but thirty-two.

While we spoke Althea entered the parlor. She was a graceful creature, not very beautiful, but had beautiful moods, and she was as sweet as a flower, both body and soul of her. But the rose has its thorns, and Althea had a little defensive armor, a backbone to her sweetness. She wore this thorn in sight now, and she wore the rose too, a lovely bloom in each cheek, and on lip as well. But it was an uneasy brightness, and seemed to come from excitement rather than pleasure. I called her to us and she came, smiling, and ready, and chatted almost as usual, quite as brightly and wittily, scarcely as softly. Her manner now was to her former ways as a well-done wax flower is to the real one.

I looked at her while we talked, and the sight pained me. It seemed to me that her heart was bleeding into her cheeks. I could guess the pain and tenderness that were stirring there, hidden as much as her pride could hide them.

While we talked, Professor Cranston came strolling along the piazza outside the sunny window in which we stood. I knew by a slight chilling of Althea's manner that she caught the first sound of his step.

Glancing out at him, I saw that he had got back his summer face—almost. The blackness was gone from his brows, his blue eyes were bright and alert, the corners of his mouth had softened, and, instead of walking with the erect, soldierly stiffness which had lately distinguished his movements, his step was light and elastic again.

Some people think that the most fiery natures are those which belong to people of dark eyes and hair. Perhaps that may be true in the majority of cases; but I have known the most ardent and impulsive souls imprisoned in those fair-haired, blue-eyed beings who have so little color about them that they look almost tame, when quenched, or quiescent.

As I looked at the professor now, I thought that his soul might be a flame, not burning steadily, but wavering in the breath of a strong emotion, on the point of consuming and sweeping his body out of sight on the instant. It seemed likely that there would be a scene at once.

But I had miscalculated the man's self-control. There was a flicker, then in an instant all became calm, only that the frown and the stern mouth did not come back. Instead of them was a latent softness in the mouth that was almost a smile, and a light in the eyes that were downcast as if to hide it.

Just before he came within range of the vision of Althea, who stood a little back from the window, she turned carelessly away, and began walking down the room, turning slowly round and round to the tune she was humming, her white dress and scarlet mantle floating out gracefully, her small feet just visible, her lovely face appearing and disappearing, her whole being seeming wrapped away in that self-ensphering motion. She was as completely isolated from us as if she were miles away.

The professor leaned in the window, and looked after her with love-lighted eyes, watching her slow, graceful motion till she had waltzed herself out of the room. Then he said, with smiling coolness, "Miss Dorman is a perfect waltzer. One does not often see such slow grace. Most ladies are too rapid and jerking."

"Thank you!" said I, dryly.

"O!" said the professor, looking at me deprecatingly, "I know you never waltz. But your walk is not walking, it is floating."

"Thank you!" I said again, not dryly this time.

The professor was a very agreeable man.

"I have come to say good-by for twenty-four hours," he said. "I am going down to Cameron. Will you make my compliments to Miss Dorman and the others? I am off this minute. Good-by!"

The stage was at the door while he spoke, and he went to get into it. Althea came back into the room, her face a little startled. Evidently she had heard the good-by, or caught a glimpse of him through the open hall-door.

"The professor is going down to Cameron for a day," I made haste to explain; "and since you turned your back on him, he asked us to make his compliments for him. Come and wave your handkerchief after the coach. He is looking back."

"I've got my handkerchief around my throat," said Althea carelessly, not coming near the window, but turning away toward the piano.

The afternoon passed rather dully. Nobody felt in tune, and the absence of one was felt for all. Althea alone tried to be gay; but I could see that she was on the point of breaking down. I caught a quiver in her lip which she turned away her face to hide, and an occasional fixed and yearning gaze, as if her heart was far away.

The evening came on, and we all sulked in various holes and corners, as unsocial as bears.

"I do wish that somebody would propose something," said I, snappishly. "What is the use of people staying here if they will not make themselves agreeable?"

"I don't think that you are setting a very agreeable example," retorted John Morton from his tilted back chair out on the piazza.

I hated John Morton.

"Speak when you're spoken to," says I.

Somebody came gliding toward me in the shadowy room, sank on the cushion at my feet, and laid her forehead in my hands.

"How your head aches, dear!" I said, tenderly.

"Yes!" whispered Althea.

After a little while our landlord, Mr. Grant, came in. "Ladies and gentlemen," he began through the darkness, addressing his audience by faith rather than by sight, "there's an Indian fortune-teller out in the garden. If any of you would like to have your fortunes told, he will do it for a quarter apiece."

"O, coot!" said Bertie Lynn, whose cold, ever on the increase, had shut off about half the consonants for her. "That's subthig to kill tibe. I'll have bide tode. Does he ever tell adythig true, Bister Grat?"

"He's been telling the servants," the landlord replied, "and they all say that he knows everything about 'em."

John Morton got up and stretched his lazy length. "I'll make a sacrifice of myself," he said, "and go first. 'If he tells anything worth hearing, the rest can go. Where is he, Grant?"

"He is sitting in the chair just under that great willow," was the reply. "You are to go to him one by one, and say 'I have come to know the future.' You mustn't laugh, or he will be angry."

"Is he safe?" I asked. "Shouldn't we be afraid of him?"

"O no! I think not," the landlord replied. "The Indians about here are always harmless. They wouldn't dare to do any hurt. Besides, he is near the house."

John Morton pulled his hat over his forehead, and strode down to the great willow that hung like a green fountain over the sward, pushed aside its drooping branches, and disappeared. We all waited in silence till he came back. "He is worth a quarter," was his comment. "You go next, Bertie."

"To you thig it's safe?" asked Bertie, growing more stuffed every moment.

"Perfectly so!" says John, and sat down on the window-sill at the elbow of my chair. I gave my shoulder a hitch, and attended to Althea.

Bertie fussed a little, then went. Presently she came back, and entered the room without saying a word. But instead of taking her former seat by the old bachelor Grimes, she sat by herself near another window.

"Who's to go next, Bertie?" asked John Morton, leaning into the room, bracing himself on the arm of my chair. "Each one must name his or her successor."

"Well," said Bertie hesitatingly, and in a soft voice dropped almost to a whisper, "Bister Sobes bite go."

Bertie hadn't spoken to Mr. Somes for three days.

He got up from a sofa in the farthest Plutonian darkness of a corner, and came toward the open long window, on his way stopping to drop a shawl into Bertie's lap. "You ought to keep that on," he said gently.

She obediently put it on, and he went out.

As he stepped out the window by us, I started, and had nearly made an exclamation; for in the shadow of his going somebody had kissed my hand.

I snatched it away, and bent over Althea.

"Are you going?" I asked.

"Yes," she whispered; "but I won't trust myself alone to him. We will go out together, and when you have had yours told, you come out and slip round to the other side of the tree while I go in. I am a coward, you know."

"But I shall hear your fortune," I said in a whisper.

"You may," she replied. "I don't care."

"Where there's whispering, there's always something said," remarked John Morton.

I didn't condescend to answer. I was too angry with him for his impudence, and too much astonished also. We hadn't been very good friends lately, and for more than a week he had not come to sit by my chair as to-night.

"Are you angry?" he asked, in the very lowest of whispers; and, before I was aware of his intention, put his hand to my cheek, and felt the indignant blush that in the darkness he could not see.

"Come, Althea," I said, starting up abruptly, seeing Mr. Somes returning.

He came in, named me as his successor, then went to sit beside Bertie. Really, it seemed that the coming of the fortune-teller had had a reconciling effect.

"You go first," said Althea, "and I will stand a little way off in front. When you are through call out to me, and as I come in you seem to slip away, but go to the other side of the tree. I'm a simpleton, of course; but I can't help it."

I pushed aside the branches, and stepped into the green tent they made, dropping them behind me. It was very dark then, only light enough to show a large Indian seated in the garden chair, his blanket wrapped about him, his hat on, his face turned toward me.

"Who's that outside?" he demanded, harshly.

"A friend of mine," I replied. "She is to come in next, and is waiting her turn."

"I don't want any one to listen," he said.

"She isn't listening," I answered. "She can't hear where she is."

"Are you afraid?" asked the savage, in a still harsher voice.

"Indeed not!" I replied, almost angrily.

"You wouldn't dare say a word to displease me. There are a score of men within call."

He laughed a little under his breath, then asked more gently, "And your friend out there, is she afraid?"

"You can ask her when she comes," I replied. "Now I want my fortune told."

"I must take your hand," said the Indian, gruffly.

I gave it to him.

What great, lazy scamps those Indians are! Doing nothing more manly than basket-making, and letting their wives wait on them. This man's long, slim hands were as soft as mine, though there was an intimation of a power in them to grip.

He took my finger-tips in his hand, then passed the tips of his right fingers softly over the open palm.

"You are rich, you are proud, you write much, you love and hate much, you like to go off alone much, then be in a crowd, you like to do as you please, and you like to have a man with blue eyes and broad shoulders at your feet. When you get him there again, don't set your foot on him. He's too good, and he loves you. He likes to appear ugly, because you are ugly to him; but he loves you. He will soon tell you so."

"What else?" I asked, after a moment.

"Nothing else," was the curt reply.

"Am I going to be famous? Am I going to have a set of diamonds? Am I going to marry a titled foreigner and have all the American folks breaking their backs bowing to me? Am I—"

"You are going to be loved all your life, and that is enough for any woman," was the reply, but not harshly given.

"I don't call it much of a fortune for a quarter," I said.

"Send that other girl in," said the Indian, roughly.

I called Althea, and as she came in, squeezing my hand in passing, I slipped around the large clustered trunks of the tree and hid there where I could hear every word.

"You are too proud," the fortune-teller said, in a voice that had softened wonderfully.

"He whom you love loves you truly, deeply, and you make him unhappy. If anything was reported to you which you didn't like, it was not meant for you. He loves the ground you walk on. O my love—"

I started up from where I crouched, at the same instant that Althea uttered a faint cry.

"Professor Cranston! This masquerade—"

"What will not love attempt?" said the fortune-teller, throwing his blanket at my feet. "O Althea!—"

I stole away, but Althea didn't follow. Here was a pretty plot indeed!

Instead of going into the house, I turned off down a garden path. A heavy step came striding after me.

"What did he tell you?" asked John Morton at my elbow.

"A mess of trash," I answered. "Professor Cranston doesn't understand fortune-telling."

"Who said he did?" asked John, in a tone of surprise.

"Nobody. But I say he doesn't," I replied shortly.

"What has Professor Cranston to do with it?" queried John, in apparent astonishment.

"What are you talking about?"

"Don't you know, John?" I asked, facing him.

"On my honor I don't," he answered. "Do tell me what you mean."

"Let's go into the house," I said, turning back.

"No," said John, unceremoniously taking me by the arm. "Bertie and Len Somes are courting in the parlor, Sallie Brent and James Marshall are courting on the piazza, and—"

"No matter," I interrupted. "They needn't stop for me."

"And you and I are going to do our—"

Well, no matter about the rest of John's impudence. Come to think of it, I'm not the heroine of this story; Althea is.

I think that girl never made her appearance till eleven o'clock, and then she went through the hall and up stairs without speaking to any one.

The next morning the professor appeared at the breakfast-table. He had come back sooner than he expected to, he said with perfect gravity. But Althea glanced at me, and blushed crimson.

"How long did you stop?" she whispered, as we got up from the table.

"Long enough to know where you got that ring you wear," I answered, glancing at a sparkling diamond on her left fore-finger.

She smiled, but said nothing, saw nothing, though I had been holding my hand before my face for some minutes.

"I like my ring best," I remarked, disgusted at her stupidity.

She stared, looked at my hand, then laughed.

"You darling creature, I'm so glad!" she said, putting her arm around my waist.

"Althea," said the professor's voice behind us, "do you wish to go down to the dell, or up the mountain this morning?"

"Either," she said softly, then blushed when we both laughed.

"Professor," I said, "I forgive you all your insults of last evening. In return, confess that you overheard Bertie telling me why Althea was angry with you."

"Whad is it about me?" asked Bertie, coming up.

"I confess!" said the professor, laughing. "That blessed Bertie put me on the right track. Miss Lynn, I am forever your debtor."

"O! brovezzer," said Bertie, "Ibe dot sure dat I wat any bad to be forever iddedded to be. You bay seddle wid Adthea. Adthea, lake hib pay cobpoud idterest."

"Come, Bertie!" called a voice outside the window.

"Ibe cubbid," said Bertie, blushing, and wiping her nose; or, as she would have said, "wipid 'er dose."

HOW I FOUND MY MARIA.

BY N. P. DARLING.

My name is Smith—"one of the few immortal names that were not born to die"—Jabez Smith, and I am not a married man, though I expect to be one soon, very soon. My hair stands on end like the quills upon the fretful porcupine, when I think upon the doom that awaits me. It is hard, for one so young, so beautiful, and with such bright hopes as were mine only a few short hours ago, with the world all before me, as one might say, with the exception of what is behind me, to be thus doomed to drag out a weary existence as the husband of a woman I never saw but once, who is ten years my senior, and who has only one thing to recommend herself to my love—her name, which was Jones.

Now there is nothing in the simple name of Jones to cause a man's heart to palpitate, perhaps you think, my lovely reader. Under ordinary circumstances, I agree with you; but if for three long years (one was leap year) and more, you had loved with your whole heart a girl who bore the euphonious name of Jones; if for one thousand and ninety-six consecutive nights ("an unprecedented run") you had retired to your virtuous couch with the name of Jones upon your lips, and the fancied image of Maria Jones before your eyes, would it be strange if you came to love the name only less than its lovely owner? Would it be strange if the name of Jones, no matter where you saw it, should fix your attention? Would it be as all singular if you became intensely interested in everybody and everything belonging to the whole Jones family, or rather all the families and members of families who bear the name of Jones, not excepting the celebrated Davy, and his famous locker? I rather think not. This was the case with me. I was interested in everybody by the name of Jones; I loved the name, but alas! I loved Maria better.

Maria, the beautiful, the dark-haired, the hazel-eyed, the loveliest Jones of all the Joneses, O, where was she? "Ask of the winds that far around with fragments strewed the sea," as the late Mrs. Hemans replied when questioned as to the whereabouts of the boy who stood on the burning deck.

I don't think the above quotation quite appropriate, but it was the only thing I could think of, and I felt just as though I must quote something. My feelings have been so wrought upon in the last few hours, that nothing but mental pictures of those people who at some period of their lives found themselves in a worse situation than I am at present, afford me the slightest relief. It made me almost cheerful when I thought of young Cassabianca, for, although my situation is horrible to contemplate, his was certainly worse.

But to my story. I must tell it, for I can find relief no other way, and I have but a few minutes to do it in. The marriage ceremony is to take place at two o'clock this afternoon. The minister is engaged, and my particular friend William Williamson has just left me for the purpose of obtaining the marriage certificate. I am alone with my thoughts.

Where, O where is Maria? I know not, but ah! let me forget her. She can never be mine. It is three years now since these eyes of mine dwelt upon her beautiful countenance, since she told me that she loved me. During those long years I have been a wanderer in distant lands, with nothing but her dear letters and a comfortable salary to comfort me.

I made her acquaintance while I was principal of the P— High School. She was one of my pupils. When she graduated it was our idea to marry, and open an academy for young ladies and gentlemen, where we could instruct the young idea in the art of shooting on the most approved plan.

But before the arrival of the day that was to make us both supremely happy, I received such a very liberal offer from a Mr. Jordan, the father of one of my pupils, to become his son's tutor and travelling companion, while the lad made a tour through Europe, for the benefit of his health, which had become much impaired by study, that I thought, and Maria agreed with me, that it would be very foolish of me not to accept. And so, bidding adieu to the dear girl, who had wound herself like a corkscrew through the very core of my heart, I kissed her upon both cheeks, and promising to be true to her, as well as to the rest of the Joneses, whom I loved sincerely for her sake, I tore myself away from her, and that very day, in company with my pupil, embarked in the Asia for Liverpool.

For three years, as I remarked before, I travelled or sojourned in Europe. We passed our first winter in Nice, which is a very nice place to spend a winter, though some crabbed people don't pronounce it so; the second in Venice, and the third in Paris; and although I saw many beautiful women, I am happy to state that the needle of my heart never for one instant "wobbled," but pointed steadily to the north star of my existence, Maria Jones.

Meantime that dear creature amused herself (she always was fond of amusements), by teaching school in the rural districts, and in writing to her dear Smithy, as she called me, and in reading the letters I sent her, containing glowing descriptions of the various countries, cities, peoples and incidents, that I visited and met with in my journey; and so the time passed.

At last, I stood once more upon the soil of my own native land. This interesting and rather difficult feat (for I have seen those who couldn't stand thus without help) I executed for the first time in three years, just one week ago to-day in the city of New York.

What my feelings were I shall not attempt to describe. It would take too long. It is enough to say that I was supremely happy in the thought that I was once more near my own Maria, and that in a few days, at most, I should press her beauteous form to my wildly throbbing heart.

With the utmost despatch I transacted what little business I had in the city, and then started for the village of M—, where I expected to find my Dukinea. Alas! she had gone from there, no one knew whither. All that I could learn was, that her brother had returned from Australia, immensely rich, and that he was going to settle somewhere in his native country, and Maria was to live with him.

I believe that I have not told you that my love was an orphan. Knowing how tender-hearted you are, dear reader, I didn't want to harrow up your feelings, and I shouldn't have mentioned her fatherless and motherless condition even now, if I did not think it was positively necessary for you to know it. I loved her better on that account. You see I had been in the habit of falling in love with young ladies that had fathers who had money, and the said fathers had been in the habit of declining my proposals, sometimes viciously, to speak mildly, until I retired at last in disgust and centered my affections upon the orphan Maria, congratulating myself that at last I had anchored in a port from which no cruel parent could drive me.

My love had a sister some years older than herself, whom I had never seen, and a brother in Australia, whom I had never called upon. But of course the former would not undertake to influence Maria in the choice of a husband, and as to the latter, I never expected to see him.

But here he had returned, with wealth, and his sister was under his charge. I knew not where to find them, and if I did, perhaps this brother would object to making over his sister into the hands of a poor tutor. Alas! was I always to be balked by crabbed fathers and wealthy brothers?

Hardly knowing which way to turn or what to do, I tarried in M— nearly a week, in a state of dreadful uncertainty. But in the meantime I wrote to my old friend William Williamson, informing him of my return to "my dear native land." His answer reached me before I had decided upon any particular plan of action. It contained an invitation for me to visit him immediately at his home in the town of Becklinburg, where he was keeping bachelor's hall, his family being away.

Without more ado, I immediately packed up, and started for Becklinburg, via. New York and New London per steamer.

The steamboat train, as it is called, reaches Becklinburg at about four o'clock in the morning; and at that hour of this very morning I found myself landed at a dark and dismal depot, from which I hurried out into the street, in search of my friend Williamson's house.

I have been here in Becklinburg many times before, and I am quite familiar with the streets of the town, or at least I was three years ago, and time has made but few changes. To be sure the town is larger, and quite a number of buildings have been erected in my absence, as I noticed this morning while walking through its deserted streets. I noticed in particular, that some one had built a house on the lot adjoining my friend Williamson's, and so much like his in every respect, that it would have been difficult for a stranger to distinguish between them. However, I had visited the house too often to experience any difficulty on that score, or at least I thought so, for I pride myself a great deal upon the fact that I never forget a face that I have once seen, a road that I have once travelled, or a house whose threshold I have once crossed.

When I reached Williamson's gate I was undecided what course to pursue. It was really too bad to ring a man up at four o'clock in the morning, even if he was your friend, if I could effect an entrance without; and I knew I could, as I had done it many a time before, in company with Williamson, when we were boys, and slightly wild, perhaps.

Around the house ran a veranda, the top of which was easily reached by some trellis work at the side and from there I could step into one of the chamber windows without troubling any one. This I resolved to do.

I succeeded in climbing to the roof of the veranda without any serious difficulty, and with but little noise, and then a few cautious steps brought me to the window of Williamson's room, which I raised noiselessly and entered, not without some trepidation, although as I knew my friend had never been in the habit of keeping firearms about him, the danger, even if he should awaken, was slight.

Once in the room I paused to listen, for it was so dark that I could make nothing out but the dim outlines of the bed and furniture. I believe I trembled slightly, but the regular breathing of the occupant of the bed reassured me, and so cautiously closing the window I advanced into the room.

Still Williamson slept. Peering through the darkness, I could discover his form lying very near the edge of the bed, having plenty of room for me to slip in on the other side without disturbing him, or at least I thought so, remembering that he was a heavy sleeper.

It was with a chuckle of satisfaction and delight that I threw off my clothes, thinking meanwhile what would be the surprise of Williamson when he awoke in the morning to find his old friend Smith comfortably reposing beside him. I could hardly restrain myself from laughing outright, as my fancy pictured to me the sleeper's wonderment and perhaps alarm, or that which would be his, to find a bedfellow. Would he take me for the ghost of Smith, and run screaming away, or—just at this moment the sleeper turned over, and I became quiet as a mouse, hardly daring to breathe; but he did not awake, and I, having completed my preparations, crept softly toward the bed, cautiously turned back the sheet, and slipped in.

Egad! how the bedstead creaked. Williamson flopped over, but he did not wake. He moaned musically, and then he muttered "Smithy," and I knew he was dreaming of me.

My grandmother used to tell me that if you pinch a sleeping person's toe he will answer any question you may ask. I had never tried it; but here was certainly an excellent opportunity. I began to search for Williamson's toe, but very carefully. Slowly I slipped my hand beneath the sheets, slowly I—

"What the—Moses?"

"Murder! Help! help! help!"

It wasn't Williamson!

I sprang out on the front side, and the other party sprang out on the back side of the bed, yelling murder, and crying for help at the top of her voice (it was a female voice, or the voice of a female), while I stood shivering with the cold, and trembling with fear, endeavoring to persuade the lady to "hush up," declaring that I was a gentleman of honor, and that it was all a mistake, and that what wasn't right then we'd make right in the morning, but I really don't believe she heard a word that I said; and just as the lady became exhausted with screaming, and might have been persuaded to listen to reason, I heard footsteps outside the door.

There is nothing like presence of mind in a case like this. Some people wouldn't have known what to do at this juncture. I did. With the greatest presence of mind I seized my pantaloons, and jumping into them (I never had a pair go on with more ease), I very coolly made a dash at the window, dashed through it, of course dashing it all to "smithereens," and landed myself handsomely on the roof of the veranda, my face, hands and legs beautifully ornamented with "cuts;" but I did not stop to admire these, but with the greatest celerity I made my way down the trellis work to the ground, followed by cries of "robbers!" "thieves!" etc., from my unknown bedfellow, and a fat, puffy gentleman in a red nightcap who had popped himself out of the window with a lamp in one hand and a "seven-shooter" in the other, who began to "let it off" just as soon as I disappeared from his view.

"Bang, bang, bang!" He discharged every barrel, but fortunately he was a poor shot at long range. He missed me, but awakened all his neighbors. Lights flashed up in the houses on both sides of the street. Windows flew up and nightcaps popped out to see what was the matter.

Fortunately for me, at this moment I saw a face appear at a window in the next house, that seemed familiar. It was Williamson. I sprang forward, and leaping the garden wall called to him to come down.

"Who is it?" cried he.

"Smith—Jabez Smith," I replied, as softly as I could.

"Where'd you come from at this time, and in such a plight, Smith?"

"Don't stop to ask questions now, but come down and let me in."

"Go around to the door then."

I did so, and was admitted. Williamson closed the door behind me, staring at me in the greatest astonishment.

"What is thunder, does this mean, Smith?" he cried, grasping my hand, "your face and hands are covered with blood, and—ha, ha, ha—where are your pantaloons?"

I looked down. Egad, I had jumped into the unknown's balmoral skirt!

"Where have you been?"

"I've been roaming, I've been roaming, my dear boy, and I lost my reckoning, and slipped into bed with a female in the next house, thinking it was you; and I dashed myself through a window; and I've been shot at, and if we can't hush this matter up, I'm ruined. Hide me, William, hide me, from the terrible man next door."

Williamson pulled me into the parlor, and throwing himself on the sofa roared with laughter.

"Don't laugh, or you'll betray me. Bless me, there's the doorbell!"

"Hush! keep quiet. Wait here and I'll go and see what is wanted," said Williamson, beginning to be alarmed.

"Don't betray me—don't."

He took the lamp, and closing the door after him, left me alone.

It was a moment of terrible suspense for me. If I had been seen to enter Williamson's house, if they searched and found me there, what would be the consequences? I dared not think. I had been guilty of something worse than burglary, and although I might be able to prove that I was innocent of any bad intentions, still my situation was dreadful to contemplate. At this moment I heard a strange voice at the hall door.

"But I tell you I saw him enter this house, Mr. Williamson," cried the voice, in a tone that assured me that the speaker was terribly in earnest; "and although I have not a search warrant, unless you mean to harbor a thief, you certainly can have no objections to my satisfying myself that he is not here."

"But he certainly wasn't a thief," said my friend.

"How do you know that, Mr. Williamson?"

My friend was nonplussed.

"Come," said he, "come in, and I will explain it all."

"You explain it! What, are you the man?"

"No, but it was a friend of mine. Close the door, and let us keep this matter entirely to ourselves."

"Certainly, if your friend is an honorable man, and is willing to do the right thing."

"But it was a mistake, you see."

"Yes, and a very bad one, Mr. Williamson, and if men will make blunders they must pay for them."

"But my friend mistook the house. He thought it was my room that he was entering, and he thought it was I in the bed."

"But it was my sister."

"Well, there was no harm in that."

"How the deuce do I know, Mr. Williamson? I merely know the facts in the case, just as I have stated them, and I am bound to have satisfaction of your friend. He must marry the lady, even if she is compelled to sue for a divorce the next day after."

"And lose my Maria?" I yelled, forgetting in the agony of that thought the necessity for silence.

"Ha! that's him," cried the fat gentleman, rushing into the room, followed by a long, thin, peaked-nosed, peaked-chinned lady of thirty-five, perhaps, whose face was the color of tan bark, and whose eyes were as red as a soldier's button-hole.

"O, ho, Mr. What's-your-name," cried the tan-colored lady, springing forward, and clutching my hair, "aren't you ashamed of yourself, sir?"

"Danged if I aint," I answered, trying to sink into my balmoral.

"And what are you going to do about it, sir? Just tell me that, will you?" inquired the fat gentleman, grasping me by the arm. "Didn't you know that it was a high crime and a misdemeanor, for which you might be impeached, sir? Didn't you know that you might be lynched, sir, and don't you think you deserve to be lynched, sir, for attempting to sleep with my sister contrary to the laws of the Commonwealth, and against the peace and dignity of the State?"

Looking at the tan-colored sister, I could but answer in the affirmative.

"And now what do you propose to do about it?" cried the fat gentleman.

"Why," said I, "I'm very sorry, sir; and for you, madam, I beg your pardon. It was all a mistake, I assure you, and my friend Williamson will tell you so."

"Quite likely, sir; but suppose such miserable mistakes should become common? They must be nipped in the bud, sir, nipped in the bud," and the fat gentleman looked exceedingly fierce. "To come to the point, you must either marry my sister, or—"

"What?" I gasped, fixing my eyes upon the countenance of the tan-colored female, who gave me an amorous glance at this point.

"Marry my sister, or I'll shoot you like a dog.

"Choose," cried the tan-colored one.

"And quick, too," yelled the fat one, growing excited.

"I'll marry her," I faltered.

"When?" inquired the lady.

"Name the day yourself. The sooner the better."

"This afternoon, then, at two o'clock."

"And meantime you will remain a prisoner in one of the chambers," said the fat gentleman, "and your friend must have no intercourse with you."

"I submit."

"Very good," said the fat gentleman; "and now follow me."

He led me to this room, brought my clothes, and locked me in. I have taken a bath since, and am now dressed ready for the execution—or the marriage ceremony, rather. Shall I ever survive it?

—"Hold heart;

And you, my sinews, grow not instant old,
But bear me stiffly up."

I hear a footstep at the door. My time is almost come. The fat gentleman enters. Adieu, my own beloved Maria, adieu!

Three o'clock, P. M. The ceremony is concluded, and I still live. Truly

"There's a divinity that shapes our ends, Rough-hew them how we will."

The fat gentleman conveyed me to his house, where I found his sister, arrayed in her best the minister, and Williamson waiting for us.

I was introduced to the minister, and then Williamson asked me if I was all ready, and I answered that I was.

"You can take your places then," said the minister.

"Place me on the trap, and draw the cap over my eyes."

"The lady isn't here," said Williamson.

"Yes, I am," answered a voice from the door.

I sprang forward, almost crazy with astonishment and delight.

"That voice!" I cried, "that form, those eyes, them nose! It is, it is my own, my darling Maria!"

"You bet!" she exclaimed, throwing herself into my arms.

We kissed.

"And this is your brother from Australia?" I asked.

"Yes, love. And this is my sister; but you are not going to marry her. We found out who you were, by some of my letters which I found in your coat, after your abrupt departure this morning from my room."

"Then it was your room that I entered—not your sister's?"

"Exactly. But don't make such a mistake again, my dear."

"Wont I, though?"

Then we took our places, and the minister made us one flesh.

And this is a true account of how and where I found my Maria.

LOST AND FOUND.

BY EMMA GARRISON JONES.

MARGUERITE was her name, but we called her Little Pearl, Philip and I. She was our first baby, the daintiest, dearest, little thing that ever you set eyes on; cheeks like half-blown rosebuds, hair like rings of sunshine, and eyes as blue as the depths of a June sky. Darling little Pearl, how we loved her. We had been married just a year and a half, when Philip caught the Western fever. Philip was my husband, you know, tender, and true, and devoted, and so noble and handsome that my eyes filled with tears of fond pride whenever I looked at him. But he was an ambitious man, a man who aspired to set his mark high in the world. I don't think I fully sympathized with him in those days of our early wedded life; we had been so differently raised, Philip and I, and our natures were so widely dissimilar.

He was a New England man, a keen thinker, and an untiring worker, with a will as strong and unyielding as the granite of his native hills; while I was a lover of my ease, an indolent Southern woman, who had been reared in the very lap of affluence and luxury, and in the midst of warm, tropical beauty. Previous to the time of my marriage, my life had never known a care or a sorrow.

I loved my husband with an intensity bordering on idolatry, but when he told me of his intention to leave our beautiful cottage, and seek his fortune in the far West, it was a terrible blow to me. We had lived at Rosedale ever since our marriage, and I could see no reason why we should not continue to live there. Truly the place belonged to my uncle, but then it would be ours at his death, and why should Philip fret and chafe so under a foolish sense of dependence? We had everything, elegant rooms, flowers, birds, pleasure-grounds, and servants enough to keep our hands from anything like labor, and uncle gave it all ungrudgingly, still my husband was not content.

"I can't live this life, Belle," he said, "I wasn't made for it. My work awaits me somewhere in the world, and I must hunt it up. My little ones won't respect their father by-and-by, if he is nothing more than a drone in the hive of life."

The idea of a man going out to hunt up his life-work seemed to me, who from day to day sought only to avoid work and to pass my hours in luxurious leisure, utterly preposterous. I laughed at first, and then I wept and expostulated, but ridicule, tears, and expostulations were alike unavailing. My husband had a will of iron.

"I am sorry, Belle," he said, "that you cannot see as I do, but I know my duty, and must do it, despite the pain it gives me to act in opposition to your wishes."

I was vexed and angry at first, and said a great many things that were unwise and unwomanly, but Philip pursued the even tenor of his way, all patience and forbearance. Our preparations were soon made, the few things we held most precious were packed up, and bidding adieu to our sunny Southern home, we started Westward.

The excitement of the journey, together with my husband's constant tenderness and encouragement, reconciled me in a measure to the change in my life; and when we reached our little Western cottage, my impulsive nature, always rushing to one extreme or the other, carried me into an ecstasy of delight and anticipation, even beyond anything my steadfast husband exhibited. But he seemed greatly relieved to see me growing so thoroughly contented, and we began our new life very bravely.

The cottage was comfortable enough, but bare and humble in comparison to what we had hitherto been accustomed; the square, white-washed rooms had a dreadfully forlorn look, and the little kitchen, with its one staring window, and the cooking-stove standing in the middle of the floor, filled me with shuddering disgust every time I entered it. But I had made up my mind to endure all and everything, and as I have said, we began our new life very bravely.

For the first two or three months I had help, not very efficient help truly; but better far than none. Philip entered at once upon the practice of law, and as his office was some distance from home he did not return until evening, so we had no great amount of cooking to do, and between us, we managed to keep the cottage tidy, and to take care of Little Pearl.

Looking back through the hazy mist of long departed years, those early days of my Western life seem infinitely happy. They were autumn days, and the great prairies rolled out before our door like seas of billowy gold, and the distant river lapsed and murmured between its flowery banks, with a music as soothing as a mother's lullaby.

Philip was all life and hope; his eye was like an eagle's, his brow crowned with perpetual sunshine. The ambition and aspiration of his life were about to win success; the consummation of all he hoped and wished for was within his grasp.

Every afternoon we went to meet him, taking Little Pearl, through the grand and gorgeous prairies, and as often as his happy eyes caught sight of us he would hasten forward with fond embraces and approving words.

"Ah, Belle," he would say, "I believe I am the happiest man in the universe, and you are growing contented, too, dear—I can see it in your bright face."

I ought to have been contented, I surely must have been, despite the influences of my false training; looking back at those days, it seems to me that they must have fled by like a dream of bliss, yet the seeds of discord, and self-love, and indolence were still in my heart, ready to spring up and bear fruit at any moment. It is a mistaken kindness in friends to rear their children as I was raised; better by far, is it to push them out into the fierce storms of life, and teach them that it is God's command that they shall earn their bread in the sweat of their brow.

I linger along my life-path here, dreading to go forward, for beyond these sunny days of hope and promise lies the blackness of darkness, the gulf of sorrow and despair which opened like a yawning tomb across our way.

The glory of autumn faded, and the chill November rains set in, bringing dreary, sunless days, and changing the gorgeous prairie-bloom into endless leagues of sodden gray. My girl left me, and Little Pearl grew cross and fretful in her teething. In addition to his law business, Philip had gone into farming, and we had two or three laborers to feed and lodge, which greatly increased the housework. Under this accumulation of trials my patience began to give way. I worked late and early, but I grew morose and fretful, and never had a pleasant word for my husband. But he never complained.

"Poor Belle," he would say, "poor, overworked little wife, be as brave as you can—better days will come by-and-by. Just as soon as I can get off from my business, I'll go to the city and obtain permanent help. In the meantime, don't fret the roses from your cheeks and the brightness from your eyes."

But despite my husband's loving words and constant help, for he took one half the household labor on his own hands, I continued to murmur at my fate, and one morning the crisis came.

A dreadfully desolate morning; the clouds rolling down to the very river brink, in ragged, leaden masses, and a penetrating, misty rain dripping, dripping with a ceaseless, wearisome patter. Everything seemed to go bad with me that morning. Breakfast was unusually late, Little Pearl cross to absolute fretfulness, and the sick laborer up stairs in need of constant attention. Philip was obliged to leave early, and after coaxing and hushing Pearl to sleep, I laid her in her dainty little crib, and went about my morning's work. And there was plenty of it to do; dishes to be cleaned and put in order, baby's clothes to wash, and the rooms to be cleared of the black prairie-mud that stuck to the floors in huge cakes. To increase my vexation, and to render everything more comfortless, the sudden gusts of wind that came souging from the east, brought the smoke and ashes from the stove in great blinding puffs.

I went to work, heart and head both throbbing with absolute misery; and through all the gloom, and smoke, and discomfort, bright glimpses of my girlhood's old home coming back to me like visions in a beautiful dream, I felt wronged and injured, and while I worked away, dusting off the soot and ashes, and scrubbing up the mud, the hot tears fell so fast as almost to blind me. My husband had been cruel, heartless, I thought, to tear me from a home where all was beauty and pleasure, and bring me to that dreadful place to wear my life out in hateful drudgery. I would sooner be in my grave than to live on so from year to year.

In the midst of this outburst of egotistic despair, I heard the sick man calling from above, and dropping my scrubbing-brush, hurried up to him. His fever was rising again, he needed cooling draughts, and ice-cloths to his head. I went to work to prepare them, trembling with nervous haste, for the morning was slipping by, and the noon meal must be in readiness for the farming-hands. In the midst of my work and hurry, Little Pearl's sharp, imperative cry came piping from below. What should I do? I had just spent over half an hour lulling her to sleep, and here she was on my hands again.

"I won't go down," I cried, in real anger. "She may have her cry out—O dear, I wish I had no baby!"

But the instant the unwomanly wish had passed my lips, I repented of having uttered it. No baby, no Little Pearl! The bare thought filled me with shuddering terror. Hurriedly administering the sick man's potion, I hastened down, eager to compensate for my unmotherly words by fond caresses. There stood the little cradle in its accustomed corner, the dainty lace coverlid thrown back, the pillow still damp and warm from the impress of the little curly head, but Little Pearl was gone!

For an instant I stood dumb, breathless; then in frantic foolishness I searched the rooms, the yard, calling upon the child's name as if she could hear and answer me! And then at last a happy thought broke like sunlight upon me. My husband had been home, and stolen away the child to tease me. I set about preparing dinner, looking every moment to see him come in. In a little while the noon bell rang, bringing the laborers from the clearing. I hurried out to meet them.

"Where is Mr. Weston?" I questioned, with my heart in my mouth.

"Haven't seen him, ma'am, since this morning."

"Not seen him? You surely have, he's got my baby."

But the men shook their heads, and catching up my shawl, I hurried off in the direction of his office.

Half a mile from the cottage I met him on his way home.

"Why, Belle," he cried, catching my arm, and looking down in consternation at my dragged garments and muddy feet, "in God's name where are you going? what is the matter?"

"O Phillip, the baby, Little Pearl, what have you done with her?"

"Done with Little Pearl? are you going mad, Belle? for God's sake tell me what you mean?"

"She's gone, Little Pearl's gone—I came down stairs and found her cradle empty, and I was so sure you had her."

He stood silent a moment, his face growing as white and stern as death; then he said, solemnly:

"No, Belle, I haven't seen the child. I haven't been home since morning."

He started on before me with long, rapid strides, into the cottage, and up to the little cradle standing in the corner, as if to satisfy his own eyes. Then he turned back to the yard, and began to examine the tracks in the mud around the doorway. The farm-hands were examining them also.

"Moccasin tracks, Boss," said one old man, significantly, pointing to an indenture in the yielding soil. "Injuna, I guess."

My husband's face grew a shade whiter.

"Yes," he responded, "that's it, come, my lads, we haven't a moment to lose."

He started off, followed by the laborers, but a few rods from the house he turned back.

"Poor Belle," he said, putting his arms round me, "this is terrible for you, but you must be strong, and hope for the best. The Indians have passed here, and it was they, no doubt, who stole the child. We must try to intercept them before they cross the river; we may not be back to-night; you had better go over to Mr. Delevan's and stay till we return."

But I did not go. I went into the lonely cottage, and fell on my knees beside the little empty crib. God had given me my wish, I had no baby. Ah me, the self-torture, the bitterness of those long, long night hours can never be described!

Morning dawned at last, lurid and misty, a red sun struggling up through ragged billows of gray fog. About ten o'clock my husband and his party returned, weary, haggard and hopeless. They had followed the Indians all night, but when at last they came up with them, far beyond the river, they could gain no tidings of the child. And all our after efforts were equally unsuccessful. We offered rewards, and instituted every means of inquiry, but in vain. Little Pearl was gone! I had no baby!

There was ample time for leisure then; no peevish cries, no busy little hands, no little baby wants to occupy me! But I, who had hated labor, fled to it now as my sole refuge and comfort. The only ease I found was in constant action. My husband worked too, but his life seemed to have lost its impelling force, its happiest inspiration.

Years went by, and not content with my simple household duties I took charge of a neighboring school—later I aided my husband in his office. My mind expanded, my ideas enlarged. I was no longer an indolent, helpless repiner, but a strong, self-reliant, labor-loving woman, a true helpmate for my husband. Success crowned our united efforts, wealth and renown flowed in upon us, my husband was elected Judge, and spoken of for Congress—but we were childless, for no more babies came.

I cannot say that I regretted this, for I could not bear to think of seeing another baby face in my little lost one's place. I could never forget her. Hundreds and hundreds of times I seemed to hear again the sharp, imperative cry, as I heard it that morning, and I would drop my work, and rush away to the empty cradle, with a foolish fancy that I should see again the little rosy face, with its azure eyes and golden rings of hair. But it was all fancy—the pretty little cradle was empty, and would forever remain so; and I should go down to my grave yearning and longing for the cooling voice, the velvet lips, the baby caresses that would never be mine again. Little Pearl was gone!

Ten years after our removal to the West, we received intelligence of my uncle's death, and being his only heirs, we went down at once to attend to the settlement of his estates. Returning homeward, we made a tour of Niagara and the principal Northern cities.

One September night found us in New York, and at the opera. The house was unusually gay, the music divine, but through all the glamour and perfume of gorgeous tûilets, amid the wailing of the music, and the triumph strains of the singers, I sat unconscious, almost indifferent, the old yearning in my heart roused up to strange and sudden intensity. Only one thought possessed me, and that was of my lost baby, Little Pearl. I seemed to be living over that terrible morning and long, long night again, and my soul cried out for my child with a longing that would not be silenced. Yet in the gay house and exquisite music there was nothing suggestive of her short, sweet little life; why then did she seem so near me? what was it thrilled and shook me so?

The opera over we started for our hotel. At one of the crossings the carriage made a sudden halt.

"Nothing but a strap broke loose, all right in a moment, sir," said the driver, in answer to my husband's inquiry.

I leaned out while he was arranging it, looking over the great silent city, and up into the solemn summer night. The sky was blue and cloudless, the stars mellow and misty, and a full moon hung like a golden jewel in the far west. My eyes filled with tears, and an inexpressible yearning filled my soul.

"Where is my baby, where is Little Pearl to-night?" I murmured.

"Please madam, just one penny!"

The slender, childish voice, mellow and sweet as the note of a blackbird, startled me out of my reverie; and looking down, I saw a tiny figure, and an appealing baby-face, below me in the misty moonlight.

"Please madam, I never begged before, but grandmarm is so sick, and she's eat nothing since yesterday."

Just then the driver sprang to his box, and the carriage whirled off again, leaving the little thing far behind; but I caught at my husband's arm, in breathless eagerness.

"Phillip," I entreated, "stop the carriage. I must see that child."

He glanced back hesitatingly, and there the little thing stood in the moonlight, just as we had left her.

"I must, Phillip," I repeated, "don't deny me."

And my husband bade the driver turn back, which he did with a muttered imprecation.

"Now, my little girl," I said, leaning out, and extending my hand, "come here, and tell me how I can help you."

"Grandmarm is so sick," she replied, coming close up to the wheels, and raising her soft blue eyes to my face, "and so hungry, and I never begged before, madam!"

"And where does your grandma live, dear?"

"Right down this street, in that row of tenements."

"Take her up, Phillip, we must look into this case."

My husband obeyed, and the driver being promised double pay, turned down towards the tenements. I seated the little girl beside me, and took her little brown hand in mine. The bare touch of her slender fingers made the very blood in my heart thrill, and I wanted to clasp her in my arms, and cover her poor, wan little face with kisses, with a longing that was absolute pain.

"How pretty she is," I said, smoothing back the tangled golden hair that shaded her white forehead and sweet blue eyes.

"She looks like a frightened bird," said my husband, smiling; "what shall you do with her, Belle?"

"Keep her forever, if I can," I replied, with a feeling of intense happiness at my heart.

Just then we reached the tenements.

"That's grandmarm's room," said the child, pointing upward to a window in which a dim light was burning.

We left the carriage, and followed her up the long flights of stairs, and into the bare, humble room. On a rude couch lay an old woman, her strong, worn face wearing that pallor which never knows no change.

"Grandmarm," cried the child, running to the bedside, "here's a good, nice lady come, and she'll give you some tea, and you'll get well now."

The old woman turned her head, her eager eyes fastening themselves upon us.

"Thank God," she murmured. "I thought I should die, and leave her alone."

"What can we do for you, madam?" I asked, bending over her.

"Nothing for me, I'm past help, it's the child I want looked after."

"Yes, but you must have nourishment—Philip, go out for some tea, and we'll have a fire at once."

"Woman," she said, solemnly, "listen to me. I'm dying—in a few hours I shall be in the other world—I could drink a drop o' wine, but nothing else."

My husband procured it in a few moments, and after drinking it, she seemed somewhat revived.

"Now," she said, "while I'm strong enough, let me speak about the child—when I'm gone she wont have a friend in the world—you look like a rich woman, would you—"

"I'll take her, and be a mother to her," I interrupted, eagerly.

"Come round here and let me see your face."

I obeyed, bending down to the dying eyes that searched my face so keenly. After a moment she drew a deep breath.

"Yes," she said, "I can trust you, your face is good and honest—God has sent you—come here, little Rose—this is your new mother, you must love her, and be a good child when I'm gone."

I held out my arms, and the little thing nestled close to my bosom, looking up into my face with wondering eyes.

"I will be good to her," I said; "as God hears me, I will."

"I believe you, and now I can die in peace. I should a' been dead long ago, but for leavin' the child—that kept me back. She aint a friend in the world, and she's no flesh and blood o' mine. Ten years ago, my old man was alive then, and runnin' a flatboat on a Western river, we fell in with a party o' Injuns. They had a white baby with 'em, the prettiest, daintiest little thing I ever set eyes on. I had jest buried my own baby, and I couldn't bear to see 'em carry the poor little thing away, so I persuaded my old man to buy it. They were willing enough to sell, so I took the child and raised it as my own. I meant to hunt up its folks, but I named it after my own baby, and got sich a likin' for the little creater, I couldn't bear to give her up—but I was sorry enough after my old man died, and we come to want. But I've kept the clothes she had on, and maybe, madam, you may hear of her people some day."

"Let us see the clothes," gasped my husband, his face as white as death.

"Look in the box and get 'em, Rose."

The child obeyed, bringing a small bundle carefully wrapped up. I unfolded it with trembling hands, and then as my eyes fell upon the embroidered frock, the little crimson sack, and the dainty blue shoes, my own baby's clothes, for the first time in my life I dropped down in a dead faint.

When consciousness returned, I found my husband, bending over me with a radiant face, and little Rose, my own Little Pearl, closely clasped in his arms.

"Found at last, Belle," he murmured, tremulously. "God be thanked, we are not childless now."

Then sitting down by the bedside we told our story, and the dying woman listened with tears of joy.

"God's work," she said, solemnly, "God Almighty's own work."

And a few hours later, just as the sweet September stars faded, and the golden dawn-tints began to glimmer above the sleeping city, her spirit took its flight in peace. And when the funeral rites were over we journeyed back to our Western home, how happy, how grateful to God I need not try to express. From henceforth our lives were perfect—Little Pearl was found.

FAITH WILD'S BONDAGE.

BY FRANK H. ANGLIER.

FAITH WILD had been to the city; and to say this of an unsophisticated country girl, who had never before been a dozen miles from the paternal roof, means a great deal. To Faith the assertion imported not only that she had looked upon the roofs of the metropolis, from the windows of the State House lantern, and beheld its imposing aggregate of domes and spires from the railing of Cambridge bridge, but also that she was no longer the simple-minded Faith who had left Willowville for Boston three months ago.

When Abner Markham helped her into the stage-coach, on the day of her departure, and, with a sinking heart, waved her a sad goodbye as the conveyance vanished down the road in a cloud of dust, he bade farewell forever to the girlish, open-hearted Faith Wild, whose image had grown into his heart. It was another woman who came back to him three months afterward. Not that Faith had learned, in this short interval, to despise the little village wherein she had been born and bred, or to look with disdain upon the simple rustic youths and maidens who had been her companions from childhood. She was too true-hearted and sincere a girl to assume any attributes which did not properly belong to her, and not even the most envious of her Willowville friends ever thought to accuse her of "putting on airs." But her visit to the city had been Faith Wild's Rubicon. The experience had widened her conception of life, and had built up an intangible barrier between her and her old associates. She had grown out of their humble sphere, and although there was nothing of scornful pride nor any assumption of superiority in her intercourse with them, a host of new desires and ambitions had been born in Faith's bosom, which made her heart ache, with a pain it had never known before, when she thought how very hopeless these ambitions were.

Thus Faith Wild's visit to the city had to her a grave meaning. If she had never gone, she would have been quite content to marry Abner Markham and to settle down into a quiet, domestic, homespun life at Willowville, without once dreaming of what she had learned in metropolitan company—that she was remarkably smart and pretty, and capable of improving much better opportunities than Willowville was ever likely to offer her. Of course this new knowledge of herself brought its pain as well as pleasure. With the first thrill of delight at finding her own charms attractive to city eyes, came a humiliating recollection of her own deficiencies in education and accomplishments, a recollection which made her half miserable with vexation.

"But I can improve in these things," thought Faith; "and I shall never accomplish anything whatever in life, if I marry Abner Markham."

And one afternoon she told him so.

"I thought you would marry me, Faith," said Abner, digging his knife savagely into the log on which they were sitting. "I always expected it. I suppose I was a fool for thinking so, but you led me yourself to believe it, although I had never asked you."

"I wish you had not asked me now," said Faith, looking at him kindly from her bright, blue eyes. "O Abner! we have been friends together since we were little children. Why can't we be the same to each other still?"

"Because we can't, Faith," he replied. "I have loved you all my life, and I shall love you until I die. If I had told you this before you went to the city you would have taken me, and you know it."

"Yes," said Faith, "I should; and I rejoice for your own sake, Abner, that you did not tell me then, for since I came back I seem to have come into another world. All my life is changed to me. I should only have made you miserable, if I had married you, feeling so. Don't think, Abner, that I have learned to despise you and my old friends here in Willowville. It is not that, indeed."

"I understand," he said. "Since you saw something of the world, you have found that we are not the only people in it. I don't blame you—only if it had been I who had gone to the city, no length of time would have changed my feelings toward you."

Faith bit her lip and tapped her little foot impatiently on the grass.

"If I don't love you," she said, "I can't help it. Let us talk of something else."

"The time will come," said Abner, vehemently, "when you shall be my wife, Faith. Some day you will believe me worthy of you. I shall never be as good as you, but you will find that I am capable of better things than you have ever seen me do."

"We cannot tell what changes time may bring," replied Faith, smiling. "I give you no hope, Abner. I am going up the mountain a little way, after some berries for tea. Will you go too?"

"No," he replied. "I want to sit here for a while and think this over."

"Good-by, then," said Faith, placing her hand on his shoulder as she rose. "Don't think hard of me. You will see, some day, that it was all for the best."

She waved her hand to him and tripped lightly away among the trees, taking with her, as it seemed to Abner, all the sunshine from the spot where she had been sitting, and all the fragrance from the wild flowers that grew around it. As she reached a turn in the road she paused a moment to look back, and as her eyes fell upon Abner Markham, still digging his knife spitefully into the old log, a shade of something like regret came over Faith's heart and stung her with a slight spasm of remorse.

"It is too bad," she said to herself. "I almost wish I had never gone away. I believe he loves me, and I am sorry for him. Poor Abner!"

She turned away along the path that led up the side of the gray old mountain which overshadowed Willowville, and tried to dismiss the matter from her mind entirely. But as she passed leisurely onward, looking on either hand for berries, the briars became entangled in her dress so provokingly, and her foot slipped upon the stones so many times, that she could hardly help thinking that Abner's assistance would be very acceptable, and wondering why he had refused to come with her. She was not quite sure that she had done right in treating him thus. Abner Markham was the finest young fellow in Willowville, and the little circle of her acquaintance was not likely to offer so many chances that she could afford to throw them away without serious deliberation. But Faith had set her heart on higher things.

"I don't care," she said, shutting her teeth determinedly together. "I'll do better than that, or die an old maid. See if I don't."

The berries were scarce, and Faith unconsciously wandered from the path, in her search, and had climbed half way up the mountain side before she became aware of her whereabouts. She had no fear of getting lost, for the trees that found a foothold among the rocks were so few and scattered that she could always have a fair view of the country below, and as for the terrible tales which she had heard of these stony ledges, she believed them too little to feel any cause for alarm.

And so Faith wandered on, heedless of her footsteps, and had barely filled her basket as she reached the "shoulder" of the mountain, a ledge of rough, precipitous rocks which overhung the spot whereon she stood. The sun was sinking slowly in the west, and the whole earth below was brightened by the level bars of gold which came slanting across the landscape. Willowville, almost at Faith's feet, lay sleeping peacefully in the evening light, and the smoke from a hundred scattered farmhouses in the valley curled gently upward in the clear, still air. So lovely was the picture beneath her that Faith stopped still in admiration. A chord within her nature, ever susceptible to an appeal from the beautiful, thrilled at the splendor of the scene before her. But as she remained thus, lost in contemplation of the view, Faith became vaguely conscious of some disturbing influence breaking in upon her reverie. It seemed to her that some one or something was watching her, and she cast her eyes around involuntarily to see who or what it was. She glanced behind her and saw nothing. She turned to look toward the top of the ledge above her, but there was no one there. Her eyes dropped to the ground again and fell upon a coiled and shining reptile which had disposed itself in graceful folds almost at her feet.

Faith had usually a shuddering fear of snakes, but there was something in the position of this monster that aroused in her a strange curiosity. Instead of running away, she stood still and waited for it to move. There was something so horribly beautiful in the arrangement of its coils and in the contour of its glistening head, as it was raised motionless in the air, that Faith felt a curious attraction toward it. So still did the reptile remain, that she, after a while, began to doubt whether it were a snake at all, and questioned whether she had not been deceived. Perhaps her eyes had misled her, or mayhap it was only the ghost of a snake, the spirit of some one of the old crotali with which tradition infested the mountain. And then, carrying her fancy still further, she queried whether it were not the Genius of the mountain himself, who had assumed this form to terrify her into retracing her steps. What if there were treasures in the hill behind these rocks which it was the duty of this beautiful monster to guard?

And as Faith thought of these things, and amused herself with such idle fancies, the glittering black eyes of the creature seemed to enlarge, and from their depths to send forth coruscations of fire. She scarcely noticed the phenomenon as unusual, so busy was her mind with the dreamy musings which this thing at her feet had suggested. The air around her became filled with a confused, golden light, from the midst of which the terribly black eyes, each moment growing larger and wider, were fixed upon her with a fierce intensity. A rich voluptuous languor stole over her frame, and a sweet, drowsy hum, like the droning of bees among the clover blossoms, sounded vaguely in her ears. A dim consciousness came over her that in some way she was being drawn under the influence of a fearful spell, but the brilliant glare of the horribly beautiful eyes bound her to the spot, and she could not have moved for her life.

What followed within the next five minutes Faith Wild never knew. The whole earth seemed to dissolve around her and to melt into thin air. The sun was blotted out. And then she felt three cruel blows that stunned her into unconsciousness, and she sank fainting to the ground.

"Faith! Faith! Don't you know me? Dear Faith! look at me."

It was Abner who spoke, and it was Abner's arms which were clasped so tightly around her. Faith opened her eyes languidly, and shudderingly closed them again.

"Speak to me, Faith!"

She started up with a convulsive cry. "Where am I?" she asked.

"On Bald Mountain," said Abner, smiling to reassure her, "right in the middle of rattlesnakes. Not a very safe place for either of us, and we will get out of it as soon as you feel able to walk."

"What has happened?" she asked, still bewildered. "You struck me," she cried, shrinking from him, as a confused remembrance of what had occurred came back to her. "Why did you do that?"

"I?" said Abner, in astonishment. "I struck you? Faith, you are dreaming."

"Yes, you struck me thrice across my shoulders, and I fell. You nearly killed me."

"No," said Abner, amazed at her singular words; "this is what I struck, and three blows did the business for him. In a moment more I should have been too late. Look here!"

He thrust his cane into the bushes and drew out the flaccid body of a huge crotalus, so horrible in its scaly convolutions that Faith drew back with a shudder.

"Five rattles," observed Abner, swinging the creature through the air upon the end of his stick and casting it away from him down the mountain. It was a lucky escape."

"You have saved my life," said Faith, resting her head upon his shoulder. "I thank you, Abner. I shall never forget it."

"And you thought I struck you," said Abner, reproachfully.

"Every blow which you gave that monster I felt, too," replied Faith. "I suppose that accounts for it. Let us leave this dreadful place. I will lean upon your arm if you will let me."

As they descended the mountain, Abner carrying Faith's basket in one hand and assisting her tottering footsteps with the other, the young man pondered deeply upon what Faith had said. If it was true that she had felt the strokes inflicted upon the serpent, did it argue that the reptile had for the moment made her a part of itself? Or was the solution of the mystery to be found in the fact that Faith possessed a singular degree of sensibility, which, in the tensely drawn condition of her nerves, had assumed to itself the pain wrought upon another creature? Or did Abner himself possess that power which had, without his knowledge, brought Faith within its influence, and led him unconsciously to transfer to her a reflex of the blows which had broken the back of the enemy?

Abner was no metaphysician, but he had heard of animal magnetism, and had seen one of his own acquaintances "mesmerized" by a popular lecturer who had once visited Willowville. Whether Faith's curious experience had anything in common with the extraordinary statements which the lecturer had given as facts, he could not tell, but a secret wonder came across his mind whether he himself did not possess some such gift as that exercised by the mesmerist, and whether he could not command the wills and movements of others, as he had heard that some men could do.

The matter puzzled his brain for days afterwards, until, in despair of coming to any lucid conclusion, he rejected the entire idea as ridiculous. Nevertheless, before a week had elapsed, an opportunity presented itself to settle his doubts and to furnish a definite answer to the questions which filled his mind.

One lazy afternoon, as he was hay-making in his father's meadow, he caught sight of Faith Wild's trim little figure passing down the lane full half a mile away. It was past four o'clock, and he knew that she was going to the "Corners" post-office for letters. An irresistible impulse to put at rest his own uncertainty as to his influence over this girl, led him to hide himself behind a tree and to bid her come to him. From his place of concealment he watched her as she came opposite the barway which led into the meadow. He saw her stop and hesitate, in apparent indecision, then she advanced a step and halted again. Finally she turned towards the meadow, let down the bars, and came slowly towards Abner. Thus far his experiment had been successful, and filled with a wild excitement at his unexpected victory, he bent the full energies of his will to drive her back again. She had advanced nearly half way to him, before she stopped once more. Then she turned quickly around and rapidly retraced her steps to the road.

This test, though it would scarcely have convinced a skeptical mind, was perfectly satisfactory to Abner Markham. From that hour he knew that he held Faith Wild's destiny in the hollow of his hand. To her his will was a law to which she was bound in passive obedience. And, as the days passed on, he found ample opportunity to verify this conclusion. Exulting in the discovery of his power, he used it upon every occasion which gave him a chance to exercise it. He called Faith to him from across the fields where no echo of his voice could reach her. He extended his control to the minor details of her life, and fastened upon her the iron chains of a bondage such as few women ever know. It was a sweet revenge for the slight which he felt she had put upon him, although he could not but himself acknowledge how dangerous a power it was which he possessed. In tampering thus with the main springs of Faith's life, he knew that he was playing with fire. Yet he had no conception of his own meanness, or thought of that other danger—to him the most dreaded of all calamities—that even Faith's kindly feeling towards him might be changed to hate, when she came to realize her position, and that, like a hunted tigress, she might some day turn and rend him. Abner loved Faith Wild with all his soul. He would have laid down his life at her request, but there was an exultant delight in this ability to sway the heart, the passions, the very life of a young and lovely girl, which formed a temptation too brilliant for a man like Abner Markham to resist.

And poor Faith, at first dimly conscious of all this, at last came to know her enchanter and to realize how terrible was the spell in which he held her. The serpent upon the mountain had not had for her a more fearful fascination than this man had unaccountably acquired. She learned to shrink from him, in a vague, wild terror when she met him, and yet was drawn to him by a subtle attraction to which she was powerless to offer resistance. And it was not only in his presence that she felt the magician's spell. His influence extended to the most private relations of her life. It caused her to do those things against which her whole nature revolted. It pressed upon her soul like some terrible weight, which was crushing her existence into a shapeless mass of contradictions and anomalies.

"Abner! Abner!" she cried, when one day an irresistible impulse to seek him had led her to him at his work, "have you no mercy for me?"

"Mercy?" repeated Abner. "What do you mean, Faith?"

"What charm have you thrown around me, that I feel no longer myself?" said Faith. "You bid me come to you, and I come. You have bewitched me, and you know it."

A faint smile of triumph stole over Abner's features, and he leaned upon his rake to look at her more closely.

"So you acknowledge my power," he said. "It is true, Faith. Do you remember what I told you, weeks ago?"

"You will never bring me to it thus," replied Faith. "You may make me your slave, but you will make me hate you. You have been to me a valued friend, Abner, since we were children together. I don't know what you have done to me. I don't know what strange power you have acquired, but my will is no longer my own. Some spell has been cast upon me, and I know that it is you who are my master. Abner, if you would not have me your enemy, release me."

"Faith," he said, fixing his eye steadily upon her, "I would not for the world cause you a moment's pain in a matter less dear to my heart. I will release you on one condition. Love me."

She threw her arms about his neck with a despairing cry.

"I love you," she said, "and I hate you. If I become your wife, my love shall be the love of a serpent. I warn you of your own danger. Now let me go."

Abner looked down into Faith's face, as it lay upon his breast, and marked how pale it was. He sadly unclasped her white arms from about his neck, and held both her hands in his, while into his own countenance there came a look which betokened a mental struggle beneath the surface, most terrible in its intensity. If he resigned his claim upon her now, his power was gone forever. Hitherto he had looked only upon his own side of the problem, and at this moment a sense of his own selfishness came upon his inward vision and proceeded to do pitched battle with his love for Faith. At this very instant he possessed her. Did he love her well enough to lose her of his own volition? Could he drive her from him, for her own sake, and so stifle forever, with his own hand, the hope which still filled his heart? These were the questions which racked his brain as he looked down into Faith's beseeching eyes, and in them read his answer. It was love that conquered.

"Go, Faith!" he said. "You shall be free henceforth. Dear as you are to me, I will win you fairly or not at all."

Did Abner Markham guess, as the blue eyes were turned to him in gratitude, that Faith was half won already?

Faith herself did not dream of such a thing, but she went home and sat down to think it over and to surprise herself in making excuses for Abner. Had she possessed this wondrous strength of will, would she have used it less cruelly than he? she wondered. She doubted it. If his love for her was really such as to cause him to renounce its very object, rather than by ignoble means to gain the end he sought, was not the love of such man a pearl of too great price to relinquish hastily? She hardly knew. He was not her ideal hero, but she half-questioned whether, for that reason, he were any less heroic.

She might have ended in marrying him, after all, were it not that at this most critical juncture of Abner's destiny there appeared upon the scene a new actor, in the shape of one of Faith's metropolitan admirers, who came, as he elegantly but not very lucidly expressed it, "to visit the humming-bird in her native wilds," meaning, perhaps, that he came to see how Faith looked at home. Jack Ellersly was a formidable rival to Abner. He could make French quotations glibly, read poetic extracts neatly, and the fact that he came from the city covered up whatever mental or moral deficiencies he possessed, and enthroned him as a prime favorite among the Willowville girls. With Jack's advent the green-eyed monster made sad havoc among the rustic gallants of the village, but Ellersly had no intention of meddling in their affairs. It was Faith who had enchained him, and it was Faith whom he had journeyed all this distance to woo.

And silly little Faith, who would have accepted Jack without question before her adventure upon the mountain, now trembles with apprehension lest he should ask her to marry him. She was pleased with the attention, but she was not ready to commit herself beyond recall as yet. She could look across the pew in church and see Abner's weary face watching herself and Jack with a look of pain so keen that her heart would be filled with pity for him. She could see him stop his work to gaze after her as she passed down the road, with Ellersly holding her basket or her parasol, or helping her through the bars, or bestowing upon her a thousand of those little attentions which he knew so well how to use with advantage, and of which Abner understood nothing. And Faith appreciated the sacrifice, and knew that, though Abner suffered in silence, he suffered none the less acutely.

One Sunday evening, when it seemed to Abner that matters between Ellersly and Faith must be approaching a crisis, he stood upon the steps of the village church waiting for them to come out. A new look in Ellersly's eyes, as he stood for a moment in the light which streamed from the doorway out into the night, crushed whatever lingering hope there still remained in Abner's heart. It was a look of conscious triumph—of a certainty of victory—a look which to Abner was a deathblow to all his chance of winning Faith forever. He leaned against the churchyard fence, among the shadows, and wrung his hands hard together. With one word he knew that he could wrest the prize from this man's grasp even now. A slight exercise of the boundless power which he possessed over Faith's whole being would give her to him for life. Should the word be spoken? Could he stand despairingly by and let the woman, who was to him as his very life, be taken from his bosom without lifting a hand in defence of his own great love for her? No, no! Back through the long years which they had passed together since the golden days of childhood, back over the dark waters of Time, which had parted him from the sunny shores which her presence made glorious, his heart called to her with a despairing cry. Not yet! not yet! He could not throw himself upon a sword, even though Faith's hand held it, and the words which, in the anguish of his heart, he had spoken to himself, found utterance on his lips. He fixed his eye upon her and called to her softly from out of the darkness:

"Faith! Come to me!"

He knew that she could not see him, but he saw her leave Ellersly's side and step hesitatingly towards him. And as Abner stood quietly awaiting her approach, he held with one hand tightly to the pickets of the fence, and with the other beckoned to her. With uncertain step she came across the churchyard, peering anxiously into the darkness.

"Abner! It is you. Where are you?"

The opening of a window-blind in the church let loose a stream of light across the churchyard, reaching, in a narrow, luminous lane, to where Abner stood. As she slowly advanced towards him, down this narrow path between the tombstones, she seemed to Abner as a spirit from another world, surrounded by the radiant halo of her own celestial glory. But her features wore a look so sad and reproachful that Abner's beckoning hand fell powerless at his side.

"No, no, Faith," he cried. "Go back, go back—I have not kept my word. I am not worthy of you. My heart may break, but you shall be spared."

"Abner!"

"He loves you," said Abner, waving her back from him with both hands. "See! Ellersly is waiting for you. He, at least, has won you honorably."

He moved slowly away among the graves, while Faith stood where she had first halted, at the end of the radiant lane whose golden walls commenced at the window of the church.

"Farewell, Faith!"

Poor Faith Wild's heart came up to her throat in a convulsive gasp. There was something more than heroic in this man, who could thus, through love, resign a victory that was already his own, rather than gain the battle with dishonor. At that moment there came to her a consciousness which made her whole frame tremble and her heart turn cold as ice—a consciousness that if Abner Markham went out from her presence now, all life would be to her but as a living death. Back to her from the outer darkness came his voice, calling softly in tones which trembled with the sadness of a last farewell. He was leaving her and she felt that it was forever.

"Abner! Abner!"

He stopped and partly turned towards her. She came slowly to him and twined her arms about his neck.

"The victory is yours," she whispered. "I rebel no more."

With a strange light glittering in his eyes, he placed his hands upon her shoulders and held her from him.

"Let me understand you," he said, quickly.

"Is this because you pity me?"

She looked into his face and smiled upon him through her tears.

"I have loved you all my life," she said.

THE FALLING SNOW.

BY F. M. CREEKBAUM.

How beautifully falls the snow!
Like heavenly blessings in disguise;
Like angel messages from the skies
To mourning ones below!
It falleth so soft and slow.

Down through the ambient air,
Like rifted shreds of the Milky Way,
The beautiful flakes forever stray,
As pure as an infant's prayer,
Unsullied by sin or care.

They say it is cold and chill,
But I feel it not, for I only see
The beautiful bloom on shrub and tree,
And the robe on the distant hill,
So waveless, and white, and still.

It falls with a gentle moan
That spreads a softness over the breast,
That lulls the storms of passion to rest
And maketh the heart its own,
Like far, faint music's tone.

As the cooing of some far dove
That floats at eve o'er the twilight plain,
It comes in its sweetness, a holy strain,
Awaking the soul to love
For the pure and the holy above.

Sweet dreams of the long ago!
When a form of gladness would softly glide,
With fairy-like gentleness to my side,
To gaze at the falling snow,
Flecking the earth below.

And the snow is falling now!
I list to its music, but listen alone,
O where, with thy gladness and silvery tone,
My beautiful one, art thou?
With thy fair and radiant brow!

Where the snow lieth smooth and even,
Neath her waveless pall she taketh her rest;
With her white hands clasped on her pulseless breast,
And her spirit far up in heaven—
The high and holy heaven.

THE HAUNTED HOUSE AT WICKLOW.

BY ARTHUR L. MESERVE.

WHY I left the filthy and gloomy office of Messrs. Bite & Tear, "Attorneys and Counselors at Law," as their legend read, and where I had acted in the capacity of clerk for the past dozen years, was for a two-fold reason. The first was, my health was beginning to fail, from too close application to my business, and the old doctor, who had been in our family for years, declared that I must have country air, and plenty of it, before I could hope to be better; and the other was, I wanted to pay a visit to my old friend and chum at school, Tom Jones, whom I had seen but once since I had entered the employ of Messrs. Bite & Tear. These reasons being deemed sufficient by my employers, I was granted a leave of absence for a couple of months, and throwing together a modest amount of apparel I sallied forth for the depot, and was soon whirling along towards the place of my destination.

I had learned that the train did not run nearer to Wicklow than half a score of miles; but I was told, on board, that I should find a conveyance at the little wayside station which would take me there, and therefore I felt somewhat disappointed, when I stepped on the lonely, unsheltered platform, to find that I was monarch of all I surveyed, there not being a road, or a human habitation in sight.

A cross-road led away into what seemed to be the heart of a wilderness, but which one to take, the right or the left, was more than I could possibly conjecture. In my uncertainty and doubt, I blamed myself for not having written Tom to meet me at the station, as he would gladly have done, but then I wanted to take him by surprise. In one thing I had succeeded, and that was in surprising myself, for I had not the least idea that such a wild, wilderness-looking place could be found before the end of a day's ride from the Hub.

I was just on the point of adopting that method which all lost travellers are supposed to put in practice, that of setting up a stick and bending my steps in the direction which it fell, when, much to my relief, I heard the clatter of wheels, and a loud voice, apparently addressed to the beast its owner was driving, and in a moment more a rough-looking team appeared coming down the road, and in a little time it had driven round to the platform with a flourish.

"Going to Wicklow?" he asked, as he took me in at a glance, and picked up the small mail-bag, which, up to this time, had been lying all unnoticed at my feet.

I replied in the affirmative.

"Get aboard, then, ahnt got no time to lose. Most half an hour behind time, and Old Mail-keys, at Wicklow, will be as mad as a hornet if I'm late. Anybody would think he was post-master general by the airs he puts on."

I meekly obeyed this rather imperative summons, took my place on the seat with him, and away we went towards Wicklow at a round pace.

The country was wild nearly all the way there, and my companion was by no means communicative, answering my questions by the shortest possible answers. Once only did he seem inclined to open his mouth, and that was when our journey was nearly over, and my attention had been attracted by an old, dilapidated and apparently deserted house, standing in a dark grove of cedars a little back from the roadside. I inquired who lived there, and he replied, with a sharp look in my face:

"Nobody."

"Why not?"

"It's haunted."

"By what?"

"A ghost, to be sure," he answered, with another glance into my face.

"Of whom?" I went on.

"Of a man who was murdered there ten years ago, or thereabouts."

"Why does he walk?" was my next question.

My driver looked at me as though my question astonished him.

"What makes ghosts come back anyway?" he said, answering my question by asking another.

"I don't believe they do," I answered. "But why do people hereabouts say this house is haunted?"

"Because of the lights and noises seen and heard here on dark nights, and of the blood-stain on the kitchen floor."

"Where the former owner of the house was killed?"

"Yes."

"What of it? Anything more than a dark stain, as is usually the case where human blood is spilt upon wood?"

"Yes, much more. On certain nights, when the ghost walks, and also during the day before, the dark stains upon the floor turn to a blood-red, as though blood had been but just spilt there."

"That can hardly be. People who think they witness this miracle have to draw largely on their imagination, and allow their eyes to deceive them."

"There is no chance for your being deceived. It is there as plain as the nose on your face. But yonder is Wicklow."

He pointed to the village lying some half mile away on a slight elevation. This turned the topic of our conversation, and the haunted house was not again recurred to.

I gave Tom a genuine surprise, as I had intended to, and he was glad to see me, as I knew he would be.

One day I said to him, the thought suddenly occurring to my mind:

"What is it, Tom, about that haunted house over yonder? The driver told me something about it the other day as we came along."

My friend looked grave.

"I hardly know what to tell you," he said. "People that live over yonder say that the house is haunted, and I must confess that I have seen things there that I cannot account for."

"You, Tom?"

"Yes, I myself. You may think that I am foolish and smile if you will, but I have seen things there that cannot rationally be explained."

"What are they, Tom?"

"Probably the same as the driver told you, though I have seen none of the lights or heard the sounds; but I have seen the blood-stain when it was almost as dark as ink, and then again when it was a light crimson—like fresh blood. How this should be I doubt if you can explain."

I could not. The most I could do was to say that he must be mistaken. That his eyes had played him false, and that the change in the blood-stain was owing to the manner in which the light fell upon it. But he would not be convinced; neither would I.

One morning Tom was called away. He was going to a town some twenty miles distant, and would not return until late in the night, perhaps not until the next day. He invited me to go with him, but I declined. I had a project of my own on foot. I meant to pay a visit to the haunted house, and I did not want Tom to know of it. So his absence was the chance I coveted.

Tom took an early start, but I did not; I had less than a mile and a half to go, and I was in no hurry. So I lingered about the house, making company for Tom's mother until nearly the middle of the forenoon. Then I took down Tom's rifle, and, with the remark that I was going out shooting for an hour or two, I left the house.

I promised to be back by noon, in season for dinner, so, once out of sight of the window where I had left Tom's mother sewing, I increased my pace to a smart walk, and in a half hour's time I stood in front of, and curiously contemplating, the haunted house.

There was nothing very peculiar about it to distinguish it from other old houses that had been deserted for a number of years. It had the same lonesome, weather-beaten, deserted appearance that all such old buildings have, and as there was no one to stay the ravages of time, it was fast going to decay. Beneath the eaves the swallows had built their nests, and were flying busily to and fro in the sunlight. They, at least, were not afraid of the blood-stain, or the ghostly sights and sounds that came sometimes from within.

The front door was fastened, so I could not effect an entrance there, and I clambered over a dilapidated fence and went round to the backside, in search of another entrance. Here I found one, and the door, instead of being fastened, I found standing open a foot or more.

I may as well confess that I paused for a moment before I went in. I may as well, also, own up, that I caught myself listening to catch some sound that might come from within. But all was as still as death; so I pushed open the door and entered.

I found myself in a sort of back hall, or entry, from which a door opened upon either side. One of these rooms, I reasoned, must be the kitchen, and in it I should find the token of the terrible deed which had helped give the house its bad repute.

I turned to the left, and pushed open the door. A glance about the room showed me that it was the kitchen. So I was standing in the room where a murder had been committed, in the years that had passed.

I must confess that I did not give the surroundings more than a passing glance. My eyes, almost in spite of myself, I found were sweeping the floor, and they were not long in resting upon the blood-stain. There it was, about half way from the broad open fireplace to the sink on the opposite side of the room, and, what was more, it was of a blood-red, as though the life fluid had been spilled there ten minutes before.

This I had not expected, notwithstanding the story which Tom had told. I did not believe that the blood-stain could change its color, but here was the proof right before my eyes. I knew that it could not have retained it from the first; therefore what could it mean? What I had before learned now flashed upon my mind. The blood-stain turned only to a crimson when there was to be a new manifestation. To-night, then, the ghost would walk again.

Leaving the kitchen, and the stain, which would rivet my eyes in spite of all that I could do, I walked over the rest of the house. But I made no new discoveries there. To all appearances the house had not been disturbed since the family of the murdered man moved out of it. After examining every room, I ventured down into the cellar. I will here acknowledge that I had hesitated a moment before doing so, but I went, and there I made a discovery.

Near where the stairs descended there was an angle in the wall, and near it a cellar window, and it chanced, at this time of day, the sunlight fell through it, and rested on the earth behind the step, and there it revealed an object which at once attracted my attention. It was nothing more or less than a tin basin half full of newly-mixed red paint!

In a moment light flashed upon my mind, and I sprang up the steps two at a time, and rushed straight for the blood-stain, where I knelt down and drew my hand across it, an act which I would not have done ten minutes before. I raised my hand, and saw that it was stained by some red substance. It was not the gore of the murdered man that lay thereon; but red paint, like that in the basin below stairs.

In a moment the trick was all plain to me. Ghosts would have no need of this device, but human beings might. Whenever the old stain was repainted, then some sort of a band assembled there, who, for reasons of their own, did not care to have company, or too much light thrown upon their operations; hence this device of theirs which had proved so efficacious.

I was not long in making up my mind to solve this mystery, which had puzzled the good people of Wicklow so long. I would pass the night there and see what it brought forth.

A glance at my watch showed me that it was nearly twelve, and that Tom's mother would soon have dinner in readiness, for the good woman would have considered it almost the unpardonable sin if the noontide repast was not ready when the "sun was square in the window," as she always went by that when it was fair.

When I got back, minus game, the good woman rallied me somewhat on my want of luck; and then I told her of my visit to the haunted house, but not of the discoveries I had made there. This part I kept to myself, as did I, also, the determination I had formed of spending the night there. When at sunset I imparted this information to her, the good woman received it almost with alacrity, and begged me not to do it, but I answered her that my mind was fully made up on this point, and begged her not to impart my intentions to any one unless it was Tom, should he return. This she promised, and as soon as the sun went down I set out upon my self-imposed task.

When I arrived at the deserted house I found everything quiet, and as I had left it; and, entering the kitchen, I stowed myself away in a small closet opening therefrom, the door of which I left open a little way, so that I could command a view of the door by which I had entered, and also of that which led to the cellar beneath. Thus ensconced, I waited, with what patience I could, for any development which might take place.

Slowly the minutes dragged themselves along. An hour went by, and still all was as silent as death. Another hour was well told, and then I began to grow impatient. Would those for whom I was looking never come? At last I heard a footfall outside the door. Instinctively I placed my hand upon the revolver I carried in my pocket. Would I have occasion to use it?

The footstep sounded closer, and at last it was on the threshold. The door was pushed open, and a footfall sounded in the entry. Then there came another, and I was aware that two men were standing in the room.

I heard them moving along the floor, and then the scratching of a match. It gave a promise of burning, and then went out, and an impatient voice exclaimed:

"D—n the match. Give me another, Jim, this is gone out."

The voice sounded familiar. Surely I had heard it since I had come to Wicklow; but where I could not bring to mind.

The next match did its duty, and communicated its blaze to the candle which one of the men held, and in a little time it was burning clearly, diffusing a bright light about the apartment. It revealed the faces of the two men to me and as I gazed upon one of them, I was no longer in doubt as to where I had heard his voice before. It was the driver of the express wagon who had taken me from the depot, and who had first given me the history of the house in which we now stood. It was he who had addressed his companion as "Jim," and now they both moved along to the spot which had possessed such fascination in my eyes until I had solved the mystery connected with it.

Jim held the candle above it, moving it to and fro, but taking care to shade the blaze with his hand, so that it might not shine out too brightly through the windows.

"Do you know whether any one has been here to-day, Sam?" asked the one who had not before spoken.

"Yes, one sure; that chap I brought over from the depot t'other day was in here this forenoon."

I gave a start of surprise. How did he know this? Had my movements been watched, and, if so, did they not know that I was even then secreted somewhere about the house?

"He here! Then he must be a detective, as we thought he was, in the first place," said the other, in evident alarm.

"No, I don't think he is," returned my driver. "I've made all sorts of inquiries, and I have found that he is really an old friend of Tom Jones's, and that prying his nose into other folks' affairs aint in his line; but if he makes it so, he had better not have come to Wicklow, that's all."

"So I say," replied the other, emphatically; "we've too good a thing here to be blown on if we can help it."

"You are right, there, Jim; but let us go down. The rest of the boys will be along soon."

I held my breath as the two villains passed along to the cellar door, which I had left standing open, and descended the stairs leaving the old kitchen again in total darkness.

What was their errand below? I asked myself this question, and at once resolved that I would find out if possible. Noiselessly I glided out from the closet and felt my way along to the cellar door, where I paused and listened. A faint light came up from below, and the hum of distant voices.

Silently I descended the stairs. When I reached the bottom I found myself in total darkness. The light had disappeared, and the hum of voices had ceased.

What had become of them? It seemed as though the earth had opened and swallowed them up.

Suddenly I heard a sound above my head; others of the gang were crossing the kitchen floor towards the entrance to the cellar, and in a moment more they would be coming down upon me.

Hastily I crept in beneath the stairs, knocking over the basin of paint, with one hand and dashing its contents over my hands and face. Once under the stairs there was plenty of room, and I drew myself up into as small a compass as possible against the wall, and with my hand upon my revolver waited for what the next minutes would bring forth.

Tramp, tramp, above my head, sounded the footsteps, and by them I was assured that three more had entered the cellar, and were groping their way about in the darkness. Suddenly a voice exclaimed impatiently:

"Why don't the boys show that light? I shall break my neck over something that may be lying about here."

"Give the signal and they will show it!" said another.

A sharp, short whistle cut the air like a knife, and it had not died away before a door in the wall, which had escaped my notice on my previous visit, was thrown open and a bright light flashed out, revealing a room of considerable dimensions beyond, in which were tables and benches ranged about. The light was too brilliant to proceed from a tallow candle, for it lighted up the cellar without, revealing the forms of the three men distinctly, and had either of them chanced to have turned their heads they must have seen me crouching beneath the stairs. But as luck would have it they did not, but passed at once into the further apartment, closing the door behind them, leaving me in darkness more profound than before.

Thrice was this repeated, and I had seen ten men enter the secret chamber. Then came a long interval, which convinced me, at last, that they had all arrived who would be there that night. I reflected upon what should be my next move.

To attempt to pry any further into their mysteries that night, I thought, would avail me nothing and it might get me into difficulties. I had learned enough already to forever lay the ghost in the haunted house; and to bring a pack of villains to justice. That they were a gang of base coiners, or counterfeiters, I had not the least doubt, and I felt that it would be my duty to unearth them to the authorities.

I felt considerable interest in the discoveries I had made, and I knew that I should be the lion of Wicklow for the next seven days at least. People would say to one another:

"There goes the man who laid the ghost," and I should also be an object of interest to the young ladies in the church the next Sabbath. At that moment I felt myself quite a hero, but it suddenly occurred to me that I should remember the old adage "not to crow until you are out of the woods." I had forgotten that.

I now came back to my immediate surroundings, and reflected on what I should do next. Should I remain where I was, and see them emerge from their den and take their departure, or should I leave at once, and return to Tom's mother, while the coast was clear?

I decided upon the latter, and was about to crawl out from my hiding-place, when I heard footsteps again in the kitchen. More of them were coming, so I shrank back into my corner to witness their descent.

The footsteps went round the room and at last came to the cellar door, where they paused for a moment, while a light, as from a lantern, flashed down the stairs. Then the footsteps began slowly to descend. I counted them one by one until they reached the bottom, and the new-comer stood close to, but with his back towards me. In one hand he carried a common lantern, and as he moved away from the foot of the stairs, I thought that his figure looked very familiar.

He held the lantern up as he went round, and from his motions I could not help deciding that he was a stranger to the spot, and not a member of the gang beyond the wall. At last his steps brought him close to the door, through which I had seen the members of the gang pass, and at this instant his face was turned by chance for a moment towards me, and I plainly saw his features. It was my friend, Tom Jones.

I hardly checked myself in time to prevent giving utterance to an exclamation of surprise at beholding him, for I had not supposed that he had returned. But here he was in the flesh, and I knew his errand at once. His mother had told him where I had gone, and he had come in search of me.

I was about to call out to him in a low tone, but before I could do so he had seen the door, and, evidently with the intention of entering, he placed his hand upon the latch and finding it fastened he gave it a violent shake. It produced no result, so he gave it another, and the next moment it flew open, revealing nothing but a dark void beyond.

Taking a step forward, despite the low warning I gave him, he held his lantern out, that its light might show his way, but in a moment more it was dashed from his hands and all was total darkness.

"Villains, unhand me," I heard Tom cry; then there was a short struggle, followed by a blow and a heavy fall, and then all was still.

Poor Tom! Had they taken his life, and I close by, without lifting a hand to prevent it? I heard the door shut to with a clang, and then all was still.

What should I do? Should I fly to his assistance, and with my simple arm combat the whole gang and try to save his life? or should I make the best of my way out of the accursed spot, and run to the village and give the alarm? For a moment I was undecided. Either way it seemed that Tom's life was at stake.

At last I formed the resolution to go for help, and was just edging my way out from beneath the stairs, when the door of the secret apartment was again thrown open, and the brilliant light which I had seen before flashed out.

Hastily I fell back against the wall, fearing that I should be discovered; and there I lay holding my breath, while three or four of the gang went peering about the cellar and up through the house seeking for any companions which Tom might have brought with him. At last they were apparently satisfied that he came alone, and returned to their den, leaving me undiscovered.

No sooner was the door shut, than, having changed my mind as to the course of procedure, I emerged from my hiding-place, and crept noiselessly up the stairs, across the kitchen, out into the open air.

Here, in the thick shrubbery which grew close to the house, I secreted myself, and there remained motionless, until I counted as many leave the house as I had seen enter the cellar. Then when I had given them a chance to get well clear of the premises, I reentered the house, and hastened down to the cellar to hear if possible the fate of Tom. I carried with me a rusty iron bar which I had stumbled upon outside, with which I meant to break in the door, could I not open it in any other manner.

Feeling my way to the door, which I tried and found securely fastened, I placed my ear to the crevice and listened intently. At first I heard nothing, and then a sound fell upon my ear which I was sure was a groan.

"Tom," I cried, through the crevice; "you are not dead, I hope?"

Another groan and then a faint voice said: "Not quite; can't you get to me?"

My only answer was a blow upon the door with that bar, another and another I dealt upon it; till at last the bolt was broken, the door swung back, and I rushed into the secret chamber.

"Tom, where are you?" I cried.

"Here," said a voice, at my feet; and reaching down I encountered the face of Tom, which in another moment I should have put my foot on.

"Thank God that you are alive, Tom; but are you much hurt?" I cried, searching for his hand, that I might give it a friendly pressure.

"Some, I am afraid; my head don't feel just right yet. You must find my hand there. The villains have fastened them behind me, and my legs are bound too."

"The rascals! but they shall suffer for this," I said, as with my pocket-knife I set Tom free, and then helped him upon his feet, where for a minute he was unable to stand alone, his head was so dizzy.

"Lead me out of this room. The air is stifling. Get me out beneath the stars and I shall feel better."

"Lean on me and I will soon get you there, Tom," I replied; and, half-supporting him, I led him out through the cellar, up over the stairs, through the kitchen, and so had him out where the cool air could bathe his brow and bring him fairly to himself again.

In a little time he had in a measure recovered his strength, and we had set out for home.

"Did you recognize any of them, Tom?" I said, as we went along.

"No, not one," he replied. "It was not light enough."

"Why did they bind your hand and foot? Do you remember what they said about it?"

"Yes, plainly. They tried to make me take a horrid oath that I would never reveal what I had discovered of their hiding-place, but I refused to do it. Then they told me that I should never leave the place alive until I had taken the oath, and that they would starve me to it, or to death. So they bound me and left me there till you came."

Then, in return, I told him of what I had witnessed, and by that time we were at his mother's.

It was past midnight, and the good woman was fearfully frightened. Tom had come home sooner than he had promised, and had gone at once to the haunted house for me. She had watched anxiously for our return, and when, at last, we did present ourselves, she was frightened more than ever. Tom's face and clothes were covered with blood, which had flowed from the wound in his head, while I presented an equally gory appearance on account of the red paint with which I was plentifully besprinkled.

Leaving Tom to acquaint his mother with the details of our adventures, I made my way to the village, and soon had the proper officers alert to their duty; for I knew if we wanted to make a haul we must do it before they would have a chance to return to see to their prisoner. Quietly we proceeded to the old house, and there found that which I had expected to find, namely, tools, plates and presses of a gang of counterfeiters, and a large amount of spurious currency, which they had all ready to send to their agents in various parts of the country.

It was near morning when we got round to call upon my old friend the driver, and it must be confessed that we somewhat surprised that worthy when we accommodated him with a pair of bracelets. When he saw me, he was convinced that I was in reality a detective, and that I already knew all; so he made a clean breast of it and implicated all of his companions, whereby we were enabled to secure the whole gang, and thus break up a combination which extended over a large area of territory to which no clue had before been obtained.

It was daylight when I got back to Tom's mother's, and I found that neither of them had been abed, so anxious were they to know how it all turned out, and when I had told my story they were of one mind, that I had done a good night's work, which conclusion I also coincided in.

I stayed in Wicklow until the villains had had their examination and been carried away to jail, and I was all the lion that I had imagined I should be. Old ladies would stop to look at me in the street, and so would the boys; but the young ladies, I must confess, though it hurts my vanity to do so, only gave me a look, and then their eyes followed some other better looking fellow who chanced to be going by.

I hear from Tom quite often now. He says the ghost no longer walks in the haunted house, and that the blood-stain retains its dark hue from one year's end to another. When it changes its spots again I shall make another trip to Wicklow.

FIVE LETTERS.

TRANSCRIBED BY MRS. M. A. DENISON.

LETTER FIRST.

DEAR CLARA:—Mrs. Alden made all the trouble, I think, in the affair you mentioned. You must have heard of Laura's marriage; it was very brilliant, took place in New York, but under the protest of Laura's mother. Mrs. Alden was a singular woman, always. After losing seven children, she reared Laura, who was her idol, of course. She never wanted her to marry; she was a very miser in the matter of affection. Besides, she had not been happy in her married life, and she naturally looked upon men as monsters. The idea of Laura's marriage was repugnant to her in every sense of the word.

But Laura loved young Lincoln; she met him at a picnic, and I think it was love at sight on both sides. He was an honorable young man—and possessed great personal beauty. Laura is a passionate creature, and she worshipped him with all the warmth of her fervid nature. I believe she truly loves him now.

Well, she married him, and Mrs. Alden was so miserable about it, that she was taken ill, and came near losing her life. At last she consented that Laura should accompany her husband to New York, stipulating that she should spend a certain part of the year with her daughter, during the winter, and that Laura must stay with her through the summer season.

It was a convenient arrangement, for Hadley is not far from the city, you know. Young Lincoln could drive back and forth in his own carriage, or take the cars.

The first winter passed agreeably with one exception; Mrs. Alden interfered too much with the business and pleasures of the young people. She had been accustomed to the supreme domineering of her own house, and could not give up her arbitrary love of rule. Her temper was not gentle, by any means. Laura did not see these things in the same light as her high-spirited husband did; she was accustomed to her mother's whims and caprices; he was not, and it made him uneasy and unhappy. He wanted a house, and Laura to himself. This yearning would not have been so strong if Mrs. Alden had exercised a little common sense. But though she had a beautifully furnished suite of apartments, she intruded her company on her daughter and son-in-law, so that naturally they felt some restraint in her presence. Finally, she took command of the cook, and even ventured, to young Lincoln's great surprise and indignation, to countermand his orders, merely offering the briefest apology.

Sometimes he expostulated, and then bitter blame was thrown upon him in the presence of Laura. He loved his wife most tenderly, but he could not bear too much, and when it came to this, that in every little matter of difference between Laura and his wife, Mrs. Alden interfered, always taking sides against him, he angrily declared that his wife must either part with her mother, or with him.

Then came confusion worse confounded. There was no calm friend to advise. Mrs. Alden went into fainting fits, and from that into hysterics. Laura wept passionately and accused her husband of wishing to kill her mamma. Then her mother left the house, and went to that of her brother, where she was taken ill again. Laura flew to her mother, who wept the tears of weakness and of anger, declared she should die without her child—that she was a poor, lonely widow with nobody to love her; that her darling's affections had been stolen from her, and much more of the same kind of nonsense.

What was Laura to do? She had not been trained to independence in matters of judgment, and I am sorry to say the wilful mother conquered. Laura wrote to her husband that she must, for the time at least, remain with her mother.

LETTER SECOND.

Laura's mother is dead; they have been expecting it for some time. The poor girl has no one to go to, for she has not heard from her husband since he went away six months ago. I sometimes think it is cruel of him not to write her.

The poor girl was wild with grief for a time, but she is calmer now.

Such suffering either exalts or debases; I think it exalts Laura. She has a sweet and noble beauty of countenance; with a different mother, she would have been a higher order of woman. As it is, trouble has changed her character, materially.

Last night Laura was with me when the young minister of the new church came over. He is just married; his bride is a lovely creature, exceedingly winning in speech and manner.

Laura's eyes filled as she witnessed their happiness. I knew of whom she was thinking.

After they had gone, for the first time she spoke to me of her husband. Poor thing! she has sacrificed much on the altar of filial love. She thinks she shall never see him again—that he has forgotten her. I am not so sure of that. I believe he loved her tenderly and truly, but there was no comfort at home, and she deliberately chose to go with her mother. It was a hard case—I confess it. And she is by herself too much, mourning over the past. She needs a motive.

Yesterday, I thought it might rouse her to witness a little suffering. So I drove to a miserable house on the outskirts of the town. The woman I called to see was dead.

"She'd bad news, ma'm, of her husband," said the person who was watching; "he was killed at sea, by a fall, and that ended her, miss; she died just on the stroke of twelve."

"And what's to be done for this dear little girl?" I asked, taking the miserably clad child on my knee. "See, Laura, dear, what a beautiful face she has."

"Sure she must go to the poor-us;" replied the woman, stolidly.

"No," said Laura, "at least not for the present. I will take charge of the poor little orphan, gladly. She will be company for me."

Now this is just the thing for Laura; it will save her, for it occupies her mind constantly. It is such a lovely little creature, too, with long lashes and soft brown eyes; and as grateful as she can be. And Laura will recover her good spirits, I am sure she will. I hailed the first smile this morning with real delight. And still she hears no tidings of her husband.

LETTER THIRD.

Our young pastor is doing a good work. The spirit of reform is coming to our village. Do you remember Dolly Day? Hers was a woful fall. Her mother died in consequence, for she was a proud woman, and since that time Dolly has shunned society. It is a curious place she has chosen for her abode—in a little ruined hut just within the shelter of the woods close by, and kept cleared, is a little grave—that of Dolly's unfortunate child. It died at its birth, and she lives in sight of it—a perpetual reminder.

We have seemed to forget her of late. Our minister's little wife heard of her, and off she posted, taking me for company. Dear little thing! she dreaded to go in, but she did, and came back delighted.

Her eyes sparkled as she told me of her success.

"At first you can't think how shy she was," she said, "but she looked neat, and so sad, so very sad. Finally I spoke of that little grave and then she broke down. I don't believe she has cried for years as she did to-day. And she told me all her sorrowful story, and wept and sobbed as if her heart was almost broken."

Well, the ending of the whole matter is, Dolly is a good Christian. She has come out humbly and meekly before all Israel and the sun, and nobody seems to cast her sin at her. Laura has a fearful temper, as I believe I have told you once before. Yesterday in my presence she gave way to it. Little Anna had displeased her, she was frightened, and perhaps willful.

"You are a wicked little thing," cried Laura, stamping with vexation. "I won't keep you, and nobody else will be willing to bear with your stubbornness and ugly temper. I don't care if somebody takes you away, this very day."

How much that was like her mother, I need not tell you. The child sobbed bitterly, and Laura was not prepared for what happened not long after.

I was at tea with Laura. The girl came in from the kitchen saying that a sailor wanted to see the lady of the house. He was asked into the sitting-room to wait; Anna was there with her doll. We all heard a glad scream.

"Papa, papa!" and hurried out to see our beautiful pet clinging to the neck of a great bearded sailor man.

So he had not fallen from the masthead as his poor wife heard.

Whether he will take the child or not we cannot tell; but Laura believes it is a judgment upon her.

LETTER FOURTH.

The sailor has gone to sea again, and left little Anna with Laura. He probably sees that it will be for his child's advantage. Laura grows more gentle every day, but still I can see that the old trouble wears upon her. She often speaks of her husband, but not to blame him.

"What could he do?" she asks, with tears in her beautiful eyes; "home was not home without me."

"Trust me, dear, you will hear from him, soon," I said.

"What makes you think so?" her face was eager.

"I feel it in my bones," I said, laughing; "that's all I can tell you."

A little later, Mr. Graves the minister came over here, wishing to see me alone. We went into our cool little back parlor. Feeling nervous, not knowing exactly why I was, I busied myself for a moment in thrusting the woodbine that peeped into the window, outside, and closing the blind. Then I sat down smiling at my own fears, opposite "our young friend," as Judge Story calls him.

"I hardly know in what way to approach the subject," he said, "but I believe I have found a clue to Mrs. Lincoln's husband."

I was instantly in a tremor of anxiety.

"Is he here?"

"No, not here, but at Leedsville, some ten miles from here. I was there yesterday, and was called in to see a sick man, who was thought to be dying."

"O!" I clasped my hands hard and felt my face grow pale.

"He was better, though, when I saw him, though very weak, indeed."

"And why should you think it was Mr. Lincoln?"

"I will tell you. I mentioned the name of our village."

"Do you know anything about Hadley?" he asked.

"I told him I was settled here."

"Are you acquainted with a widow Alden?" he further questioned me.

"I was," I said.

"You were?" with a long, painful glance.

"Yes, but she is dead. I attended her funeral several months ago."

"But her daughter—but Laura?" he almost gasped.

"She is still in the old place?"

"Happy?"

"Contented—but I should judge not happy," I said. "She feels keenly her husband's absence and long silence."

"His features worked a little, and he was silent. I tried to think of some way of alluding to the matter that occupied my thoughts, but could not take the initiative on so delicate a subject. I believe the gentleman is there under an assumed name, for gentleman he is, undoubtedly."

"He had not heard of Mrs. Alden's death, then?"

"I judge not, by his extreme emotion. He feels, doubtless, that he has been in error, and does not like to intrude himself upon her notice, before he can learn how she views his desertion. I presume he was coming on here, when he was taken ill. At one time, as I said, they thought him dying, and he requested to see a clergyman; I was called in, the proprietor of the house being acquainted with me."

"It must be dear Laura's husband," I said, joyfully. "I will tell her as gently as I can, and then I know what she will do."

So the minister went away.

LETTER FIFTH.

Well, here I have written nearly three sheets, and have not told you the principal items of news—good news, yet. The sailor, Anna's father, is dead. Poor man, he came to his death in the very way it was reported before; was it not singular? So the sweet child is an orphan.

You remember Judge Story, the good, kind "woman-hater," as he has been called. Well, he is at last going to the altar, like a lamb to the sacrifice. Methinks I hear you cry out with uplifted hands, "who will marry that eccentric, ugly old fellow?" Well, I will tell you—but, listen, I deny in toto your scandalous assertions. In the first place, the judge is only forty-two, and his affianced bride is all of thirty-eight. Can you guess who it is, now? Of course not, and you will never guess, so I will tell you her first name is Augusta, old-fashioned and trim. Her other name is—but you have divined it by this time. And now you know why I deny your assertion. To think I have lived thirty-eight years, to be married at last. But it's the way of the world, isn't it?

I have just come from Laura's. You never saw a happier couple than she and her husband, as cosy as birds in a nest, and they have adopted little Anna. I couldn't undertake to tell you how the reconciliation came about, only it did, and through the efforts of our good little minister.

There were tears, kisses, smiles, but no reproaches. They are very happy, and Laura is so altered that I do not think they will ever have any more trouble, for she puts a strict watch upon herself, a guard on her quick temper.

The judge is at the door. Homely—bless him! he's a beauty, and I say it if I should not—although he is marked a little with the small-pox, and there is just the slightest cast in his dear blue eyes. Well, good-by—I will let you know in time, so that you can come to the wedding. Yours, AUGUSTA.

 THE SIEGE OF THE LOG CABIN.

BY GEORGE H. COOMER.

"I HAVE been reading," said the old lady, "how Rose Bradwardine saw the three Highlanders lay dead at her father's door at Jully-Veolan, and the incident has set me to thinking of an episode of my own early days."

"O Aunt Ormand!" said Mabel—for we all called her "aunt," though she was no relative of ours—"do tell us of the Indians again! This is just the day and the scene for it; see how heavy the apple trees are with snow, and the stumps and the rocks look as if they might get up and walk about. I can imagine a warrior peering at us from behind the well-curb with the white flakes in his eagle quills!"

"Why, Bel! how romantic," said bright little Maud; "do you suppose those eagle quills would make your scalp come any easier? For my part, I believe an Indian is just an Indian—the romance writers put on the quills, or at best they are only partridge feathers!"

"Was the dark and bloody ground anything like the scene we now look upon?" asked Mabel; "for this is very rugged, and it seems wild enough to me."

"O no, my child," replied Mrs. Ormand,

"it was a level country, but the forest appeared to go on and on forever—an ocean of gnarled oaks and great towering pines. There were smooth, open spaces at intervals; yet, bordering the whole, and winding away, and standing like a wall against the sky, was the same prodigious growth of giants. In front of our house was a plain, beyond which were seen the treetops. It narrowed near the cabin, and the lines of forest meeting in our rear shut us within a triangle between the enormous walls.

"In the summer, this open space was beautiful with flowers, and all around the borders of the forest were scarlet and gold and azure fringes, composed of thousands upon thousands of starry blooms. But in the winter, one could have dreamed that we were hemmed about with phantoms. The great oak had his turrets and his warders, and beneath the swaying limbs what long, dim chambers of gloom! The whole Shawnee tribe might have been imagined standing or crouching with belt and hatchet close to our little cabin, when not a living thing was near—for there were all shapes in the forest that ever fancy drew.

"My mother was a nervous and timid woman, very lovely in face and form, and possessing a sweetness and sociability of temper which would have made her beloved in a civilized community; but she was utterly unfit for a life in the wilderness. True, she loved the flowers and the wild and beautiful scenery, but she had a horror of the Indians and panthers, and in the bitter days of winter she saw either the one or the other in every shape assumed by the fantastic snow. I, on the other hand, resembling my father, suffered little from anticipations of evil. The winter inspired me with strength of spirit, and the summer was a volume of whose pictures and songs I never tired. I had one brother, a little, blue-eyed child, who at the time of which I am about to speak was only three years old; and thus we four comprised our household. My sources of amusement were very different from yours—did you ever fire a gun, Mabel?"

"O goodness, no, Aunt Ormand! I should never expect to survive it."

"But I have," said Maud; "the mark of the bullet is on the old apple tree, yonder, only it is all covered with snow. It was Cousin Frank's gun, and how frightened he was because it stretched me flat on the grass. I declare, I don't see how an army escapes self-destruction. I should think the first fire would be fatal to all concerned."

"You did not hold it right," said Aunt Ormand, smiling; "you allowed it too great latitude to 'kick.' Now I, in the wild woods, was taught differently; I learned that the gun should be suffered to kill only at one end. Father would sometimes call me his 'little tom-boy,' when I begged him to let me practise with his rifle, yet he was pleased when he saw the bark fly from a tree-trunk before my ball, and still more so when I struck a mark he had made with his axe directly in the centre."

"I believe you would encourage that girl to go out on a panther hunt!" remarked my mother, laughing; for though she feared I would be harmed with the rifle, she was amused at my dexterity in shooting, and once or twice went with me to the trees while I pointed out the place where the bullet had ploughed along. But at last there came a time when the bullet did not plough along, but went straight into the tree, centering the mark at every fire.

"Who knows," said father, one day, in my hearing, "but this may turn to good? We are in the heart of a wilderness, where the rifle is the only law of those around us. In an Indian fight it would be better than a Latin grammar. But Margaret does not neglect her grammar either"—and I did not, Mabel, for mother taught me—"and if her uncommon beauty,"—I was young then, Mabel—"should win her a cultivated admirer, and she should find her home in a more polished community, she will not be unprepared; but should she continue to dwell in the wilds—should she be left alone upon occasion with little children around her, like Oscar here, would she not feel it a happy circumstance that her hand is no stranger to the rifle? That hand is no less beautiful, nor is her heart less feminine, than would be the case if she had never heard the whistling of a bullet and knew not how to send one to its mark."

"This expression, which father did not know that I had overheard, impressed me very strongly. I looked at little Oscar and thought of the Shawnees, and wished that I had a rifle of my own. My mother wrote a humorous account of my proficiency in marksmanship to my Uncle Arthur, her brother, with whom I was a great favorite; and shortly afterwards, upon the occasion of his making a journey to visit us, he surprised me with the present of the most handsomely finished rifle that I ever saw. He laughed heartily on presenting it, and I do believe that my face would almost have burned your hand; for I had never till then realized what a 'tom-boy' was."

"Uncle Arthur, however, seconding my father's views, told me that there was nothing in my woodland tastes to be ashamed of. 'A shot over your father's shoulder when his gun was empty, might make one the less Shawnee,' he said, 'and be very opportune.' I tried my skill in his presence, as he insisted that I should do. My father watched me, while mother laughed merrily, and little Oscar stood wondering in the doorway."

"Not a long aim!" cried Uncle Arthur, "remember that! Quick and decisive! Never let your gun stop—bring it steadily up, and the instant it covers the mark, fire!"

"Father had often told me the same thing. 'Ping!' sang the bullet, and running forward, how my heart thrilled to see a small round hole in the bull's eye on the oak! From that moment my mortification passed away. Did not Uncle Arthur know well enough that I was no amazon, no wild, masculine, strong-minded creature that passed for a woman?"

Surely he did. I was only a woodland girl who could fire a rifle. I looked in the glass to see if I had grown masculine—I examined my own tastes and fancies, and knew that I had all a girl's heart. Then I felt at ease upon the subject; for I have no sympathy with a woman who is almost a man.

"After a pleasant sojourn at our cabin, Uncle Arthur departed, and not long subsequent, father was obliged to leave home on business relating to some property of his. It was the first time he had ever left us, and nothing but the most urgent necessity constrained him to do so; for it was now winter, and the wilderness lay about us like a great, rugged ocean, across which no aid could reach us in the day of need. Besides, we had learned that the Shawnees had become more than usually troublesome. Always a warlike people, whose feats of arms were as old as tradition itself, they had not yet ceased to be the terror of the 'dark and bloody ground.' Father paused long at the door.

"'Remain in the house,' he said, 'there will be nothing to call you out. The cattle can drink at the spring, for it never freezes, and they can go in and out of the stable at pleasure. There is sufficient hay within their reach, and you need not attend to them at all.'

"He then caught up Oscar. It was hard to turn from the door! I knew that he was thinking of the Shawnees.

"'Do not be troubled about the Indians,' he said, 'they are a long way off. But, Marge,' he added, as we passed a moment from mother's hearing—if they should come, remember your rifle. You are a brave girl, but they might confuse and frighten you. Think them only targets such as you have been used to firing at. But what am I saying? Was there a probability of attack, I would not leave you here alone for the whole continent of North America.'

"At last he put down little Oscar and strode away; but it was a dreadfully sad parting. Love is stronger in woods than cities; home is dearer, and sorrow is a thousand times more piercing—like a bitter wind from which there is no shelter.

"What a gloomy night succeeded! Oscar slept sweetly, as if a thousand friends were near, but mother and I caught only fitful naps. We had no especial reason for supposing that the Indians would molest us, yet mother, as I have said, was always nervous, and I could not help in some degree feeling the influence of her terror as one might feel the edge of a shadow. Nor was this all; in my short and fitful slumbers, I seemed to see moccasin trails winding all about in the snow, and Indians that changed to wolves, and wolves that changed to Indians. At last, while wide awake, as much so as at this moment, I experienced a most singular sensation, as if I were two persons, the one troubled, tired and affrighted, hemmed about with darkness and knowing nothing about the future; the other, calm and confident, a second self, risen above the first, and buoyed up by inspiration. It was a mirage of the soul, and in that clear moment of intuitive perception, I knew the work that was before me. How or why I knew, I did not ask. I had seen nothing; but still the impression amounted to an absolute certainty. I rose on my elbow and looked long at dear little Oscar. I thought of my father, far away, anxious and troubled for his little cherub, and worshipping every lock of his bright head. Mother was not sleeping; why should she not know it at once and brace her mind for the reality?

"'Mother,' I said, 'nothing will molest us to-night; but to-morrow it will snow, and then—'

"'What then, my child? and why do you think it will snow? there is no appearance of a storm.'

"'I know there is not at present, mother; the sky is clear and bright; but to-morrow it will snow, and after the snow begins we must fight for our lives. The Shawnees are coming!'

"Mother thought I had been dreaming, but I was sure it would snow, and equally sure that blankets and scalp-locks and tawny faces would steal all about us under the feathery flakes—for the broad daylight and a snow-storm were as plainly marked in my impression as the attack itself—yet I do not believe in visions, nor was this anything more than a presentiment, struck by a type upon the soul.

"Morning came—a remarkably pleasant one for winter—and as the sun flashed over the great wall of trees, mother's spirits rose accordingly. Soon, however, a dark, harl, iron-like cloud stretched all along the east; the whole sky was presently hidden, and just before noon large flakes of snow came fluttering down. In a few minutes they darkened the air; and we might have imagined ourselves at the bottom of an immense ocean, from whose billows out of sight, were sinking down to us myriads upon myriads of foam-white pearls. Often I took up the rifle which Uncle Arthur had given me, and aimed it at various objects, so fearful was I that my hand might forget its cunning or my eye lose something of its hair-breadth steadiness. But O, what a feeble hope I had! The snow had come—the Indians were coming—this was all I knew. The result was hidden. And what was I? A girl of sixteen! Was I to combat, rifle in hand, the terrible braves of the dark and bloody ground? Somehow the very touch of my rifle reassured me when I trembled. I knew that a bolt of death lay within that iron tube, and for my father's sake, for my mother's sake, for little Oscar's sake—I could send it home!

"I had a vague impression that the Indians would endeavor to entice us from the house. It seemed to me that I had dreamed something of the kind. They could not know that father was absent, and to draw him out of his fortress by stratagem would give them an easy victory. Mother still hoped they would not come.

"It would have snowed just the same," she said, "if you had not felt the impression. That was only a coincidence, and the rest may not be verified."

"And there would have been famine in Egypt, if Pharaoh had not dreamed of the lean kine," I replied. "Hark! what was that? A wolf?"

"A snarling yelp, apparently of pain, was followed by a long and dismal howl. Then came the yelp and snarl once more, succeeded as at first by the howling. Climbing to one of the high, small windows, I peered through the thick storm with a kind of misgiving that this hideous sound might be only the prelude to voices still more terrible—for wolves and Indians had been all the morning mixed in my imagination.

"There is a wolf in one of father's traps!" I cried. "I can just catch a glimpse of him behind the trees. If father was here, he would shoot the poor creature at once and end his suffering."

"At the moment the words left my lips, I started and my heart gave a suffocating flutter. The storm was so very thick that I could not see distinctly, but my eyes were quick to catch the least suspicious sign. I stepped hastily down from the window, caught up my rifle, and then convulsively embracing little Oscar, kissed his beautiful baby lips. In a moment more, I was in the loft of the cabin, and had removed the fastening from a loophole that was made fronting the wolf trap.

"You cannot hit him," said mother from below. "I would not try, Margaret; there is so little of him in sight, and the storm is so thick."

"O mother!" I said—but then I stopped. She would know soon enough. A wolf, indeed! O, that it were nothing worse! I dropped on one knee by the loophole. At intervals, a small portion of the creature would appear in sight, as it seemed to struggle behind a huge log, and then it would entirely vanish.

"No, no," my heart said silently and with a kind of fierceness, "your fine trickery shall not shield you. How glad I am that father is away; he would have rushed out at once, and it would have been so dreadful! There, there—O, if my heart would stop beating so! My hand trembles! A quick aim, father says—mind the 'sights,' be sure they are right; but, once right, fire! There he is again!"

"It seemed to me that he must see the muzzle of the gun as I placed it in the loophole—that he must hear my heart beat. My thumb was on the hammer—'click!' it sprang back. 'There, there! that must be the top of his head! Now he lifts it a little! Quick, now! O, if he will stay just so!' I clapped my face to the rifle and rose with the breech quickly but steadily, while the muzzle rested in the loophole. My hands so trembled that I could hardly have held it an instant on the mark; but it seemed as if a voice shot through my brain, as for a fraction of a second the two 'sights' hid the object—pull!"

"The crack of my rifle resounded through the cabin. Throwing it down, I pressed my face to the loophole.

"O mother! mother!" I cried, "I have killed him! It is a great, tall Indian in a wolf-skin, and he has dropped on the snow! There are others behind the trees. They would have killed father had he been here. They must have found the trap, and then this stratagem occurred to them. For Heaven's sake, mother, be strong! Yes, yes, I knew they would yell! Only quiet Oscar and keep him where the bullets cannot hit him! I know it is awful, but they always yell so. Don't cry, Oscar, they cannot get you! Margie will fight them, and they will all run away!"

"Run away! O, that I could have believed it! The braves who had discomfited Harnmar and put St. Clair to rout—no, they would not run away! Wild yells arose from every side, but I felt nerved for any danger, and when the next bullet was driven into my rifle, it was no trembling hand that thrust it down. I cannot describe the thrilling inspiration which seemed to possess me. It was a flood tide of the spirit, and I felt, and heard, and saw, as I had never done before.

"And now the attack commenced. Hither and thither the Shawnees darted among the trees, all the while sending forth their unimaginable shrieks. Bullets came through the narrow windows, which happily were not large enough to admit a human form; and even the clay which stopped the interstices between the logs was often sent spinning across the cabin, while the ball which drove it in struck with an appalling 'chick!' against the opposite wall.

"Our cattle, with head and tail erect, went floundering through the snow, and wheeling and staring in terror. Some escaped to the woods; some, bellowing with wounds, rolled over and died in the white drifts—and all the while, yell upon yell rang in my ears. Mother stood pale and motionless in a corner, and little Oscar, cowering behind her, cried with all his might. The storm was now absolutely blinding to any one without, and the warriors, dodging from the haystack to the barn, from the barn to the woodpile, with the thick, white mass in the hair of their wolf and bearskins, looked like snow-men. The fire of their rifles flashed vividly among the dampening flakes, and 'ping!' 'pat!' 'chick!' came those messengers whose touch was death!

"Soon they attacked the door, thundering against it with heavy logs. It was exceedingly strong, but I feared that it might fall. Over it was a projection formed for the purpose of defence, and stealing quietly up to this, I removed the cover from a narrow aperture which permitted me to look down. Careful as I was, however, the Indians discovered the newly opened loophole, and dropping their log retreated with a surprised yell. I have since been glad that they did so, for though at the moment I had the heart to slaughter them without mercy, I should not now like to reflect upon such an act. Their discovery of the danger was, however, sufficient to protect the door from any further assault.

"For a short time there was silence, and I endeavored by every means in my power to ascertain the position of the enemy. I peered through the small bullet holes in the clay, and removed, just a little, one or two of the wooden plugs that stopped the loopholes, but all in vain. Mother and I both knew that this was a terrible moment—a thousand times the more so for its silence. With my rifle half raised, and the hammer drawn back, I stood and waited.

"Suddenly a sheet of flame and powder-smoke shot across the room, and the simultaneous crash of half a dozen rifles pierced our ears like a thunderbolt. The Indians had crept close to the house, and putting the muzzles of their guns against the clay between two of the logs, had all fired at once. Then, dropping close under cover, they were completely sheltered from my aim. We feared that the cries of poor little Oscar would reveal his position to the Shawnees, and at my suggestion mother carried him into the loft, while I, standing at one end of the rent in the wall, awaited the reappearance of the scalp-locks, as they should rise for a second fire. My position was such that they could not easily harm me from that side, but what was my perplexity, and, I might say, despair, when the same manœuvre was repeated on the opposite side of the house, the clay being hurled all around me! Wholly unprepared for this, I, as before, failed to return the fire. A process of attack more trying to the besieged could hardly have been chosen. And now, from what quarter might I expect a third volley?

"It occurred to me that the voice of Oscar in the loft—for he cried incessantly—and the silence below, must at last induce the Shawnees to suppose that the garrison had taken shelter above stairs, and I resolved to await whatever demonstration might result from this mistake. My eyes swept the two openings almost at one glance, and as neither breach was more than an inch wide, and as moreover a dim gloom pervaded the cabin, I could better see without than could the Indians within, should they attempt to discover me.

"Presently, at the first opening which had been made, a tuft of quills rose cautiously in sight. Ah ha! now I would be ready! But the gray feathers did not rise high enough. The warrior's head was below the log. He could not be aware that his eagle plumes were thus visible above the crevice. O, how I watched! like a female panther when her prey stirs among the leaves but is not quite defined. My fingers seemed almost to indent the rifle stock. What could he be doing? A little higher! just an inch, a little inch! Would that brown head never come up? But what of the opposite breach? For the moment I had forgotten it. I glanced aside, and my blood leaped. Four copper faces were peeping in at the crevice, while a fifth warrior having already drawn back, had raised his rifle to a range above the log—a brown hand at the lock and a keen black eye at the breach! Probably, however, in changing his position, he had partly or wholly lost sight of me. An instant would decide all. Never moving my feet, I turned the upper portion of my body, throwing my cheek against the rifle. My eye caught the ‘sights,’ and as they broke the light of the crevice, I fired. Simultaneously came the shot of the Indian, and I felt the black smoke in my face, but his ball only grazed my hair. I caught a glimpse of his copper hand and the quick flap of his bearskin blanket as he fell.

“The remaining four Indians upon that side, together with the one who had been used to distract my attention at the opposite opening, now poured their bullets into the cabin, and after a series of yells took to cover as before. A long silence succeeded. It was growing dark, and the snowstorm was so violent and the air so bitterly cold, that it seemed as if the warriors must for the present abandon the attack. We had out-houses of logs, in which we finally concluded that they had sought shelter.

“All night the storm howled fearfully, and when morning came, we saw nothing of the Indians. Our apprehensions, however, of a second attack increased as the tempest abated. Between the cabin and the out-houses the wind had swept away the snow; but we perceived that a great tree, which for its height and beauty father had left standing, had fallen directly upon a stable which formed a wing of the barn, crushing the roof, pushing one of the walls in and the other out, and bringing down the whole in a complete wreck, whereon it now lay with all its prodigious weight. Upon the whole rested a huge drift of snow, from which here and there protruded the end of a log.

“The entire morning passed quickly, and at noon the sun shone out.

“‘Mother,’ I said, ‘they would not have gone away in the storm—can it be that they are all this time in the barn hoping to put us off our guard? Who knows but—there, O there?’

“I had looked again and again at the pile of wrecked logs, hoping but not daring to believe what I hoped. But now, a rifle-barrel came up through the snow! It was moved, as if with difficulty, back and forth. They were there! Trapped like the gray wolves, they were deep under the logs and snow! But would they not escape? What a fearful question! No, not all of them; they would not all escape, for my rifle was already in the loophole, and the first, I knew, would fall, and perhaps the second.

“At length an arm appeared, and a large copper hand was placed against the fallen tree as if with an endeavor to push it aside. I took a steady aim at the hand, but I could not fire. ‘No, no—if the tree should move,’ I thought—‘if the logs should be forced apart—I will not wait a moment; but I cannot fire at that poor struggling hand!’

“But what was to be done? I could not ascertain the exact condition of the Shawnees, for to approach the spot might be death; neither would it be possible for me to watch them after dark. They might be dreadfully mangled by the logs, or remain wholly uninjured—be securely imprisoned, or on the very verge of escape. The suspense was trying; but I hoped that my father would reach home before nightfall, when with such an accession to the garrison, we might feel comparatively secure. And thus, as the shadows crept eastward along the snow, I watched and watched—never taking my eyes from the fallen tree or my rifle from the loophole. How I dreaded the sunset! how I measured its approach by the growth of that shadow which the fallen treetop cast! and perhaps no one ever longed more earnestly for the power of a Joshua.

“It was just as the last flicker of gold died upon the snowdrifts that my heart leaped at the sound of father’s voice. He had approached from a direction opposite that of the Indians, and knew nothing of the tragedy enacted about his home. Opening the door, mother and myself were about to rush into his arms, when we were startled at seeing close in his footsteps a tall Indian.

“‘He is a friend,’ said father, answering our looks of terror—‘he is “Hollow Tree,” a Shawnee chief. I have been fortunate enough to render him a service, and he has come with me to protect you from a band of his people who, he says, have taken the war-path in this neighborhood. I feared that they might already have attacked you, and so made all the speed I could through the snow.’

"O father! I cried, 'they have indeed attacked us. The snow covers the traces of the fight, or you would have seen the logs with which they assailed the door. We kept them at bay yesterday, and last night when they were in the stable it was crushed by that great tree, and they are all under the ruins. For Heaven's sake, secure them before they can get out. I have been watching ever so long—ever so long!'

"Thus saying, I sprang back to the loophole—for, Mabel, with five hostile Indians under the woodpile yonder, you would not feel very secure even with your father in the house.

"O father, father! I cried, 'bar the door, bar the door at once!' My head bent to the rifle-sight, the butt was pressed to my shoulder; and just as Hollow Tree struck my weapon with his hand, the bullet whistled forth. A stout warrior had leaped out upon the logs. Little he thought that but for Hollow Tree's hand, the ball that took a quill from his decoration, would have stretched him on the snow. I shall never forget his resounding whoop, as, standing in full view, he returned my fire.

"Old Hollow Tree darted to the door. 'Young squaw no fire more!' he cried. 'Hollow Tree talk with his people!'

"We are safe, Margie,' said my father. 'I have won the good-will of the chief. In a fight with a wounded panther, he had slipped and so fallen that his right arm was caught between a tree and a large rock, and his foothold being very slight and treacherous, he could not extricate himself. I was fortunate enough to save him from a miserable death.'

"Still, father barred the door behind the chief, for he knew not what Hollow Tree's braves might do. One after another they started from beneath the logs, each with a shrill yell, succeeded by a loud 'ugh!' of astonishment as they recognized the advancing sachem. We watched the conference. The warriors, apparently confused by the turn of affairs, stood covered from the range of my loophole, their scalp-locks now and then nodding above the logs; while Hollow Tree, assuming an imposing and noble attitude, evidently poured forth in his own language a 'big talk' of peace.

"Then the whole band approached the cabin. Father opened the door fearlessly, for he had the stately sachem's word, and what was of far more importance, his gratitude. O, with what interest I watched those grim Indians, as entering the house they examined gravely the bullet marks of their rifles within the lately beleagued fortress. Only one of them besides the chief could speak English. He was the warrior who had lost the eagle quill.

"Young squaw make very big fight!' he said. 'Harmar run, St. Clair run, young squaw no run!'

"My fancy was busy; it flew to the scene of Harmar's tragedy and St. Clair's awful rout. The braves whose yells had struck terror to the hardy soldiery, and whose hatchets had broken the lines of bristling bayonets, were before me. I had a kind of admiration for their gravity, their simplicity, their unwearying endurance. True they had beleagued me, a woman, in a little cot, but this was the manner of their people—they would just as readily have rushed to the deadliest battle.

"The Indians had been chilled through and through, but the logs had not injured them in the least. We had a large stock of provisions in the house, and after eating what they would, they turned gravely away for their march to the Shawnee country; but first they deposited their dead in a rude receptacle of logs secure from the wolves.

"When ground thawed, then Shawnee come and bury,' said Hollow Tree, and in a moment he was gone—passing along the forest aisles at the head of his warriors.

"When the ground thawed, he came accordingly, with a dozen of his braves, and the simple rites of that Indian burial interested me exceedingly. I asked myself if the red man was not nearer than ourselves to the Great Spirit. Hollow Tree brought presents for my father and myself. During subsequent years he occasionally visited us, and his warriors held our cabin sacred. But after the great battle of Tippecanoe, he came no more. He was found dead among the piles of slain, his unloaded rifle beneath him, and the hatchet in his hand."

SINK OR SWIM:

—OR—

HARRY RAYMOND'S RESOLVE.

BY HORATIO ALGER, JR.

AUTHOR OF "LUCK AND PLUCK," "RAGGED DICK SERIES," "CAMPAIGN SERIES," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER VII.

A MEAN TRICK.

HARRY RAYMOND had been employed in Mr. Porter's store but a few days when he had a difficulty with James Turner which deserves to be chronicled. For various reasons James cherished a dislike of our hero, which he was not likely to get over very soon. Harry had always distanced him in his studies, and, as we have seen, had carried off the prize for declamation which James persuaded himself would have been his but for the partiality of Mr. Tower. Again, James aspired to be a leader among the boys at school and in the village. He felt that this position was due to him on account of the superior wealth of his father. When boys assert this claim to consideration, it is generally a sign that they have little else to boast of, and this was precisely the case with James Turner.

Now it may appear strange, that though Squire Turner was the richest man in the village and Mr. Raymond one of the poorest, the boys paid much more respect to Harry than to the son of the wealthy squire. Harry was put forward prominently on all occasions, as, for example, when a military company was formed, he was elected captain, while James could not even obtain the post of simple corporal. Of course the latter withdrew his name from the roll in disgust, but the company, so far from being thrown into consternation, appeared to thrive about as well as before. This military organization went by the name of the Vernon Guards, and consisted of about thirty boys. They used to parade on Saturday afternoons, when a sufficient number could be gathered for duty, and the young captain, who had studied up his duties, discharged them in a very creditable manner.

James Turner, however, had one consolation in all this strange neglect. His superiority was conceded by one boy, who was in the habit of revolving round him like a humble satellite. This was Tom Barton, who has already been referred to. Tom was a born sycophant, and was ready on all occasions to flatter James and join him in abusing Harry and Harry's friends. Tom's father was in California at the mines. His mother was a weak woman, of an envious disposition, who was always bewailing her fate in having married a poor man instead of a certain other person who had turned out rich, and who, as she asserted, had offered her his hand in early life. In fact, it was generally supposed that her complaints had driven her husband to California to seek for the fortune for which she was continually pining. As for Tom, she considered him one of the smartest boys in America, and as might be expected, asserted that he took after her, and not after his father.

"There aint any Barton about him," she said. "He's all Jessup."

This was not far from true. Tom certainly did inherit his mother's mean and disagreeable qualities, and there were very few points in which he resembled his father, who was really a worthy man, and deserved a better wife than had been allotted to him.

It might have been supposed that Harry's misfortune in losing his father would have led to a suspension of ill feeling on the part of James and his sycophant. But I have already said that James was a mean boy, and Tom was in this respect a very fitting companion for him. Indeed Tom, besides espousing James's quarrel, had a personal grievance of his own. At the time that Alfred Harper entered the village store, Mr. Porter had an application for the place from Tom, which he had seen fit to decline without assigning any reasons for so doing. In fact, Tom had the reputation of being lazy and self-sufficient, and the storekeeper rightly concluded that he would not be likely to prove a very valuable assistant. When Tom heard that the coveted place had been given to Harry he felt highly indignant, not only with Mr. Porter, but with Harry himself, and was anxious for an opportunity of wreaking vengeance upon our hero. Now the manliest way would have been to make a direct assault upon him, but this he did not care to do. He knew that Harry had a pair of good strong arms, and was ready on all occasions to defend himself. If he should venture upon an attack, it was pretty clear to him that he would get the worst of it, and this would be very far from suiting him. He preferred to wait for some secret way of injuring him.

That opportunity came about a week after Harry had entered upon his duties in Mr. Porter's store.

It has already been said that one of his duties was to drive the store-wagon, and deliver groceries in different parts of the village. One afternoon he was driving at about half a mile distance from the store. Among other articles in the wagon was a basket containing three dozen eggs, which, by the way, were to be delivered to Squire Turner's housekeeper.

Just about this part of the road there was a cliff on one side, about twenty feet in height, with a steep, almost perpendicular descent. The field terminating thus abruptly belonged to Squire Turner. It so happened that James Turner and Tom Barton were walking leisurely along the cliff just as Harry came driving by.

"There's Harry Raymond," said Tom, spitefully. "Old Barton must have been hard up for a clerk when he took him."

"I suppose he took pity on him," said James, "and gave him the situation to keep him out of the poorhouse."

"That isn't the way he looks at it," said Tom. "He puts on as many airs as if he owned the store himself."

"Didn't you try for the place once, Tom?"

"Why, not exactly," said Tom. "I told him I would take it if he couldn't get anybody else. It isn't much of a place."

Of course this was only a salvo for Tom's wounded pride, for he had been eager to enter the store.

"I'll tell you what," added Tom, after a pause, "suppose we play a trick on Raymond."

"What sort of a trick?"

"Suppose we pitch a stone into that basket of eggs. There'll be an awful smash, and he can't see who did it."

This was a proposition which just suited James. It would get Harry into trouble with his employer, and this of course would be rare sport. Then, as they could easily withdraw from sight, he would never know to whom he was indebted for the favor. All these considerations darted through James Turner's mind more quickly than I have stated them, and he responded:

"All right, Tom. You do it. You can fire straighter than I."

Tom needed no second approval. He seized a stone about as large as his two fists, or perhaps a little larger, and bending over the cliff, fired it directly at the basket.

His success was all that he could have wished. His aim was a true one, and the first Harry knew of the "trick," there was a loud crash behind him, and the contents of the eggs were partially splattered over him. Glancing quickly back, he saw that the work was almost total. Of the three dozen eggs not one third had escaped destruction.

Now, though Harry was naturally good-natured, he felt that this was a little too much for good-nature. It might be a joke, but he could not see it in that light. He knew that he was likely to be blamed for the accident, and he resolved to find out how it came about. It was not very probable that the stone came into the basket of its own volition. There was evidently some human agency concerned, and this agency Harry determined to ascertain.

Looking up he just caught a glimpse of Tom Barton peering over to see what mischief had been done.

"It's that mean Tom Barton," he said to himself. "He's about the only fellow mean enough to play such a trick. Perhaps he thinks I'm going to stand it."

"Whoa!" shouted Harry.

In obedience to the summons the horse came to a halt.

Harry drew him to the side of the road, and jumped out of the wagon. He hesitated about leaving the horse unattended, but just at that moment Will Pomeroy came along.

"Just mind the horse a minute, Will," said Harry.

"Where are you going?"

"I'll tell you when I come back."

Our hero felt that there was no time for explanation. He began to clamber up the side of the cliff. This was a hard job, for it was nearly perpendicular, but here and there were roots and bushes that helped him along. Probably his indignation helped him, for in a very short time he reached the top.

Tom Barton was elated at the success of his trick. After first looking over to see the extent of the damage, he withdrew to a short distance and threw himself under a tree by the side of James Turner. He felt entirely safe, not having the least idea that Harry would undertake to climb the cliff.

The two boys were laughing together over the success of their trick, when the figure of our hero, his face red with excitement, and his hands chafed and torn, presented itself unexpectedly.

Tom sprang to his feet in dismay.

"Look here, Tom Barton," said Harry, in a quick, peremptory way, "what did you mean by pitching a stone into my basket of eggs?"

"Don't be afraid," said James Turner, in a low voice, "I'll stand by you."

This emboldened Tom. Though he would not have liked to engage in single combat with Harry, he concluded that our hero would be in no haste to engage both. So he answered insolently:

"None of your business!"

"It strikes me that it is my business," said Harry, warmly. "It was a mean, contemptible trick."

"What are you going to do about it?" sneered Tom.

Now I am not going to justify Harry for the course he took, but it was certainly very natural.

"Stand up here, if you dare, and you'll see," he answered, with compressed lips.

"Let's give him a licking, James," said Tom. "It'll do him good."

Both boys sprang to their feet, and advanced towards our hero. He saw that his task was not going to be an easy one. The united strength of both of his assailants was undoubtedly greater than his own. If he allowed the two to come to close quarters with him he would probably get the worst of it. Here was a chance for strategy, and he resolved to improve it.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE BATTLE OF THE CLIFF.

SOME of my readers are no doubt familiar with the memorable combat between the Horatii and the Curiatii, told in all the Roman histories. There were three brothers on each side, and the contest between them was to decide the fortunes of the armies to which they respectively belonged. After a time two of the Horatii lay dead upon the field. The third unhurt found himself opposed to three adversaries, all of whom, however, were wounded. These he managed to engage singly, and was thus enabled to overcome them in turn.

I am not sure whether Harry Raymond had heard of this historical combat, but when he found himself opposed to two enemies, it struck him at once that this was his proper course, if he wanted to come off victorious.

As Tom and James advanced upon him he feigned to retreat.

"He's afraid," said Tom, in exultation.

"Let's give him a licking."

James had no possible objection. Indeed he felt that there was nothing he would enjoy so much as to see our hero humiliated. He would not have ventured to attack him alone, but now with Tom's assistance there seemed an excellent opportunity, such as might not again present itself.

"Go ahead!" he called out. "I'll help you."

Tom did go ahead. Being a faster runner than James he found himself separated from him by a considerable distance in the impetuosity of his pursuit.

Harry turned his head, and seeing that his opportunity had come, suddenly faced round upon his astonished adversary.

Tom, unable to check himself, almost rushed into the arms of our hero.

"Now defend yourself!" shouted Harry.

So saying he clinched Tom, who was too astonished to defend himself properly, and with a quick movement of the leg brought him down heavily upon the ground—with Harry on top.

Lying on the ground in such a position as to fit into the small of Tom's back was a stone about as large as the one he had thrown into the basket of eggs. The sensation which resulted from falling upon it was by no means pleasant.

"O!" he whined, "I've broken my backbone. Get off from me, Harry Raymond."

"I guess you'll get over it," said Harry, who knew that the hurt could not be very serious.

"Jim Turner?" shouted the fallen hero.

James, who had witnessed his friend's discomfiture, paused at a little distance. He began to doubt whether it would be prudent to take an active part in the hostilities. His confederate was disabled, and he strongly suspected that Harry was more than a match for him. Still he was rather ashamed to hold aloof.

"Let him alone!" he called out, from the place where he stood, making no motion to advance.

"Come and help me, Jim. You said you would," said Tom.

"I'll have you arrested," said James, preparing to war with his tongue.

"Take him off!" entreated Tom.

Thus adjured, James advanced with hesitating steps to the rescue. He would rather have been excused, and had there been any decent pretext for giving up the undertaking he would have done so. But though his sentiment of honor was not very keen, it did occur to him that it would be rather mean to leave Tom in the lurch, after he had urged him on to the assault with the promise of assistance.

"Let him alone!" he exclaimed, reinforcing his failing courage with a little bluster, "or you'll get the worst licking you ever had."

"Who'll give it to me?" asked Harry, composedly.

He had merely retained his position, pinning Tom to the ground, but not striking him, for he was too honorable to strike a prostrate foe.

"I will," said James, with a boldness of manner which did not by any means correspond to his inward feelings.

So saying he made a step or two in advance in a threatening manner.

Harry sprang up suddenly, and advanced upon his new foe.

"I'm ready for you, James Turner," he said, "now or at any other time. Come on if you dare."

James paused in his advance. He did not like the position of affairs at all. He had never bargained to meet, Harry in single combat, and now it appeared likely that he would have to do so.

"Get up, Tom," he called out. "The two of us can whip him soundly."

"I can't do anything," whined Tom. "My back's most broke."

He rose slowly from the ground, and began with a rueful face to rub the injured portion of his frame.

Thus left to himself James saw that there was no backing out. He had provoked the contest, and must take the consequences. What these were likely to be he was cheerfully reminded by Tom's doleful face. He resolved to secure his cooperation if possible.

"Come along, Tom," he urged. "Just help me a little, and I'll manage him."

"I can't," said Tom, dismally. "That plaguy rock's worn a hole in my back."

"I'll stand you both," said Harry, stoutly. "You've served me a mean trick, and you ought to be punished."

Just then James noticed a stone about the size of his fist lying on the ground before him. It was a mean and cowardly impulse that led him to pick it up, and fire it full at our hero's head. Had it struck him, the injury would have been serious, if not fatal, but Harry quickly divined his intention, and dropped suddenly to the ground. The stone passed harmlessly over his head.

"You shall pay for that, James Turner," he said, angrily. "No one but a coward would do such a thing."

As he spoke he sprang forward, and grappled with his adversary. James, having a premonition of defeat, defended himself poorly, flinging out blows at random. In less than a minute he too was prostrate with Harry on top.

"Help!" he screamed, making desperate efforts to unseat his opponent.

But Harry held him down with a tight grip. Tom had had enough fighting, and did not stir to his assistance.

"Get up, you ragamuffin!" he screamed. In fact he was more mortified that his defeat should have come from Harry Raymond than if his opponent had been of his own position. That a poor boy like Harry should treat with such indignity his father's son was a gross outrage which filled him with vexation.

"Let me up, you beggar!" he cried, again.

"You'll have to speak to me in a different style before I let you up," said Harry, coolly, for he felt that the advantage was in his hands, and that it was for him to dictate terms of submission.

"I called you by your right name," said James, provoked beyond the limits of prudence. "You are a ragamuffin and a beggar."

"It strikes me that you are the beggar just now," said our hero.

"What do you mean?"

"I mean that you are begging me to let you up."

"If you don't I'll have you arrested," said James, with another violent but ineffectual struggle.

"You're welcome to do it," said Harry. "Perhaps there'll be something to say on my side as well as yours."

"If you don't come and help me, Tom Barton, I'll never speak to you again," said James, whose anger was now directed against his confederate.

"I would if I could," said Tom, "but my back's too sore."

The fact was, that Tom's back was not quite so much hurt as he wished to have it believed, but he had no inclination to attack Harry again. The ease with which he had been thrown caused him to realize that Harry carried "too many guns for him," as the phrase is, and, though he was ready to fawn upon James, he was not willing to compromise his personal safety for him. But a bright idea occurred to him.

"I'll go and call your father," he said.

James did not answer. He would rather have had Tom's personal aid, but that he was not likely to obtain. Tom Barton, glad to get away limped off towards the road.

"Are you going to let me up?" demanded James, fiercely.

"That depends upon whether you are going to behave yourself. Promise to fire no more stones at me."

"I won't."

"You won't fire any stones?"

"No, I won't promise."

"Very well. Then you may lie here a little longer."

So the two remained in their old position. Five minutes passed, and James renewed his demand.

"As soon as you will say that you won't fire any more stones you shall get up."

"I don't mean to," said James, sullenly.

"All right! That's all I want," said Harry; and he relaxed his hold upon his prostrate foe, and rose to his feet.

James picked himself up, and glared at Harry with a look by no means friendly.

"You shall pay for this," he said.

"Who's going to pay for the eggs you broke?" retorted our hero.

"I didn't break them."

"You approved it, at any rate."

"Yes, I did," said James.

"You probably didn't know where I was carrying them."

"Where?" James condescended to ask.

"To your house. I've lost time enough already, and must be getting back."

Harry hurried to the road, where he found the wagon safe under the charge of Will Pomeroy. Jumping in, he drove in haste to Squire Turner's residence, and taking the basket of eggs carried them round to the side door, which was opened by Mrs. Murray the housekeeper.

"Here are some eggs from the store," said Harry, holding out the basket.

"Why, they're all broke," said the housekeeper, in dismay.

"I know it," said Harry. "If you want to know how it happened ask James."

"Well, I never!" ejaculated the housekeeper, mechanically taking the basket. "The squire'll have to do without his omelet to-night, that's sure"

CHAPTER V.

FIRE!

JAMES did not fail to make a report to his father of the outrage which he had received at the hands of Harry Raymond. Over the trick which Tom and he had played upon our hero he passed rather lightly.

"It seems there were two of you," said the squire. "Why didn't you give him such a lesson as he would have remembered?"

"I would if Tom had stood by me."

"Why didn't he?"

"O, he pretended to be very much hurt," said James.

"Couldn't you manage young Raymond alone?"

"No; he's as strong as a bull. He's had to work for a living, and that has given him muscle."

"Then you and Tom had better watch your chance, and give him a sound thrashing. I am perfectly willing."

This was not quite what James wanted. The result of the first contest had not been such as to encourage him much to renew it, even with Tom's assistance, and this might fail him at a critical moment as on a former occasion.

"Haven't you got a mortgage on his mother's place?" he asked, hesitating.

"Well, what of it?" said the squire.

"Can't you call for the money, and if she can't pay it, turn her out of the house?"

"I don't care to do it at present," said the squire. "You must settle your quarrel in some other way."

"Are you going to pay for the broken eggs?"

"As long as you broke them, I can't very well refuse."

"It wasn't me. It was Tom."

"There's little difference."

James was rather astonished at the moderate view which his father took of the matter. He had been fully convinced that the squire would sympathize with him in the affair, and be ready to join in any scheme to punish Harry Raymond for his insolence. Under ordinary circumstances, this was precisely what his father would have done. But there was a secret cause for his present conduct, and this shall at once be explained.

It has been said that Squire Turner had offered himself in marriage to Mrs. Raymond in early life, and that she had seen fit to decline his proposal. Both she and the squire had married, but now, by the dispensation of Providence, she was a widow and he a widower. Though now thirty-five, Mrs. Raymond was still a handsome woman, and, if surrounded by the appliances of wealth, she would make a wife of whom any man might be proud. Certainly she presented a very favorable contrast to the late Mrs. Turner, who had a sour, acid visage, and a temper to match, as her husband had often experienced to his cost. There is reason to believe that when that amiable lady was removed by death her husband was not disconsolate, but consoled himself with the fact that she could not carry away the property which she had brought him, and without which she would never have become Mrs. Turner.

Now the squire had had some vague thoughts that he might marry again, but no one in particular had occurred to him as worthy to fill the place of the late Mrs. Turner. But when Mrs. Raymond was suddenly left a widow, and the report of the lawyer in Milwaukie rendered it likely that she might come into possession of a considerable sum of money, it set the squire to thinking.

Mrs. Raymond was still a young woman, and he had never got over the fancy he had felt for her in earlier years. Indeed she was the only one that had ever touched the squire's rather flinty heart. He had not even liked the late Mrs. Turner, which was not much to be wondered at, for it is doubtful whether the warmest-hearted person could have felt much affection for so disagreeable a woman. He was rather pleased with the idea of offering his hand to his first love, especially if she could bring him a handsome addition to his present property. The chances of this he thought very fair. The lawyer had written very encouragingly, and he knew how rapidly real estate appreciated at the West.

There was one important question—would Mrs. Raymond smile upon his suit, or would she repulse him as before? The squire thought with proper management he might secure her consent. She had outlived the period of romance, there was no rival in the way, and for the sake of her children she would find it advisable to accept a proposal which would at once remove all pecuniary anxiety. Of course, if she knew of the probable value of the land warrant, that would make a great difference. But Squire Turner resolved to keep her in ignorance of this until he had time to settle his matrimonial plans.

It will now be understood why James failed to win his father's cooperation in his schemes of retaliation upon Harry. It was the squire's cue to be friendly and conciliatory, even to our hero, who he suspected had considerable influence over his mother, and might use that influence to defeat his plans. In his secret heart, however, Squire Turner disliked Harry not a little, and would have been very glad of any little disaster which might come to our hero. Should he receive a beating at the hands of Tom Barton and James, the squire would not be likely to censure either very much.

That very evening something happened which went far to increase the dislike and aversion of the squire to our hero, and in the end had considerable influence upon Harry's career.

It was between eleven and twelve o'clock that Mrs. Raymond came suddenly into Harry's room, and waked him up.

"Harry," she said, in a tone of excitement, "Katy is taken sick, and is in great pain. I want you to put on your clothes at once, and go as fast as you can to Dr. Lamson's."

Harry needed no second bidding. He could hear Katy moaning, and shared in his mother's alarm. He dressed in "double quick time," and set off by the nearest route for the house of Dr. Lamson.

The doctor lived at considerable distance. By the road it was full a mile and a quarter. But there was a way of cutting off from a quarter to a third of a mile by "cutting across lots." This made the journey rather a dark and lonely one, especially as there was no moon, and there were but few stars out. Harry had a stout heart and a clear conscience, and was not easily daunted. Besides, he had his little sister to think of, and this was enough to fill his mind to the exclusion of anything else.

In due time he reached the doctor's door, and knocked. He had to repeat his knock. Upon doing so the doctor put out his head from an upper window.

"Who's there?" he asked.

"It's I—Harry Raymond."

"O, it's you, Harry. Anybody sick at home?"

"Yes, my sister Katy. She is in a good deal of pain. Can you come right off?"

"I'll get ready at once. Will you stop and ride with me?"

"No, thank you, doctor. I'll run home and tell mother you're coming."

"I may be there first, Harry. However, perhaps you will feel better to go."

The doctor knew that when a friend or relative is in danger, nothing is harder to bear than passive suspense, and that action is a relief. So he interposed no objections to Harry's wish.

Harry naturally decided to return by the same short cut by which he had come. On the way was a lonely old building, aloof from the road, but very near his path, which had recently fallen into possession of Squire Turner. It was not tenanted, and would require considerable repairs before it would be in order to receive tenants. Ten years before it had been insured with a fire insurance company for an amount below its value at that time. The insurance had been kept up, but the value had so depreciated, that it would be a profitable thing for the proprietor if it should be consumed by fire.

Squire Turner was aware of this, and in an evil hour, under the influence of cupidity, determined to set fire to his own building, in order to realize the insurance money.

Being in a lonely situation, he thought he should be able to set fire to the house, and return home before the village awoke to the fact that there was a fire, while there was not much chance of the wheezy old engine getting to the spot in time to arrest the conflagration.

Harry was a few rods from the house when his attention was arrested by a sight which struck him with dismay. A man muffled in an overcoat, was stooping over a basket of shavings. In a moment there was a tiny light, proceeding from a match. This was communicated to the shavings, which caught at once. The man threw the basket with its combustible contents into the house through a broken sash, and after pausing a moment to judge whether it was likely to accomplish his purpose, turned swiftly away. His coat collar was up, and his hat was drawn down over his face as he turned round. His amazement may be imagined when he found that the midnight incendiary was no other than Squire Turner himself!

"What can it mean?" he thought, bewildered.

Fifteen minutes later the house, which was a mere tinder-box, was in flames, and the startled villagers, aroused from their slumbers, saw a bright flame reflected against the dark midnight sky.

A WATER-CURE.

BY MISS CAMILLA WILLIAN.

THEY all went down to the shore, and stepped into the boat, all the summer-boarders at Mrs. Beal's farm, ten of them, five ladies, and five gentlemen. But there were eleven of the party; for it would never do to overlook Prince Charles.

Prince Charles was one of those Newfoundland dogs who are worth their weight in gold, a great strong, shaggy, knowing creature, a splendid swimmer, and as handsome as a picture. His master wouldn't have taken any money for him. His master was Mr. Charles Blandon, the gentleman who, with his two hands on the side of the boat, over which he has been leaning, looks round to listen while Miss Bertie Nelson strikes the light guitar. Just behind Bertie stands Mark Tracy who shuts his teeth hard, and thinks that Charles Blandon need not have taken such pains to place himself by the young lady's elbow, and that his looking over to see the color of the water is a mere pretence. John Shore stands just behind Charles; and Nettle Lane, Jane Clement and Fred James sit in the stern, Fred with the tiller. No matter about the other three. Prince Charles lies in the bottom of the boat.

This is a company of city folks who are spending a few weeks in a plain country place, and enjoying themselves much more than if they were at some styled hotel where all their time would be spent in dressing and dancing. The five young ladies are devoted and inseparable friends, and all belonged to the last but one graduating class of the Normal school. Not one is over eighteen. Three of the young men, Charles Blandon, John Shore and Mark Tracy, are college students on a vacation. Fred James is older, a patriarch of nearly thirty.

Now while they go skimming over the pond with laugh, and song, and jest, let us go back a few days to explain.

Bertie Nelson, being as much a belle as a girl just out of school can well be, has had rather more than a fair share of attention from the young men, a fact which did not in the least displease her. How could it? It was only when she noticed that Charles Blandon and Mark Tracy were less friendly with each other on her account that she felt disturbed. She was a sweet and truly amiable girl, and liked to see everybody friends; and it must be owned that she wanted them to think very well of her. However, that was no harm.

"My dear," says Mattie Lane, who was the eldest of the girls, "there can be no doubt but both Mark and Charles are in love with you."

Bertie blushed crimson. "I should think you'd be ashamed to talk such nonsense!" she exclaimed, in vexation. "I am only seventeen years old, and little at that, and I don't mean to think of a beau till I am twenty."

"Possibly," replied Mattie, with great coolness, letting down her back hair as she stood before the dressing-table, and shaking it out with both hands. "You are not obliged to think of a beau; but you can't help it if a beau thinks of you."

The company had all been on a tramp in the woods that afternoon, and the girls were now brushing up to be ready for tea. The doors between their chambers were open and they ran to and fro, as girls will, exchanging confidences, borrowing hair-pins, helping arrange each other's hair, admiring each other's dresses and trinkets, laughing and joking.

"Such a lovely dress, and so becoming!" sighed Jane Clement, as Bertie smoothed out the tunic of a green-striped organdie. "It just sets off your fair hair and fresh complexion. Now I am so slow and horrid that I always look worse in the last dress than in the one before."

Presently they were all ready, and went rustling down stairs in a pretty, flower-hued procession, a light perfume hovering about them, their faces bright with smiles. Bertie and Mattie Lane brought up the rear, their arms around each other's waists. Bertie's cheeks were very red, for she had not forgotten the conversation about beaux; but before tea was done she had quite got over that nonsense, and was chatting away as gayly as ever. Then in the evening they all went down and walked on the shore of the pond near the house.

It so happened that Bertie and Charles Blandon got by themselves, and stood, with the moon shining in their faces, talking quite seriously. Charles was a generous young fellow of twenty, and he told his companion what he meant to make of himself, and how determined he was to be a great man.

"I am going to be a doctor, and I mean to be a first class one," he said proudly. "As soon as I graduate, I shall commence my studies. Then I am going to Paris for lectures."

"What are you going to do then?" asked Bertie, much interested.

"I shall put up a sign, and—get married!"

Charles laughed as he brought out these last two words with a jerk, but he also blushed so deeply that Bertie could see the color by the moonlight.

She hardly knew what to say, and was beginning to feel a little embarrassed, when a step sounded near them, and a shadow fell across their path.

"Do I interrupt?" asked Mark Tracy's voice, in a not very pleasant tone.

"O no!" answered Bertie, hastily, Charles answering not at all. "It is time we should go into the house. Where are the girls?"

They had all gone in, Mark said.

"Come then!" said Bertie; but after a few steps found that only one of the young men followed her. Charles remained standing on the shore, with his back to them.

"Aren't you coming?" Bertie called out to him, sorry now that their friendly talk had been interrupted.

"No!" he answered, quite shortly.

"I didn't mean to offend him," Mark said, in a tone that showed he was himself annoyed. "But, really, he is too touchy."

Bertie glanced back, and saw Charles still standing where they had left him. "Perhaps he isn't vexed," she answered, gently.

Mark glanced down at her pretty face. "Yes, he is! His dislike for me breaks out at the least provocation."

"Why?" Bertie exclaimed. "What can he dislike you for?"

Mark hesitated. He didn't want to reply, "He dislikes me because I like you;" for he suspected that Bertie would not be displeased with Charles for that. He knew but too well that Charles was the favorite, and he felt a little temptation to say something which would injure him—not very much, but enough to make this girl think a little less of him. Without meaning to, Bertie helped him along. She really liked Charles Blandon very much, and wished to know all she could about him. Besides, she had begun unconsciously to take pleasure in having him spoken of.

"I hope that you and he haven't quarrelled about anything," she said, presently.

"I'm in for it now," thought Mark, and went on without giving himself time to think. "It's nothing very great; but since you ask, I will tell you. It is a little affair that happened at college. You see, some of the fellows play cards there, and sometimes they play for money. Well, one night Charles played an unfair trick, and won, and I hauled him up for it. I thought it was made all up; but I don't believe he has ever forgiven me. Perhaps I oughtn't to have told; but I know you won't mention it."

"O no!" answered Bertie, faintly.

Charles Blandon, whom she had begun to make a hero of, 'a gambler and a cheat.' For that was the plain English of it. She didn't want to hear any more. She didn't want to hear anything just now. To her this was a dreadful shock. She had been very strictly brought up, and had none of those easy ways by which many girls excuse almost any sin in a man. She knew that she was a good girl, and she didn't want to be on friendly terms with a dishonest young man.

And yet, it was hard; for really Charles was very pleasant.

She was glad when they got into the house, and glad that, since Mattie was playing and singing, she was not obliged to talk, but could sit by a window, and make believe listen, though, in truth, she could not for her life have told what Mattie was singing. After full half an hour she saw Charles Blandon strolling slowly up toward the house.

"Let's go to bed," she said hastily to Jane Clement. "I am tired and sleepy."

"I don't want to speak to him again to-night," she thought, as she hurried up stairs just as Charles's graceful form appeared in the door. Then the next day was the sail.

There hadn't been much chance for any one to talk at breakfast time; and while they were on their way to the boat Bertie kept close to Mattie and Jane, one on either side of her. It was only when they reached the shore that she was obliged to speak to Charles. He stood there ready to hand the girls on board, and there was no escape for her.

"I am sorry I spoke so rudely to you last night," he said in a very low voice, as he handed her over the rocks among which the boat was drawn up. "Will you forgive me?"

"O, it's no matter," Bertie replied, without looking at him, knowing that he was looking very earnestly at her, knowing also that Mark Tracy was watching them from the boat.

"What's the sense of having that great clumsy dog with us?" Mark asked sharply, as Prince Charles came trotting over the rocks. "He's as heavy as a man."

"I'll pay his passage," Charles Brandon answered, flushing angrily. "He's going, any way."

"O yes!" the girls all said in chorus, the Newfoundland being a favorite with them.

Presently they were off, and in spite of the little cloud over two of the young men, theirs was apparently a gay and happy party. They sang choruses, Bertie sang to her guitar, and they enjoyed the day and the scene. It was very beautiful, clear and bright, with a slight breeze from the west, and the loveliest sparkle in the water. Fishes jumped and sank again, looking like jewels as the sun shone on them, and bird-songs and perfumes came off from the shore.

"If only Mark hadn't told me that, I should be happy," thought Bertie.

"If I hadn't snapped her up so last night, she would talk to me to-day," thought Charles, leaning over the boatside, close behind Bertie.

"What does he want to stick so close to her for?" thought Mark Tracy, having hard work to keep a pleasant face on him.

They went across the pond to a beautiful wooded point where they got out, and took a two miles' walk, through the woods to a wonderful cascade which they had made this expedition to see. This cascade was in the depth of the woods, where a brook, after wandering slowly, mile after mile, gathering smaller streams here and there, came suddenly to a mossy ledge between two tall trees, and made a leap into the basin below.

Exclamations of delight broke from all the party as they came out in front of this waterfall. Green branches far aloft hung their leafy tent to keep out the sunbeams, all but a few golden drops that would sift through, flowers embroidered the sod all about, and were sprinkled with spray by the falling waters, and all sorts of vines and shrubs grew luxuriantly under the trees.

The company spent an hour in this charming retreat, then unwillingly started to return, lading themselves with flowers, pine-cones, and branches of young acorns. Mattie, who sketched very nicely, made a little drawing of the fall, and put Bertie into it.

Arrived at the point again, there was their boat all right, and Prince Charles mounted guard over the luncheon-basket.

"Good fellow!" his master said, patting him on the head. "He is always faithful, if he is only a quadruped."

As he spoke he happened to glance at Mark, who colored, and looked uneasy. A guilty conscience needs no accuser, and perhaps he wondered if Charles suspected him.

"I'm famished!" Mattie exclaimed. "Do give the basket here as quick as you can. Bustle round, girls, and get the cloth spread. Now there."

But in spite of Mattie's gayety and good-nature, and in spite of the efforts of others, there was a stiffness over the party. Without knowing what was the trouble, they all saw that there was a coldness between Mark and Charles, and that it had increased since the morning. So they hurried through their luncheon quickly, and started for home.

Beautiful as it had been at starting, it was still more beautiful now. The sun was setting, and threw bright reflections on the water, every ripple crested with crimson flame, the breeze had freshened, and their boat flew before it like a bird.

"Better sit down, Mark," Fred James said.

"The wind is gusty, and you may upset us."

Mark turned angrily to answer, mortified at being spoken to reprovingly, when at a puff of air the sail struck him, and before they knew what had happened, ~~he was overboard.~~

"Out, Prince! Catch him!" cried Charles Blandon, hastily pulling his coat off, all thought of enmity gone.

Bertie caught his arm. "Don't jump overboard!" she prayed, her face as pale as death. "Let Prince get him. Don't! I beg of you!"

"No, Charlie!" Fred James put in. "I'll throw this rope. There he comes!"

Charles held himself in readiness, determined to go after his friend if Prince should prove unsuccessful.

The girls hushed their cries, and, clinging without hope. He felt powerless to struggle, and had sense enough to know that he should soon sink again.

"O Lord, have mercy on me!" he gasped, as the fresh air struck in his face.

A shout rang in his ears, something near him splashed the water, and breathed heavily, something fastened in his coat-collar and drew him up as he was sinking again, and he felt Prince Charles's shaggy mane against his face. He was pulled along, strong arms grasped him, lifted him, clasped him, and Charles Blandon, bursting into tears of joy, bent and kissed him on the cheek.

"Dear old boy, if you had gone when my last word to you was a cross one, I should never have got over it."

RESCUE OF MARK.

together, leaned to watch. The young men took in the sail, put the boat about, and used their oars.

Meantime, Mark had gone over so suddenly that he was perfectly paralyzed, and could not have swam a stroke, even if he had not been encumbered with his clothes. He felt the water close over him, gasped, shivered and sank. Was it a moment, or a year?

There was time for him to recollect the lie he had told of Charles Blandon, poor, generous Charles, who had always been a true friend to him; and not only that, but to recollect every wrong thing he had done in his whole life. It was terrible. Then the darkness gave way to light, he saw the sunshine and the sky as he rose to the surface, but Mark opened his eyes, and looked up into his friend's face, forgetting all about Bertie.

"I have acted like a villain," he said, faintly. "But I'll make it up, Charlie."

And make it up he did. That very night he confessed to Bertie that he had belied his friend, and told her why he did so.

"I give you up," he said, with tears in his eyes. "Charlie is worthy of you—I am not."

Bertie forgave him freely, but said nothing to the last part of the speech. Perhaps she quite agreed with the speaker.

And I shouldn't be at all surprised, if when Charles's studies are finished, and his lectures heard, and his sign put out, Bertie and he would set up housekeeping together. It looks like it now.

THE HOUSEKEEPER.

SAGO SOUP.—Take three pounds of lean beef, a slice of lean ham, and lay them in a stewpan with a lump of butter, draw the gravy gently, and two quarts of water, and a sliced onion which has been browned by frying in fresh butter; also add a bunch of sweet herbs, six cloves, a blade of mace, a tea spoonful of allspice, and one of black pepper whole; stew until the soup is rich and brown, then remove the meat, and strain the soup clear, put it into a clean stewpan, and thicken it to a good consistency with sago.

BAKED SOUP.—Cut into slices a pound and a half of lean beef, put it into a stewpan earthenware jar, with three onions sliced, and the same number of carrots cut up; add also three ounces of rice, which has been soaked two hours previously and thoroughly washed, and a pint of white peas; season with pepper and salt, cover down close, and bake two hours.

BREAD SAUCE.—Cut in slices the crumb of a French roll, to which add a few peppercorns, one whole onion, a little salt, and boiling milk enough to cover it; let it simmer gently by the side of the fire till the bread soaks up the milk, then add a little thick cream, take out the onion, and rub the whole through a sieve, make it very hot, and serve with game or fowl.

APPLE SAUCE.—Pare, core, and slice some apples, put them with a little water into the saucepan to prevent them from burning, and add a little lemon peel; when sufficiently done, take out the latter, bruise the apples, put in a bit of butter, and sweeten it.

BAKED APPLE SAUCE.—Put a table-spoonful of water into a basin, and fill it with apples, pared, quartered and cored; put them into a moderate oven, until they are reduced to a pulp; beat them with a wooden spoon, adding a little sugar, and fresh butter.

TO STEW CRANBERRIES.—To a pound of cranberries allow a pound of sugar; dissolve the sugar in a very little water, boil it for ten minutes, and skim it well; put them with the sugar and boil them slowly till they are quite soft.

CRANBERRY SAUCE.—A quart of cranberries are washed and stewed with sufficient water to cover them; when they burst mix with them a pound of brown sugar and stir them well. Before you take them from the fire, all the berries should have burst. They will be jellied when cold.

STEWED APPLE SAUCE.—Pare and core some apples, put them into a preserve-pot, cover and set it in a saucepan of water, to boil; when soft, mix them with some butter, and sweeten with brown sugar.

ROAST OYSTERS.—Large oysters not opened, a few minutes before they are wanted, put them on a gridiron over a moderate fire. When done they will open, do not lose the liquor that is in the shell with the oysters; serve them hot upon a napkin.

OYSTER FRITTERS.—Beard, dip them into an omelette, sprinkle well with crumbs of bread, and fry them brown.

TO BROIL SHAD.—This delicate and delicious fish is excellent broiled. Clean, wash and split the shad, wipe it dry and sprinkle it with pepper and salt—broil it like mackerel.

BEEF SAUSAGE.—To three pounds of beef, very lean, put one pound and a half of suet, and chop very finely; season with sage in powder, allspice, pepper and salt; have skins thoroughly cleaned and force the meat into them.

MUTTON CHOPS AS BEEF STEAKS.—Cut thick from a leg of mutton, and rub each steak with a shalot; broil over a quick fire; rub your dish with a shalot; when on the dish pepper and salt them; send them up quite hot.

HOW TO CHOOSE BEEF.—True well-fed beef may be known by the texture and color; the lean will exhibit an open grain of deep coral red, and the fat will appear of a healthy, oily smoothness, rather inclining to white than yellow; the suet firm and white. Yellow fat is a test of meat of an inferior quality. Heifer beef is but little inferior to ox beef; the lean is of a closer grain, the red paler, and the fat whiter. Cow beef may be detected by the same signs, save that the older the beast the texture of the meat will appear closer, and the flesh closer to the sight, as well as harder to the touch.

CURIOUS MATTERS.

A BRIGHT IDEA.—There are few persons, who have not, at some time or other, experienced the inconvenience of driving up and down on a dark night, with the assistance of a probably stupid and possibly surly coachman, in search of an invisible door-number. A French chymist, struck by the unpleasantness attending on these nocturnal explorations, has invented a method of rendering the number of houses and names of shops as easily visible by night as by day. It consists in rubbing the figures and letters with a certain phosphoric paste, which, though not discernible in the daylight, will in the dark shine with perfect distinctness. The application would only require renewing about once a month, and involves a very trifling expense. A commission has been appointed to report on the desirability of adopting this proposal. Certainly a row of houses numbered in characters of fire would present a curious and striking coup d'œil.

WONDERFUL APPLICATION.—Sanderson, the mathematician, lost his sight in 1683, when only one year old, after a severe attack of the smallpox. But spite of his complete blindness he gave himself up to the assiduous duty of the sciences, and finally lectured at the University of Cambridge on mathematics and optics, with wonderful success. His sense of touch was exquisitely fine. Thus, in a collection of Roman medals, he could distinguish the genuine from the false, although the latter were often so admirably counterfeited as to deceive those who examined them with their eyes. By the different feeling of the air on his face he could tell when an object was placed before him. And his hearing was so accurate in seizing and appreciating the slightest sound, that he could determine the height of any chamber into which he was introduced, and his distance from the wall.

HOW BEES TREAT MOTHS.—There is a large moth, commonly known as the death's-head moth, from its having a curious mark on its back like a skull and crossbones sculptured on an old tombstone, which makes very free with the bees' honey. It flies in the dusk of the evening when the bees are at rest, and enters the hole in the hive, pokes its long sucker through the wax walls which surround the comb, and draws much honey into its stomach. Very often in the long evenings there are many bees hovering round about the hive, but if the death's-head alights and moves towards the door they do not take much notice; yet one sting would kill it, and it has no means of hurting the bee in return. So much troubled are some hives by these curious visitors, that the bees erect a flat wall of wax just within the hive-door, allowing a small opening to exist on either hand. This, as a rule, puzzles the moth, and it cannot enter. On the other hand, if a moth gets right into the hive, the bees do not kill it, but either let it alone or use all their ingenuity to stop its honey-stealing propensities. While the moth is enjoying its meal, the bees occasionally pull down some of the honeycomb behind it, and mould the wax quickly so as to form a dense wall. When the moth has finished its meal, and turns to get out of the hive, it finds itself walled up and imprisoned for life.

LIGHT AND LIFE.—It has been proved by recent researches in France, that the red rays of the spectrum are those to which the important physiological function exercised by the sun on plants is exclusively to be ascribed. The leaves act as analyzers of the white light which falls upon them; they reject and reflect the green rays, and thus get their natural color. If plants were exposed to green illumination only, they would be virtually in the dark. The light which the vegetable world thus refuses to absorb, is precisely that which is coveted by animals. Red, the complimentary color of green, is that which, owing to the blood, tinges the skin of the healthy human subject just as the green color of plants is the complement of that which they absorb.

These facts have been fully stated and illustrated in a paper read by M. Dubrunfant before the French Academy of Science; and from them he deduces certain practical suggestions. All kinds of red should be avoided in our furniture, except curtains. Our clothes which play the part of screens, should never be green. He also dwells upon the salubrious influence of sunshine. He mentions cases, of patients whose broken constitutions were restored by continual exposure to the sun in gardens where there were no trees; and gives an account of four children, become weak and sickly by living in a narrow street in Paris, that regained their health under the influence of the solar rays on a sandy seacoast.

FACTS AND FANCIES.

WHAT HE THOUGHT.—The repeated disasters during the racing week on the New Orleans Shell Road were ludicrously illustrated by the misfortunes of a nice young man. He had taken his dulcinea out, and was showing her how to make "two-forty on the shell," when his lines accidentally broke, and the youth tumbled backwards over the seat, the heel of his boot hanging in the lady's crinoline, and his body dragged along in this way by the increased and now dangerous speed of the horses. The lady had grasped the dash-board, and holding on for dear life, while supporting the dragging weight of her beau.

"Hold fast!" he cried, in terror.

"Let go, you brute!" she screamed.

"I can't!" he mumbled.

Amid scream and cry and bitter upbraiding, the horses dashed along until at last some kindly hand checked their speed, and the unfortunate pleasure-seekers were relieved from their uncomfortable situation.

"How dare you do that?" the lady asked, of her escort, indignantly.

"Do what?"

"Hold on to my dress in that way."

"Was that your dress?"

"Yes."

"I beg pardon, then; I thought it was a wire fence."

LOYAL TO THE LAST.—We have heard some tough stories of "Virginia mud," but the following extract from a letter from Stafford Court House, during the war, beats all the mud stories extant:

"As an illustration of muddy travelling, I may relate a story of a march, which came from one of the officers on General Slocum's staff. As he rode to the top of an eminence, on the way down, he says, 'I saw a driver astride of his team, in a distant mud-hole, jerking vigorously at the single line with which he drove his four mules, and waving his hat furiously above his head. At first I thought he was trying to urge his team over the slough, but soon saw it made no progress forward, while the driver continued his exertions, but looked anxiously backwards. I rode forward as fast as the mud would permit; driver and mules were fast disappearing; but he never ceased his exertions, and the thought of deserting his saddle appeared not to have entered his head. I reached the spot, but the hand and head of the driver alone remained above the mud. I saw him throw his hat towards me with a convulsive movement, heard him cry three cheers for the American Union, and the mud closed over him.'"

KEEPING OFF OFFICERS.—An instance of how successfully cunning may evade the officers of justice is exemplified in the case of an old darkey at New Orleans recently who had committed some sort of offence, and was in hourly expectation of a visit from the police.

To prevent this, he procured a yellow flag and hung it out at his door. "Small-pox" in the house was an effectual preventive of any intrusive visits. Weeks went by, and still the yellow flag fluttered from the door post. The officers grew impatient, and at last one more adventurous than the rest knocked at the door.

"Who dar?"

"Officers! Open, in the name of the law."

"Golly, boss, got de small-pox."

"That wont do. You were seen upon the street last night."

"Yes, I know, boss; but I has him in de day time."

"I don't believe it, and am coming in."

"Better stay out, boss! catch the small-pox, shore."

The officer persisted in coming in, and the old fox was caught in his lair, looking sleek and marvellously well. With a broad grin on his face, he saluted the officer with the remark:

"You didn't catch de small-pox, boss, but you catch me."

It is needless to say that the yellow flag was taken down.

SIGNIFICANCE OF A WINK.—Smith, the auctioneer, is a popular man, a wit and a gentleman. No person is offended at what he says, and many a hearty laugh has been provoked by his sayings. He was recently engaged in the sale of venerable household furniture and fixings. He had just got to "Going, going, and a half, going," when he saw a smiling countenance on agricultural shoulders wink at him.

A wink is as good as a nod to a blind horse or a sharp-sighted auctioneer; so Smith winked and the man winked, and Smith kept "Going, going," with a lot of glass ware, stove-pipes, carpets, pots, and perfumery, and finally this lot was knocked down.

"To whom?" said Smith, gazing at the smiling stranger.

"Who? Golly!" said the stranger, "I don't know who."

"Why, you, sir!" said Smith.

"Who? Me?"

"Yes, you bid on the lot," said Smith.

"Me? Hang me if I did," insisted the stranger.

"Why, did you not wink and keep winking?" asked Smith.

"Winking! Well, I did, and so did you at me. I thought you was winking as much as to say, 'keep dark; I'll stick somebody on this lot of stuff;' and I winked as much as to say, 'I'll be hanged if you don't, mister.'"

PATIENT WAITING.—At the — Hotel in Cairo, they are noted for despatch in filling orders for meals. If a warm dinner is ordered, some time is taken to cook it. Not long since I stopped there, and sat down at the table with an elderly gentleman, who ordered a squirrel. I waited some time for my dinner, but was almost through, and the old gentleman was still waiting for his squirrel. But his patience was at last exhausted, and he beckoned the steward to him and said:

"Has the man got a good gun?"

"What man?" asked the steward.

"The man that's gone to shoot the squirrel I ordered," said the old gentleman, with gravity.

Just then I choked, and did not hear the steward's answer; but I saw him disappear and in a few seconds the old gentleman was devouring his squirrel with apparent relish.

A CONVERT.—There was a great revival in the region where old Smithers, as everybody called him, lived, and it took hold of him one day. Smithers was a dreadful mean man, oppressive to the poor and all of that, and never paying a debt if he could help it. He had been known to turn a poor widow with a family of small children out into the street of a cold winter's day, because she was unable to pay the rent of the miserable shanty she had of him. He was known as "Old Smithers," although he wasn't so very old either, but we have noticed that mean men have the prefix old attached to their names generally, when their neighbors speak of them.

Old Smithers "took a habit," as they say in Wisconsin, to attend one of the "protracted meetings." He was struck with a conviction the first night, and hopefully converted, as he claimed, the next. After his conversion he was announced to address his fellow-sinners and sinnersesses on the following Sunday afternoon. The news that Old Smithers had got religion spread all about the neighborhood. Some doubted it; said he was putting it on so as to skin folks a little closer; others, more charitable, said it might be true, and they hoped he wouldn't be so mean in the future if it was.

When Sunday afternoon arrived the church was crowded. The entire neighborhood turned out to hear what so mean a man as Old Smithers would say for himself after passing through conviction and conversion. All was still in the church when Old Smithers arose to speak. He began by telling what a mean man he had been all his life. He said he had probably done more mean things than any man of his years and opportunities living, and if there was any mean thing he had failed to do, it was because he hadn't thought of it, or there was no good chance. After going somewhat into a detail regarding his meanness, astonishing even those who thought they knew him best, with the recital, and declaring his utter unworthiness, he resumed his seat.

There was a brief pause, after which a neighbor of Old Smithers, a member of the church, arose and said:

"I have lived nigh neighbor to Brother Smithers for a long time. I have just listened to Brother Smithers's remarks, and from an intimate acquaintance with him and his actions for many years, I am prepared to endorse in the fullest manner all the charges he has made against himself, and more too. He is certainly the meanest man I ever knew in the whole course of my life;" and sat down.

Then arose Old Smithers, pale and trembling with rage, and exclaimed:

"It's a d— lie, and I'll whip you as soon as you leave the church."

EXTRACT FROM A CELTIC LETTER.—Bridget darling, come across to me then; its myself is doing a nate business here with a son of Father Malone's—sure its with his brother I mane. He keeps a wishkey store here, and I does the waiten. He tould me the other morning that he had no money, and I tould him I would take part of the shtock every Saturday as wages; but says he, sure, Pat, if I pay you that way, I will soon have no shtock at all left, and you will have it all. Says I to him, says I, sure you can work for me then, alanna, and earn it back agin, and so we can keep it up, and be mashters month in and month out, and wages will come alsy to both of us."

A schoolmaster asked one of his boys, on a cold winter morning, what was the Latin word for cold. The boy hesitated a little, when the master said, "What, sirrah, can't you tell me?" "Yes sir," said the boy, "I have it at my finger ends."

THE HORSE CARS.

Never full, pack 'em in;
Move up, fat man; squeeze in, thin.
Market baskets without number,

Owners easy, nod in slumber.
Thirty seated, forty standing,
A dozen or more on either landing.

Toes are trod on, hats are smashed,
Dresses soiled, hoop skirts crashed.
Thieves are busy, bent on plunder;

Still we rattle on like thunder.
Packed together, unwashed bodies,
Bathed in fumes of whiskey toddies,

Tobacco, garlic, cheese and beer
Perfume the heated atmosphere;
Old boots, pipes, leather and tan,

And if in luck, a "soap fat man."
Aren't we jolly! What a blessing!
A horse-car hash, with such a dressing!

JAPANESE SCENES AND CUSTOMS.

We judge of things by making comparisons, and while we laugh or sneer at peculiarities in other nations, that seem such through their difference from our modes and manners, we forget that, if we were born and bred in one of those nations, it is very likely we there and our own. Whether we can lay more claim to refinement or civilization than the Japanese is a question; though we lead them in the matter of clothes, and have more steam engines than they, they lead us in many respects, and therefore, on the whole, the balance may be about equal, after all. Human nature is the same everywhere and in Japan and New England like leads to like in regulating intercourse and running the wheels of society—the same love, hate, generosity, ambition, revenge, virtue, exist in Japan and New England, exerting the same influence and working the same results. People exist, marry, trade and die, and arrive at the end of things about the same, though they do manage differently in the accomplishment, and a grave is a grave in one place as well as another. There is very little of the glory of dress and orange wreaths, and lace veils in a Japanese wedding, and the bride is less angelic in appearance than we are accustomed to see, but she is as beautiful maybe to her ardent groom, as if arrayed as sumptuously as a queen. Marriage is a very simple thing in Japan, with little of the fuss and feathers that attends the ceremony in more "civilized" lands. On the night appointed for a wedding in Japan, should laugh or sneer at peculiarities seen in this great and glorious land, as, being born and bred in Japan, or other foreign lands, would be equivalent to being a native, and customs there in that case would not seem so strange as now; with which very profound remark we introduce several scenes in Japan, showing the difference between the customs the bride's father, having invited all his kinsfolk, by a simpler mode than the many-card system of our own, entertains them previous to the bride's departure. About midnight the bridal party set out on palanquins, the bride first, then the bride's mother, and finally her father. The bride is attended by two servants, and the whole party proceed to the house of the bridegroom, accompanied by men bearing torches and lanterns. On arriving at the house, the bride, accompanied by two of her chosen friends, enters the room where the ceremony is to be celebrated. The formality of the marriage consists in drinking wine in a particular manner. The marriage is afterwards consecrated by the prayers and benedictions of the priests of the temple to which the young couple belong, and who there register it.

WOMEN OF JAPAN.

A glimpse of the humanity of Japan is seen in the following from a recent letter writer:

"The better class are a fine bold set of men. Like knights of old, they are ever ready to avenge a wrong, or even to provoke a quarrel; and with their terrible two-handed swords would be anything but contemptible antagonists in hand to hand fighting. Their manners are polished in the extreme. As a rule they are exceedingly good-natured, and have a keen sense of the ridiculous—rather too much so; for we believe that if the most dutiful son, possessed of the greatest filial piety, were to see his father dying, he could not repress a laugh if the old gentleman were to do so in at all a comical way. The Japanese ladies are almost as fair-skinned as their sisters of the West. Small but neatly—nay, sometimes faultlessly—shaped; their flowing robes displaying in its own gracefulness the model that nature has adopted, and which none of the meretricious deceptions of civilization can improve upon; with pretty, captivating manners, and a language musical and soft as Italian, the laughter-loving nymphs of the Rising Sun have many powerful charms. No one who has been in Japan will deny their claim to beauty."

Japanese towns, with their odd architecture, are exceedingly interesting to an observer, and we have a view of Oosaka, the second in Japan, in point of size, that commends itself to us by its picturesqueness. Its queer houses, walls, bridges, boats—the river flowing in the midst under the light of the new moon—form a picture "peculiar," but natural. Water, whether in Hindostan or Boston is the same—no change of language can affect the formula " H_2O ," and its ripple is a universal tongue. And the individual houses that compose these towns are as odd as the whole in combination. Each house has another house within itself. The outer house is thus described:

"Of the better classes, the houses are of stone, or are constructed of a frame-work of bamboo, or lath, covered with tenacious mud; this, being covered with a coat of plaster, is either painted or becomes bleached by exposure. Mouldings are often arranged in diagonal lines over the surface of the building, and these being painted white, and contrasting with the dark ground behind, give the house a curious piebald look. The roofs are often of tiles, colored alternately black and white, the eaves being extended low down in front of the walls, so as to protect the inmates from the sun, and the oiled paper windows from the effects of the rain. There are, besides, movable shutters, which by night are fastened to the posts which support the verandas. The inner house is a large frame-work raised two feet above the ground, and divided into several compartments by means of sliding panels. The raised floor, which extends over the whole area of the house, is covered with white mats, made soft and thick by being lined at the bottom with straw. These are very neatly woven and bound with cloth, and are all of the uniform size prescribed by law, being three feet by six, and placed in rows upon the floor so neatly as to have the appearance of one piece. Upon these mats the people sit to take their meals, to converse with their friends, and lie down at night to sleep, having then a quilted mat for a cover and a hard box for a pillow."

Ap[ro]pos of these pillows and the arrangements for sleeping in Japan, we have the following from a recent sojourner in Japan:

"As I was about to pass my first night in a Japanese house, I watched anxiously the preparations for sleeping. These were simple enough; a mattress in the form of a very thick quilt, about seven feet long by four wide, was spread on the floor; and over it was spread an ample robe, very long and heavily padded, and provided with very large sleeves. Having put on this night dress, the sleeper covers himself with another quilt, and sleeps, as if he has had some years' experience in the use of this bed. But the most remarkable feature about a Japanese bed is the pillow. This is a wooden box about four inches high, eight inches long and two inches wide at the top. It has a cushion of folded papers on the upper side to rest the neck on, for the elaborate manner of dressing the hair does not permit the Japanese, especially the women, to press the head on the pillow. Every morning the uppermost paper is taken off from the cushion, thus exposing a clean surface without the expense of washing a pillow-case. I passed a greater part of the night in learning how to poise my head in this novel manner, and when I finally closed my eyes, it was to dream that I was being chop-sticks, and accustoming my palate to raw fresh fish, but the attempt to balance my head on a two-inch pillow I gave up in despair, after trying in vain to secure the box by tying it to my neck and head."

slowly beheaded, and to wake at the crisis to find the pillow bottom-side up, and my neck resting on the sharp lower edge of the box. During my stay in the country, I acquired many of its customs, mastering the use of

The Japanese are especially favored with gods, deities abounding and controlling all the duties and destinies of life. Wayside temples and altars attract devotees everywhere, and they are seen kneeling before them with as much reverence as the Christian at his altar and apparently with as good an effect. The two religious systems in Japan are Shintuism and Buddhism. The Sun goddess, Ten-sio-dai-zin, is the chief deity of Shintuism; but there are thousands of inferior ones, called kami, of whom the greater number are deified men. It inculcates the worship of the kami, both in temples and private habitations, and pilgrimage at certain seasons. The principal decorations of their temples consist of images of the kami; a mirror, the emblem of the purity of the soul; and various strips of white paper, called gohei, also an emblem of purity. On festivals, the worshipper visits a temple, performs his ablutions in a reservoir provided for the purpose, kneels in the veranda, from whence, through a grated window, he gazes at the mirror, offers up his prayers, with his sacrifice of rice, fruit, tea, drops his coin into the money-box, and retires. Every principle, passion and virtue have godlike exponents, and temples where the votaries come, and in the home are altars erected to tutelary divinities, that do the worshipper much good, doubtless, or if they think so it is just as well. Justice is the divinity to whom appeal is made oftenest, as Justice is a virtue cultivated by the Japanese, but Mercy has her shrine to soften the visitings of the stern deity. Mercy is a female, of course, and combines all the graces that denote amiability of mind and temper. We may quote Bishop Heber, and sing of the "heathen in his blindness" bowing down to wood and stone, but, after all, does it not all amount to the same thing, Christianity and heathenism showing their works in the life? It is the sincere belief in both that influences for good—the belief sanctifies and quickens, and a professed Christian, without this, is no more than a professed heathen without it. The heart, which is beyond and above systems and nationalities, fills with devotion under this faith, which flows out into the life of Christian and heathen alike.

The natives of Japan appear to have an intense love and reverence for their own country, and every individual in the empire seems to have a deep and thorough appreciation of the natural beauties and delights of the country. To this the genial climate, the rich soil, and the variety of the surface contribute. The islands lie at such a latitude as to make the air in summer warm without being hot, and in winter cold without being raw. The soil, as in all recent lava soils, is of a rich black mould, raising the finest crops of millet, wheat and sugar-cane, and when supplied in unstinted profusion rearing splendid timber, or capable, when almost entirely withdrawn, of keeping life and vigor and seeding power in a pine tree of two inches in height. The trees have a tendency to break out into excrescences from plethora. The variety of surface arises from the great height to which the mountains rise in an island which slopes gradually from the mountain tops to the sea. Some of these ridges appear to rise to the height of Mont Blanc, one of them, Fusi-yama, being upwards of thirteen thousand feet in height, and it would appear that other ranges are higher. The great beauty of this mountain consists in its rising singly out of a low country with a beautifully-curved sweep to a conical apex; and the atmospheric effects changing from hour to hour, as it is seen from thirteen provinces, give such a variety to this single object that it is rightly called by a name to express the feeling that there are not two such in the world. The variations of atmospheric density make it look at one time much higher than at another. It may be seen with its head clear in the blue sky rising out of a thick base of clouds, or the clouds rise and roll in masses about the middle, leaving the gentle curve to be filled up by the mind's eye from the base to the apex. Again, the whole contour, in a sort of proud, queenly sweep, stands out against a cloudless ether, or with a little vapor drifting to leeward of the summit, giving the appearance of a crater, or, after a cool night in September, the eye is arrested by the appearance of the bursting downwards of a flattened shell, the pure white snow filling the valleys from the top, the haze of the morning half concealing the hill beneath. Every hour brings a change upon a landscape, which consists of a single object that the lover of nature can never weary of admiring, in a climate where seventy miles of atmosphere do not obscure the larger features on the face of the mountain to the naked eye.

Well may the Japanese have this admiration of their own country, and probably as they contemplate ours and us from that distant standpoint—seeing our costume of close-fitting suits, tight boots and high hats—reading of our costumes at weddings or worship—they may be led to say "How peculiar!" and congratulate themselves on their loose garments, felt shoes and turbans.

Mr. Pompelly, in his book upon Japan, thus speaks of the respect for the dead, evinced by the Japanese, and the cemeteries in which they are buried:

"These cities of the dead were always interesting to me. Often built on the side of a hill, covering a large area, and commanding a their construction. Thousands of small paved terraces, surrounded by stone balustrades, form family lots containing commemorative stones of every shape and size, and every variety of proper ornamentation. The sculptured inscriptions in the Chinese character always excited my admiration,

A TEMPLE AT TOKU-HAMA, JAPAN.

fine view, their neatly-kept avenues offer the place for quiet walks, where one is sure to find none of the revolting sights so common in China. On all that relates to their dead, the Japanese exhibit a refinement one does not expect to find out of Christian countries. Thus we find great care bestowed on the tombs, and much taste and art displayed in being much more finished than common with us. On the night of the festival corresponding with All Soul's Day, the cemeteries are illuminated with myriads of lanterns, which, seen from a distance, produce the effect of as many openings into a mountain burning within. Cremation and interment seem to be about equally practised, though it does not appear which is the more ancient custom."

The Japanese are very fond of amusements (the theatre with a sanguinary cast being the most prominent), skilled in, and admirers of, jugglery and athleticism. Not chaste as a people, grossness mingles with their performances and renders them disgusting often to civilized visitors. They are a cleanly people, and delight in the bath, public and private, but conventional restraints between the sexes are not regarded, and men, women and children indulge in the luxury together.

The widest distinction exists between the people and their rulers, the daimios, who and rode in his stocking feet. The stocking here is made of black cloth, and has a thumb to it, in which the great toe is received; and between this and the others passes the cord which laces the sandal to the foot and ankle. These Japanese nobility deport themselves quite haughtily towards their inferiors among the common people. As among themselves their manners are exceedingly urbane and deferential. Their two swords are omnipresent with them, projecting stiffly both behind and in front, and must be no small impediment to freedom of movement beyond that of the stiffest and most perpendicular courtesy. I saw one of these two-sworded Japs meet and accost a civilian, a well-dressed and good-looking man, but without insignia of rank. The greeting of the commoner was most profound in its humility. He did not quite prostrate himself prone in the mud, but placing his hands on his thighs, thence sliding them down on his knees, he bowed himself quite double repeatedly, again and again, keeping one eye cocked upon the daimio, to note by his expression when he might cease bowing, and when this was finished he still stood up with his hands clasped in a kind of beseeching attitude before the haughty yet handsome looking nobleman."

The besetting sin of the Japanese is drunkenness, the principal tiple that produces which is a liquor distilled from rice, and they drink to excess, all indulging in the use of it. There is no business done in the latter part of the day in consequence of this, and in the large cities it is often dangerous to walk the streets at that time, the people are in such a turbulent condition. The women are not permitted to join generally in these orgies, but have a period assigned them, wherein they can indulge to the top of their bent. At this time the masculines are excluded and allowed to get their own meals, or procure male assistance. At the expiration of the period allotted them, they are expected to fall at once into the old routine, but in case the wives of the lower classes do not recover in time they are liable to receive a severe beating.

Those foreigners who visit Japan are not so impressed with it that they care to remain there, and the Japs don't desire them to.

A SHRINE OF THE GODDESS OF MERCY.

use their power in the most arbitrary manner, the people having no voice in making law, and submitting to everything with the most abject willingness. "One afternoon," says Pompelly, "I met a Japanese nobleman of some degree or other, mounted on a scraggy-looking pony—their ponies are all such—and at his side was running a little retainer bearing his two swords, and a little behind was running another carrying his umbrella. Though going at full gallop, his retainers must keep up with him, and they were, therefore, in full run. But so agile were their movements that they did not appear to labor hard to keep their places. The daimio was handsomely clad in silk robes,

AN INTERNATIONAL YACHT RACE.

Some time in July we are to have an international yacht race, Mr. Bennett of New York having at length prevailed upon Mr. Ashbury of England to try conclusions for superiority. It is to be an ocean race from Kinsale Head to Sandy Hook and elsewhere as the parties may agree. Mr. Bennett owns the Dauntless, and Mr. Ashbury the Cambria. Both yachts are noted for their speed and sea-going qualities, but which is inferior to the other will be answered after the race, and even then the conclusions may not be satisfactory.

Mr. Ashbury proposes, after his arrival in this country, to contend for the plate won by the America in her great contest with a fleet of English yachts in English waters; but we trust that his proposal will not be accepted, for we must keep the prize which was so handsomely won. Let another piece of plate be put up and contended for, but not the prize which we have held for so many years. There is no fairness or justice in asking that it should be subjected to a contest, now that so many years have elapsed since it was won against great odds.

Mr. Bennett has made great exertions to get up an international race. He went to Europe with his yacht for that purpose. He won renown while there, but no prizes, for no one would accept his challenges unless certain stipulations were consented to, and to have accepted them would insure defeat, and Mr. Bennett was not ambitious of that. He wanted fair play or nothing. As he could not obtain it he returned home, and recently Mr. Ashbury was goaded into conceding something by the English press, so the race was arranged by telegraph, and, unless some further difficulty occurs, will come off, say about the fourth of July, both yachts starting from Kinsale Head, Ireland, for New York, at the same moment.

On page 812 we give our readers an excellent picture of the Cambria, under full sail, opposite the Royal Yacht Club House, West Cowes, England. She looks dangerous, as an antagonist, but still we trust that rough weather will be too much for her sailing qualities. We hope the Dauntless will win, but want no unfair advantage.

West Cowes is the headquarters of yachting. The Royal Yacht Club House—the subject of our illustration—is at West Cowes; and the Royal Thames Yacht Club make East Cowes their summer station. So that in the season Cowes is the rendezvous for whole fleets of the white-winged doves of the sea, presenting on gala and match days one of the most beautiful nautical sights in the kingdom.

The appearance of the town from the water, particularly when approached by the passage from Southampton, is extremely pleasing, as the acclivity of the hill on which it stands is sufficiently bold to admit of the houses being seen above each other, as if built in a succession of terraces. East Cowes is separated from West Cowes by the river Medina, which here joins the sea. It is a place of importance, having a capacious harbor and dockyard, and is also celebrated for the skill of its shipwrights in naval architecture, for here are built many of the yachts so celebrated in nautical annals, and a fleet of which we hope to see in American waters this summer.

Within the past quarter of a century the island, as the Isle of Wight is now affectionately designated by Englishmen, has grown more and more in public estimation, until at length it has become almost the accepted headquarters of those who love the soft pictures of pastoral and rural life, diversified by splendid mansions, parks, and groves, combined with the beauty and grandeur of the sea in all its moods. To those who when out for pleasure prefer the sea to the land, a voyage round the Isle of Wight is a positive delight. Going eastward from Cowes Harbor, either by steamer or sailing craft, the first objects presented to the eye are Norris Castle, the mansion of a private gentleman, and the Royal Palace of Osborne, with their extensive lawns sweeping to the shore, shaded by numerous groups of noble trees. Then, after passing one or two pretty creeks, there is a comprehensive view of the fashionable town of Ryde, and its famous pier. Hence to St. Helen's the coast forms several fine bays, lined with gentlemen's seats and villas, hamlets and luxuriant woods. Brading Haven, with the adjacent villages of Bamberidge, St. Helen's, and Brading—the whole encompassed by a semi-circular range of lofty hills—form a very agreeable picture.

Two miles further are the lofty Culver cliffs, forming the north side of Sandown Bay, on whose shores stand the village and fort of the same name. At the southern extremity of this extensive bay rise the dark precipices of Dunnose, penetrated by the Chines of gantic steps that seem to lead from the lofty hills on the shore to the summit of the grand, perpendicular wall that bounds it on the land side. East-end, the lovely village of Bon-

Shanklin and Luccombe. Near the latter commences the celebrated tract called the Undercliff, whose varied and unique charms are nowhere so advantageously seen as from the water, whence it rises like a series of gi-church, the prosperous town of Ventnor, and the stately castle of Sleephill, all come into view, and afford a sight that is worth a trip to England to view.

ANCIENT AND MODERN HAIR-DRESSING.

Since we published our last engraving of ancient and modern fashions—(see BALLOU'S MAGAZINE for January, 1870)—we have received more than twenty letters written by ladies of education and position, requesting us to give them some more illustra-that she is wrong and you are right? It has been tried, but no marked success reported as yet. If women think they look better with their hair frizzled, crimped, ratted, braided or waterfallled, and fashion leads the way, they will torture their tresses into won-tions of the "frights" of other days. Most of the letters contain postscripts (all letters written by ladies have postscripts), in which they state that the modern fashion for arranging the hair is far superior to the old, which we will admit without argument, for who can argue with a woman and convince her derful shapes, and men must admire but not condemn, for when the latter course is adopted they are told that they don't know "what they are talking about," which silences, if it does not convince.

We are pleased to comply with the request of our patrons, and present on this page an illustration of ancient and modern hair-dressing. No. 20 represents Marie de Medici, the great queen of the French, and it shows how, with false taste, she delighted to pile her hair, and no doubt the hair of others, in a huge tower upon her head. We can only say of her coiffure that it is not quite so bad as that of Queen Elizabeth and her ladies.

But good taste was very soon resumed. The hair was now parted horizontally across the brow—a very small portion cut short and allowed to fall as a fringe, sometimes straight, sometimes waved, occasionally curled in regular small ringlets, and commonly called the King Charles style. The rest of the head was dressed in short ringlets, graduated in length from the forehead, or a single long curl hung over the shoulder from the back. But the style shown in No. 21 preceded this. After the portion of hair had been combed as a fringe over the forehead, the rest, being brought back to the crown of the head, was made into a long plait and twisted into a knot, with the exception of the sides curled or frizzed out. At a later date tresses were curled, and allowed to fall behind on the poll of the neck, as in No. 23. A ribbon was often bound round the head like the Scotch snood. No. 22—a style coeval with No. 21, and almost the same in arrangement—is remarkable for the resemblance of the head-gear to that which we now adopt. The little flat crown of the bonnet can be seen on the top of the head; the broad strings are pinned in great loops each side of the chin, just as they used to be a few years since; while the mantilla veil falling round the head, and secured on the bosom by a brooch, is precisely like those seen a few months since.

Leaving the good taste of the seventeenth century with regret, we plunge at once into a period marked by the greatest monstrosities ever perpetrated in the world of hair-dressing, and alternately smile and wonder at the eccentricities of the eighteenth century. Matters began gently. The hair was simply raised at first over a cushion seven or eight inches in height, and shaped like a cocoanut. After a while, this headdress began to rise higher and higher. All sorts of objects were sought to be imitated in coiffures. Here a lady is represented with her hair dressed upright in the form of a lyre. There a second has hers arranged like a string of cherries on a stick (see No. 24). A third lady luxuriates in a huge mass rolled over pads, surmounted by a double fan of lace and artificial flowers.

These heads were dressed over solid cushions. An immense deal of false hair was used, and the mass cemented with a hard pomade of hog's lard and marrow, liberally used. After dressing, the whole was well powdered. As these chevelures took a long time, and were costly to arrange, it was not considered possible to remake them often; therefore one dressing usually sufficed for at least a month. Previously to any grand ball, ladies' heads were often dressed a week, and even a fortnight in advance. To have it dressed a night or two before was nothing. The lady sat up and slept in a chair in the interval, full of terror, lest, during her fitful slumbers, she should damage her coiffure. Paint and washes were in vogue. The fashion of wearing hair-powder was introduced to conceal the grayness of a certain high personage, whose name has not descended to us.

Early in the nineteenth century many wore the hair in a crop, and amongst a crowd of ugly modes one or two graceful ones can be discovered, such as No. 27.

We pass on to the days of bows, of which No. 28 is an illustration. A lady of this period, wore five bows and a bird of paradise feather for company. The French curls at each side of the face were fixed with tortoiseshell combs above them.

The more recent modes of hair-dressing can be remembered by most persons. The topknot twisted round and round with plaits; the fancy arrangement of plaits at the back of the head; the bands flat and looped near the ears; the puffs extended far out at either side of the face; the rolls of hair sloping from the forehead all round towards the back, in the Joan of Arc style, often encircled by a plait, called a coronet, of hair, and always ornamented with bows of ribbons, lace, or flowers placed at the nape of the neck; the mere loose thrusting of the hair into nets; the Empress style, first so censured as giving a bold look to the face; the chignon, and now the Watteau coiffure (see No. 29). The Watteau, at one time popular in Paris, is very graceful. It is not unlike some of the coiffures of the eighteenth century, sans powder. The double comb, with its rows of beads like nobs, was introduced by the Princess Metternich, one of the beauties of the French court and a leader of fashion.

But we have already exceeded our limits, and must close, hoping at some other time to resume the subject.

BALTIMORE—MERCHANTS' EXCHANGE.

Baltimore, the third city of the United States in point of size and importance, did not have existence as a town till 1729, though it was originally settled in 1633. That year the assembly of Maryland passed an act entitled—"An act for erecting a town on the north side of the Patapsco in Baltimore county," and the town at once assumed importance, absorbing the rival settlement of Jonestown, established in 1732, and taking rank as a commercial point. For this it is admirably suited. The arm of the Patapsco fort at Saller's Point, about eight miles below the city.

The general appearance of Baltimore is striking and picturesque, and it appears to advantage from nearly every point of view. It is regularly laid out, but not with the painful monotony of Philadelphia. Its surface is not so even, its streets are wide, and all remarkably cleanly, owing to excellent sewerage. Its climate is fine, and it is one of the healthiest cities in the world. An aspect of cheerful elegance pervades the place, which is on which Baltimore is situated is about three miles long, varying in length from one eighth to one and three-fourths of a mile, having its extreme breadth opposite to the eastern part of the city. This inlet gives an easy access to the place and a harbor sufficiently capacious to hold two thousand vessels. The harbor is divided into an outer and inner bay, the inner bay, or "The Basin," having but twelve feet of water and navigable but by small vessels; the outer capable of floating the largest merchant ships. The entrance is guarded by Fort McHenry and the peculiarly attractive to strangers. The larger mansions are in good taste, with generally handsome yards attached, giving an impression of ease and comfort, unlike those of the same class in other large cities that are crowded together. The smaller dwellings are neat and comfortable, with very rarely any squalid tenements, and for the most part bear the presentment of industry and thrift. Much of the light and pleasant character of the city proceeds from the material used in building—a clay dug in the vicinity, of fine grain and excellent color.

Baltimore is called "the Monumental City," and the different monuments that give it its name were noticed in a former number of our Magazine. There are, besides, many grand monuments of its greatness, in its public buildings—its schools, its cathedrals, its colleges and churches. Of these we present, on page 315, a picture of the Merchants' Exchange, on the corner of Gay and Pratt streets, a building of great importance to the mercantile portion of the city. The edifice was originally planned to combine a hotel, similar to the Boston Exchange, but it was speedily found, as in the case of the latter, that commercial business and hotel-keeping could not exist together, and therefore it was given up entirely for commercial purposes. It cost originally $600,000, and was and is regarded as a grand architectural specimen, its great dome being a conspicuous feature in the scenery as viewed from Federal Hill.

Another structure, represented on page 316, is the Calvert street railway station, the depot of the Baltimore and Susquehanna Railroad, a handsome freestone-front building, that when erected was regarded as the largest and most elegant in the country. There is, however, such a rivalry in railroad matters that it is impossible for one depot to remain long without a superior. The main edifice for the reception of the cars is 315 feet long and 120 wide, is supported by 42 granite columns, and roofed with sheet iron.

Calvert, the name of the street on which this station is situated, is a name respected by Marylanders, as it was to the Calverts, father and son, Lords Baltimore, that Maryland was originally indebted for its charter.

The former was a favorite of James I., man- gre his Catholic sentiments, who kept him in his privy council though he was compelled to resign as secretary of state, and created him Baron Baltimore, of Longford, Ireland. Calvert had long been imbued with the idea of planting colonial establishments in America, and obtained a grant from King James, which created him sole lord and proprietor of a part of Newfoundland, and with all the rights and privileges of nobility. He called it Ferryland, and after spending £25,000 in improvements, including a splendid residence, he came over to take possession, but was much disappointed. After a few years he abandoned the colony and went to Virginia, where they did not receive him very well, and he returned to England. He was delighted, however, with Chesapeake Bay, its tributaries and climate, giving his name to the oriole, and adopting its beautiful black and orange plumage for his livery. He came back to Newfoundland, and afterwards had the location of his grant changed to include the territory now forming the States of Maryland and Delaware, but he died before taking possession, and the charter was renewed to his son Cecilus, June 20, 1632, in which Lord Baltimore held tenure by payment of two Indian arrows yearly. This Lord Baltimore never visited his possession, but his power was conveyed to his brother Leonard, who was the first governor of Maryland, leaving Cowes, in 1633, with two hundred persons, in the Ark, a ship of three hundred tons, and the Dove, of fifty tons, the shallow of Lord Baltimore. The original name of the city was St. Mary.

JOHN ROGERS.

Those familiar with that classic, "Foxe's Book of the Martyrs," have been attracted by the picture of the good John Rogers, surrounded by his wife and ten children, to whom he is addressing words of spiritual consolation, while he is bound to a stake, his body wreathed in flame. Few have read this without a feeling of intense pity for the unfortunate man, thus given to sacrifice, and indignation at the bigotry that consigned him to this cruel death. The depicted grief of the wife and children added also to the tide of sympathy, and the mute appeal of that ridiculous wood cut was more potent against Catholicism than all the preaching of all the pulpits. The Catholic church has found that simple "Book of Martyrs," full of misrepresentation, doubtless, and pious fraud, the most effective worker in the cause of the opposition, against which no refutation or explanation could avail. It is said that every back is fitted for its burden, and martyrdom was easy to those who encountered it with a temper as fierce as those who inflicted it. There was on one hand the holy spite of the church that sought God's service through the punishment of heresy by the stake, and on the other the holy temper of resistance that gloried in principle, and held to it with a fierceness which verified the promise that, when imbued with the spirit of God, no harm should happen to the possessor. No more pain was felt by a good, zealous martyr, than was felt by the Indian who, when put to the torture, taunted his captors with not knowing their business, and begged them to be kind enough to bring along more pitch-pine splinters with which to pinfeather his body.

not popular and a silver dollar or a number of them will turn the scale at almost any time against duty. He was born in England about the year 1500, and was burnt at Smithfield, now part of London, Feb. 4, 1555. He was educated at Cambridge, and took orders. He was subsequently appointed chaplain of the English factories at Antwerp, and there he became acquainted with Tindal and Coverdale, and assisted them in translating

John Rogers, whose portrait graces the present number, was a noted martyr, and stands as a model of firmness and persistency during the martyr period. The stake had no terrors for him—it was a light affliction; the presence of his family diverted not his mind from the sacrifice he was to make, that doubtless would have been spared him had he recanted, and so he remained true and went to heaven in a chariot of fire, for which we all admire him at a time when martyrdom is the Scriptures into English, which was published in 1537. From Antwerp he went to Wurtemberg, where he was pastor of a Dutch congregation. On the accession of Edward VI., Bishop Ridley invited him home, and made him prebendary and divinity reader of St. Paul's. On the Sunday after Queen Mary's entrance into London, he preached a sermon at St. Paul's cross, in which he exhorted the people to hold fast to the faith as taught in King Edward's days, and to resist the forms and dogmas of Catholicism. There was no press to give publicity to this sermon, and probably but a small handful heard it, and yet it immediately reached the ears of the Privy Council, before which he was summoned to answer for the offence, and so ably defended himself that he was discharged. But on the 18th of August, 1553, he was ordered to remain a prisoner at his own house, and at the end of six months was removed to Newgate. He was tried Jan., 1555, before the Bishop of Winchester, and despite his own ability and such efforts as his friends tremblingly dared put forth in his defence, he was adjudged guilty of heresy, and condemned to death, by burning. This sentence was received with as much coolness as though his worship, the bishop, had invited him to dinner, and he endured the ordeal as though it were a festival. Several of his grandchildren came over to this country with the early settlers, and it is a matter of boast with thousands that they bear the blood of the martyr. During the persecutions of the early Christians, an immense number of martyrs suffered for the faith. We read that the cheerful and musical Nero caused Christians, at Rome, to be smeared with pitch and set fire to, standing them up blazing by the side of the streets for torches. St. Lawrence was broiled on a huge gridiron. At Lyons, under Marcus Aurelius, Sts. Maturus and Sanctus were roasted in a red-hot iron chair, and St. Blandina, at the same period, was scourged, torn by wild beasts, partly roasted on the iron chair, put into a net and tossed by a bull, and finally despatched with the sword. These, however, are not of the John Rogers class of martyrs, who suffered from the Catholic church, as the early Christians had from the heathen.

The literature from which we have quoted we do not regard as wholesome and therefore do not commend it, but there is a library of volumes relating to the early martyrs, by Bolland, of Belgium, and his successors, and the Acta Sanctorum is a grand authority in the Catholic church. The Book of Protestant martyrs, by Foxe, is also a bloody and fiery record, and those who like to read such things may "sup full of horrors" by procuring it.

The face of our martyr is a very pleasing one, combining great sweetness and firmness, and we see evidence of its authenticity in the lines of resolution and deep reflection that distinguish it. There was no bending to that calm and placid nature. He had embraced the truth, it had become a part of his being, and all the influences of the earth could not prevail against it. Such characters are glorious to contemplate, who will stand up, if need be, alone in defence of principle, and die rather than abandon it.

THE APRIL LESSON.

BY J. J. COLBATH.

Roaming by the woodside

In the April day,
Ere the wandering birds had ventured back,
When the skies with frequent storms were black,

And the ice still lay on the travelled track,
We took our joyful way.

Glad that the dreary winter

Its fearful rage had spent,
Hopful and gay at the promised boon
Of the brighter scenes to open soon,
Of the buds of spring and the flowers of June,
With grateful feelings blent.

As onward thus we wandered—

Margaret and I—
Feeling the chill air round us blow,
The failing breath of the passing snow,—
Feeling the sun's increasing glow,
From the brightening April sky,—

Close by our path appearing,— Spring's gracious harbinger,—

We spied, in the cold ungenial hour,
A tiny and unpretending flower,
That had heard spring's call in its sylvan bower,
And was thus soon astir.

We plucked the tiny blossom—

A very floral gem—
A rescue from the surrounding gloom,
A thing of beauty and rarest bloom,
Whose wealth of hue and sweet perfume
Might grace a diadem.

And with it came a meaning,

More than words can say;
Fidelity was the lesson given:
It heard, undoubting, the call of heaven,
And straight its icy bands were riven,
Upon that April day.

And upward brightly springing,
 In innocence true,
 Its duty simply the earth to deck,
 No doubt to chill and no fears to check
 It blossomed alone, nor felt to reek
 Though none its form might view.

O salutary lesson,
 The simple flower imparts!
 Could we our summons thus obey,
 And spring to our duties without delay,
 How grand a service would crown our day—
 What glory fill our hearts!

THE STRUGGLE FOR MAVERICK.

A Dramatic Story....In Three Parts.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

PART SECOND.—VII.

THE crevice through which Laura Maverick now surveyed the chamber where her dying uncle lay, was not wider than her finger; so narrow that of itself it could never lead to the discovery of the concealed passage where she stood. The bed was directly in front of her, with the footboard against the wall, so that Augustus Maverick's face was directly toward her, and not more than eight feet off. Her range of vision took in the door leading into the next room—and in fact, all of the room excepting a part of the ceiling above the bed, and a part of the wall to her right. The door was closed; the chamber had but two occupants.

Mr. Jenks, the lawyer, sat at a small stand close to the bedside; a full-faced, bald-headed man of the middle age, with not a line or wrinkle in his smooth countenance. He was writing rapidly with a quill-pen which kept up an incessant scratching sound. At intervals he cast a glance at the occupant of the bed, and let his eyes fall immediately back to the paper. They were keen little eyes, and relieved the serious face beneath them with an expression of peculiar acuteness.

He had written but two or three minutes after the concealed watcher had taken her place, when he laid down his pen and lifted his eyes toward the sick man.

"I have made the formal beginning, Mr. Maverick," he said. "Now please tell me in your own way who is to have your property, and in what proportions."

Laura Maverick's eyes turned from their close watch of the lawyer's proceedings, to the occupant of the bed. Propped up to a half-sitting posture by two pillows placed beneath his back, and with his poor, wasted hands lying helpless outside of the coverlet, Augustus Maverick presented in himself a picture of weakness and emaciation dreadful to behold. Nobody who had ever seen him in the days of robust health could have recognized him; any one who had known him then must have been shocked to be told that this was the dismal wreck of that proud, vigorous man. His chest was fallen away so that his head, unless placed back, as it was now, hung helplessly down; his face was attenuated so that it had more of the ghastly look of a skeleton-face than of a living one; the hair had mostly fallen off, and the eyes gleamed with unnatural brightness, deep sunken in their hollowed sockets. The wind of dissipation, of excess, of sin, had been sown by this man in his youth and manhood; the whirlwind of wrath was upon him, and about to sweep him into the grave at an age when most men are but on the threshold of a useful, healthy after-life.

His eyes turned to the lawyer, and they seemed to brighten with an intenser light than before. He spoke with painful effort, which agitated the wrinkled skin upon his face; and Laura heard his answer, though it was given very faintly.

"You mean the will?" he said.

"Yes—certainly," said the lawyer. He rose and came close to the bedside, and bent over it with a look that showed that he suspected the other to be out of his head. "The will, of course, Mr. Maverick; don't you know what we were just talking about?"

"A little nearer," Maverick whispered, trying hard to speak aloud, but the effort ended only in a hoarse, hollow whisper. Mr. Jenks put his ear down nearly to his mouth. "How long have you been here? I remember that Mrs. Roesselle brought you in, and we talked; but—but—"

"Only about half an hour," the lawyer interrupted. "Do you feel well enough to go on, Mr. Maverick? I do not think it will take long; and I need ask you only a few questions."

"Yes—yes; go on." The dying man exhibited a decision in his reply, wrrenched as the words were from his half-palsied tongue, that was unmistakable. "I see; I have been wandering for a few minutes, and I woke up bewildered; but I know now; I remember. We were talking about the will; yes, I wanted to make a will. Mrs. Roesselle spoke to me about it, good creature; I never thought she knew so much. She told me that Oliver Maverick would have the property when—when—when I couldn't use it any more, unless I made a will; I knew that before, but I never thought of it for years. Yes, I want to make a will, for I suppose I shall go before long."

Unused to so much speech, he closed his eyes and lay exhausted for a moment. When he opened them again, the lawyer repeated his question.

"I want to know who is to have the property, Mr. Maverick—and in what shares."

"There is only one to have it," was the reply.

"What—one person to have the whole?" Mr. Jenks asked, in great surprise. Maverick alighty moved his head in assent.

The lawyer softly rubbed his hands together. "It'll be a lucky man!" he said; and he chuckled at the thought of such rare good fortune. "All the farm here—three hundred acres of it, if there's one, with the mansion, and everything on the place; all the bank-stock, and the accumulated dividends, which I know you haven't used; all the bonds and mortgages, and back interest on some of them; all the estate, real and personal—why, sir, he'll be the richest man between Albany and New York! Faith, if I have the management of the law part of his estate, my son Jack must take all the rest of the firm's business. Just think, Mr. Maverick; is it all to go to one person?"

"All," was the decided whisper.

"And who is the lucky one?"

Laura Maverick had stood upon her tiptoes until now, painfully supporting herself in this constrained and unnatural position by sheer force of will when the strength of her muscles had become exhausted; but at this instant the limit of her endurance was reached, and she sank to the floor. As she put out her hand to assist her in rising, it rested on a small, rough box, such as carpenters make to hold their nails; and placing it bottom upward against the partition, she stood upon it, and again looked through the crevice.

But the name of the future owner of Maverick had been pronounced! Mr. Jenks stood as before by the bedside, a look of tremendous astonishment covering his face; and with her heart sinking with disappointment at the loss of this precious knowledge, Laura watched and listened with redoubled vigilance.

"I suppose there's nothing in law against it?" Augustus Maverick whispered.

"No," replied the lawyer. "Any man, being in possession of his natural and sufficient faculties, may dispose of his property to whomever he pleases, and the disposition will become valid in law. But do you not forget the servants? Some of them have been in the house longer than you can remember; some of them are getting old and decrepid. Wont you remember them?"

"The servants?" whispered the other angrily. "Haven't they been hired, and paid for what they've done? I suppose they'll get all that's due them anyway?"

Mr. Jenks nodded.

"That's all they are entitled to. Draw the will, give it all to the one I said."

For a few moments more the suppressed tones of the lawyer and the hoarse but distinct whisperings of the sick man were silent. The latter lay perfectly quiet, with closed eyes, apparently weak almost unto death; and the former resumed his seat by the stand, and again wrote rapidly upon the paper. Suddenly he stopped, and went to the bedside again. He placed his own fair, smooth hand upon the wrinkled, emaciated ones of Augustus Maverick, and the latter opened his eyes.

"Brandy!" he whispered, very faintly. Mr. Jenks took a vial and a teaspoon from the mantel, and administered a dose of the liquid to the dying man. His eyes brightened again, and looked questioningly up to the lawyer's face.

"It is not necessary to give any reason for what you have told me to do," said Mr. Jenks. "The law gives you the right to do it, if you wish to. But where there are good reasons for the doing of so unusual an act as this, it is better to state them. I will ask you plainly why you wish to leave all your estate to this person."

The palsied body of Augustus Maverick could not move, however much he might be affected in his feelings by any impression. A nervous twitching of the wrinkles that were folded away from his thin lips, and the startled, furtive glancing of his eyes toward the lawyer's face were the only signs which now indicated that anything had occurred to arouse him in an unusual degree. Several times he seemed about to speak, and each time did Mr. Jenks bend down to hear what he would say; but it was not until he had made several ineffectual efforts that he could put his thought in words. It seemed to the watcher that he hesitated at this moment, not so much from physical weakness as to select the words that he wished to use.

He spoke, at last; but the creaking of the bed, as the lawyer leaned both of his hands upon it, to steady him in his stooping posture, made it impossible for Laura to hear every word. Those that did reach her ear were disconnected, and were as follows:

"Because—than the others—good to me—faithful—watched—deserves it."

Mr. Jenks moved his head in assent when the last words were spoken, and returned to his seat at the stand. For the next ten minutes the silence of the room was only broken by the rapid scratching of his pen, while the occupant of the bed lay watching him, with his eyes wide open, under the stimulus of the brandy.

"It will need an executor," the lawyer said, looking up. "Who shall it be?"

He went to the bed again, and some words were whispered to him which were entirely inaudible to Laura. Mr. Jenks crossed the room and opened the door, and through the opening Laura saw like a picture in its frame, the table, the lighted lamp, the armchair beyond, with the portly form of Granny Wadhams reposing in it, Roscoe Grayle reading at the table, and the housekeeper sitting thoughtfully by it without manual occupation. She looked up quickly as the door was opened, and arose on Mr. Jenks's motion. A whisper passed between them, and then the lawyer returned immediately to the stand, shutting the door after him. Rapidly his hand traced the concluding sentences of the will, and presently he laid down the pen and arose, holding in his hand a single sheet, still wet with ink.

"It is ready to be signed, Mr. Maverick," he said. "You must first hear it read. Do you desire any one to hear it read with you?"

The question was answered by a faint negative. Mr. Jenks drew his chair close to the bedside, and in a voice that was perfectly distinct to Laura, but still low, read the instrument through.

"IN THE NAME OF GOD, AMEN! I, Augustus Maverick, being at this date in the fiftieth year of my life, and of sound mind and memory, but feeling seriously admonished by the pains of my present sickness that my last end is approaching; and being anxious to settle and make certain the manner in which my property shall be disposed after my decease, do hereby make, publish, and declare my Last Will and Testament, in manner as follows; that is to say:

"I give, devise, and bequeath, to ANNA MARIA MAY, the adopted daughter of my housekeeper, Helen Roesselle, to have and to hold to her and her heirs forever, all the estate real and personal, of whatsoever name, kind, or nature, and wheresoever situated, and by whosoever held, of which I shall die seized: hereby constituting the said Anna my sole and only devisee and legatee, to the entire exclusion of all and every other person and persons whomsoever.

"And in making this final disposition of my property, I hereby declare that I am moved so to do by a grateful recognition of the many acts of kindness which the said Anna has done in my behalf since she has been an inmate of my house, and in the unwearying patience, more especially, with which she has watched at my bedside during the long and painful duration of this, my last sickness.

"And I hereby appoint the said Helen Roesselle sole executrix of this, my last will and testament.

"In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal, the twenty-first day of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty."

Mr. Jenks read it through, and concluding the reading, saw that Augustus Maverick was attentively listening.

"Is it just as you would have it?" the lawyer asked. "Do you want anything further in it?"

"It is right," was the whispered answer.

"Who shall witness it? There must be two."

"You and the housekeeper."

Mr. Jenks called in the latter, and shut the door after her. Then holding up the writing, he placed it upon a large book, and put the pen into the benumbed hand that lay outside the coverlet. But its power was gone—it had hardly the force to move itself a foot in any direction, and the stiffened fingers refused to grasp the pen. In answer to the sick man's mute appeal the lawyer took hold of the fingers, bent them about the quill, and guided them to write roughly the name "Augustus Maverick" opposite the seal.

"Mr. Maverick, is this your last will and testament?" the lawyer asked, in a louder voice than he had yet used. A slight movement of the head gave his assent.

"Do you wish Mrs. Roesselle and myself to subscribe it as witnesses?"

Another motion assented. The lawyer turned to the stand and added an attesting clause to the instrument; and then wrote his name and residence beneath it in large characters. Mrs. Roesselle followed with her signature; and then Mr. Jenks folded the sheet, sealed it up in a large envelop, and indorsed upon the back the words, "Augustus Maverick's Will—May 21, 1850."

"Where shall it be kept?" he inquired, holding it out toward the bed.

The poor, helpless hands started and moved a little upon the coverlet as the paralytic strove to hold them forth and take the envelop; but the effort was useless.

"Put it under my pillow," he whispered with fretful petulance. "Mrs. Roesselle will take it when—when—I'm—dead."

The exertion of this interview, unusual and protracted as it was, had exhausted his slender strength; and he only saw that Mr. Jenks had complied with his directions, placing the envelop between the sheet and the lower pillow, before he dropped off into a deep sleep. The lawyer exchanged a few words in whisper with the housekeeper, and the latter called in Mrs. Wadhams, who took her usual seat by the bed. Through the open door Laura saw Mr. Grayle composing himself sleepily upon a sofa. Mr. Jenks and Mrs. Roesselle left the room, and Laura silently traversed the passage, crept through the opening into the closet, and replaced the panel. A pencil of light through the key-hole of the closet-door told her that Mrs. Roesselle was lighting the lawyer down stairs. She waited until it had disappeared, and nothing could be heard; and then piling back the rubbish upon the panel, and waiting an instant longer, for safety, she emerged from the closet, shut the door, and returned undiscovered to the chamber where her father waited for her in torturing suspense.

At the back door of the great hall on the first floor, as Mr. Jenks turned from Toby Small standing with the information, "Yer hoos ready, sir," to say good-night to Mrs. Roesselle, this man of hard facts and dry principles, who was not accustomed to be astonished at anything, was fairly startled into an abrupt expression to see the housekeeper's face dreadfully pale, and a look of the most agonizing anxiety upon it. "Good heavens, madam, what is the matter?" he asked. "Are you ill?"

"No sir," she said, in her usual tone. "But I want you to tell me, Mr. Jenks, to whom the will gives the property." A surprised shake of the head answered her. "You don't know what right I have to ask," she pleaded. "I hope and expect that it is just as it should be; but I know that fraud and wrong are waiting to deprive that person of the estate, if it can be accomplished. Sir, these influences are now, at this moment, beneath this roof! I do not ask this information from mere curiosity, but that I may be able to protect the weak against the wicked and designing." And then she repeated the request with renewed earnestness.

"Positively, I never did such a thing in my life!" Mr. Jenks exclaimed. "Why, madam, it's unprofessional in the highest degree; I can't think of it."

"Consider," urged she, "that I am named executrix in the will. Consider that Augustus Maverick has at best but a very few hours to live, and that in those few hours the craft and subtlety of an unscrupulous man and woman will be actively at work to defeat the operation of this will—provided that its provisions are as I hope they are, and they can leave it. Perhaps I am over-anxious and over-fearful; but I can't help it. I have prayed for a consummation that I hope is coming; I was hardy enough to tell that man what no one else could have told him, that he was dying, and must make his will; and I want to know whether he has done what he knows he should do—what I know he should do—but what I dared not ask him to do. Please tell me, Mr. Jenks; you have known me a great many years, and you surely can trust me."

"This is very extraordinary indeed," replied the lawyer. "All that you tell me is extraordinary, as well as surprising to me. As you observe, I have known you a great many years; and I know you can be trusted to an unlimited extent. Now I do not fear for a moment that you would communicate this information to any person, or even the fact that you had it; I simply hesitate to violate a fixed rule of the profession. Yet the statements you make clearly show to me that if in any case such a revelation as you ask could be properly made, it would be under circumstances like these. You may be gratified to know, madam, that I am trusting you further than Andrew Jenks ever yet trusted any human being. The will gives the property to your adopted daughter, Miss May."

"All of it?"

"The whole."

"Thank you, sir, you have lightened my heart more than I can tell you. Your confidence is not misplaced."

"Good-night, Mrs. Roesselle."

"Good-night, sir."

The housekeeper closed and locked the door after him, and an expression of triumphant joy irradiated her face. The consummation for which she had prayed was at hand; Augustus Maverick had done exactly the thing that she had not dared ask him to do, lest she should anger him against it. With a fervent "thank God!" upon her lips she returned to the room where she had left her nephew, and where she proposed to alternate with him in watching out the night.

And overhead, in Oliver Maverick's chamber, there were two others who relieved each other through the long night in watching. Within one hour after Laura had placed her father in possession of the secret of the sick-chamber, the audacious plot was formed, the execution of which would give them all that they sought; and by turns they watched and listened with open door, sometimes in the hall, and sometimes on the stairs, for the cry, the flurry, the token, whatever it might be, that the soul of Augustus Maverick was quitting its miserable tenement.

The token came not that night. The sun of another day rose upon the master of Maverick living, and the plot of the conspirators was changed in the first hour of the new morning.

VIII.

THE doctor was at the house before breakfast. He found his patient had been surely sinking during the night, and now lay in a kind of torpor from which he was awakened by the administration of another stimulant.

"I think there is nothing further here for me to do," he said to Mrs. Roesselle. "Left alone, this man would certainly die before noon. He can be kept alive for some hours longer than that by stimulants, which you can give him as well as I. A teaspoonful of brandy once an hour, or oftener, will prolong his existence a little, and you can give it as often as he appears to sink. I will call to-morrow morning, but I do not expect to find him alive."

Roscoe Grayle did not join the others at the breakfast table, having volunteered to continue his watch until Anna could relieve him. The rest were all present; and such a breakfast as that this mansion had never seen. People who were plotting and counter-plotting against each other sat at the same board, with an assumed cordiality that to a stranger might have passed for the real sentiment, and conversed with a hollow politeness upon indifferent topics, when anxiety was preying on their hearts in regard to a matter of transcendent importance in which their interests were hostile to the point of enmity. But as we often cloak our feelings and smooth our fears in the company of those whom we could secretly wish buried under Mont Blanc, so did this company sip their coffee and eat their toast with sweet, and gracious, and cordial smiles.

Mrs. Roesselle appeared at the head of the table, and presided over it with matronly grace and unruffled benignity. She had some difficulty in repressing that smile of quiet triumph, as she thought of the events of the night; but self-control was with her a matter of habit, and no one could have told from the appearance of her face that she had any recent cause for either joy or sorrow. Her bearing was so different from that of the previous day that Oliver Maverick had no difficulty in understanding from it that she not only knew the fact that his brother had made his will, but also who was the party most interested in it. And with his own face expressing an unlimited quantity of polite and complaisant deference, he thought behind his inverted coffee-cup—Ah, madam—if you only knew of all that happened in this house last night!

Anna May, as unsuspecting as she was uninformed of the events of the night, or any of them, and utterly ignorant that those events had made herself an object of jealous care as well as of bitter hatred to some of those about her, and knowing only that these were unwelcome guests at Maverick, to be treated with courtesy but not with any excess of hospitality, strove to maintain a quiet, commonplace conversation with Laura. It was their first meeting; Laura had almost forgotten that her father had mentioned to her at the cottage the existence of such a person; and when she had heard the name read on the previous night from the will, she could not at first recall where she had heard it before. To tell what anger, what unconquerable passion Laura Maverick smothered down at the sight of this simple charity-child, as she considered her, to whom her uncle had chosen to give his estate in preference to those of near kin to him, would be impossible. She was just equal to the task, and no more; and when, in addition to this, her sense suggested to her that prudence as well as policy required her to meet Anna May half way in her efforts at sociability, she found a harder task before her than she had ever been required to perform. And but for that wild ambition in her heart, her determination to succeed, and the thought of the darling purpose itself that had brought her here, she never could have succeeded as she did in wearing the mask. In short, these people met around that table, and acted a better play with greater skill than my reader and I can ever hope to see on theatrical boards.

A female servant brought in the coffee-urn, and took her place behind the housekeeper's chair, as if to wait on the table; but Mrs. Roesselle remarked to her:

"You need not stay, Jane; we will help ourselves. I want you to be in readiness to attend to the wants of Mr. and Miss Maverick to-day."

The girl said "Yes, ma'am," and left the room.

"I hope, madam," Oliver Maverick remarked, with excessive deference in his tone, "that you are not suffering yourself to be discommoded in this very inconsiderable matter of attendance upon us. I do assure you that Jerry has waited upon us with the most scrupulous fidelity, and that he is in every respect satisfactory. Is not this true, Laura?"

"Most certainly, father."

"I regret to say, however," the housekeeper dryly said, "that circumstances will prevent his further attendance upon you."

Oliver Maverick instantly fortified himself for a disagreeable revelation, and simply remarked,

"Ah?"

It was an exclamation that was not in the least expressive of curiosity; it simply seemed to fall into the current of conversation to give it direction. Mrs. Roesselle was looking straight at him, and he knew it; and anticipating what was coming, he trod warningly upon Laura's slipper under the table, and begged Miss May to pass the butter.

"I found him too officious to suit me, and I discharged him," said the lady.

Mr. Maverick simply said he was sorry, for the man's sake; and Laura observed to Miss May that it was difficult indeed to get along with most servants.

The good housekeeper had purposely delivered this piece of domestic news at this time, expecting to startle one or both of her guests into the exhibition of something more than a passing interest in the matter; and she most signally failed. She did not cause even a ripple of excitement or interest at the table; and it required some effort on her part to conceal the disappointment which she felt at the result.

"I have entirely mistaken them," she thought, "or they are both well skilled in the cunning of wary rascals."

The information, however, was true, as Oliver Maverick subsequently satisfied himself. Toby Small, jealously watchful of the interests of Mrs. Roesselle, who was the old fellow's best friend and particular favorite, had observed with increasing curiosity the inquisitiveness of his son, between whom and the old man there was nothing like affection; and his conduct at the stable particularly excited Toby's attention. "I'll know more about this," the old man determined; and upon his return from the village with Mr. Jenks, he came directly into the house, leaving the horses to be cared for by the hostler. It was somewhat difficult for the old man to get about, and he was some time in satisfying himself that Jerry had gone up stairs; and when he had done this he resolved to follow, thinking that if the housekeeper found him above, where he was never expected to be, he would simply tell her his suspicions, and what he was after. The result of his investigations was communicated to Mrs. Roesselle very soon after she arose in the morning.

"I thought summat was up, marm, from Jerry's sneaking way and great curiosity lately; and I watched him. I got into a dark corner of the hall, and saw him come down very sliily from above, and skulk into the room. Pretty soon after you came up from below with your black box, and went in too; and then I thought Master Jerry'd be caught at his tricks. But I guess he wasn't, for pretty soon he comes out as sly as ever, and scuttles back up stairs again. It's my opinion, marm, that he was sent down by them people to find out what neither he nor they had any business to know; and I'm in duty bound to tell you about it."

The housekeeper dismissed honest Toby with her thanks; and forthwith summoned

Jerry. He came directly, and she abruptly charged him with spying over the house in the employment of Oliver Maverick. The charge was so unexpected that the man exhibited much confusion; and without waiting for any explanation, he was summarily discharged and ordered to quit the house at once. At the house of a friend in the neighborhood he awaited the issue of the events at Maverick, in which he had up to the time borne an important, if despicable part.

The incident will illustrate how wide-awake the housekeeper had become to the probable designs of her troublesome guests, and how jealously she regarded their actions. Nothing but the very greatest offence ever caused the dismissal of one of the established and trusted servants of the house, and neither herself nor Mr. Terry, in his supervision of the out-door laborers, ever exercised this power without what they deemed ample cause. Nor had the housekeeper any doubt as to the propriety of her action in this case until she saw how coolly the news of his dismissal was heard by those whom she supposed to be chiefly concerned in it.

"I don't know what to think of them," was her afterthought. "If he was their spy, and if they have any sinister designs here, the step I have taken ought to disarrange their plans; and the knowledge of it ought to make them show some confusion. But here they are, as cool as though I had said nothing more than good-morning. Perhaps I am mistaken about Jerry. No matter; if I am it is a mistake on the right side. I could not with prudence have done anything else; and I can set myself right about Jerry when I discover that he has been wronged. A few hours will show."

The meal was concluded without any reference having been made to the condition of Augustus Maverick, although it was apparent to Laura that the girl had been sent away from the table lest some allusion might be made which was not for the servants' ears. Mrs. Roesselle arose, and the others with her; and as they left the room, Oliver Maverick said to her, aside:

"I have heard nothing as yet, this morning, of the condition of my brother."

"The doctor has seen him again," was the reply, "and thinks that his end is fast approaching."

"I hope and trust that we shall have timely warning of the moment."

"You have my word to that effect," was the reply; and giving him no opportunity for further conversation, the housekeeper preceded him up stairs, and went to relieve Mr. Grayle. The latter lingered in the hall a moment as he saw Laura Maverick and her father going up to their room; and when they were out of sight, he descended to his breakfast, and found Anna May at the coffee-urn, the housekeeper having requested her to remain. The young man was as far from entertaining any suspicions of the night before as Anna herself; saving that he knew of the visit of a professional-looking gentleman, and readily divined the general object of his visit. That was all.

Again in private, Oliver Maverick and his daughter conferred anxiously together.

"We can easily see that our object is suspected," he said, "and that a vigilant watch is being kept over the chamber where Augustus lies. And it is perfectly clear to me that if we are ever admitted to that chamber before he dies, and before the will is removed from his pillow, it must be by some other agency than that of this lynx-eyed housekeeper. She knows exactly what we would do if we had the chance, and exactly what is necessary for her to do to keep that chance from us; and she is doing it with a vengeance. Our plan is a bold one, and promises success, if we only have an opportunity to try it. But how do we know that he will live till night? He is liable to drop off at any moment; and then farewell to all our hopes. Laura, we are playing for too high a stake to risk what may happen if we remain all day in this room. We—one of us, certainly—must be near that chamber, to take advantage of what may at any instant happen."

She looked at him in thoughtful silence.

"I can risk the night, if we do not reach it as we hope; but the day may defeat us."

"It must not," her father returned. "Write her a note, and send Jane down with it. Offer to help them in the sick-room. I want to see what she will say; and I have another card, if that fails."

A few moments later the girl tapped at the outer door of the suite of rooms, and delivered to the housekeeper a note that read as follows:

"Miss Maverick sends her compliments to Mrs. Roesselle, and begs that she may be allowed to participate in the watchings and labors of her uncle's sick-room. She is very anxious to be of assistance at this time, and hopes that the relation in which she stands to Mr. Augustus Maverick will plead powerfully with Mrs. Roesselle for her request. Her uncle has never seen her, and cannot know her; and if any fear is felt that he might recognize her from resemblance to her father, she can remain out of his sight. But she prays the privilege, if Mrs. Roesselle must so consider it, of exercising the duty of a niece."

The answer quickly came back, pencilled on the same paper. It simply said:

"Miss Maverick's offer is declined, with thanks. Her uncle now has all necessary attention."

Laura read the words, and handed the paper to her father. He read them; and remarking:

"Now for my other card," left the room. Descending the stairs, he met Mrs. Roesselle in the hall.

"My dear madam," he said, with animation and earnestness, "I know you are incapable of wronging us, particularly at so solemn a time as this; but I feel, and my daughter feels, that as you have located us in this house, the death of my brother may happen in such a way that it will give us life-long reproach. You know he is liable to expire at any moment, and a minute of time may be precious beyond thought to us. I do not ask that we may be introduced to his bedside before the final agony arrives; but, O madam, you who have seen death before know how rapid is his work. When that last struggle begins he will have expired. You mean well, my dear madam; but do you not see that it is cruel to place us in this position? Our hearts are intent upon seeing his face a moment ere he passes away, that in that awful time, since it cannot be before, we may be reconciled. Only allow us to make sure that we may be with him at that moment, so important to us and to him."

"What do you propose?" Mrs. Roesselle asked.

"At least, that you allow us to occupy the outer room of those three. We can then be at the bedside at an instant's warning."

Again did the housekeeper penetrate the flimsy pretext; more distinctly than at any moment since the entry of these people into the house did she realize what was the secret purpose that brought them. Could they have discovered, she asked herself, the secret of that sick chamber?—and she answered herself that it was impossible. She had herself hardly, and with much difficulty reached the assurance that she knew it; and how could these people gain that knowledge? They could not—they had not—so she thought; but it was quite possible that Jerry Small had reported to them the arrival of the lawyer, and from that knowledge they might draw a broad inference that they were cut off from the estate. And now, swiftly upon the heels of this discovery, and the loss of their serviceable spy, came the bold request that they might be admitted to the immediate proximity of the dying man's chamber.

What did it mean? Only one thing, as she thought. It was the desperate attempt of a desperate man and woman, to place themselves in a position of advantage, where any unforeseen accident might be turned to their account, by almost any desperate step.

All this flashed through her active mind while Oliver Maverick was pronouncing the words of his request. An emphatic no was on her tongue. It was not uttered when the same fear that had opened the door of the house for their ingress restrained her, and presently opened the door of the first room of the suite also to them.

It was the fear of what the world would say. Not fear for herself; evil report had done with her, and would not attack her when it could strike so shining a mark as the young and beautiful mistress of Maverick. For the day was coming—nay, it might come with the morrow—when Anna May, dear to her by trials and sufferings, and long, secret heart-agonies endured for her, which she prayed God that the girl might never know—would hold the title of all that Augustus Maverick had owned; and it was against her that the slander would be trumpeted far and wide, if this request of Oliver Maverick was now denied.

"Ah yes—she's rich enough; but a curse will follow the property that's got in that way! She barred the door against his own brother and niece, in his dying hour, when she knew that he'd have willed it all to them, but that he thought them too proud to come and be reconciled."

That was the slander that Mrs. Roesselle foresaw and feared. And still, she might have overridden that fear, had it seemed at that moment necessary; but it did seem to her that she might with perfect safety allow the request. She reflected that she had nothing to fear. The sick-room should be rigidly guarded to the last; her strong, willing nephew would be with her between it and the feeble man before her; she would take the will into her possession immediately, when all was over; there was absolutely no risk.

"You may occupy that room, if you insist," she replied. "You will find no conveniences there for sleeping."

She proceeded on her way amid his profuse outpouring of thanks; and she returned to the rooms very little disturbed by the occurrence. But had she known all that this "feeble man" knew; had she even suspected the nature of his plot!

IX.

JANE SHOREY, the girl who had been assigned by the housekeeper to wait upon Oliver Maverick and his daughter, after the discovery of the treachery of Jerry Small, had been in service at Maverick about two years. Contrary to the usual custom, she had been employed without being required to produce references or recommendations; but her distress and her pitiful story had pleaded so powerfully with the lady that she had taken her on trial. Up to this time she had found no cause to regret it. A more faithful, industrious and manly servant than she had never been at the mansion; and had Mrs. Roesselle been asked to name one of her many servants who upon the whole bore the best character for all that is desirable in a servant, she would have unhesitatingly selected Jane Shorey. She was a quiet, unobtrusive girl of twenty-four or five, with a plain face and an old look about it which plainly showed suffering. Her story to the housekeeper was that she had been thrown upon the world destitute by the sudden death of her husband in New York; that she was unable to obtain honorable employment there, and had walked from the city all the way to Maverick Mansion. She came forlorn, sad, weary and hungry, and appealed pitifully to Mrs. Roesselle to take her in.

"I know I cannot do much at first, ma'am," she frankly said; "but I can learn, and after a while I will be as useful to you as though I had always known about housework. I will work for my board, only, as long as you think I ought to; and if I can only find a home here, I will give all my heart to serving you well."

This happened two years before Augustus Maverick was laid upon the bed from which he was destined to be carried only to his grave; and most nobly had the girl rendered her pledge. She was always shy, almost timorous in her manner, and was never liked among the servants; but her quickness, her fidelity, and her scrupulously exact performance of her duties soon raised her high in the estimation of Mrs. Roesselle. And when the latter had made the astonishing discovery of the defection of Jerry Small, she unhesitatingly selected Jane as the proper person to wait upon the guests. She had peculiar reasons for this selection. The girl had an unaccountable shyness of all strangers, and studiously avoided them whenever they appeared in the house. This peculiarity, combined with her general fidelity, entirely satisfied the housekeeper that the girl could not be induced to have any communication with those whom she was to wait upon, except such as was barely necessary to enable her to attend to their wants.

And yet, of all the servants at Maverick, had the good housekeeper asked her guests to name the one who should replace Jerry Small, they would have chosen Jane Shorey! And nothing that Mrs. Roesselle could have blindly done would have so much favored the plot that had that morning been matured in Oliver Maverick's chamber, as this announcement made by the housekeeper at the breakfast-table, to the secret delight of both of the conspirators. For of that plot, Jane Shorey already constituted a most important, if a most unwilling part.

It was the regular duty of Jane to see that each meal was properly put on the table and served; and this duty she generally attended to in person. She was present in the dining-room on the previous afternoon when Laura Maverick and her father entered it; and it was with a start and a chill of horror that she recognized the former. But neither by word, look, nor gesture did Laura show that she knew her, and poor Jane, trembling and almost sick with apprehension for the consequences to herself of this discovery, was nearly reassured by the manner of the young lady, before the conclusion of the meal. Poor Jane, indeed! She was destined to be speedily undeceived, and to learn that the dread that had for two years haunted her had overtaken her at last. As Mrs. Roesselle and Mr. Maverick passed from the room, Laura lingered a little, unperceived by the former—lingered just long enough to speak a few words of terrible, crushing purport to the girl.

"I know you," Laura said, in a low voice across the table. "Would you wish me to tell your mistress all that I know about you?"

"O miss! for the love of God—"

She broke off her speech abruptly, and stood with clasped hands and imploring eyes before her tyrant.

"Hush!" Laura whispered, imperiously. "Don't whisper another loud word, or I'll betray you on the spot! I have something for you to do; if you will do it faithfully, I will not disturb you in your place here, and will allow Mrs. Roesselle to go on thinking that you are all you seem to be; refuse, and she shall know the whole story. Is it your business here to see to the serving of the meals? You need not speak; answer with your head."

The girl made an affirmative sign.

"Good! I thought so. Make some errand to come up into the third story hall in half an hour, and I will see you there; and do not breathe a word of this to any one."

The girl had obeyed; she could do nothing else; and in that brief interview, carried on in whispers, Laura Maverick informed her of the part she was to perform in the drama of the plotters whenever called upon. It was all one to Laura that her uncle might die without making a will, and the necessity for the services of the girl be obliterated; she knew that she held her in such fear that she dared not whisper a word of the plot to any one. Piteously, and with tears, did Jane Shorey beg that this might not be required of her; sternly, breathlessly, did Laura Maverick exact it; and she went down again to her tasks, shrinking with miserable dread from the treachery imposed upon her, sad, and almost weary of life—yet bound by the cruel will of her tyrant.

Such was the condition of affairs when the father and daughter transferred themselves to the outer room of the suite about ten o'clock, shortly after the interview of Oliver Maverick and the housekeeper. They brought down with them books, one of which the former appeared to be industriously reading through the entire day; while Laura did nothing but hem handkerchiefs, with rapid fingers and downcast eyes. To see them as Mrs. Roesselle saw them sitting in that room, a dozen times during the day, it might naturally have been thought that the energies of the one were absorbingly bent on finishing the book before dark, and of the other, on hemming the greatest possible number of handkerchiefs before night. The housekeeper purposely made errands through the room, that she might observe them; but their conduct was a perfect mask to their designs. But she doubted not that nothing passed unnoticed within the limits of their vision, nothing unheard within the reach of their ears.

The sick-room was occupied during the day by the nurse, who never left it for a moment; the middle room by Mr. Grayle, who never left that for a moment; their meals being served them where they were. The housekeeper kept on the alert all day, passing from one room to another, secretly confident of the result of this strange game of cross-purposes, and yet unavoidably anxious. And indeed she must have been more or less than human if she had not been anxious. The good or the ill fortune of a cherished object of years of anxiety and patient, hopeful working and waiting depended upon the happenings beneath that roof of the next few hours.

Dinner was served at three o'clock, and attended only by Mrs. Roesselle and Mr. Maverick. Either from inclination or the direction of the former, Anna remained in the middle room with Mr. Grayle; and Laura Maverick pleaded a headache, and did not come below stairs. There was very little said, and very little eaten by the two who faced each other from the ends of the long table. There was no more superfluous politeness on the part of Oliver Maverick; he found himself unable to play the active hypocrite, as the end approached, and his feelings labored under a greater tension of excitement. A more useless dinner for any practical purpose, was never served at Maverick.

The afternoon passed slowly away, with the happening of nothing noticeable, excepting that Mrs. Wadhams observed, and called Mrs. Roesselle's attention to the fact, that the patient was steadily sinking. The sagacity of the physician was amply verified; nothing but the oft-repeated doses of brandy kept the fluttering spirit within the poor weak body, which was ready at last to release its hold. But it was evident to both the women that the vital forces would shortly be beyond the reach of stimulants, and that the end must come this night.

When tea was quietly announced, Mrs.

Roesselle, Laura, and Anna May took their places at the table.

"My father wishes me to excuse his absence," said the daughter. "He has no appetite, and an interesting book."

The lady at the head of the table very slightly bowed, Anna, still ignorant of any suspicions of wrong on the part of the guests, as Mrs. Roesselle was designedly keeping her so, talked upon ordinary subjects; and Laura, better able to control herself than was her father, conversed with her, without the least show of anxiety. As they took their seats, Jane Shorey entered with the tea-urn; and as she bent to place it upon the tray before Mrs. Roesselle, the latter observed that her face was very pale.

"Jane—what is the matter?"

The question was a quick and peremptory one; the girl looked up, faltered—and became aware that Miss Maverick's hateful, colorless eyes were fixed menacingly upon her. The three at the table were looking at her; but those eyes—she could almost feel them!

"Nothing at all, ma'am," she answered, repressing her agitation in obedience to the menace. "I felt a little faint once this afternoon, but I don't think anything of it."

"You are not sick, I hope?" Laura inquired; and groaning and writhing in spirit because of the dreadful bonds that bound her to this woman's will, Jane helped her in the deception, as she was at the moment helping her in a monstrous villany, and answered humbly and gratefully, as became a servant, that she was not.

The tea was served, with the slight addition of edibles that appropriately supplemented a late dinner; and at a pause in the conversation Anna remarked that Laura's cup stood untasted before her.

"Do you drink no tea?" Anna asked.

"No," was the reply, "my headache forbids it. With most people, I know, it is soothing; with me it is stimulating, and always increases the pain of my headache."

With this bold falsehood smoothly uttered, the speaker turned to Mrs. Roesselle, to hear her direct Jane to carry a cup of tea and some cakes up to Mr. Grayle. The girl left the room to obey the direction, and paused and looked back through the open door when in sight of Laura Maverick's face only. She gave one last pitiful look at that face; at the last moment, she thought, there might be some mercy in that cold beautiful face. She looked in vain; she might as well have sought for a sympathetic expression in the bare wall behind her. Those eyes fastened her look upon them, and commanded her as plainly as speech could have done it, to obey—to hesitate at her peril. And desperately, hopelessly, Jane Shorey proceeded with the work which she knew must cut her off from Maverick and cast her out upon the world again.

In the solitude of her room that night, with bitter tears and bitter regrets, the poor girl prepared for her secret departure. She packed a satchel with her clothing; and then with a pencil wrote her farewell to her mistress:

"I don't know what great wickedness I've helped to do to-night," were her words. "I pray it may not be a great one, for I shall be as guilty as the worst about it. It's killing me, ma'am, to think how ungrateful you'll think I am for all your kindness; but as God knows me, they're forcing me to it. I'm in their power; I can't help myself; they know something of me that would send me to the State Prison if they caught me, for it happened while I was serving in a house in the city where one of them was visiting. I ran away because I knew they'd arrest me; I thought they'd never find me here, and I have lived honest and tried to do right since I came. But it's no use; they'd hand me over to the law if I refused to obey them; God help me, ma'am, I'm forced to betray you. I might stay, now I've done their will, and nothing ever would be said; but I can't see your kind face to-morrow; I don't dare to stay and see what I've helped them do. Try to forgive me, ma'am, and I'll forever pray for you and dear Miss Anna. JANE SHOREY."

The sheet upon which she wrote was rudely folded and directed, and pinned to her unruffled pillow. Poor, outcast and a criminal she had come to Maverick; poor, outcast and a criminal she left it, and saw it no more.

X.

THE great clock in the lower hall at Maverick struck the hour of ten. The sound of its striking reached Oliver Maverick and his daughter as they sat in the outer room of the suite. Both suspended their employment together; book and handkerchief were laid down, and the conspirators looked eagerly into each other's face. It was the pre-arranged hour for action.

About one hour before, Mrs. Roesselle had passed through their room into the hall, and almost immediately passed back. She had found them engaged as before; and after closing the door between them and the middle room, she sank into a chair, and looked about her, bewildered and terrified.

"I wonder what possesses me?" she murmured; and her voice seemed wrrenched with an effort from her tongue. "I feel as though I must sleep; but I can't—I won't yield to this weakness. And they are both as sleepy as I am," she continued, looking from her nephew to Anna May. "I'll go and see how Mrs. Wadhams—"

Her tongue refused her further speech; she half rose from her chair, and instantly settled back in it, entirely overcome. And when, just as the great clock had finished striking ten, the door that she had last closed noiselessly and slowly opened, and Oliver Maverick peered into the room, a sight met his eyes that gave him unbounded satisfaction. The three occupants of the room were fast asleep; Anna lying upon the lounge, Roscoe Grayle with his head down upon the table, and the housekeeper sitting bolt upright in the chair. The three were sound asleep, as their heavy breathing showed.

Laura came to the door, and looked at the scene. Triumph shone and sparkled in her eye, a bright flush colored her face, and her hands were clasped nervously together.

"It is all right now!" she said, to her father, under her breath. "Let me go at once."

He opened the door a trifle wider, and she passed through and noiselessly across the room, avoiding the least contact with any of the sleepers. The knob of the sick-room door was in her hand; she turned it with a gentle and silent pressure, and opening the door a few inches, she eagerly looked in. Her face appeared again, to telegraph to her father by its broad smile of exultation that all within was as she wished; and crossing the threshold, she reclosed the door behind her.

She was in the sick-room; in the presence of the uncle whom she had never seen; in the presence of the will! Before moving a step, she took a quick, comprehensive survey of the apartment. A lamp burned dimly on the table; between it and the bed was Mrs. Wadhams, asleep in her chair, and giving unmistakable evidence of the fact by a vocal effort. The drear, thin face of Augustus Maverick lay upon the pillow; his eyes were closed; he lay without motion or sign, and apparently shared the sleep of the others.

Laura Maverick waited not an instant. Stepping lightly to the bedside, she ran her hand underneath the pillows; and her heart leaped as her fingers encountered an envelop. She withdrew it, and read upon the outside, "Augustus Maverick's will—May 21, 1850."

Won—won! Easily, lightly won—the object of her anxiety, the perfection of her hopes! She grasped it tightly, and turned to leave the room; something detained the skirt of her dress; and looking again towards the bed she saw with a chill of dismay that the stiffened fingers of the dying man had closed upon her skirt, while his eyes, wide open and staring, looked wildly into her face.

For a moment she stood perfectly still and looked at him. With desperate presence of mind in this frightful crisis, it occurred to her that he might have sunk so far by this time as to have lost the power of utterance entirely, and she eagerly but calmly watched his face. The bony hand had not relinquished its hold upon her dress; and ever the corpse-like face spasms of acute agony ran as the sufferer strove to give utterance to his thought. Once—and though he groaned with pain, he could not speak. Twice; and the muscles of his face worked and wrestled as he uttered some meaningless gibberish. Thrice; and in a low but perfectly distinct tone he said, "Who are you?"

His tongue was captive to his will again, and as he spoke and tightened his hold upon her dress, his eyes rested in alarm upon the envelop that the intruder held in her hand. The position of Laura Maverick at that moment was most desperate, and she promptly resorted to the most desperate course that presented itself.

"I am Laura Maverick, your niece, and daughter of your brother, Oliver Maverick. I have your will here in my hand; and holding it with the full knowledge of all that it contains, I ask you, uncle, to do us justice!" She spoke low, but her voice thrilled with a passionate and eager earnestness as she went on. "Let us all forget the past, Uncle Augustus; let us forget and forgive; and after that, you will tell me to burn up this will—wont you, uncle? You don't mean, you can't mean, to give all your property to a servant, a miserable dependant, like this Anna May! Think of us, uncle; of your brother Oliver, and me, his daughter! We are near of kin to you; we have the same blood, and—think of my mother—”

At the repeated mention of the name of Oliver Maverick, the eyes of the dying man lit up with a sudden light of baleful fury; and coolly gathering his little remaining strength while she spoke, he interrupted her with a wild, terrible scream that rang and echoed through the rooms of the mansion like the high note of a bugle. It burst like a knell upon the ears of Laura Maverick, and she turned again to fly; and again she found herself detained by the vicelike grasp of those long fingers. The noise and stir in the next room admonished her that public discovery was inevitable, and she had only time to conceal the envelop in the bosom of her dress, when the door was thrown open and her father sprang in, followed immediately by Roscoe Grayle, Mrs. Roesselle and Anna May. Of all the sleepers, only the old nurse failed to awaken under the pressure of that awful cry from the deathbed.

There was not one of them but noted the presence of Laura Maverick; but before the anger and alarm of most of them could assert itself in words, the attention of them all was engrossed by the appearance of Augustus Maverick. Repeated spasms shook his frame; his fingers loosed their hold of the dress, his breath came hard and in gasps, and the cold dew of death started out upon his forehead as he strove to speak. He seemed to take no note of the presence of his brother; but his eyes wandered from face to face with a longing, wistful look, while he struggled with Death, to keep him at bay a moment more. Mrs. Roesselle hastened to force a few drops of brandy between his teeth, and raised him from the pillow. Then, very faintly, he said:

“Where’s Anna? I want her.”

She had been hidden by the others, but now came to the bedside. His eyes brightened as he saw her, and the motions of his hands showed her that he wished her to take them in her own. She did so, and he gasped with difficulty:

“My last words—bear witness! This girl is my own daughter! She’s to have it all—will—will—”

He said no more; speech failed him, and he looked at Laura with a stern, savage eye. He entered his final sleep soon after, with his head on Anna’s bosom, and that last expression of mingled rage and entreaty stereotyped upon his features.

In the midst of the first confusion caused by the death, Laura Maverick turned and left the room, followed by her father.

With one hand Mrs. Roesselle closed the eyelids of the dead, and with the other she reached beneath the pillow for the will. With a voice of the utmost concern and astonishment, she informed her nephew that the will was gone; and suddenly losing all her fortitude and resolution in this dreadful discovery, she threw herself down upon the floor, and burst into tears. Anna, bewildered by the astounding disclosure that she had just heard, knelt by her and tried to learn the cause of her grief; but she shook her head despondingly, and sobbed and cried more bitterly. Never had Anna seen her so completely broken down before.

“I’m weeping for you, child, not for myself,” was her answer. “It’s hard—it’s too hard! Please God, it can’t stay so; there will be a way out of this villany yet.” So she said, but her looks and words denied her, for she continued to weep and sob over her hopes so cruelly shattered; and from time to time she moaned out the words, “Too hard—too hard!”

Laura Maverick and her father hurried up stairs into her chamber, with a lamp which one of them snatched from the table below. Oliver Maverick received with greedy hands the envelop from his daughter, tore it open, and satisfied himself at once that this was the veritable will. His eyes burned; his teeth were set together, and his lips compressed, as he allowed one corner of the sheet to fall into the flame of the lamp. He held it in his hand while it blazed up, and both will and envelop were quickly consumed to the last scrap and corner. With the utmost care he gathered the ashes and blew them out of the window; and then clasping Laura wildly in his arms he exclaimed:

“It is ours now—all, all ours!”

THE DEAD PAST.

BY ABBIE WHEELER.

"Of all sad words from tongue or pen,
The saddest are these: 'It might have been.'"

There's a bright golden light in the long ago,
Flooding the river and shore;
The river whose waters gently flow
Beside Beaver Cottage door;
There's a bank that is green with waving grass,
And roses and lilac's bloom;
And eyes drink in beauty whenever they pass
In the mystic twilight gloom.
Ah! memory holds away, o'er my heart to-day
The dead come back from the tomb!

There were hopes I nursed lovingly long ago,
Buds gathered carefully there,
To adorn the bare walls with a sweet rich glow
Of beautiful flowers, and rare;
And I seem to hear the patter of feet,
Her children climbing the stair;
And I seem to see the lips that greet
My own, their kisses to spare. [to sleep,
And the tears they weep, when she puts them
Without her allotted share.

There are dreams that were beautiful to me,—
Bright visions of girlhood's grace;
And the tears are sacred I shed for thee.
Dreams Time never can efface!
And thus I weave ever the web of life
With smiles, and tears, and a dream,
Till my soul cries out with its weight of strife
That creeps o'er the years' dark stream—
And I lower the blind on my heart, for I find Things are not what they seem!

I will shut out the beautiful long ago—
Lock my heart with a golden key;
I will listen no more to the gentle flow
Of that sweet-voiced memory;
I will shut out the sight of that cottage there
On the Beaver's bank and fen,
The sight of those beautiful flowers so rare—
And think that "It might have been,"
And my dear dead Past shall rest at last,
Away from the Future's ken.

A CUP OF COLD WATER.

BY MRS. R. B. EDSON.

UP through the lush meadows, across a velvety, fern-bordered upland, winding round a sunny knoll into a narrow ravine, came Millie Trent, Squire Trent's only daughter. All the broad reach of meadow and upland, all the great forests and broad fields of grain, were Squire Trent's, as far as Millie could see. Her father was a rich man, the child knew that. She wondered sometimes, in a childish way, if money made people happy why her father was not happier. Old Tommy Lovett the miller, who owned only a patch of ground big enough for his little loghouse to sit upon, was happy as the sunshine. Indeed he seemed to radiate a perpetual warmth and brightness which made every one happy who came within his influence. Millie had caught herself more than once wishing Tommy was her father, or that her father was like Tommy.

Down at the foot of the ravine ran a slow, loitering river, and on this river was Tommy's little mill—an old brown, tumble-down affair, not worth one of Squire Trent's handsome cows who came down to the water to drink, or, in hot days, to wade into the shallow, rush-bordered river. Yet to Millie this mill was the most charming and wonderful place in the world. She would sit for hours watching the white sparkle of the water falling through the flume and sprinkling the beautiful golden-hearted lilies below with its glittering spray. Every little while old Tommy would look out and nod at her in the jolliest way, and then run back to watch his grists.

Millie was on her way to the mill. She had been over in the further meadow after strawberries, and though her cup was lamentably empty, her small hands and face bore numerous suspicious stains, which led one to believe that strawberries were ripe.

Half way down the ravine grew a clump of scrub-oaks, interspersed here and there with slender white birches. Here, a little later, the golden-blossomed gerarolias lit up the shadows with their brightness. Millie wondered if they were not most ready to bloom, and clambered up on the rocks to see. She was a courageous little thing, but she turned very white when she saw a man lying close to the rock, a little bundle under his head. She took another look, and discovered that he was pale and looked ill.

"Are you sick, man?" she asked, standing some way off.

"I am burning with thirst," he replied, "and I cannot go out to get water. If only you would get me a cup of cold water!"

A little way back round the sunny knoll was a clear, rippling spring.

"Just you wait," said Millie, running back as fast as she could.

She forgot all about her momentary fear, and crept over the rocks and brush and held the water to the man's lips. He drank it eagerly.

"I guess you're sick," said Millie; "why don't you go home?"

"I can't, child," he said, hoarsely; and he put his hand suddenly up over his face. Millie noticed that it was a very white hand, with handsome, tapering nails.

"Is it a good ways?" she persisted; "wont they be frightened if you don't come?"

"Don't, child!" he gasped, chokingly.

Millie stood still and watched him a moment.

"I wish I could help you," she said, wistfully.

"You have helped me already, little one," he said, sitting up, and smiling faintly into the sober little face before him. "What is your name, little girl?"

"Millicent Trent, though nobody calls me anything but Millie."

"Well, I will remember them both; but you mustn't tell any one you saw me here. You can keep a secret I know by your brave face."

"I never tell anything I promise not to," she replied, with cold dignity.

"And you will not tell what I am going to tell you?"

"No," she said, soberly.

"Well, I am in trouble, and if some people knew I was here they would carry me away by force, and perhaps put me in prison."

"In prison? Why, you don't look wicked," interrupted Millie, with wide eyes.

"I am not, but I cannot prove it, and I am poor, and have no friends. Now if you hear any one talking about me you must not say that I was here, or that you saw anybody at all."

"No," said Millie, gravely.

"Well, good-by, little one; I shall not forget the cup of cold water."

Millie knew he desired to be left alone, and so she turned away. She stood a moment irresolute, and then she turned back into the path that led up the knoll; she didn't want to see even old Tommy, just then.

"Here is a bold affair," said Squire Trent, looking up from his evening paper, that night. "I hope they will catch the rascal," reading aloud the following:

"Last night, as one of our large clothing manufacturers was about closing his store, and while he was alone, a young man entered and catching him suddenly by the wrist, demanded five dollars. Mr. M—— refused to concede to the impudent demand, when the fellow sprang over the counter, drew open the money drawer, and singling out a five dollar bill, made his escape before Mr. M—— could collect his scattered senses. He, however, recognized the young man as one Gerald Montford, who has been for two or three years past in the employ of Guild & Bacon, importers. The young man had hitherto borne an excellent character, and the reason for this bold, petty theft is a mystery."

Millie sat very still, but she trembled dreadfully all the time her father was reading. That this was the man in the ravine she was confident.

"O dear," she said, after she had gone up to bed and lay thinking it over. "I wish I had known it was only five dollars he wanted. I would have given it to him, I've got some of those little gold ones in my bureau drawer. Maybe he was hungry—he looked as if he was;" and she remembered the pale hands and the thin, white face, with a feeling of infinite pity.

The green meadows shimmered under the sunshine, and the velvet uplands sloped, fern-bordered, to the wood. Under the hill, at the foot of the ravine, the old mill crumbled slowly to decay; its master had gone to his reward.

Down through the ravine, with thoughtful steps, came a woman. She walked listlessly, as if weary or sad, and when the wind lifted her hat you saw that the face, though young and fair, was full of pain.

She sat down on a rock at the foot of the ravine and waited. You knew that she was waiting, by the little quick, furtive glances that she cast about her, and the general air of nervousness she betrayed. The dreary brown eyes that strayed out over the languid river had a look of trouble and pain in them, and the clear oval cheek was white as the lilies floating on the still waters below.

There was a sudden crackling of dry limbs, and a young man of some twenty-four or five years sprang hastily through the thick undergrowth that skirted one edge of the ravine, and came toward the girl. She rose and put out both her hands with a little, quick cry.

"My faithful Millie!" he cried, folding her in his arms and kissing her fondly.

"My dear brother!" she responded, struggling hard to keep back the hot tears.

"I knew you would come, dear," he said, in a hoarse whisper.

"O Alfred!" was all she could say.

"Don't worry for me, Millie, I'm not worth it. But I wanted to tell you about this—this affair," he said, turning his face away, and going on hurriedly.

"You know the old story, Millie, but you don't know what I have suffered since I got that letter from you. Girl, I have been wild enough sometimes for anything," he said with sudden fierceness; "thank God, Millicent, it was no worse!" a little shudder running over him.

"Does he know?" he asked, after a pause.

"No, Alfred, he is broken enough already. I could not answer for the effect if he knew this, also," she said, with a faint shadow of reproach in her tone.

"Who made me what I am?" he cried, starting up. "Who thwarted me every way until my naturally fiery temper was beyond all human control? Who forced me day after day into that dreary old office, to read still drearier books—when my whole soul was longing for the free breath of the ocean—because a lawyer would reflect more glory on the family name than a sailor? And then the last cruel wrong—good heavens!" And turning away he paced back and forth like a chained lion.

He was a fine, brave-looking fellow, with dark, flashing eyes, and clear-cut, resolute features. You knew that he was fiery, impetuous, and perhaps a little reckless, but you would never have taken him for a thief; and yet at this moment he was hiding from pursuit for attempting a bold and daring robbery in a neighboring city.

"Alfred," and a little hand was laid softly on his arm, "I saw her yesterday."

"Myrtle!" he gasped, the fire dying suddenly out of his eyes, and a flush of shame and sorrow clouding his face.

"Yes, Myrtle. She has grown so pretty, Alfred. And do you know, she is quite an heiress, now. You remember Uncle Tommy had a brother in the West. Well, he died there about three months ago, and Myrtle owns one of the finest farms in Michigan, the property of her Uncle Julius Lovett, who, you remember, used to work on the farm for father when we were children. He was very poor, then—poorer than Uncle Tommy a good deal, and I remember used to eat his meals in the back porch, alone, when he worked for us. Well, he died worth twenty-five thousand dollars, and Myrtle is his heir."

"But Myrtle—is she much changed?" he asked eagerly, his face softening. "O Millicent, how I loved that girl! When father turned her from our house that morning with those bitter, terrible words, I thought I should go mad! I was not quite twenty-one and he had power to control me. And if he had not, it would have made no difference. Myrtle would never see me afterward; she was proud if she was 'only a pauper-vagabond's daughter,' as he called her. O, if I could only see her, Millicent, only just once, when she did not know." His voice faltered; then dashing his hand across his eyes he exclaimed bitterly:

"Folly! I, a felon, talking sentiment! Millicent, there is no need of my saying that I can do nothing—that the old place must go," he added, in an altered tone. "If only I had got your letter before. We had been in a week and I had five hundred dollars when we were paid off. I cared little for it, however; money had little value to me beside supplying my immediate wants. But though I was reckless and indifferent, I had never been guilty of the dissipations common among sailors. I deserve no credit; I had no taste for gambling, whiskey drinking, and kindred immoralities. I don't say this whiningly, to rouse your sympathies, Millicent," he said, half proudly; "I only tell you the truth. Well, about this five hundred dollars. The night after we received our money a lot of us went into Birney's saloon. Pretty soon the boys were busy at the cards, I looking on indifferently. There were two sharpers there—fellows who make a business of fleecing sailors and country people. I had nothing to do, and so I watched the game. Will Edgerly was playing a high stake, and he lost. It was the last dollar poor Will had, and I knew his old mother was waiting for her boy in a little country town some twenty miles away, and I fell into the blind, and thought maybe he could win it back, and thrust my pocket-book into his hand. It contained four hundred dollars, and poor Will lost it every penny. The next day I divided my remaining hundred with him, and saw him on board the stage-coach for O—, where his mother lives. Poor Will! he cried like a baby when I put that fifty dollars in his hand, and swore that he'd pay me every dollar, some day, if God spared his life.

"That night I got your letter, Millie, telling me of father's losses, his illness, and the mortgage on the homestead. Your letter had followed me from port to port, and over four months had elapsed since it was written. I saw there was no to lose if the place was to be saved. A sudden feeling of remorse came upon me. What right had I, a strong, well man, to leave all the care and burden of these days of darkness and reverse for your slender shoulders to bear? You did not mean to reproach me, Millie, but when I read of your taking in sewing, to try with your weak hands to pay the interest on the mortgage, and so keep a shelter for yourself and him—O Millie, I was wild, then. I never closed my eyes for three days and nights, and money, money, in some way, I felt I must obtain. I forgot the old wrong and the old hardness, then, and remembered only that he was my father, sick and in poverty. I remembered, then, how you had hinted of these troubles from time to time, and I—wretch that I was—had rejoiced over them, feeling that I was avenged for the wreck he had made of my happiness. The thought only added to the depths of my self-reproach, and I grew insane for money. I tried to enlist for another voyage and get an advance of fifty per cent on my wages, but no one was inclined to hire me upon those terms. I think now that I was for the time quite crazed. I had dwelt upon the subject incessantly for three days and nights, and I do not remember to have eaten in the time, though possibly I might.

"It was about ten o'clock on the morning of the fourth day that in passing a large cotton warehouse I glanced through a window and saw a man giving a roll of bills into the hands of a boy. My eyes were instantly fascinated and held by that money. If only it was mine, I looked up and read the sign, Gerald Montford. The boy came out directly behind me, carrying the money in his hand. Instantly I turned, caught the bills from the lad's hand, and fled down the street. There was a loud cry raised, and at the first sound of 'stop thief!' I dropped the money as though it had been an adder. Before God, Millicent, I did not realize until that moment what I had been doing," he said, solemnly.

"Dear Alfred!" she said, gently, laying her tear-wet cheek against his hand.

"That is all, dear, only that I escaped in the pursuit that followed, though I am liable to arrest at any moment. I am going to escape them, though, Millicent," he said, with an odd look. "I only wanted to tell you just how it was, so that you would think tenderly of me when—"

He broke off abruptly, drawing her to him convulsively and kissing her.

"But you will come up to the house, Alfred!" she said, pleadingly; "you must go through the old place once more. You remember the room where mother died? O Alfred, I could give up all but that! Don't you remember how still and solemn it used to seem to us—that great south chamber—after she was carried out of it, taking, as it seemed to us, all the brightness and the sunshine from it, and from the whole house as well? Come home with me, Alfred. He is changed, now."

"You forget that I am a fugitive," he replied, smilingly. "Go back, Millicent, and try to forget you ever had a brother." And drawing his hand from her detaining clasp he walked hurriedly away, and though she called after him, he never once paused or turned back.

About half a mile from the Trent farm was the village. It had its half dozen stores, its schoolhouse and meeting-house, and a quiet, old-fashioned inn known as the "Traveller's Rest." It had its one main street, flanked on either side with spotless white houses, all looking as prim and immaculate as virgins. They all had little square yards with great, red peonies under the windows, and clumps of yellow lilies at the gates, and looked as if they all grew in one pod.

Camden didn't have a great influx of strangers in the summer, like some country towns. It wasn't popular to go to Camden, and so nobody went. And, when a handsome, gentlemanly man, with clear, blue eyes and beautiful, annahny smile, came to the "Traveller's Rest" and took a room, it was quite an event in the history of the village, and more than one susceptible maid lost her heart in the meshes of his irresistible whiskers as he walked down the village street in the June twilight.

Mr. Benjamin, the proprietor of the "Traveller's Rest," was that very rara avis, a male gossip. He knew everybody's affairs by heart. He admired to talk about them—not maliciously, but by way of entertainment. He was therefore quite in his element when the strange gentleman, upon returning from his walk, manifested a disposition to learn something about the Camdenites.

"Trent, did you say, sir?" cried Benjamin, eagerly. "O yes. They live something like half a mile from here. The old squire used to own the River Farm, the best farm in the country. He's been strangely unfortunate one way and another, and it's all slipped out of his hands but the homestead, and that'll go next week, I s'pose. There hasn't been any interest paid on the mortgage these two years. Any children? Yes, two, though one aint of much account, I fear, by late reports. But Millicent Trent is a girl worth having. The old squire was a cold, hard man, and his son Alfred was a fiery, high-spirited lad, bewitched with the sea, and the old man tried to make an attorney of him, and failed, and the boy left between two days and has never returned. After he went away the squire built some saw-mills down below a ways, and there came a freshet and carried them all away; then the murrain got among his cattle—and he had a nice lot, I tell you—and every one on the farm died. Then the fire got into his woodland and burned up five hundred cord of nice, seasoned wood, besides what there was standing, and some handsome young wood. He had to sell off part of his farm to stock the rest, and two years ago he had a sort of fit, or something, and he has never been into the road since. They had to mortgage the farm to live on, and as I said, I guess that will go too. The amount of the mortgage? O yes, $1150, sir."

"I wish," said Mr. Benjamin, after a little thoughtful pause, "I wish you could see Miss Millie. She is just as sweet and pretty as a pink. It aint many girls, brought up as she was, to have everything—born, as the saying is, with a silver spoon in her mouth—that would work as she has. Why, sir," warming with his subject, "that girl, sir, actually took in sewing and fine ironing all last summer and winter, and done it with such a good-will, too, no grumbling or whining. But she always was a brave little thing; I wish you could ha' seen her when she was a little girl, she was so pretty and so womanish."

The stranger got up and went to the window, and stood very still looking out into the quiet summer air. His face looked pale, but perhaps it was the shadow from the lamp. He stood there a while longer, and then took his hat and went out.

The moon was just rising from a straggling belt of dim clouds lying low in the east. A faint mist hovered over the meadows and the river, and the fresh scent of ferns came up from the dewy woodlands. The moonlight fell in long, slantwise beams across the old mill, across the moss-covered roof half fallen in upon the broken wheel, and stretching away, ran, a silver thread, up through the gloomy ravine, shadowed with oaks and birches, and fragrant with the honeyed breath of the wild azalia.

A man, following the slender thread of light, came slowly down the dewy, briar-o'er-run path. Suddenly he started hurriedly forward. A splash, like a heavy body falling into the water, came up faintly from the river below. He ran across the little bridge and out onto the broken, crumbling dam. He looked sharply a moment, his ear turned toward the water. Then he swung himself down into a little boat that, moored to an old stone post, floated lazily in and out the length of its rusted chain. A dark object rose to the surface of the water, and quick as lightning the man pushed out with a bold, strong stroke, and was just in time to grasp the dark object, as with a dull lunge it parted the sleepy waters.

"He is dead, I fear, poor fellow!" he said, as he carried his lifeless burden to the shore in his arms. "Who would have thought of such a tragedy in this quiet town! And so young, too," he added, pushing back the dark, dripping hair from the broad, fair forehead, across which the moonlight fell in a sudden flood. He gave a slight start and then leaned close to the white, upturned face.

"Good Heaven! the same face?" he cried. "[I should know it in a thousand, though I had but one glance at it."

Laying him carefully on the grass he thrust his hand into his pocket and drew out a pocket-book. It was wet, but inside the water had not penetrated. He took out two or three folded papers, and drawing a match across his sleeve he glanced at them with eager, hurried eyes.

"Alfred Trent," he read, at the bottom of some sort of a receipt, and then again upon the envelop of a letter bearing half a dozen foreign postmarks, and superscribed in a woman's hand. He drew out the letter and opened it. Just then his match flared up and went out; he lighted another, and read with a white, excited face, just what he had expected to read: "Your loving sister, Millie."

It was between nine and ten o'clock, and Millicent Trent had just bolted the doors preparatory to retiring. Her father had already fallen asleep, and the great house was silent, save the ghostly ticking of the great clock in the long hall, when there came a quick, firm step on the gravel, and a short, peremptory rap on the door. She took a step backward and unbolted the door and looked out. A man stood half in shadow, holding some sort of a burden in his arms.

"Miss Trent?" he asked.

Millicent bowed and took a step forward. Something familiar in the outline of the form of the man—as she now saw it was—in his arms, struck her with a sudden chill. He saw the expression of her face and answered it.

"It is your brother, but he will live. He came near being drowned; I saw him barely in season to save him." He did not repeat to her the battle he had had with death to restore him; it would do no good for her to know. He brought him in and laid him on a bed which she silently pointed out. He breathed regularly, but was still unconscious. He turned and walked away when she dropped on her knees and kissed the white face and the dripping hair, but his voice was a trifle unsteady when a moment after he said:

"I will send your doctor round, now, Miss Trent, and if I do not see you again, good-by."

He lifted the hand she gave him to his lips in a tender, reverent way, and went out.

It was late the next afternoon when Alfred Trent opened his eyes and looked into his sister's face.

"Millie!" he ejaculated, in a bewildered tone.

"Yes, dear Alfie, and father, too," placing a wrinkled, shrunken hand in his, and dropping a little, soft splash of warm tears upon them.

"O father!"

"My dear boy?"

That was all, not another word was spoken. Doctor Marsden opened the door softly and slipped out. On the steps he met a boy coming up.

"See here, youngster," he said, sharply; "you see the town clock over there?"

"Yes sir," said the boy, looking considerably astonished.

"Well, if you rap at that door in a second less than five minutes, I'll make a diagnosis of you!" And frowning terribly at the amazed boy, he climbed into his chaise and drove away, breaking after a few moments into a soft, gurgling laugh, after which he drew his coatsleeve several times across his eyes and coughed in an odd, husky voice.

By-and-by Millicent heard a hesitating rap on the door and went out. A boy from the village stood on the steps, and when she opened the door he hurriedly thrust a little package into her hand, and was turning away.

"Who sent this, Andy?" she asked, calling him back.

"I don't know his name, Miss Millie; it's the stranger stopping at old Benjamin's. He's gone off this afternoon, though. I expect he hadn't time to come himself."

It was a sealed package, directed to "Miss Millicent Trent." She turned it over and over in her hand as she went back, wondering what a stranger stopping at the "Traveler's Rest" could know of her, or what possible communication he could make to her. Tearing open the envelop, a long, folded paper slipped to her lap. It was the mortgage deed, she knew it instantly. She caught it up; $1150, the payment in full with interest, was endorsed on the back. She sank into a chair and burst into a flood of happy tears.

"O father! O Alfred! the old place is redeemed! See, here is the deed, receipted in full," she cried, hysterically.

Squire Trent tried to rise; he stretched out his palsied hands, and leaned forward, a gleam of wild hope in his hollow eyes.

"Child! child! what does it mean?" he asked, trembling.

"I don't know—" she paused abruptly. A slip of paper which she had not before noticed fluttered to the floor. She snatched it up hastily, unfolded it and read:

"And whosoever shall give a cup of cold water unto the least of these, shall in no wise lose his reward."

The dreamy August sunshine came in a yellow flood through the high, narrow windows, and fell across the wide floor, and touched with soft fingers the loose mass of dark, wavy hair lying against the great, green easy-chair, and brightened insensibly the thin, pallid face. The eyes were closed, but they opened slowly, and the pale lips wore a beautiful, tender smile when a slight, girlish form glided across the soft carpet and stood at his side.

"O Myrtle, I do not deserve this!" he cried, holding out his weak arms. "How can you forgive all my folly and wickedness—you who are so pure and good?"

"Hush, Alfred!—you must not say that. I am weak, and err sadly, sometimes, but I have always loved you, even when I would not see you. Can you forgive me, and take me back again?"

"Forgive you! It is I who have need to be forgiven, darling. I think He has forgiven me," he added softly, a moment after; "I am very happy, Myrtle, now. I have found the haven after the storm. See here, dear, read this."

Myrtle Lovett took the letter he held toward her.

"It was His hand, that is all I can say," he said.

She opened the sheet and read with a little thrill of awe the following letter from Gerald Montford:

"MR. TRENT:—My dear sir, I feel, under the circumstances, that I owe you a letter of assurance and explanation. And first, I wish to say that you will not be disturbed by me in any way. I know enough of your case to know that you were sorely tempted—go, and sin no more.

"Your sister has doubtless told you of the circumstances under which we met twelve years ago. I do not know, however, as she has ever known the exact nature of my offence at the time. I think I owe both her and myself an explanation, which I will make as brief as possible.

"My father died, leaving my mother in poverty, with five children, of whom I was alone capable of assisting her. I obtained a situation in a store and she took sewing from the shops. We barely lived, we could make no provision for misfortune, but it came, nevertheless. I was taken ill, and then came such days as I pray God never to see again! I had got able to go out in the yard, and was impatient to be at work, for we were absolutely starving. George Mason, my mother's employer, owed her five dollars, which he withheld upon the miserable plea that the work was not well done. She went after it one evening, and begged for it, telling him our needs. He 'had heard such trumped-up stories before,' he said. She came home and fell on the floor, fainting. I was weak before; now I had the strength of a giant. I strode through the streets and reached his store just as he was about shutting up for the night. I demanded the money, and he refused, and then I took it. 'I was only taking my own,' I said. I know now that I had no right to do as I did, but I did not stop to reason, then. Well, I was hunted remorselessly, and in my flight came to Camden. Two days I lay in the shadow of the rocks in that little ravine, not daring to venture out. Then she came. Her faith in me, her pitying tenderness and childish trust, gave me new life. I am an honored and successful man now, surrounded by all the dear ties that make life desirable, but never for a single day have I forgotten the cup of cold water.

"GERALD MONTFORD."

There were tears on the bright lashes when she closed.

"Dear Alfred, we will begin life anew," she said, smiling through her tears.

He heard Millie's step in the hall, keeping time to his father's halting gait. The steps were coming nearer; he drew her to his heart and kissed the tremulous lips.

"God bless you, my beloved!" he said, huskily.

THE FATE OF SCARLET HATCHET.

BY CHARLES H. DAVIS.

"HALLOO, Joe Wickenham! What makes yer so late? I've been a waitin' fur yer on this here stump nigh above an hour!"

"Waal, what if yer hev? I tell yer, I couldn't git here no sooner, if I'd a' tried! I'd a done it if I could!" was the reply.

"I didn't 'spose but what ye would; yer needn't git snappy so early in the mornin'! But what's kept yer?"

"Why, yer see, one of the cows didn't cum home at all last night, an' I went out an' hunted the prairie over arter her till nigh onter twelve o'clock, till the moon set, an' then I turned in, an' I've been out ever since daylight, but I can't find tail nor track on her on the plain nor the river bottom."

"That so, Joe? Injuns caught her, mebbe?" said the other, with a serious expression in his eye.

The one called Joe Wickenham shook his head slowly, and was silent a moment.

"Thar's none of them varmints round in these quarters now, I think, the blue-coats drove 'em way back to the mountains only last week," he said, at length. "Perhaps she's swum the river, though—we'll take old Nell, if you're willin', and while we're down in the bottom land a choppin', I'll mount her and take a explorin' jaunt across the ford on her back."

"Sartin, Joe, you shall hev my boss an' welcome, as long as I've got a beast ter land. But let's jog along back to the house and get her; we'll leave our axes sticking in this here stump."

It is now time to introduce to the reader the authors of this characteristic colloquy. They are Western settlers—er, as the vernacular aptly hath it, squatters—on the prairies bordering on the upper side of the North Fork of the Platte River, in Nebraska. The first whom his companion addressed as Joe Wickenham, was a young man, perhaps twenty-five years of age, of light, sandy hair and complexion, with mild, hazel eyes; and a form that towered like a grenadier's above the head and shoulders of the other. Bill Oakes, the shorter of the two, had nut-brown hair, and an eye black, sparkling and sharp as an eagle's. He made up what he lacked in height in the massive solidity of his physical structure—his chest, and shoulders, and toughened palms being wonderfully expansive for so short-statured a person, in their aspect.

These two young men were near of an age, lived near each other, had spent their time from infancy on the broad prairies around them. Consequently, though they might have acquired very little culture in the arts familiar to civilized life, they were proficient in the lore of the dead letter of the plains, and, practically speaking, had reduced the art of handling a rifle to a science, and adopted it as a profession.

To-day, however, they forsook their trail for game, and, as the reader finds them, were about starting for the river bottom to fell timber for a certain purpose, which both thoroughly understood, though Joe said but little on the subject.

There was a female head stuck out of the little opening that served the double purpose of both door and window of Bill's cabin, when they arrived there.

"Halloo, Joe! That you? Why! Why, I thought you an' Bill was half-way to the bottom by this time!"

"Bottom o' what? That shows how much you think on us, hey?" called forth Joe, as though trying to drown by the explosion some inward sensation he preferred not to exhibit, but which in reality he did exhibit very plain, for his "gills" suddenly grew scarlet, and his parted lips disclosed a set of teeth that would have been the delight of any dentist.

"Bottom of the river, Smarter! now you've got yer answer," cried the other, who also responded, ditto color in the cheeks, ditto teeth.

"We've come back to get the boss. Joe's epw's run off, and he's goin' ter take Nell awhile to look her up," explained Bill, going towards the little shed, where the said animal was housed.

"Sorry, Joe—come in, wait yer?"

"No, thank yer; Sallie, how are ye, my gal?" said the other, trying playfully to pinch her cheek.

The individual whom he had called Sallie was a person of slightly plethoric and material embodiments of form and feature, but made up for it by possessing a very pretty face, a bold, handsome, straight nose, and large, saucy, black eyes, that blinked and sparkled like a squirrel's. A glance would have assured a stranger that she and Bill were brother and sister, and another glance would have told him that the two persons now regarding each other with such magnetic glances across the little door-sill, while the tongue of each wagged not inaudibly, were lovers.

"When are you going to begin to build our cabin, Joe?" said the girl.

"Wal, Bill and I calkerlates we'll cut logs enough to-day for to put it up, then thar's the roofin' and the door, and all, besides old Nell's got the timber ter haul up from the bottom land."

"But Joe, do let's hev a window in ourn? Father and mother never had none in this shanty."

"What's the use? the door's big enough for them 'ere black eyes o' yourn to look through, I reckon."

"No, Joe, make a window, you know it's goin' to be bigger'n this one," pouted Sallie.

"Wal, little un, don't pout so, yer shall hev a winder—but, say, give us just one, a little un, Sallie?"

"Git out, you impudence!" cried Miss Sallie, in indignation at her lover's presuming to seize that opportunity to pay himself in advance for constructing windows in their future dwelling, and a smart slap followed close upon the report of the kias.

Bill was just coming round the corner of the shed with Nell when this little episode occurred, but he very wisely forbore to see it. Joe laughed at his rebuff, though his cheek smarted, and the three, horse, Joe and Bill, jogged away from the door.

Sallie, as Joe called her, and whose original name was Salina—corrupted by these people of homely names into the dissyllabic Sallie, when some of finer taste would have had it, perhaps, Lina—stood and looked several moments after the trio. As she gazed, a feeling of something akin to a pleasant sadness, if there be such a paradox, came to her eyes, and softened their brilliancy into tender depths, that made her beautiful; for Salina Oakes was a handsome girl, with mellow features and splendid dark hair, and her proud brother would have nicknamed her the belle of the prairies, only that he knew or cared nothing about belles in any way.

"I'm half sorry I slapped him so hard, but there was Bill a looking," she said to herself, going into the cabin, "and he loves me so awful hard! he's a strong 'un—my Joe is—how I'd like to see him and a bar tackle it once, or one o' them sassy Injuns!" And her full merry laugh rang out, and made the two men look back toward the hut.

But we will follow the two young men. The first in our story, as is already understood, was about to begin the erection of a log hut to shelter himself and his intended bride. In this he was voluntarily assisted by the young woman's brother, who, since the death of father and mother, had looked out for his pretty sister, and was glad to find she was likely to have so good a protector for life as Joe Wikenham, his old childhood's friend. Besides, let it be whispered, Joe also had a sister, and that sister had a lover, and that lover was—Bill Oakes. The spot for the erection of the new cabin had already been chosen, on the level just south of the Platte Bluffs, distant a couple of miles, and where the timber was to be cut, and this was a full mile from Bill's cottage. For these people—the squatters—were ever opposed to near neighbors. As they walked along, their axes and the indispensable rifle on their shoulders, Joe, who led the unwilling horse, took it into his head that it would be a more feasible as well as sensible plan, to make the animal carry him on her back, instead of his having to drag her by the nose behind him. Accordingly he leaped on her back. At this moment a prairie-hen started from the cover beneath Nell's feet, and that animal gave such a sideways bound as to send our tall hero, axe, rifle and all, flying in various directions after the innocent hen! Joe picked himself up, likewise axe and rifle, and stood confronting the beast, in a serio-comic way, taking no notice of Bill's unrestrained laughter. He said to the horse with as much admonitory pathos in his tones as if the creature had been an object of intelligence:

"Darn ye! Yer couldn't du that ere agin if yer was tu try, could yer? Well, cuss ye, don't ye try?"

And with this speech he remounted the animal, who didn't 'try it on a second time!"

The young men reached the "bottom," or land by the river, and after allowing the horse a sip of water from the stream, tied her where she could browse, while they set themselves to the task of cutting down some stalwart timber. One of the ungainly forest monarchs lodged his head in falling in the boughs of his neighbor, and hung, refusing to come nearer the earth.

"Climb up and loosen her! You're the spryest, Joe!" cried Bill; and then he sat down on one of the huge logs to wipe the sweat from his brow, and rest while the other sprang nimbly into the bending tree, and climbed his way towards the top.

In a minute he uttered an exclamation which startled Bill into a sudden erect position.

"Bufflers! By thunder! There's such a sight o' dust I can't see for aartin, it's some-thin', though!" And down the tree he slid, in a hurry, to the imminent danger of his pantaloons.

Seizing their rifles, the two woodchoppers rushed out of the strip of woodland that skirted the River Platte, and stood gazing intently over the prairie towards the northwest whence came a rolling cloud of dense dust. Said dust was caused by some powerfully-moving object or objects behind it—any Eastern greenhorn of a Jonathan could have told that—but at this particular moment, and in this peculiar instance, it would have seriously taxed the intelligence of even a cunning trapper to have told precisely what class of moving objects had occasioned such a commotion upon the bosom of the otherwise quiet prairie, for the reason that the dust was so thick as to utterly hide the objects from view. Presently the cloud, which had been advancing in the southeast direction, turned its course suddenly from the spot where our two heroes stood with their hands on the hammers of their rifles, and moved in a course due east, showing by this plainly what and who was behind it. The effect of this manœuvre on the young men was instantaneous and peculiar. They dropped flat on their faces upon the prairie, as suddenly as if a couple of dozen Leyden jars had been connected with the nerves of their thumbs!

"Injuns! Sioux!" cried Bill.

"And they are goin' right for your cabin! Sallie, God help her!" and Joe was running, his body bent downwards to secure him from observation by the enemy on the plain, while he went ahead almost as fast as a horse might trot. Bill followed him, both of them trailing their rifles on the ground, and keeping near the confines of the wood, till they could gain sufficient distance to enable them to run straight across the prairie, without being discovered by the savages, who, grim wish war paint and feathers, and mounted on tough Indian ponies, were galloping right for the trapper's little cottage! They were thirteen in number. The endeavor of the young men was to get to the cabin before the Indians, but in this they were destined painfully to be disappointed. The Indians were already close upon the hut, and they had a good half mile to run yet.

"Now for it!" shouted Bill, to his companion, and both of them left the cover of the woods, and dashed out over the open prairie in full sight of the redskins, should they cast their heads behind them.

O, how they ran, as lover and brother only would, in such a case. Joe's forehead was covered with sweat. But his was cold sweat! And his face grew white and his lips compressed, and as he ran he spoke never a word!

"See, Joe! the door's open! O God! She doesn't even know they're comin';" and Bill's heart grew dark and his eyes flashed desperate determination as he ran.

The savages, with a chorus of horrid whoops, dashed up to the open door of the cottage. Some dismounted, and a couple with brandished tomahawks, rushed into the little dwelling. Bill's heart leaped into his throat at this sight. Where was his sister? Surely she must have heard them as they came up! Yet there was the door open still. All this flashed through his brain while the foremost savage was entering. Two minutes more and they would reach the scene!

But the savages came out, empty-handed, and with whoops of disappointment that told of ill success in their expected discoveries.

"Thank the good God, Bill, the girl's gone!" cried Joe; and the next moment the two trappers were lying flat in the long grass, for the eyes of the baffled Indians were now scouring the plain for a glimpse of the inhabitants of the deserted cabin, provided there were any. Joe and Bill did not give themselves a moment to rest, but instantly commenced to crawl back on their hands and knees to the woods. They were already half way there, when Bill raised his head just so as to peep through the heads of the grass, to see how the Indians were amusing themselves with his property. Several were making explorations through the house and shed, destroying or appropriating all they could find that was valuable, and one fellow had piled a quantity of hay against the windward corner of the cabin, and was preparing to light the same.

"Them cussed red varmints is settin' my house afire! I wont stand that, darned if I du!" and quick as a flash the young man brought his rifle to his eye, and fired—dropping the said "varmint" in his little scheme of innocent mischief, as a plum falls from a tree!

"What have you done! You're a fool, Bill Oakes!" cried Joe, in evident alarm at the rash act of his companion.

"Done! I reckon I've killed one of them devils yonder, and done the Almighty good service by it. He'll git fire enough whar he's gone now, cuss him?"

"But you've drawn 'em this way, and the gal, most likely, is in the woods here! Why don't you strike out one side?" as a shower of bullets came from the Indians in reply.

"They'd hev been arter us in less than ten minutes, any how; they can see our trail plain as day in this tall grass!" replied the other, loading his rifle as he still crept slowly forward.

"Here comes the Beelzebub's own cussed ones! We shall have to run for it, spite of pitch!" cried Joe, accelerating his longitudinal motion upon the ground.

For the Indians, aroused from their blissful recreations of destroying and plundering the white settler's little home, were now bearing down directly upon the spot where they then were.

"Then let's run—the sooner the better—start!" cried Bill.

"Whoozoooh! Chase us and be darned ter ye, ye devilish thieves, ye haven't got our scalps yet!" yelled Joe, in responsive defiance to the whoops of the dashing savages as the two young men sprang from the grass and rushed at headlong speed towards the cover.

Had they looked to the left they might have seen another trail leading from the cottage to the woods. It was not the trail made by Joe and Bill on leaving the woods at the first alarm. It was far to the left of that, and had been made before theirs.

Into the woods rushed the squatters, with their enemies shouting and firing at them three hundred yards behind. In the middle of the Platte was a shrub-covered island, containing about a rood of land. Bill plunged into the river, and diving under the water, swam for this island.

Five minutes before another swimmer had left the island to swim in an exactly opposite direction to the one Bill now took. That swimmer was a young woman—none other than Bill's sister, Sallie! Now, to account for her presence there.

She had discovered the approach of the Indians long before her brother and lover had done so, for, as the reader will remember, at the first they were not galloping in the direction of the cottage, hence were not obscured by the dust which, driven by the wind, rolled directly before them. She had thus been able to make her timely escape, to the spot where she expected to find her brother at work, in the bottom land.

But she had not found them. Her first thought was that the Indians had slain or captured them; her second that they were hastening towards the house to her. She did not return to the opening to look if this was the case, for she knew they would not expose themselves to sight while on the trail of the savages.

"They will find soon enough that I have escaped, and this spot is the nearest place for them to run to when the savages chase them," she said; and straightway, with subtlety born of the prairies, she put in execution a shrewd plan. Running down the river to a little cove where the still water was overhung by deep banks and thick foliage of stooping trees, she listened a moment to the mingled yells of the savages, and then she unclosed her brother's canoe. Taking the paddles in her plump, strong arms, she rowed quickly out into the stream, and shot towards the little island. Running the boat around behind the island, she secured the painter to a shrub, and, afoot, crossed to the hither side. Then divesting herself of sundry impediments known to be peculiar to feminine attire, taking off shoes and stockings, throwing aside her hat, and colling her magnificent hair about her brow, a kind of natural turban, she emerged from the bushes at the edge of the water, immersing first one then the other shapely bare ankle and leg, then without the slightest particle of noise, slipping beneath the liquid, she swam like a graceful young swan for the shore—the skirt of her light calico dress scarce impeding her motion at all.

This was how Sallie chanced to be not ten feet from the spot where her brother leaped into the water, as we have told. He managed to get one chance to come up and breathe before the Indians pursuing him dashed after him into the cover. Then he sank again, noiseless as before, and when he rose again he was close to the island, and safe among the bushes. But poor Joe was behind, and more hotly pursued, followed at least by as many as six Sioux, who leaped from their saddles without checking their horses' speed, and plunged into the woods at his heels!

Right down the bank he plunged and into the water. He knew it would be folly to try to swim the gauntlet to the island that held out its arms of green so protectingly towards him. The savages were good riflemen, and would pick him out with a bullet the moment he stuck the tip of his nose above water for a breath of air. He saw the cove where Bill's canoe usually lay. He was surprised to find it gone. But the place was still and dark, and the overhanging boughs formed a good support as he lay on his back in the water, as well as a sure protection. Joe thought of one thing. There was a pathway to the cove, worn by Bill's feet in coming and going for his canoe. The Indians might take a notion to follow it up and discover him. But he reflected that the savages like a fresh trail, and never condescend to the foolishness of following a beaten path. He did not know then that Bill had the moment previous swam off to the island from the bank near by, though he wondered what had become of his companion. He chuckled as he heard the redskins who had been pursuing him howl their rage and disappointment up and down the river bank above. He did not know that twenty feet above him, in the tree, concealed from view by the foliage, silent and motionless as a cat, sat Sallie!

The six Sioux who had made special effort to secure Joe's scalp, were astounded to see him so suddenly and unaccountably disappear from their view. One of them, the chief of the band, as might be seen by those familiar with the import of the war paint on his hideous countenance, saw the little cove, and though he did not see either Sallie or Joe, he smelt a rat, "very loud." But he wanted the glory and emoluments consequent upon securing our hero's scalp to redound solely to him personally, and to ensure this felicitous result, he determined upon doing the job himself. So raising a yell loud enough to waken the ghosts of all his grandfathers who ever drank firewater and butchered white women and babies, and were promoted to the Happy Hunting Ground by the Great Spirit, in consequence of said meritorious acts, he ran at the same time up the river as though he had struck the missing trail. This sent his companions in a body, yelling up the bank of the stream, while he instantly turned his back on his braves, and crept shyly along till he stood peering his ugly face into the cove where Joe lay. At last a leaf rustled in the wind, a ray of sunshine shot into the cove, and enabled the chief to see Joe's face! An expressive "Ugh! Waugh!" embodied his delight, and revealed to Joe the real and critical nature of his situation, as the chief, dropping his rifle, began to crawl swiftly out over the overhanging boughs that nearly touched the water by Joe's weight in clinging to them.

Joe was aware of his danger now, but he was as wily as the savage. The chief held his knife ready for use. Joe drew his also, but the moment the Indian was nearly within arm's length of him, he slipped into the water like an eel, letting go the branches, whereon hung the chief, so suddenly as to pitch the latter into the water feet first, while he held on with his hands—doused to his middle.

Joe was about to improve his opportunity and dive a second time, when something struck the struggling and astonished chief a heavy blow on the head which made him slide into the water out of sight, with no more noise than a log already half immersed. Joe looked up astonished beyond measure, when he saw who had been his deliverer, and beheld Sallie, the chief's rifle in her hand, clambering rapidly down the tree. She crept out on a limb and he took her in his arms in the water just as the half-stunned savage rose. He had lost his knife, in the to him most unexpected upset of his equilibrium, and though not entirely senseless, yet he appeared decidedly docile and stupid for one of his ferocious calibre. Altogether he was in quite a manageable frame just then, and our two lovers were not slow in taking advantage of his state. Joe had raised his arm to strike him dead, but Sallie had interposed. She evidently had an object, for the howling children of the wilderness were coming that way again. It behoved them to act quickly.

Joe was not slow to comprehend Sallie's plan of action. Seizing the savage, Joe forced his arms behind him, and held him floating close in the rear, with his face towards the shore, that he might be the more readily recognized by his discomfited brethren, and would form a perfect barrier with his body, through which the balls must needs pass to reach Joe and Sallie, who swam ahead, in a right line. Then they struck out, and had got a good eight rods from the shore before the terrible whoop of the baffled savages smote their ears. When the Indians discovered the situation of their leader, there was a most infernal hurrah's nest amongst them. They levelled their rifles. The half-stunned chief held his head so feebly upon his bosom, that Joe feared the savages might think him already dead, so he ingeniously pricked him with his knife-point to start his ideas—which piece of successful trickery caused the noble savage to cry out lustily, and the Indians were deterred from firing on their own chief. But with dreadful yells, they threw away their rifles, and with knife and tomahawk leaped into the river. They could make double the progress of Joe and Sallie, with their living impediment in the shape of the old chief who was able to do very little towards propelling himself, but the young couple had a good start, and by strenuous exertions reached the little island before their foes had half crossed the current.

The old chief was instantly bound with withes to a cotton-wood stump in plain sight of the savages, and directly behind him, and kneeling under the protection of an immense fallen log, of this species of wood, which is impervious to bullets, Joe and Sallie at once threw themselves and cleaned the wet from their rifles on the dried leaves, for their weapons were not flint locks, or of the kind too sensitive to moisture, and drew out the wad of leaves from the muzzles that had kept the barrels dry, and then prepared to give their enemies a reception—Joe with his own rifle, and Sallie with the chief's.

"Now, my gal, we'll give 'em a taste o' lead, hopin' as how they m' be led to kinsider the error o' their ways!" said he, with a chuckle, the first words he had spoken for the last exciting ten minutes.

"Wonder whar Bill is?" coolly asked Sallie, wiping the drops of river water from the hammer of her weapon.

At that very instant, about fifty feet to the left of them, a report came so loud and startling that it made them both jump, and at the same instant they saw a splash in the water, and the foremost Indian pursuer flung up his arms, bounded a yard upwards and fell a corpse—floating down the Platte.

"That was a good 'un, Bill!" cried Joe, as at that moment the author of the shot sprang into their midst, behind the log.

"Here we be! All on us safe! Thank God! Now let's give 'em pepper!" cried Bill, not concealing his delight.

Joe and Sallie ran their muzzles out just over the log, and deliberately picked out the two nearest Indians who were within excellent range. They went the way of the first, but the remaining two, now having learned wisdom, waited till Bill had completed his loading, then dove under water. But this availed them little. The position of the squatters on the island overlooked the water, and the moment an Indian's nose appeared above the surface, the owner thereof was sent to Davy Jones's locker. The other savage, by sheer desperation, and swimming under water, managed to get back to where the remaining eight of his comrades were gathered. The three behind the log simultaneously discharged their rifles among the party. Two fell, the remainder ran behind the trees, and raised their rifles to return the compliments thus lavished upon them. But the old chief, now thoroughly aroused to a realizing sense of his situation as a target for the bullets of his own braves—broke forth in the most discordant howls, which had the effect of checking these demonstrations.

It was now the evident intention of the Indians to get out of the woods and run away—they were pretty well disgusted with their mission. There were only five of them left, out of the original crew of thirteen! But here a new difficulty presented itself. The moment a redskin showed his feathered top outside a tree-trunk, a ball from the squatters' sure rifles straightway took off his nose, his ears, or went through his head!

At last, the whole band broke from their cover, and with yells of defiance rushed for their ponies in the opening. Only three of them ever reached the plain, and these might have been seen an hour after riding as hard as ever they could towards their wigwams in Southern Oregon, having fully come to the conclusion that the Great Spirit did not send them on this mission.

The squatters left the chief where he was, bound to the stump—and rowed themselves across in the canoe—appropriated the Indians' knives, hatchets, rifles, ponies and wampum, and threw the dead bodies into the river. The next day, with the chief, they followed them in the canoe, floating down as far as Fort Pike.

"I've been wanting to see you, Scarlet Hatchet, for some time—our boys have a slight difference to settle with you!" said the colonel, to the stoical chief.

Bill and Joe started and opened their eyes. Was this then the notorious Sioux warrior, Scarlet Hatchet? Even so, for Bill and Joe received a large reward for him, which they immediately appropriated to making good with government their claim to all the land for ten miles each way from their claims above the North Fork of the Platte.

Sallie and Joe were married, and lived in their new cabin; Bill married Joe's sister and lived in the old cabin.

Years afterwards a man came to North Fork and bought land and started a saw-mill. Now there is a thriving village there, and Joe and Bill are the richest men in all the county.

JEWELS.

BY ANNIE M. LAWRENCE.

"Her robings were lace and satin
Of rare and costly make,
Whose shimmering folds were as beautiful dreams,

From whence wealth untold might wake.
Pearls nestled on forehead and bosom,
In settings of rich device—
And they whispered her caskets were filled and replete
With diamonds of fabulous price.

"And amid these fair surroundings,
She stood as a lily pale;
While the few low words she uttered
Smote the ear like a funeral wail.
Her eyes had a look as if burdened
With the weight of unshed tears,
And the pallor that rested on cheek and lip Told a story of doubts and fears."

Thus I read in the letter sent me,
From over the ocean wave;
And 'twas added, "This marriage altar
Seemed more like an open grave.
For the vows which were that day uttered
Laid in death all the hopes of her youth,
And the ring that enclasped her future
Lacked the pearl of Love's own truth."

I was grieved in my soul, and I questioned
Why it is that hearts are so weak?
Why it is that diamonds can silence
The words that true affection would speak?

And I said, as I thought of his falsehood,
And her lack of womanly trust,
"Let them rest with the past, I would not exchange

Loving hearts for such glittering dust."

And I heard, as I laid down my letter,
Little voices just outside my door—
Little feet, whose footfalls made music,
Pattering constantly over the floor;
And a sound of whispered rejoicing
Met my ear as I lifted the latch,
Merging into glad spoken tidings,
Wealth in words no diamonds can match.

So down where the lamps were lighted,
And the table was spread for tea—
Leaving all my regrets behind me
For the falsehood over the sea—
I went with my darling companions,
Joining them in their settled belief
That the baby's new teeth are the veriest pearls,
Of worth completest and chief.

Two pearls in a setting of rubies—
The darlingest bud of a mouth—
Worth more than the mines of Golconda,
Or the gem-laden waves of the South.
And the falsehood that might have brought anguish,

The friendship now proved but as nought,
Were as foils, making fairer by contrast,
Common things by affection inwrought.

THE MYSTERIOUS MISS FITZ-FLUKE.

BY N. P. DARLING.

"FROM New Orleans, eh?" said the colonel. "That is what the hotel book says," returned Mrs. Adams, taking a seat on the veranda, and throwing her light shawl back on the chair.

"And that her name is Miss Fitz-Fluke."

"Yes."

"And who revealed the rest?" inquired the colonel.

"O, that she was an heiress? That's what they say—the gossips, everybody in fact; and nobody knows," replied the charming widow, looking up at the colonel "with love in her luminous eyes."

"Are you interested in her financial affairs, colonel?" she asked, after a pause.

"Why, she's a very beautiful woman, and with a fortune would make a very desirable wife, you know," he replied, smiling.

"O!" The widow raised her eyebrows, as much as to say—"Well, it is nothing to me whom you marry." The colonel interpreted the expression aright, and hastened to reassure her. Putting on the expression of injured innocence, and striking a theatrical attitude, he murmured in a low but distinct voice, only intended for her ear, "Think'st thou I'd be 'so abject, base and poor, to choose for wealth and not for perfect love?"

"How do I know? Men are deceitful ever, colonel," returned the widow, smiling again, but only half assured that her quondam lover was not slipping away from her.

"There are some exceptions, I hope?"

"I hoped so; but now—well, time will tell, in your case, at least. Let us go down to the beach," and the widow arose, the colonel took her shawl and parasol, and away they went, arm in arm, as loving as a couple of turtle-doves—I should think (I never saw but one turtle-dove, and so I can't say "for certain" how two would act.)

I've given you the above conversation verbatim. I took it down in "short hand" at the time, thinking that I might possibly have use for it at some future period of my existence. That period has arrived, and I've used the report of that conversation accordingly. There was no particular necessity for my using it, because it is only with that part that refers to Miss Fitz-Fluke that the reader has anything to do. As for the widow and her handsome colonel, why, they were married at the end of the season, just as I knew they would be, and the last I heard from him he was stationed at some fort out West, where if he is killed by the Indians this winter, it will only make an opening for some other nice young man in the widow's affections next summer.

Perhaps it wasn't very honorable in me to listen to the foregoing conversation, but if people will talk right under the windows of a seaside hotel, they must expect to be overheard; and if I should undertake to run away every time I heard people in my immediate vicinity "talking privacy," I should be as bad off as the Dutchman's steam-leg—I should never stop.

At the time I am speaking of, I had been at Santam Beach something over a week, and was intending to wear out the season there. I had a motive in coming to Santam, and I intend to let you know what that motive was. But I must go back in my life's history a few years.

My father, I have been told, was a marrying man, and my mother used to say that I "took after him," not in marrying, of course, for I was too young (I'm only twenty-six now); but my phrenological organs were so much like his, that the distinguished professor who examined our "bumps" declared that one chart would do for both father and son.

I said that my father was a marrying man. He began to marry young, and when he'd once got in that way, he couldn't break himself of the habit, and so he kept on, until he had married five wives (unfortunately he didn't live in Chicago, or he might have done better), and buried four, and then he made a period to his existence, leaving his wife, and fourteen orphans beside myself, to mourn his untimely end.

My father was an excellent man. He did his duty, that is, generally speaking, to his wives and children. There was only one thing that he neglected to do, and that was to die rich. In all other respects he was a success. As a husband and father, he was particularly so.

After my father's death I became the peculiar care of my Aunt Deborah Kempton, my mother's only sister, and an old maid. She was wealthy. I liked her just as well as if she'd been poor. She took me to live with her, and sent me to school; and I was given to understand that if I behaved myself it would be money in my pocket by-and-by.

When I came of age my aunt set me up in business. She said that if I couldn't make money, and if I couldn't keep it after it was made, why, it would be useless to leave me her property, as I should only squander it, without doing myself any good.

She experimented on me for five years. I went into business in almost every large city in the Union, and my aunt furnished the capital, but I didn't succeed. I really don't know why. I knew how to "handle money." I've always considered handling money my forte. Aunt Deborah agreed with me on that point; but at last she became disgusted with my way of handling money, and refused, in bowling hall vernacular, to "set 'em up again," and so I was obliged to retire from business.

It was in St. Louis where my last failure took place. My aunt wrote to me, saying that I hadn't any talents worth speaking of; but she had heard that I "took after my father." He never succeeded in anything but marrying. "Hadn't you better try that?"

That was the way she closed her letter. It roused my bile, and I determined that I would marry, and I would marry into a fortune, and afterwards set up as a banker and become a Rothschild, when I could laugh at Aunt Deborah and her money.

This didn't seem a very difficult thing to do. I was pretty well known throughout the country, as a young man of irreproachable character and great expectations. Aunt Deborah had declared her intention of making me her sole heir. Somebody had heard her, and that somebody had told somebody else, and so the story went. Consequently, as far as money was concerned, I was a good match for the queen, even—she being a widow. (I never had any idea of marrying her though. Her family is not only too large, but altogether too expensive; besides, the Prince of Wales is behaving himself so badly that I know it would break my heart, before I had been his stepfather a month.)

An acquaintance of mine, Mr. Filkinham

Flatbroke, dropped in to see me while I was thinking of these things. Flatbroke is connected with some of the first families in St. Louis. He had been married twice, but was a young and joyous widower at this time. His father left him a large fortune when he died, and Filkinham went through it with wonderful celerity. After that, having nothing else to busy himself about, he got married. His wife was rich, and Filkinham went right to work investing her money for her. He hadn't but just got it invested—all secure, you know—when she died. Some people thought that he wouldn't survive her a great while. His was a tearless sorrow, you see. If he could have cried, if he could have shed a tear, no doubt he could have recovered sooner, but he couldn't discount, and, so he waited about nine months and then he married again; and as his second wife had a large fortune, he was obliged to invest that; he did it too. After she died, his relatives clubbed together, and agreed to make him an allowance of—I won't undertake to say how much per month, but it was certainly enough to support him in good style.

As I was saying, he called in to see me just as I had completed all my plans for the future.

"Ah, Filkinham, glad to see you," said I, "particularly, as this is the last time that those midnight orbs of yours will ever behold this interesting countenance, as I start for the east to-morrow."

"Going to see your aunt?" asked Filkinham.

"Not at present. I'm going to get a wife first."

"O, indeed! I wasn't aware that you were engaged, Harry."

"Well, I'm not. I haven't seen the woman yet, that I am going to marry. I'm going to Santam Beach to spend the summer. There's plenty of nice people there every year, and if I find the woman there that I'm in search of, I shall marry her if I can."

"And I'll go on with you," cried Filkinham.

"Very good. Get your traps together at once, for I want to start to-morrow."

There, now I've told you how I came to be stopping at Santam, and what my motive was in going there.

But about this Miss Fitz-Fluke, whom nobody knew, although everybody wanted to. She was more than ordinarily handsome, though not strictly a beauty. Her complexion was rather shady, and her luxuriant hair was of a purple black, and her eyes were of the same color, excepting the purple shade, and as bright as the dew-drops

“—which the sun
Impearls on every leaf and every flower.”

O, they were beautiful eyes! and she knew it, and she had a way of “playing them” upon a fellow which was perfectly distracting. And the worst of it was that nobody knew her, and so it was utterly impossible for a young man to get an introduction, and meantime she kept her room, except for a few hours every morning, when she took an airing in one of the prettiest little phaetons, behind a pair of sleek-looking gray ponies.

I believe that every single man—and perhaps some few married ones—at Santam was in love with her, merely on account of her exclusiveness. If they could have made her acquaintance, and conversed with her, rode with her, walked with her and danced with her, why it is quite probable that she would have lost half her attractions in their eyes, at once; but so long as they could not, she was a woman to be sought after, and many were the wagers laid as to who should be the first one to make her acquaintance, and many were the expedients resorted to for the accomplishment of that end.

Flatbroke and I used to ride on the beach every morning. He had bought a splendid team in New York, and his man Joe brought it down to Santam the day after we arrived there. It was the best turnout at the hotel, and its first appearance created a sensation accordingly. We used to manage it so as to meet and pass Miss Fitz-Fluke at least twice in the course of our morning drives, and the flash of her black eyes, as they met mine, always put my heart in a flutter that lasted through the next twenty-four hours, because, you see, I considered it an honor even to be glanced at by this proud beauty, particularly when I found out that no other man at Santam had been “dignified with this high honor.”

“By the way, Harry,” said Filkinham, as we were taking our accustomed ride one morning, “by the way, Harry, you said before we came down here, that if you found the woman you were in search of, you should marry her if you could. I never thought to ask you before if you had found her. Have you?”

“I think I have, Filkinham.”

“And it is who?”

“Can’t you guess?”

“The charming Miss Grey?”

“No.”

“Miss Doubleday, Miss Milden, the fascinating widow Adams, or Miss Clarkensburg, which?”

“Neither.”

“O, then it must be the mysterious Miss Fitz-Fluke?”

“Yes.”

“And you’ve got everybody at Santam for a rival.”

“Yes, but so long as she condescends to notice none, I am as well off as the rest.”

“It would be a good speculation, perhaps,” said Filkinham, arousing himself from a short reverie that he had fallen into after my last remark. “She is very wealthy, I understand.”

I had never been jealous of Flatbroke before, but now when he spoke of her wealth, I knew that she was thinking how securely he could invest it, if he only had the right of a husband.

“Pshaw! Filkinham; who knows whether she is wealthy or not? or who knows anything about her, for that matter?”

“Who knows? O, that’s certain enough. Mrs. Farnsworth told me that she knew the family. She said she remembered her father very well. Met him at Newport, I believe, before the war. Said he was worth millions then. Of course, Mrs. Farnsworth is not always quite accurate in her statements, and she is a woman that never admits that she don’t know everybody that’s worth knowing, but I really think she was acquainted with the Fitz-Flukes.”

“Well, there she comes, and she’s quite alone,” said I. “She’s left her footman behind this morning.”

The little ponies came up at a spanking trot. Just as they came abreast of us, the charming driver dropped her whip.

“Egad! Flatbroke, there’s a chance. Hold your horses.”

I jumped out, picked up the whip, and walked back to meet the phaeton, for the lady had turned around and was driving down toward me.

She was smiling like a cloudy May morn (I told you that her complexion was rather shady), and she thanked me for the trouble I had taken on her account, in the sweetest voice that was ever uttered. Upon my honor, I don’t think I was ever so dazzled by a woman’s smile before in all my life.

"My heart did glowing transport feel;"

as the poet says. If I had thought myself in love before, I was sure of it now.

I walked slowly back to the carriage. Filkinham was smoking quietly, as he waited.

"Poor worm! thou art infected," he remarked, as I got in beside him.

"I admit it."

I was so happy that I could have admitted anything then. She had spoken to me, she had smiled upon me, and—I was almost certain that the whip had been dropped purposely.

Filkinham drove back to the hotel soon after, and I went up to my room. At the door I encountered Miss Fitz-Fluke's maid. She put her finger on her lip, and handed me a note.

"What's this?"

But she was gone.

With a beating heart I opened my door (a queer thing to open a door with, I confess), and entering my room, I closed and bolted the door behind me.

"Now," said I, "we'll look into the mystery."

You know that it isn't just the proper thing for a young lady to be writing to a strange young man, and I wasn't more than half pleased with the idea of receiving a note from either Miss Fitz-Fluke or her maid.

It was delicately perfumed, of course. I opened and read:

"If Mr. Ackley would visit the 'Lover's Rock,' to-night at ten o'clock, he would much oblige
"ONE IN TROUBLE."

Could that be Miss Fitz-Fluke? And if so, what possible trouble could she have?

"But I'll go, of course," I said, rising and unlocking the door for Flatbroke, who occupied the same parlor with me.

I didn't intend to let Flatbroke into the secret, but he saw the note on the table and caught a glimpse of the last words: one in trouble.

"What is that—somebody in trouble, Harry?"

"Pshaw, it's nothing," said I, hastily hiding the note in my pocket.

"O ho! nothing, eh? Well, all right, Harry, help 'em out."

"I intend to if I can," I answered, testily.

How impatiently I waited for the night I leave you to imagine. I waited till nine o'clock, and then I sallied out. There was dancing in the hotel parlor. I looked in and saw Filkinham waltzing with Miss Botts, the flour merchant's daughter, from Chicago, and then I hurried away toward the "Lover's Rock," which is located nearly half a mile from the hotel, overhanging the sea.

The moon was up and the night was beautiful. I think I noticed this, but I am not certain, for I had a great deal to think of without. For instance, the note in my pocket might be a decoy to draw me on to—well, I didn't know what. I had received it from the maid, but for all that it might not be from her mistress. It might have been written by the maid at the instigation of her lover, who might be a villain, and who might—

"You have come?"

It was the voice of her I loved, and she now came forward from the shadow of the rock to meet me.

"Miss Fitz-Fluke?"

"Yes, I see you know my name, and I know yours. That is enough. We are acquainted; shall we be friends?"

"Why, I hope so," I stammered. As I have hinted before, well-brought-up young ladies don't meet a man at such a time, more than half way. Miss Fitz-Fluke's conduct was exceedingly singular, to say the least, or it seemed so to me.

"You are in trouble?"

"Yes. Will you sit down?"

I took a seat on the stone and she sat down beside me, rather close too.

"Can I help you?" I asked.

She laid her soft, white hand on my arm, and turning her dark face up to mine, while her bright eyes glistened like diamonds in an eastern river (down in Maine), she answered softly "yes."

"What can I do?"

"Hear my story, and then you will know what I want you to do."

I was always fond of stories, and so I listened.

"You have no doubt heard that I am very wealthy?"

"Yes."

"Hush!"

There was a slight noise in the bushes near us.

"It's nothing but the wind," I said. "Go on with the story, if you please."

She turned her glorious eyes upon me once more, and continued thus:

"Young man, can you keep a secret? Yes, yes, I know you can. I have studied your countenance closely, and I can trust you. Hush! I am the daughter of the French empress by a former marriage!—"

"The deuce you are!" I exclaimed, springing to my feet.

"Of course you are, Sarah," said a man's voice behind me; and the next moment he held the unfortunate Miss Fitz-Fluke in his arms, in spite of her violent struggles to get away.

"What does this mean?" I cried, in bewilderment.

"Crazy as a loon, of course, young man. Was she gumming you?"

I was too indignant to answer.

"She ran away from home nearly a month ago, with sixteen thousand dollars of the old gentleman's money, in government bonds. He didn't discover his loss until a few days ago. Then we found out where she sold 'em and tracked her here. And so you fell in love with her, eh? Well, she's a handsome girl, and aint much mad, only semi-occasionally, as one might say. She'll be just as sane as you are, for two or three weeks on a stretch, and then she'll fly right off the handle, just as she's done to-night. Sorry for you, young man. Nice girl, as I said before, and good family, but rather flighty."

All my hopes were dashed, and I felt dashed, too, when upon looking up I discovered that nearly all the boarders at the hotel were collected around us.

"Come, Sarah," said the man who had spoken to me, "let's go home now;" and taking her arm on one side, while an assistant took hold on the other, they were leading her away, when she stopped to throw a kiss at me, and then, in a whisper, "Remember what I told you." I felt a hand on my shoulder, and looking up, discovered Filkinham by my side.

"Beware, my boy, of women in trouble."

"I will."

"And if you want a good wife, marry Miss Botts. I discovered this evening that she was very fond of you."

"Thank you, I'll see about that," I replied; and taking his arm we walked back to the hotel.

I've only to add, that while I write this, the late Miss Botts, now Mrs. Ackley, is sitting by my side while Aunt Deborah is knitting in yonder corner.

JOHN MERRILL'S SECRET.

BY W. H. MACY.

AMONG the heterogeneous crowd who were to be my shipmates in the Amphion, I was particularly attracted to a slender youth from one of the back counties of New York State, who signed his name on the papers as John Merrill. He was nearly my own age, I judged; and there was an air of quiet refinement about him, strikingly in contrast with the rude, boisterous character of the majority of our associates. These last were about an average of such raw material as is recruited every day of the week at the metropolis, and shipped off to the whaling ports, to be manufactured into seamen.

John was, from the first, retired and uncommunicative, though less so in his intercourse with me than with any one else. He never referred to his antecedents, though I had given him my whole autobiography before we had been a fortnight at sea. And as I found him a sympathizing listener whenever I wanted to let my tongue run on, I don't think I ever thought of esteeming him the less for his reticence as to his past life. I merely thought that he must have some good reason for wishing to conceal his true history, and was too conscientious to invent a false one.

One of John's eccentricities—I knew not what else to call it—was that he always kept his sea-chest locked. This is unusual in a whaler's fore-castle, and always subjects the man doing it to unpleasant remarks, as implying a want of confidence in the honesty of his shipmates. It is common to say of the man who does it, that "he is either a thief himself, or else thinks the rest of us are thieves." But John Merrill only blushed, without making any audible reply, when such cutting insinuations were thrown out, as they occasionally were, in his hearing. They had no effect whatever in producing any change in his habits. Even I myself could never get a peep at his inventory. He was generous, even to a fault, in respect of giving or lending little matters; but he always kept his chest in the darkest corner of our little dark, triangular quarters, and when he took out or put in anything, was careful never to leave it unlocked.

As concerned his duty, he did not appear to be the stuff of which crack sailors are made. But he won upon the good opinion of the officers, even of gruff Mr. Baldwin, our executive, a tarry old Triton, whom current report declared to be web-footed.

"I can't haze that boy," he would say. "We must ease him in, till he has eaten a few barrels of salt-horse to harden his sinews."

I could not tell why, but I don't think I was ever envious of my comrade because the mate favored him in this way, while he drove me up to my utmost capacity. Both of us were respectful and willing, and tried hard to do our duty, and as he expressed it, "make men of ourselves." And I think I felt rather elated to know that Mr. Baldwin discovered that there was tougher material in me than in John Merrill, and worked us accordingly. It was an honor to be selected to pull the mate's tub-oar, while he was enrolled in the rear-rank of the "shipkeepers." And I never complained, even when, in reefing topsails, the old salt would say, kindly, "Stop down, John Merrill, I want you to help me;" while, at the next moment, he roared at me on the yard, in a voice of thunder, "Lay out there, you Bill, and take up that dog's-ear! What are you staring at, in the bunt?"

I think I may have assumed a patronizing air in my intercourse with John, in consequence of all this. Feeling a professional superiority, I could not avoid letting it appear sometimes. But if so, he never seemed to notice it. If there was a sudden call, in our watch, for one of the boys to jump aloft and reeve studding-sail halyards, or loose a royal, John would start sometimes, but I would gently push him back and jump in ahead of him. I was proud of my ability to take the lead, and there was gratitude, instead of indignation or shame, in his clear, blue eye on such occasions. Some of the men standing near would perhaps intimate that he was wanting in pluck, to let me do this. But I don't think I ever thought so, though, of course, I felt flattered by such remarks, as any boy would.

But John Merrill made sure, though slow, progress in his duties, and his sinews hardened up, as Mr. Baldwin had prophesied. Though delicate in frame, his health seemed perfect, and in some respects we had no better man among us. He was always ready to take an extra trick on the lookout, for he seemed to like being alone where he could commune with his own thoughts. And he was soon acknowledged to be the best helmsman on board. Did the sturdy old Amphion show a determination to carry her wheel an extra spoke to windward at "full-and-by," or to make wayward sheers and yaws when off before it, no one could manage her like this quiet, timid youth.

He was always ready to take my turn at the helm for me; indeed, would have taken them all if I would have let him. He could have done me no greater favor than this; for no duty, however laborious or dangerous, was so irksome to me as steering the ship. To do it well, required an abstraction of the mind for two hours from all other matters, with a touch, and a kind of foresight, or rather fore-feeling, in which John Merrill excelled, but which few rough-and-tumble sailors possess.

Mr. Baldwin used to declare that "he never knew a right-down smart fellow who could steer more than a fair, decent trick; and that he never knew an A 1 extra helmsman who was good for much else." And, after an observation of many years, I think his statement was not far from the truth.

We made our first port at Talcahuano after doubling Cape Horn, and here John and I, being in the same watch, were much together on shore. But he would never stay after dark, and appeared utterly insensible to the fascinations of the Chillan brunettes. He would drink no liquor, and his example, in this respect, had a good effect upon myself.

We sailed for a cruise on the coast of Peru, after a short stay in port. Among the men shipped to fill vacancies was one known as "California Tom," a fellow of unbounded assurance and infinite "gas," to whom John and I both took an instinctive aversion at first acquaintance. But he found some congenial spirits on board the Amphion, as such fellows will in any ship where they may cast their fortunes.

We had not been long at sea before it appeared that we had some one in our circle who disdained the nice little distinctions of meum and tuum. Several articles had been mysteriously missed by different parties, and complaints were loud and clamorous.

A ship's fore-castle is as unfit a place for a thief as he can well find his way into. As much uneasiness is caused by his presence, as by the knowledge that a powder-magazine is located somewhere under the deck, without knowing exactly where. Woe to him if he is caught; for though Jack's standard of morality is, in many respects, no higher than it ought to be, he has no mercy for a pilfering shipmate. He has, it may be said, one code of morals to regulate his dealings with his own comrades, and another much more elastic, for the great barbarian world outside.

We became a very unhappy family after this discovery, for, of course, all mutual confidence was lost, until it should appear who the offender was. No one was exempt from suspicion; though the weight of it was equally divided between California Tom and my demure friend, John Merrill. Each had his friends, who believed the other guilty, but while the boy modestly refrained from saying anything about it, Tom did not scruple to head his own party.

"It's easy enough to see who the thief is," I heard him say one night, as he occupied the centre of a little knot of his cronies. "It's that sleek-faced little hypocrite that is at the wheel now."

"Of course 'tis," said Derby, one of the "congenials." "I've always thought so from the first of it. It's enough to condemn any fellow to know that he keeps his donkey always locked."

"What business has one man to be allowed to lock his donkey, anyhow?" demanded Tom, loud enough now for all to hear. "I say, let's go and kick the lid open and see what's in it."

"Sit right down!" said Frank Wightman, from our side of the house; for Tom had risen as if to carry his suggestion into effect. "Don't undertake anything of the kind. John Merrill isn't here to speak for himself, and no man shall break his chest open while I'm by to prevent it."

"Don't you want to find out who the thief is?" asked Derby,

"Of course I do; and I don't think I should have to go far to do that. If there's to be a general search of chests and bunks, I'm ready to agree to it at any time; and perhaps the boy would be willing to open his, in such a case. But I say it shan't be kicked open in his absence."

"It's plain enough that he's the guilty one," said Tom, "when his chest is the only one locked, and—"

"I don't know about that!" retorted Frank, with a significant look. "A thief may find other places for his plunder besides in his chest. Indeed, if he's an old hand at it, he would be likely to."

This home-thrust put an end to the discussion for the moment; for Tom, as well as Derby and the rest of his gang, were afraid of Wightman, who alone was a match for any two of them. But when John was relieved from the wheel, we told him what had occurred, and how suspicion was thickening upon him. Frank asked him, if he were willing to open his chest and let us all have a look at its contents.

"No," said he, quietly, "I am not willing."

"But why not if you are innocent?"

"I cannot say why not, but I can assure you that I know nothing about the stolen things. You must either take my word for it, or, if a general search is determined upon, open my chest by force, for I shall not consent to have it done."

"I believe what you say, John," said Frank, "and so does Bill, here, that you are entirely innocent. But there are many who don't, and there will be still more, if you don't satisfy them. Perhaps if you would let me, alone, overhaul it, or Bill, if that would suit you better, eh?"

"No," I cannot show the contents of it, even to Bill. If the matter is pressed hard, I shall appeal to the old man for protection—though I don't know as that would do any good."

"None at all," said Wightman and I, both at once.

"What would he do, do you think?"

"Exercise his authority, and demand the key at once—or open it by force. He has heard about the thefts, as you know; and I heard him tell Mr. Baldwin that, if another case was reported, he should make a general search, and flog the thief, if he could be found."

The boy rested his face upon his hands in thought, but made no answer.

"Never mind, John," said Wightman; "don't fret about it. No harm shall come to you, anyhow. I'm satisfied of your truth, and if you still decline to show your things, you shan't be forced to, at least by anybody in this end of the ship. But think this matter over, and perhaps to-morrow you'll feel differently about it. I've no idle curiosity, myself, to want to know your secret; but I would like to satisfy others, who haven't the same trust in your integrity that I have."

That night in the middle watch, I was awakened by a slight clicking noise, and saw California Tom, by the dim light of the hanging lamp, stealthily opening John's chest with a key. John himself, as well as all the rest of my watch, was sleeping soundly; but I knew that he never left his key where it could be found. It was always about his person, night and day. Tom must have found a duplicate key to fit the chest.

I was about to speak and give the alarm to Wightman and others; but, on second thought, determined to wait a moment and see the result. Tom had a bundle in one hand, which appeared to be a new flannel shirt, and as the lock flew open at last, he lost no time in looking into the chest, but pushed in the bundle, relocked it and went on deck.

I considered the matter, and determined to tell Frank Wightman; which I did as soon as our watch turned out.

"Don't tell John," were his first words; "I hope he won't open his chest and discover it; for I want to see what kind of a plot is hatching."

John Merrill had the morning mast-head, and went up to his post at daylight, without having had occasion to look into his chest. Tom was up and stirring soon afterwards—an unusual proceeding for him in a morning watch off duty—and headed off Captain Soule as soon as he made his appearance above deck.

Presently the order was given to call all hands, and muster them up. One of the mates was sent into the fore-castle to see that no one lingered, and to have all the men's kits and effects roused up to the light of day. The captain was evidently in a towering rage, for he had passed lightly over several previous reports of theft, hoping the matter would be adjusted without his interference. But Tom had lost a new shirt during the night, and Captain Soule had lost—his patience.

"I'll find it if it's inside the ship!" said he; "and I'll flog the man that stole it."

Several chests and bags had been emptied of their contents in the presence of us all; for John had been called down from aloft, and stood, thoughtful and agitated, at my side. When the captain came to the locked chest,

"Whose is this?" he demanded.

"Mine, sir," spoke up the lad.

"Giv' me your key?"

"If you'll excuse me, sir—I would like to speak a word with you—by ourselves, sir, if you please."

But the captain was not in a humor to listen to any remonstrance at that moment.

"Let me get through with this cursed business before I talk with anybody! It doesn't look well, anyhow, that you keep your chest locked up!"

He swung back his heavy boot as he spoke, and with a single kick under the projecting edge of the lid it flew open.

"There's my shirt!" exclaimed Tom, seizing the bundle that lay on top. He shook it open, showed his marks, and it was at once identified beyond all dispute.

"Enough said! We're on the right track, now," said Captain Soule. "Take up this chest and carry it aft!" And he closed the lid with a bang.

"Mr. Baldwin," he continued, "strip John Merrill's back, and seize him up! It's a new thing for me to flog one of my men—a thing I never did—but I've sworn it in this case, and I'll keep my word."

The poor boy, overwhelmed with confusion, could hardly find a word to protest his innocence, as the mate led him aft. But Frank Wightman at this moment neared the captain respectfully, and touched him gently on the shoulder. A word was spoken; the captain relaxed his angry brows to listen to it, for Wightman was the best man in the fore-castle. The two walked aft together, conversing earnestly. I kept my eye on them, till Frank made a signal, which I understood, when I followed.

"Mr. Derrick," said the captain to the second mate, "keep everything as it stands, with the chests, forward. Don't allow a man to touch a thing, till further orders."

He beckoned Wightman and myself to come below. But as he did not countermand the orders he had given about seizing John up, the mate, it seems, proceeded to obey them. He prepared the seizings, but when he ordered the boy to remove his shirt, he met with unexpected resistance. While I was relating to Captain Soule, in the forward cabin, what I had seen during the middle watch, there was a scuffle over our heads, and John Merrill, in a frenzy of excitement, rushed down the stairs and into the after-cabin. "Hold on, Mr. Baldwin! Never mind what I told you, for the present." And the captain followed the boy into the sanctum, while we awaited the result. In a minute afterwards he put his head out at the door with the strangest look on his face that I had ever seen mortal man wear.

"Wightman! you and Bill pass—John Merrill's chest down the stairs—right into this room."

We obeyed the order, and set our burden down at his feet. But the lad was not to be seen as we looked about us.

"That'll do. You can go on deck, now—I'll talk with you again, soon." And the door was closed between us and the mystery.

It was half an hour before Captain Soule came up, and ordered the search continued. When he came to Tom's chest, he overhauled it very carefully; but it was, apparently, emptied to the bottom, without finding any stolen property. But, still unsatisfied, he stood it up on end, thumped it heavily, and threw it bottom up. A false bottom was dislodged and fell out, followed by the various missing articles!

A general cry of indignation was raised, and a strong disposition was manifested to lynch California Tom. But Mr. Baldwin took upon himself the office of executioner, this time with a good will.

"I always felt it in my bones, that John Merrill was innocent," said he to Captain Soule; "and when it came to stripping his shirt, I hadn't, somehow, any heart to do it."

"I'm glad you didn't succeed in doing it," was the reply. "I couldn't have flogged him if he had been guilty—nor could you, either."

"How so, sir?"

"Do you think you could lay the cat on the back of a woman?"

That comical look of the captain's was reflected, nay multiplied, tenfold, in the rough face of the old mate.

"A woman?" he gasped out, "John Merrill?"

"Ay, a woman, Mr. Baldwin. Annie Carroll is her name, now."

"But—what are you going to do with him, sir?"

"Do with him? With her, you mean—put him, or put her, or it, ashore, of course, as soon as I can make a port. We must give her a stateroom, in the cabin, and have her to wear such a dress as belongs to her sex."

"Well—well—" said Mr. Baldwin, reflectively; "I never had anything bring me up with a round-turn like that." Then a bright idea seemed to have struck him, and he demanded triumphantly, "Where's your clothes to dress her in?"

"She's got all her dry goods in her chest, ready to wear."

"What? in John Merrill's chest, do you mean?"

"Of course. Whose else should I mean? That's why he—she, I mean—always kept it locked, and was so secret about it."

I shall not spend time to tell how we talked the matter over in the fore-castle that night, and compared notes, and went back to every little incident of the outward passage, that might be supposed to have any bearing upon this astounding discovery. Of course, there were those ready to say they had guessed the truth months ago; but I venture to say, that not a man on board the Amphion had the slightest suspicion of the truth, until it was revealed to Captain Soule, as I have related. And how much longer we might have been in the dark, but for the attempt to flog her, it is difficult to say.

John Merrill stood no more watches on board the Amphion, nor went to the mast-head. But Annie Carroll, a beautiful young lady, save that she wore her hair rather too much au garçon, sometimes steered a trick at the wheel when she felt in the humor, until our arrival at Callao, where she became, when her story was known, the heroine, the lioness of the hour. A passage home was secured for her; and she took leave of us all, with no desire, as she confessed, to follow any further the profession of a sailor.

It was the old, old story. An orphan, a harsh guardian, and an attempt to force her into a marriage with one she disliked. A madcap scheme, in which she had embarked from a wayward impulse, and persisted in because she hardly knew how or when to retreat. And we were constrained to admit, when we reviewed all the circumstances, that she had nobly sustained the double character, and had preserved all the finer attributes of her sex, while she laid aside the apparel.

And will it be wondered that she lost her heart while on board the Amphion? Not to me; for, of course, I was but a boy in her eyes. But when I last saw John Merrill, he was Mrs. Captain Wightman, and still claimed to be, if not the boldest seaman, the best helmsman, at least, of the family circle.

BEYOND THE STARS.

BY HELEN WOOD MANVILLE.

Beyond the stars, beyond the stars—
 What flowery fields are spread,
 Beyond the blue and golden bars,
 That arch the dome o'erhead?
 What sylvan grots where we may rest
 From all these vexing cares?
 O! I methinks would be so blest
 To climb the unseen stairs.

I long to tread the pearly shore
 Where mortal ne'er has trod,
 That I may know a pain no more,
 But dwell for aye with God.

I stretch my hands in mute despair,
 No angel stoops to save,
 But Hope, in pity whispers, "There
 Is rest beyond the grave!"

And so the grass is growing green
 Above the little spot,
 Where underneath its tasselled sheen
 I'll sleep and pain be not.
 But if the grave will lead me there
 Where I so long to go,
 Why should I for life's ills despair?
 Heaven lies beyond, I know.

A LITTLE FOOL.

BY FRANK H. ANGIER.

MR. TIMOTHY BALCOM sat leaning upon his desk, with his chin buried in his hands and his eyes staring reflectively into space. The great ledger which lay open before him was ruled methodically in red and black lines, and between the lines were rows upon rows of figures, filling each page from the top quite down to the bottom. But Mr. Balcom, whenever he dropped his eyes to these dreary columns, saw nothing there but four black letters which stared malignantly back at him from the trimly neat pages, and which repeated themselves upon every leaf and intruded themselves maliciously into the prim and proper order of the debits, credits and balances. And these four letters formed a word which represented to Mr. Balcom a terrible, crushing, maddening fact. Ruin, ruin, ruin! It was this that glared at him from every volume of accounts in his office. It was this that confronted the clerks in the outer counting-room, as they bent wearily over the chaos of drafts, and bills, and acceptances that had flooded in upon them, and tried to persuade each other that black was white and that the firm was not in such a very bad way, after all, but all the time aware, in their secret souls, that the house of Balcom, White & Co. had gone to the devil, and that no arithmetical necromancy or any other power on earth could save it. It was this which had driven the senior partner to the verge of lunacy, and had sent the junior on a tour to the Highlands of Scotland, doubtless to procure a supply of Scotch snuff to throw in the eyes of his creditors.

Mr. Timothy Balcom got off his high stool and disposed himself comfortably in an arm-chair before the fire. He almost wished that he himself had absconded to the Highlands of Scotland, or to the antarctic continent, before all this trouble came upon him. But he was a man of large family, and could not easily have got away without attracting attention. His family! It was the thought of them which burned so deep in his very heart. His wife could bear this better than his children, for as she had been his guide and counsel through all his married life, he felt that she would be faithful and patient now. But Timothy Balcom's children had been reared in affluence. Over them poverty had never yet cast its chilling shadow. Poor Meta and Pearl! What were they to do?

Mr. Balcom pulled out his pocket-knife, and, picking up a splinter from the hearth, began to whittle. No better evidence of the disturbance of his own mental equilibrium could have been needed than this simple action. He had not whittled before since he was a boy, and now, as he slowly and meditatively began to cover the carpet with delicate shavings, the clerks looked through the glass partition which separated them from the inner office, and wondered greatly. It was a curious assortment of mental pictures which passed before Mr. Balcom's inward vision as he sat absorbed in this occupation; bright pictures of the happy past, of his pleasant, luxurious back parlor at home, of the cheery fireside, the close-drawn curtains, the soft and mellow lamplight, the comfortable easy-chair, the slippers and dressing-gown, the smoking urn of tea, the books, the piano, and, better and brighter than all, the gentle face of his wife and the laughing eyes of his daughter Pearl. Then, too, following close upon these cheerier photographs, came visions of the future—a future, if not of want, at least of strict and scrupulous economy, where should be no piano, no velvet carpets, no services of silver, none of the little artificial luxuries of life, and where, alas! the light might die out of even Pearl's blue eyes, and a shadow of something worse than poverty blot out life's sunshine from them all.

Poor little Pearl! It was the thought of her that made this misfortune cut so cruelly into the very core of Timothy Balcom's heart. However his wife and Meta might be able to bear it, he knew that the news would crush Pearl to the very earth. As yet her young life had been but a golden-hued and rosy-tinted dream. No harsh experience had taught her how to battle with adversity, no cloud had ever dimmed her happiness; and now, when life was unfolding before her, as Nature reveals herself to the opening bud, the tendrils of her heart most needed the sunshine which was to be denied them. This trouble would have made a heroine of some women, but he doubted whether it would make a heroine of Pearl. There was little that was heroic in her character. As the spoiled and caressed pet of the family, she had never been taught self-reliance, nor had it ever been developed in her affectionate, trusting nature. From the bright, blue sky had she caught the gleam of her merry eyes, from the sunshine had she taken the tints of her golden hair, and her nature, kindly and sympathetic in all its attributes, was little calculated to stand bravely against the rough shouldering of a selfish world. Well might Timothy Balcom run his fingers wearily through his gray hair and murmur to himself, "Poor Pearl! What is she to do?"

But dear as Pearl and Meta were to their father, he, like many other busy men, had never in all his life had time to get thoroughly acquainted with his own children. If he had been able to read Pearl's heart more closely, he would have feared the result of the misfortune which had fallen upon the family, not because it was to deprive his daughters of the luxuries amid which they had been reared, but because it was to bring upon Pearl a struggle to which the struggle against poverty were as nothing. It was to bring upon her the necessity of waging battle with the strongest impulses of her own heart, the necessity of tearing asunder by the main strength of her pride the cords which held her to a sacred thing; the necessity of entering into a ruthless warfare with herself—a warfare which might end in making her a noble woman and which might end in her destruction.

But Timothy Balcom never dreamed, when Lieutenant Edward Harper of the United States Navy packed up his carpet bag to leave them, after a short visit to the family a year ago, that he had packed up Pearl's heart with his other possessions and taken it away with him. Young as Pearl was, she had already withstood several sieges, but the young lieutenant had certainly carried the citadel at last.

During all this time, although her father never dreamed of it, and the lieutenant himself was not at all sure of it, Pearl's heart had been travelling over stormy seas and lying becalmed on sultry African coasts in Edward Harper's ship, while Pearl herself had waited patiently at home for it to come back to her in the course of time, and had kept her secret locked so carefully away within her breast that none of those around her ever learned it. A week ago the lieutenant had returned, fully awake to the extent of his own affection for Pearl, but hesitating to lay his petition at her feet lest he should meet with a refusal which his pride could not brook. Lieutenant Harper was a sailor, unversed in woman's ways, and he could not read Pearl well enough to see that his suit was in little danger. The wide disparity between them in a worldly sense was to him a bitter fact. Had Pearl been as poor as himself, no power on earth would have kept him from her.

Mr. Balcom, having whittled his splinter quite away, arose from his chair, and, jamming his hat down hard over his ears, shut up the ledger with a vehement bang and walked out into the street. As he passed through the outer office between the rows of weary, sleepy clerks, some of whom had been at work through half the previous night, expending their stock of mercantile logic to prove to themselves that figures can sometimes lie and that the house was still as solvent as ever, while every one of them, from the cashier to the errand boy, knew that it was in a muddle which it could by no human possibility ever be got out of, his pallid, careworn look attracted the attention of even the most careless among them; and they raised their faces silently from their desks as he walked unsteadily towards the door, and watched him, with looks of kindly sympathy and pity, as he passed from the building still softly murmuring to himself, "Poor little Pearl! What will she do?"

When he reached home he went straight to his library and, throwing himself into a chair, rang for a servant.

"Send my daughter Pearl to me," he said, when his summons was answered.

"No need for that, pa. I'm here already," said a voice at his elbow, and Pearl, rosy and dimpled, threw her arms about his neck and gave him a filial kiss.

"I want to talk to you," said her father. "Sit down in my lap, puss."

"But I'm awfully heavy," she exclaimed, taking a seat upon his knee, as she was bid.

"Yes," he replied, "but never too heavy for me, always remember that, Pearl."

He drew her flaxen head against his shoulder and gently passed his hand over her shining hair.

"Pearl," he continued, after a pause, during which his eyes had wandered reflectively to the glowing fire in the open grate, "you have always been happy, have you not?"

"O father!" she replied, nestling closer to him; "how could I help being happy?"

"Are you very happy now? very happy indeed?"

"Yes indeed; very, very happy, father. Have you ever doubted it?"

"No," he said, "but do you know why you are so?"

"What funny questions!" she exclaimed. "Of course I do. It is because I have the very best father in all the world, and the kindest mother and the dearest sister. Who would not be happy in such a home as I have always had?"

"Are you quite sure, Pearl, that your enjoyment of life is not derived from these beautiful things around you? Could you be as happy without books and pictures, without your piano, and without a new bonnet every month?"

"I could, if you, and mother and Meta were not taken from me," she answered, looking up at him with wondering eyes.

"Suppose," he continued, "that we were to leave this house, where you have passed so many happy days, the old nursery up stairs where you and Meta used to play together, the little chamber where you have slept since you were a child—suppose we were to leave all these things at once, forever. Could you bear that, Pearl?"

She raised her head quickly from his shoulder, and gazed at him with an alarmed half-startled look.

"Suppose, Pearl, that our beautiful home, which all of us love so well, were sold under the sheriff's hammer. Suppose all our little household gods, which we hold dear to our hearts only next to each other, were taken from us. Suppose our pretty castle were invaded to-morrow by a company of unpitying strangers, who should turn us into the street, Pearl, and leave us without a place in all the wide world to lay our heads. Could you be happy even then, my daughter, Pearl?"

She broke into a frightened cry.

"Father! What is it? What has happened to us?"

"Hush!" he said, passing his hand once more tenderly over her amber hair. "It is nothing."

"It is something," she said, almost wildly. "You are hiding something from me. What is it?"

"If what I have told you were to come true," he said, in answer, "could you bear it, Pearl?"

"I could bear anything but the loss of your love, my father. You frighten me. You are not yourself to-night. What dreadful thing has come upon us?"

He looked long and sadly into her eyes, concentrated upon his face with a look which he felt was searching him through. He marked her face, contracted with a vague anxiety, and felt her bosom heaving tumultuously against his breast. He hesitated long before he dared trust himself to tell her; then he said, quietly, and still looking into her earnest eyes:

"We are beggars, Pearl. The poorest of our servants is not poorer than his master."

She uttered a wild, terrified cry and her cheek turned pale as marble. He had buried a knife in her heart, but not in the place where he had most feared to wound her. At that moment there flashed before her inward vision a thought, not of the material change which his words implied, not of the loss of home and the comforts of which she had never known the want, not of her future life of poverty and self-denial, but a remembrance of the man whom she owned in her heart of hearts to be dearer to her than all the world beside. In that one moment all the world grew dark to her. She could have borne the loss of all else, if the sacrifice did not include the greater sacrifice of herself. God help her! Tenderly as it had been given, the blow had crushed her love for Edward Harper into a thing of dreary hopelessness.

Not many girls would have viewed the matter in such a light. Few women would refuse to marry a man dear to their heart because they could not bring to him a fortune. But Pearl possessed a subtle pride, which now for the first time in her life rose to overbalance every other characteristic of her nature.

"He shall not marry a beggar!" was the thought which flashed at once across her consciousness. "I would rather my heart should break than to have him feel that I married him because I was homeless."

"O father!" she said. "Is it so bad as that?"

"My poor Pearl!" he replied. "I grieve more for your sake than for all the rest."

"Don't think of me," she said, hastily. "You shall see how patiently I can bear it. To lose our money is not the worst thing that could have happened to us."

"No," he returned; "we might have lost each other. Kiss me now, my darling, and go and break this thing to Meta."

She bent towards him and threw her arms about his neck.

"At least, you shall never lose Pearl's love for you," she cried; and kissing him, she left the room.

"He has lost his fortune," thought she, as she gently closed the door. "He shall never know what I have lost, besides."

She would have gone at once to her room, to try by herself to realize the full extent of the calamity that had come upon her, but a servant met her in the hall.

"Lieutenant Harper is in the drawing-room, Miss Pearl!"

So Fate would not even give her time to think! The flying shutter of Destiny, ceaselessly weaving the varied pattern of Pearl's life, was bringing in the darker colors in quick succession. It was scarcely five o'clock in the afternoon. Something in her heart told her that Edward Harper would never have called at such a time, if he had not been going away. While she yet hesitated, with her hand upon the knob of the parlor door, she knew, as well as his words could have told her, that he had been suddenly ordered to his ship and that he had called to take his leave. Whether it would please Providence, to spare her a sorer trial than the one she had just borne she did not know, but as she entered the room, she raised a silent prayer that this man might not be led to speak to her of that which she knew to be uppermost in his heart.

But she was spared the pain of telling him of her father's misfortune. The lieutenant had heard of it that morning, and offered words of comfort and good cheer. Then, after passing an hour in aimless talk, the ingenious sailor, who had little conception of the natural sequence of conversational ideas, suddenly told her of his speedy departure.

"I am going to leave you, Pearl—for a long time."

She knew it already, but that did not lessen the acuteness of the pain which his announcement gave her.

"When?" she asked, earnestly.

"To-morrow morning," he answered.

"I shall be very sorry," she said, slowly, as though steadying her voice before each word. "Shall you be gone a great while?"

"We are going to the Mediterranean," he replied. "It will be two years, at least, before I see you again."

"You will not be forgotten," said Pearl, her voice beginning to tremble a little now. "We shall always be your friends, Edward, whatever our circumstances may be."

"O Pearl!" he exclaimed, seizing her white hand earnestly. "Let me ask you to be to me something more than friend. I want you for my wife, Pearl."

Her head fell upon her bosom and her face contracted as with a spasm of acute physical anguish.

"Do you know what you ask?" she said. "Would you marry a beggar?"

"Pearl, my love for you could be neither greater nor less, whether you were beggar or queen. O, don't refuse me this dearest wish of my heart. I shall leave you to-night, Pearl. If you cannot give yourself to me now, at least do not crush all hope within me. If I could win you in the end, I would wait willingly, though it were twenty years."

O, let those who have never known what it is to have the nobility of pride wage fierce battle with the intensity of a woman's love, pity this young girl, whose nature was struggling now between these two contending influences. None but herself ever knew the desolation of her heart when the victory was won, and her love for Edward Harper was crushed back, torn and bleeding, into the deepest depth of her young breast, nevermore to make its presence known to those who knew her best. He only saw her bosom heaving like the billows of a stormy sea, and felt her breath upon his cheek fall hot and feverish. These were all the evidences she gave him of the ruthless, cruel work by which she was crushing out the most earnest passion of her life.

"It cannot be," she said. "It can never, never be."

"Pearl! Pearl! Think again before you answer me. Don't send me away in utter hopelessness."

He felt her hand turn icy cold, and then she drew it suddenly away and pressed it upon her bosom as though she were stifling.

"My whole life has changed to me since yesterday," she said. "I am not the woman that I was when you met me last. Do you not see that even if I loved you, this cross which has been laid upon us would make it my duty not to leave my father at such a time? Were I rich, Lieutenant Harper—"

"Pearl! Pearl! At this very moment you do love me. I know it, and I shall leave you with at least that conviction to gladden all my life hereafter. Had I spoken of this before, you would have given yourself to me without question."

She rose to her feet hastily, and in an instant flushed to a burning crimson.

"You assume too much," she said, haughtily.

"Pearl," he replied, rising and gazing at her in unutterable sadness, "I understand your feeling and respect it. In your own refusal, you have betrayed yourself more fully than you know. But think again of what I ask, and remember that I will be all patient, until my hair turns gray, if even then you will be my wife. You can never take from me the knowledge of your own heart which I have this moment gained."

She looked at him for a moment in cold indifference, a look so proud and rigid, that the germ of hope which had budded in Harper's breast, shrank into itself, chilled and frozen.

But the effort was too great for Pearl's untrained powers of self-control, and her surcharged heart, breaking as she felt it to be, burst loose from the fetters of her pride and revealed itself in all its quivering anguish to Edward Harper's quick perception.

"Edward!" she cried, with the agony of a hopeless desolation ringing in her trembling voice, "you are killing me. If you love me as you say, for God's sake leave me."

He opened his lips to speak to her, but her white, pleading face sealed the words unuttered. Wringing his hands silently above his head, he turned towards the door. O, was this the parting, the memory of which he had hoped to comfort him during the long night-watches beneath the stars, and in the roar and terror of wintry storms?

With his hand upon the knob of the parlor door, he paused one moment to look back at Pearl. She stood motionless in the middle of the room, with her hand still raised as when she had spoken. That look, so gentle in its expression, and yet conveying so much of bitter, bitter disappointment and sad reproach, went home with a cruel thrust to her heart, and threw down the last barrier with which she had feebly tried to protect it. With a despairing cry she ran to him and threw her white, round arms about his neck. In that one brief instant, while he held her closely to him and felt her bosom heaving against his own, and could count the wild pulsations of her heart, the gates of heaven opened upon him. He bowed his head and her lips met his in a fierce and burning kiss. Then she pushed him from her with all her strength.

"Pearl!" he said, once more, earnestly, "do you retract?"

"I retract nothing," she cried, pressing both her hands upon her temples. "I can never be your wife. O, my brain is on fire! Go! Leave me! Don't speak to me again!"

He stood for a moment in hesitation. Then he slowly opened the door, looked back once more at Pearl, turned again, crossed the threshold and softly closed the door behind him. And Pearl, trembling through every fibre of her frame, sank down upon the floor and buried her face within her hands.

Do you say that she had embittered her whole life for naught? Perhaps so. Few women would have sacrificed themselves for such a cause. But this is the story of a little fool, and poor Pearl had hardly yet begun to earn the title.

In the bewilderment of the next few days she had little time to brood over her troubles. Lieutenant Harper's ship sailed on the morning following his interview with Pearl, and with it went nearly all that made the life of this once cheery-hearted girl worth the living. The magnificent house wherein she had been born and bred was sold, and its accumulated treasures scattered far and wide. Timothy Balcom, too honest to defraud his creditors of a penny which was in his power to pay, resigned to them everything without a single reservation. One, more thoughtful than the rest, and to whom he was a large debtor, offered him a little cottage some forty or fifty miles from the city, at a moderate rent, until, as Mr. Jinglesly, the owner, said, he "got rested enough to begin again." The cottage adjoined Mr. Jinglesly's own magnificent estate, and lay snugly in the bosom of a broad and sunny valley, within the dim blue circle of a sweep of wooded hills. The nearest village was full five miles away, and no more peaceful spot could have been selected in which the family might recover from the cruel blow which Fortune had given them. Hither, when the storm had quite passed over, they wended their way, each bearing his or her cross patiently, and poor Pearl carrying her own almost self-imposed and secret burden as bravely and as silently as the rest.

"I don't see," said Mr. Balcom, when their poor little stock of furniture was set in place, and a roaring fire was built in the open fireplace in the sitting-room on the first evening after their arrival, "I don't see that we shan't be very comfortable here, after all. This looks quite as homelike as our old back parlor ever did."

"It's a great deal better, pa," said Pearl, with a merry little laugh. "It's going to be romantic enough for a novel. I wouldn't give a straw for anything we have left behind. There are just as many of us as there ever were, excepting the servants, and I'm sure it is a deliverance to be rid of them."

"I miss the piano more than all," said Meta. "It was hard to lose that."

"Not for me," replied Pearl. "We can sing just as well without it. They haven't taken our voices away from us," and she tripped out of the room to pay a visit to the kitchen, warbling, as she went, a cheery little fragment from Fra Diavolo.

But this merry, careless girl was not the true and actual Pearl Balcom. In the thoughtful woman who so often sat alone at her window, gazing sadly out towards the east, and thinking that, far away beyond the outline of yonder hills, a dark gray ocean was rolling in upon the shore, and that, further still, a ship, which to her held all the cheer and hopefulness of life, was staggering on among the billows, and each moment bearing all that her heart held dear yet further and further away from her, was to be found the real owner of the name. There was such a peaceful quiet in the scenes around her that her own great sorrow, which she had hoped amid the genial influences of woods and fields to be able to endure if not forget, grew to grievously great proportions from the very want of other things to think of. Yet Pearl's heart was strong. Bravely she struggled to hide the pain which she had inflicted upon herself from the eyes of him for whose sake she had given herself the wound, and bravely she succeeded. At least, her father never dreamed that Pearl was other than she seemed to him.

One afternoon, not many weeks after their arrival, she sat upon a mossy stone deep in the heart of a wooded glen, at least a mile from the cottage. It was only in obedience to a sudden whim that she had come hither, and now, a little wearied with her purposeless walk, she sat idly punching the end of her parasol into the dead leaves at her feet. As she sat thus, with the scattered flecks of sunshine glinting through the canopy of leaves above her head and softly retouching in bright splashes of yellow light the burnished gold of her shining hair, a sudden salutation caused her to look upward.

"I beg a thousand pardons, miss?"

The speaker was a slim and angular young man, with extremely long legs encased in plaid pantaloons, who stood leaning upon the fence immediately above her.

"My name is Jinglesly," continued this individual, swinging one of his long legs over the fence and taking a comfortable seat upon the topmost rail, "George Popsey Jinglesly. The ancient buffalo who gave me that euphonious designation is your father's landlord, you know."

"I have heard of you, Mr. Jinglesly," said Pearl, pleasantly. "I am glad to make your acquaintance."

"Yes," said Jinglesly, confidently, "I knew you would be. All the women are glad to make my acquaintance. I don't run after them any myself; it's my appearance which takes the feminine eye, you know. I have been told I look like Napoleon. Do you think I look like Napoleon?"

"O, very much," said Pearl, glancing sarcastically at Mr. Jinglesly's remarkable figure, "very much indeed."

"I don't assume any credit for the little attentions which I receive from the ladies," he continued. "If they will fall in love with me, I can't help it, you know. Alas! I once have loved, Miss Balcom, but that is now forever past. Your face and form to-day for a moment recalled the dear object of that long buried passion, and I said to myself, 'George Washington P. Jinglesly, you must know that divine maiden. Perhaps the contemplation of those lovely features will help to assuage the grief which is gnawing at your vitals.' So I followed you, you see, to introduce myself. I hope I don't intrude upon your meditations."

"Not at all," replied Pearl, thoroughly amused at this singular creature. "I'm very glad you came."

"Ah! the tone of your sweet voice, Miss Balcom," said Mr. Jinglesly, getting off the fence and advancing towards her, hat in hand, "recalls to my mind the loved accents of that voice which I no more shall ever hear. I could a tale unfold, which would harrow up your very soul. The antique curiosity who stands to me in the place of parent, has, by his course of oppressive tyranny, blasted forever the life of the individual who stands before you. The world has no more charms for G. W. P. Jinglesly, Miss Balcom."

"O, not so bad as that, Mr. Jinglesly," said Pearl. "I am sure the world is very bright and beautiful, even yet."

"It would still be heaven," he replied, "were it full of angels such as you."

"You are disposed to compliment," said Pearl, eyeing him with a curious feeling of amusement and disgust.

"No. Believe me, I am most sincere," said Mr. Jinglesly, seating himself beside her and trying to take her hand, which she quickly withdrew from his grasp. "I have done with those hollow mockeries of feeling which the world calls compliments. Ah! I once have loved, Miss Balcom. Until to-day I had not dreamed that I could love again."

Pearl rose hastily to her feet.

"I must be going home," she said. "I have been away too long, already."

"Nay, not so soon," said Mr. J., struggling to get his symmetrical legs into a safe position for rising, before daring to trust his weight to them. "Do not tear yourself from my gaze so quickly. I have risked much for this interview, Miss Balcom. I saw you coming across the fields and I escaped by means of the window, from the room in which you unfeeling despot had imprisoned me. That was an original idea of mine. Not many men would have thought of the window, eh?"

"What did he shut you up for?" asked Pearl, wonderingly.

"I drank too much champagne at the party last night. The governor didn't approve of it. There's no harm in drinking champagne. Do you think there is?"

"Fiddlestick!" said Pearl, turning abruptly away. "I must go home. Good-day, Mr. Jinglesly."

She nodded a smiling adieu, and walked away towards the house laughing to herself heartily, and leaving Mr. Jinglesly gazing abstractedly after her with an expression of vacant astonishment.

This brief interview, however, was not the last of Pearl's acquaintance with this extraordinary young man. She related the occurrence at the tea-table that night and her droll mimicry of Mr. Jinglesly's manner set even her father to laughing in spite of himself. Having thus made use of the man who "once had loved," she dismissed him from her mind forthwith.

On the following morning, while Pearl was sweeping the front piazza, there entered at the gate a fat, tow-headed boy, who, first glancing furtively towards every point of the compass, made his way stealthily up to Pearl with a gesture of profound secrecy.

"Be you Miss Pearl?"

"Yes," replied Pearl.

The flaxen-haired boy once more looked cautiously about him. Then pulling from his pocket a note enclosed in a rose-tinted envelop, placed it in Pearl's hands with an expression of utmost fear and trepidation.

"This is for you," he said. "I was told not to wait. It's from him!"

The young man pointed with his finger over towards the west in a most extraordinary manner, and then took to his heels without more ado, leaving Pearl with the letter in her hand, looking after him in perplexity.

She went to her chamber to read it, and this was what it contained, traced in very precise and formal characters, with the t's all neatly crossed and the i's scrupulously dotted:

"MISS BALCOM:—Angel of my heart! My interview with you on yesterday has awakened the long silent echoes of the time that now is past forever. The love which I had thought to be dead within me has once more roused itself and burns again with renewed and fiercer energy. I once have loved. I love now. I love you. Need more be said? The ruthless tyrant who holds to me the relation of paternal ancestor, likes you and can make no objection to our union. My own person is attractive and my domestic oppressor has a sufficiency of the base lucre which is necessary for our support. Say that you will marry me and you will translate me to the seventh sphere of paradise. Until your decision, I tremble in the balance of superlative happiness and unalleviated misery; acceptance, joy; refusal, despair.

"Your devoted and adoring

"GEO. WASHINGTON POPSEY JINGLESBY."

The first impulse of Pearl Balcom on reading this absurd composition, was to burst into a peal of laughter. Then something came up into her throat and choked her, and she bent her head upon the table and cried. But this mood lasted scarcely a moment, and she soon dried her tears and sat back in her chair with the letter in her hand, gazing dreamily out across the fields towards the blue outline of distant hills, and thinking of the sea and the ship that was toying on its broad bosom so far away from her—ah! so much further away from her now than ever before, it seemed—and so quite lost herself at once in the maze of cruel questions to which the letter had given rise.

Why not? Life to her was an almost hopeless blank. With her own hand she had already crushed whatever of joy the future might have had in store for her. What better could she do than to give this block-head what he asked? In return he offered gold, and was not that worth more to her father—and he was all she had to live for, now—than her own useless self could ever be?

No, no, no. She could not do it. She could not do it. She crumpled the letter tightly in her hand and rising, paced quickly up and down the room. Through the open window the sweet breath of ripening hay fields floated idly in, and the listless drone of bees filled the fragrant air to remind her that not yet was the world dead or the sun blotted out. Back through the lapse of time which had passed since he had left her, back from across the dreary waste of waters which separated him from her, the voice of him who had been all in all to her called, sadly and appealingly, "Pearl! Pearl!" And Pearl, stopping still to listen, heard the tender supplication, and stretched out her white arms yearningly towards the outlined hills across the valley, and then wrung her hands above her head in anguish.

And yet, look at it as she would, it seemed to her the hand of inexorable Fate which had placed this bitter cup to her lips. It had not come of her own seeking. Was she not right in believing this to be her cross? Was she wrong in thinking herself to have been singled out as the instrument of her father's restoration to the world?

"Whatever suffering it may bring to me," thought Pearl, "he at least shall never have cause to think of me in his misfortune as a useless burden."

Roused by this thought, fired with a sad enthusiasm in the belief that in this she was making a sacred though grievous sacrifice for her father's sake, she sat hurriedly down at the table and, scarce knowing what she did, wrote hastily these words:

"MR. JINGLESBY:—I desire five days time to think of this. Don't come near me.

"PEARL BALCOM."

And bitter days were these five to Pearl, slipping past her as they slip past the sentenced prisoner who has lost all hope of pardon and yet is not quite indifferent to death. The longer did she prolong the struggle the more fiercely did the battle rage within her poor, torn breast. She was the Pearl of olden time no more. Every attribute of girlishness seemed to have been crushed out of her. The echoes of the rooms which knew her best were no longer awakened with her light, mirthful laughter as she passed through them, once merrily, now slowly and thoughtfully, and with the weight of a great doubt pressing her heart cold. There was something—she knew not what—that held her back from the step she was hesitating to take, and there was the dull, hopeless blank of her future life staring her despairingly in the face and asking her, in the bitterness of its taunting promise of misery, to come—Why not? What better could she hope to be? What better could she do?

Crushing back into her heart every merciful appeal to her own better nature, which had found a place there, burying deep her very heart itself beneath the resolve which had become a desperation, that in this there should be no turning back, she sat down at last and answered her suitor's letter.

And the answer was—Yes!

When the reply was sent away and the irrevocable step had been taken for good and all, there came a sense of blessed relief which brought healing on its wings to her broken spirit. The battle had left her heart as the battles of men leave the scenes of human carnage—a dreary waste of desolation. For her, hope, ambition, faith and love, all alike were dead, and in their place there reigned a cold, impenetrable stillness which was the stillness of a mute despair rather than of patient resignation.

Steeling herself bravely against the consequences, be they what they might, she told her father of what she had done. He made no objection, but only looked at her a little sadly.

"Do you love him?" he asked.

With a face whiter than marble—with her hands clenched so tightly that the nails were buried in the yielding flesh—Pearl answered:

"Yes."

"Then I ought to say nothing," said Mr. Balcom, kissing her. "The young man has not impressed me as being just the one for you, but your happiness, Pearl, must not let my foolish notions stand in its way."

O, that he had said one word to draw her back from this! O, that amid the vain hurry of his old life, he had spared a little time in learning to know his children better! Dearly as he loved this girl, still was he blind to what she really was, and to what her own nobility, in obedience to a strange perversion, was leading her.

And so the wedding day was fixed, but it was not to come until the autumn, which seemed to Pearl to be a fitter season for it. Then nature, at least, would mourn for her. She worked upon her wedding dresses at her window, and, day by day, watched the year ripen and grow sere, from the time when first the blackberries hung dark and tempting under the fences until the woods rained their brown treasures upon the fallen leaves, and the maples embroidered the hills with a tracery of scarlet and gold. There were languid, hazy days, when the air was steeped in sunshine, and the warm breath of summer fell upon the valley like a kiss blown back to it from southern fields where summer reigned eternal. And Pearl, sitting thus at her window, tried to learn in her hopeless despair how best to bear the loneliness which was henceforward to be hers till death. Yet she never wavered. She believed that she was doing right, and heroically did she strive to stifle every other thought which might raise a single doubt of it.

One afternoon there came a smart double knock at the door of the cottage, and Pearl, answering the summons, was met by the plethoric figure of Mr. Jinglesly senior, who, raising his hat, from his little bald, bullet-shaped head, bowed to her respectfully before entering.

"Miss Pearl Balcom, I believe," he said.

"Yes sir," replied Pearl, leading the way to the parlor; "will you walk in?"

"I don't care if I do," he returned, following her and taking a seat near the little table between the windows. "In fact I have called on purpose to see you on a matter of business—strictly a matter of business, Miss Balcom."

Pearl seated herself at the opposite side of the table and looked at the old gentleman inquiringly.

"I never was good at dallying with my subjects," he continued, taking out his handkerchief and wiping his face, which had grown very hot and red with walking, "so I'll come direct to the point. You are going to marry my son."

Pearl looked dreamily out of the window and said she supposed so.

"You are a little fool," said the old gentleman, vehemently; "a little fool, ma'am, my son is an idiot."

Pearl smiled faintly and made no answer.

"A consummate idiot, Miss Balcom, and judging from what little I have seen of you, I like you too well to allow you to throw yourself away in any such manner. I object to the marriage."

"I believe your son is of age, Mr. Jinglesly," said Pearl, calmly. "He can choose for himself, I presume."

"No ma'am, he can't choose for himself," returned the old gentleman, jumping up excitedly. "That is—why yes, of course he can choose for himself, but then—you don't mean that you've set your heart upon the young jackass, like that, do you?"

"Set my heart upon him?" exclaimed Pearl, her red lip curling in spite of herself.

"Ah! I see," said Mr. Jinglesly, sitting down again and leaning across the table toward her. "I know what you want. I understand it all. It's money!"

Pearl shrank beneath the old man's gaze, and felt her face flush to a burning crimson as she turned her eyes hastily away. Never in all her struggle with herself, had a sense of her own unworthiness oppressed her as at this instant. She was silent for a moment, darted a furtive look in Mr. Jinglesly's face, and then burst into tears.

Mr. Jinglesly was on his feet again in a second.

"My dear young woman! Don't cry. There. I didn't mean to hurt your feelings, my girl. Better now? Hey?"

Pearl wiped her eyes and beat back the tide of feeling which was choking her.

"You are right," she said. "I do want money, and that is why I am going to marry your son. Believe me when I tell you that I care nothing for his gold for my own sake, for as there is a God in heaven I speak the truth. If I can place my father and my sister once more in a position to regain what our family have lost, I shall be rewarded for the sacrifice. For it is a sacrifice, and I loathe and detest this marriage and everything connected with it. I pledge myself to you—and I believe you have been friendly to me and will believe me—that not one penny of this money will I ever touch for myself or for my own uses."

Mr. Jinglesly leaned back in his chair and placed his thumbs in his vest pockets with an air of considerable bewilderment. Pearl, flushed and excited, had risen from her seat, and was now pacing slowly up and down the room before him, wringing her handkerchief fiercely as she walked.

"You are a spunky young woman," said Mr. Jinglesly, finally. "I wish my nephew knew you. Poor fellow, he never will until it's too late, for he's away off in the Mediterranean now. But he ought to know you;—he had, indeed."

At mention of that blue and sparkling sea so far away, a confused flood of sorrowful thoughts came into Pearl's mind, and she stopped in her walk and went wearily to the window to look out.

"However, business is business," continued Mr. Jinglesly. "If you are bound to marry my lunatic, you shall. He and my nephew will be my only heirs, and the marriage will make you rich. But let me tell you this, my girl, no matter what your real motives may be, no matter how disinterested as regards yourself your heart may be, this money, so obtained, will bring with it a curse. It will bring a blight upon you and yours and upon whomsoever the gold may be bestowed. I advise you to think twice before you take the step."

"I have thought of it already," said Pearl, "until my brain has well nigh burst. There is no turning back."

Mr. Jinglesly went to the other window and gazed abstractedly out at the prospect before the house. He was silent for some time, and Pearl stood motionless a short distance from him, still wringing her handkerchief savagely.

"Look here!" said the old gentleman at last. "I have a proposition to make. It's a pity to have you do this, for I believe you think you are right. You have got pluck, at any rate. Poor Ned! I wish he knew you. Just the one for him!"

Again the mention of a name which made Pearl's heart leap and flutter with an agitation which was cruel in its wildness.

"What is the proposition?" she asked.

"I'll buy you off from this marriage," said Mr. Jinglesly. "I will give you twenty thousand dollars for your bargain."

Pearl turned to him quickly, and grew red and white by turns.

"You jest," she said. "It is no jesting matter, sir."

"By heaven, I am in earnest. What do you say? Accept?"

Her reply was to fall on her knees at his feet.

"O Mr. Jinglesly! What—what do you think of me? I wish I was dead!"

"Fiddlesticks!" replied the old gentleman, taking out his pocket-book in great haste and selecting therefrom a blank draft. "Got a pen?"

He found one upon the table, filled out the draft as he sat in his chair, and without more ado handed it to Pearl.

"There," he said, seizing his hat. "That settles our bargain. You are a brave girl, but you are on the wrong track. Poor Ned! Good-by."

He had whisked to the door before Pearl could stop him.

"God bless you!" she said.

"Nonsense!" he answered, hopping out into the yard. "Good afternoon. Twenty thousand dollars for that idiot, indeed!"

And so he went away, leaving Pearl numb, astounded and nearly delirious, standing in the hall with the draft in her hand.

While she still stood thus, her father passed her, dressed for a walk.

"Are you going far?" she asked, half mechanically.

"Only over to neighbor Jinglesy's," he answered. "Was not that he who was here just now?"

"Yes, father. Here to see me."

He smiled and patted her on the shoulder.

"Things are approaching a crisis," he said. "How long before the wedding day, Pet?"

He stooped to kiss her as he said this, and Pearl threw her arms about his neck and drew his dear, old gray head toward her. It seemed to Pearl as she looked up into his careworn face, that at that moment there fell between them a dim, almost imperceptible shadow, as if a light cloud had just then passed across the disc of the sun. It was gone in a moment, however, and Mr. Balcom said hurriedly:

"There! now let me go. I can catch our old friend before he gets far away, perhaps. He is not a fast walker."

As her father's figure, bent and prematurely old, passed away from her and lost itself among the trees beyond the house, Pearl stood watching it, holding the door half shut. When she turned into the cottage again, the place seemed singularly dreary and lonely. A solemn hush had fallen upon the rooms as she passed through them, as though death had taken up his abode in them. Yet Pearl knew not why she should shudder. Nay, should she not rejoice? Did she not hold within her hand a heaven-sent release from her sorrows? She was too bewildered as yet to realize the full measure of what her visitor had done for her, but there was the draft—the blessed little piece of paper—which chronicled her victory.

Victory over what? The shriek of the evening express train, rattling amid the distant hills, and screaming through the quiet valley rang the question shrilly in her ears. Victory over what? Over some great principle of evil? Over some cruel wrong, oppressing poor humanity? Over a great and sinful temptation, rankling deep down in her own heart? Not over any of these. Now that she had conquered, she did not know for what she had been battling.

"I hate those dreadful whistles," she said to Meta. "They are like cries of dying friends."

The afternoon wore away that day very slowly, it seemed to Pearl. With Meta and her mother, she sat in the back sitting-room, with her sewing, and tried to keep herself from thinking of the day's events. She did not want them present to her mind, until she could understand her strange position. But, fight the thought of them as she would, they came to her again and again, and even her busy talk with those about her failed to frighten them away. And over everything about the house, that dreary sense of loneliness had suddenly come, which oppressed her like a pall. The ticking of the clock upon the mantelpiece made her so nervous that she stopped it, and even her sister's busy prattle about the wedding seemed to Pearl more like talk concerning a funeral than of any more joyous occasion.

At last, much to her relief, the time came round to get ready for tea. She had put the kettle on the fire, and it had just begun to give evidence of the exhilaration induced by this process, by sundry disjunctive snorts and rattlings of its lid, before commencing to sing away in good earnest. Meta was busy cutting the bread, while her mother spread the table in the dining-room, and Pearl sat before the kitchen fire, watching the tea-kettle in its convulsive efforts to be convivial, and listening to the spasmodic puffs of steam by which it revealed the intensity of its painful labors. Looking in upon her stood Mr. Jinglesy senior, some moments in the doorway, before he was discovered.

"Why, Mr. Jinglesy!" she said, looking up in surprise.

The old man advanced straight to her and took her by the hand.

"If you are as brave a girl as I think you are," he said, "you can bear some bad news."

She looked at him a little wildly, in ignorance of what new trouble was to come upon her next.

"It is very bad news," he said. "Your father—"

She placed her hand upon his shoulder, almost fiercely.

"He has been struck by the evening train," the old man continued. "We were walking together. He is badly hurt."

She pressed both hands upon her temples and her face grew white as marble. Beneath her intense and searching gaze the old man shrank and turned away his head.

"He is dead!" cried Pearl. "I see it in your face. Tell me the truth. Is he dead?"

"He is dead," replied Mr. Jinglesy.

"Good God! What is the matter with her? Help here, somebody!"

He rapped his cane upon the floor and sprang to catch Pearl as her mother and sister came into the room. But she had not fainted, and pushed them from her with one hand while with the other she clutched wildly at the bosom of her dress. Plucking therefrom a piece of crumpled paper, she pressed it together in her hands and tore it into a hundred fragments. None but Mr. Jinglesly knew what it was, and he recognized in the fluttering pieces the remnants of his own draft.

"You were right," she cried. "It has brought its curse and blight upon us already! O my father! Dead! dead!" And she fell down between them like a stone, senseless and beyond all power to know the measure of the blow which fate had dealt her.

Deep were the winter snows over her father's grave before she awoke again. There were brief intervals when she seemed to dream of sunny fields and open windows through which came a soft murmur of rustling trees, as when she had seen these things before that dreadful day. There were other times when she seemed to hear the singing of the kettle on the hob, and the clicking of the snow against the window-panes, and the sound of familiar voices all around her. There drifted to her ear, amid the tenderer tones of her mother and sister, the timid accents of the younger Jinglesly and the gruffer notes of the elder, short and brusque, but ever kind and anxiously solicitous. And mingling with these there came into her chaotic dreams a voice from far over the sea, which seemed to call to her mournfully, "Pearl! Pearl! My own dear Pearl!" And then the dream would grow so beautiful and bright to her that it were a question whether she had not had a glimpse of heaven. And so, throughout the long period of her delirious sleep, which to her was as but a day—a hideous day of horrible, weird and chaotic fantasies, with no morning, noon or night to break the terrible monotony of its bewilderment—her poor, tried brain struggled fiercely with the powers of lunacy and reason. O, for some relief from the incessant, ceaseless rush, racking her whole frame with the fierceness of the throbbing measure! O, for some hand to stop the dreadful wheels of thought but for an instant! O, for some power to quiet the restless hands, wandering so idly and constantly up and down the counterpane.

She awoke at last, and then came the dreamy days of convalescence, when she could sit once more at the window and gaze out across the wintry landscape to the old outline of hills shining white in the distance. They told her that it was brain fever which had brought her to this, but the days that she had passed were all a blank. Little presents came to her from Mr. Jinglesly, and daily visits were made and kind inquiries as to her condition. She felt very grateful and resigned to the hopelessness of her life to come. Nay, she acknowledged in the bitterness of her heart the righteousness of her punishment. She had seen nothing of the funeral. She had been spared the scene of her mother's and her sister's grief. When she had last looked upon the dear face that had gone from her forever, it had stooped low to kiss her. And she felt thankful in her soul for that.

One day, when she had grown quite strong and was able to leave her room for a little while in the middle of the day, Meta came to her and said:

"Can you see a visitor to-day, Pearl?"

"Who?" she asked.

"Mr. Jinglesly's nephew has come back from sea. His ship has been lost and he is here on leave."

"I suppose I must see him," said Pearl, indifferently. "Mr. Jinglesly has spoken much about him to me. I have no doubt he is a paragon."

"Will you see him now?"

"As well now as any other time."

Meta went to the door and beckoned to some one in the hall. Pearl turned and her eyes fell upon Edward Harper.

"Edward!" she cried, starting from her chair.

"Pearl!"

In a moment he had clasped her in his arms.

"O, how I have been punished!" she murmured, burying her face upon his shoulder and sobbing like a child. "This is more happiness than I deserve."

"What!" cried Mr. Jinglesly, who had entered behind his nephew. "You know each other!"

"And love each other," added the lieutenant.

"Hurrah!" cried the old gentleman, hopping around the room and throwing up his hat in great glee. "Hurrah!"

"Pearl," said Edward, "surely I may claim you now. I have been told the whole. If I had not supposed your mind had changed, I would not have come here to-day."

"I have been such a fool!" she sobbed. "I wonder you don't hate me."

For his answer he bent toward her and she turned up her lips and kissed him.

"Hurrah!" cried old Mr. Jinglesly again, dancing round and round them like mad, "there will be a glorious wedding of it now. The happiest wedding ever seen in this neighborhood. I'll dance at it myself. I will, by Jove! God bless me! God Bless all of us!"

And it seemed to Pearl and Edward that the echoes of the room, catching up the exclamation, rang it through the house, and out into the wintry air, and across the snow-covered valley, and up and down among the hills, until the whole world was filled with the joyful cry. And she bowed her head again upon the lieutenant's shoulder and repeated in a whisper from out the fullness of her heart:

"God bless all of us!"

PAPA DORLAN'S DECISION.

BY LOTTIE BROWN.

"I SUPPOSE she will marry some time or other, and perhaps, after all, she will be as well off to marry now, as to wait half a dozen years."

Old Mr. Dorlan turned the letter over in his hand, and looked at the pretty blonde in the easy-chair opposite. It would be hard to give her up, but with either of these two men, he felt that she would be happy.

West Harley wrote:

"MR. DORLAN:—For many months I have felt a deep interest in your daughter, and am bold enough to hope that my affection is in a degree returned. I am not a rich man, but I have a fair business, and strength and energy, and my wife would have a certainty of the love and respect of an honest man. With your permission, I would be pleased to call upon her.

Respectfully yours,

"WEST HARLEY."

Clarence Hillsdale wrote:

DEAR SIR:—I am deeply and sincerely in love with your daughter. I propose to make her my wife, with your consent. My name, position and means are well known to you. I await your reply.

Yours,

"CLARENCE HILLSDALE."

The first was a faithful counterpart of himself in his younger days. There were a few improvements, such as a little better prospect, a few more dollars than he possessed at twenty-five, but the principle, the straightforward honesty and strength of purpose were there.

The other was the very man he had had in his mind for months. Everybody knew the solidity and worth of the great banking-house of the Hillsdale Brothers. Everybody knew Clarence, the younger, to be a thorough man of business and a gentleman. He drove his handsome bays with grace and ease, but never with recklessness. He gave a supper now and then, when champagne and Madeira flowed like water; but he went to his chamber with a clear eye and steady hand, and without even the faintest breath of tobacco perfuming his elegant clothes. Men found him always at his post, with his fair face flushed with health, and not a trace of dissipation wrinkling a single feature.

It was hard to choose between them. Perhaps Ruth could choose. So he spoke:

"Ruthie, come here!"

She came, with her wellbred, graceful step, and leaned over his chair.

"Well, papa?"

"Read these."

He gave her the letters and she read them carefully over. A blush stole up, mantling brow and cheek when she concluded West Harley's letter, and at the end of Hillsdale's a delighted exclamation escaped her.

"You cannot marry both. Which shall it be?"

"Papa, I don't know. I used to really love West, until Clarence came; but now—well, Clarence is rich and stylish, and yet, West is—good and true. You shall decide."

"And you will abide by my decision?"

"With all my heart, papa."

Ruthie went back to her easy-chair, and gave the matter up entirely to papa's superior judgment, and he, with quite as much if not a degree or so more anxiety than he had, felt at his own matrimonial setting, sat back and reflected.

Honesty and truth were jewels seldom found, but with money and power on the other side of the scale he was a little afraid they would sink into nothingness.

"Well, I will wait. Someway I shall receive the truth of the matter, and know into whose hand to place the happiness of my little Ruth."

"Do you know young Harley?" he asked a neighbor.

"Yes. Bless you, who don't? He is one of our solid young men."

"Do you know Hillsdale?"

"O yes. He's another. One of the best fellows in the city."

So there it was. Both were perfection. Ruth liked both, and so did he. He could not choose between them.

These letters arrived on the second of December. On the fourth each gentleman received a brief note from Mr. Dorlan, with a few pleasant but unsatisfactory lines. He would consider, he said, and give them his answer, if they would wait with patience.

On the twenty-fourth there was a fair at the church. It was magnificent, from its foundation, and its object was to decorate with greater splendor the already splendid edifice.

Fair young girls, with confectionery at ten dollars per bite, and dainty useless knick-knacks priced at five times their real value, besieged every visitor, and he was a hard-hearted creature who could resist the touch of the white hands, and pleading glances from soft eyes, and sweet entreaties of "do buy this, you know you need it. Please do?"

Mr. Dorlan was there, and his little Ruth the proprietor of a table well filled with worsted nonsense, silken cushions, bead-work, smoking-caps and slippers, and many a close-fisted fellow laid a bill upon her table and carried away a trinket, as satisfied as though he had got double his money's worth.

Clarence Hillsdale was there, and so was West Harley, and Papa Dorlan whispered:

"Ruthie, you'll never have a better chance. study these lovers of yours."

And Ruth studied.

They did not stay away a moment longer than etiquette demanded. As soon as they could frame an excuse, they sauntered toward her table. Of course they were not jealous, for each other's motives were unknown, and they met as wellbred men do, and after offering their salutations to Ruth fell into an easy conversation.

"These are pretty articles," said Clarence, taking up a pair of velvet slippers. "Did you make them, Miss Dorlan?"

"Yes. I have but those two pair left; wont you take a pair? They must be exactly your size."

"Yes. I believe they are. What do you expect in return?"

"My price as you see is ten dollars, but in a case like this, we trust more to the generosity of the purchaser."

She said this with a charming smile, and he placed a little roll of bills in her hand.

"You will take the remaining pair, will you not, Mr. Harley?" she asked, while doing up the bundle.

"Yes," and West Harley tendered his offering.

Some one else came up just then, and they turned away, leaving Ruth for a moment with her father.

"O papa?"

"What is it?"

"See what a generous soul Clarence Hillsdale has. Five hundred dollars for a pair of slippers! And West—O how mean!"

"How much did he give you?"

"Ten dollars only."

"Well, that was your price, and a pretty steep one, too, considering the fact that they did not cost more than one half that sum."

"I know, but think how great the contrast between their gifts. Why I'd given more, after what was said, if I had been obliged to pawn my boots."

"West Harley is more sensible," was papa's short reply.

They went away, each bearing a pair of slippers wrought by her dear little fingers, and each within his heart hope enough to make him happy, and Ruth lost her chance to study her two lovers.

Long before the close of the evening Papa Dorlan got sleepy, and started for home. Ruth was in good hands, and he was too tired to stay there and stand the heavy fire, and constant demands upon his purse and patience, so he found his overcoat and furs in the ante-room, and presently was trudging along towards his comfortable mansion.

A lithe figure passed him at the end of the block, and under the light from the street lamp, he recognized West Harley. He was in a hurry, and with a little curiosity Papa Dorian hurried too and kept quite near. All at once he disappeared. Papa Dorian rubbed his eyes. Where in the world did he go? Ah! There was a grocery store on the corner. Possibly he might have gone in there. A few steps more, and Papa Dorian was peering in at the glass door.

Yes, he was there, and so the curiosity box outside watched and waited.

It was for a long while, for this strange young man was superintending the tying up of mysterious parcels, and finally the rolling out of a barrel of flour.

"What in the world is the fellow buying groceries for? He don't keep house!" thought the watcher at the door, as West took out his pocket-book and paid a bill on the counter.

"These articles must be delivered to-night," he said, as he opened the door.

"All right, sir!"

Well, Papa Dorian looked after the tall figure as it sped out of sight, and began to think it a decidedly mysterious affair.

"I may get myself into trouble, but I'm bound to solve this matter;" and straightway he walked into the store.

"These articles are to be delivered to-night."

"Yes sir."

"Where?"

"At No. 28 M—— St.

"Could you give me a ride around there?"

"O yea." The answer came promptly, but the grocer's eyes looked wonderingly at the finely-dressed gentleman.

It was a long ride and by no means a pleasant one, for it ran through narrow streets and alleys, and ended in a low but clean little court.

"Here you are, sir, at No. 28. Halloo there! Mrs. Martin."

The door of No. 28 swung open, and a woman pale and poorly clad appeared.

"Here's a load of goods for you."

"For me? There must be a mistake."

"Not a bit of it. Take a parcel or two, and I'll run in with the rest."

Papa Dorian, eager to see the whole, caught up a bundle, and ran up stairs behind the wondering woman and the grocer.

It was a poor little room, as neat as wax, half filled with freshly ironed clothes, and its proprietress, a pale, meek-faced woman, bearing the marks of poverty upon every lineament. Two children from their supper of bread and milk, looked at the stranger, and hailed the apples, as the grocer rolled them into a basket, with a shout of delight.

"Did you buy these, sir?" asked the woman, turning to Papa Dorian.

"No ma'am, I did not. But I know who did. Do you know West Harley?"

"Yes, Heaven bless him! I do his washing, sir. Did he send these?"

"Yes, he did."

"Is everything here? A barrel of flour, five pounds of sugar, one of tea, two of coffee, four of butter, a bag of salt, two bushels of potatoes, a bushel of apples, crackers, raisins, and a bag of cakes! There, all here in the book. Is it all right?"

"Yes sir, they are all here."

"Come, sir, are you going to ride back with me?"

"Yes. Wait a moment. Here, my good woman, is a little to help you. I must not be behind Harley. God bless him! may he have a family's washing to pay for before another Christmas." And Papa Dorian hurried out and again mounted the grocer's wagon.

It was very late when Ruth arrived in the carriage of a friend, at her father's door; but late as was the hour, she found her respected parent in the library.

"Why, papa! Are you awake?"

"Yes, and I've something to tell you. Do you remember that you promised to abide by my decision in choosing between your two admirers, Harley and Hillsdale?"

"Yes, papa."

"Well I have decided. Marry West Harley."

"Why, Papa Dorian."

"You know you love him best. If you don't, you will when you hear my story."

Ruth folded her hands over papa's knee and listened while he related the incident of West's generosity. When he concluded she said:

"Papa, send for him. I am sure I love him best."

Next day the two gentlemen received their replies.

West Harley folded his, and leaned back from his desk with a happy smile illuminating his handsome face.

Clarence Hillsdale coolly twisted his, and lighted his cigar with it, and went out for a smoke.

LINA'S WALK FOR DAN.

BY FENNO HAYES.

I KNEW I was just as wicked as I could be, and the more I knew it the wickeder I was. I hadn't said my prayers for a week, I could count three lies I had told in the same time, and the way I snapped up the poor innocents who sat under my supervising eye at the Cross Roads schoolhouse wasn't at all creditable to my character as an angel, though it was not the least of my sins that I had allowed a certain young gentleman to inform me that I was one on more than one recent occasion.

I took Dan's miniature, that I had brought in the top of my trunk, and put it at the very bottom, underneath everything else, and then I couldn't go to get so much as a pocket-handkerchief but it would be sure to be the very next thing to the miniature, and that hadn't any case, so there'd be Dan's great honest eyes looking into mine, just as though he hadn't any eyes for anybody but me, and didn't expect I had for anybody but him.

Then it did seem as though something possessed Dan to go on in every letter he wrote me just at this time, in the most astonishingly fervent way, about his faith, and trust, and confidence in me, and while I was reading it, it appeared to me that above every word there was this sentence written in great, staring capitals, "What if he knew?" And while Ray Marvin was looking at and talking to me as though I had just come down out of the skies, I felt as if I was too good for Dan, and when I was reading Dan's letters and remembering all, I felt Dan was too good for me. So I hadn't any comfort either way, considering I was over to the Cross Roads teaching that term for the express purpose of getting money to buy wedding finery to marry Dan in.

The very first night I came home from the schoolhouse to my boarding-place, little Min Marvin met me at the door, in a high state of excitement, with the information that "there was company come;" and entering, I found Mrs. Marvin flying about the kitchen in a manner decidedly confirmatory of the fact.

"O dear!" she said, "I never was so worked up in my life. Here's John's cousin Ray, that's been all over the world, and seen kings and queens, and the Lord knows what not, come and found me all in the suds, and John gone to mill and Sam down in the woods. He's been strolling round the fields a good hour, but he's coming back now, and I don't know who's going to keep him company while I get supper, I'm sure—unless you will, Lina—" adding this as if a new thought struck her. "I'm sure you look nice enough for anybody, to-night."

That touched me. Wasn't I nice enough any time? I stole a quick, sly glance at the little mirror hanging on the kitchen wall. There's no color I look so well in as pink, and if I live to wear my silks and velvets I don't believe I shall ever have a dress more becoming than that pink calico was that I wore that afternoon. The wind had loosed a little curl from my ribbon, and it fell down over my forehead, but I wouldn't put it up, nor so much as smooth my collar.

"Why, yes, Mrs. Marvin," I said carelessly, "I'd as lief sit in the front room as anywhere, if that will do you any good."

"I should be ever so much obliged if you would, Lina," she answered. "It seems sort of unsocial-like to leave him all alone so long when he's just come, now don't it? It will look better to have somebody in the room, if you don't say much."

Anybody would have thought this cousin was the king himself, and I barely fit to do him reverence. I've a temper that kindles at a spark, and I didn't dare to say a word, but moved toward the door with my cheeks burning and my eyes blazing, I knew.

"Aint you goin' to brush your hair?" called Min, after me. "There's a curl all loose, in front, and your ribbon looks just as if it was goin' to come off."

"If I was going before King Ahasuerus I wouldn't touch my hair," I said, scornfully, turning on my heel, "and I don't imagine any such royal presence awaits me."

The child gave me a puzzled stare, and Mrs. Marvin laughed. "Now don't fly out, Lina," she said. "I didn't mean anything, only I thought you'd naturally feel sort of diffident with a man like Ray, that's seen so much more than you have."

"I don't know as people that have seen a great deal of the world are any better than those that haven't," I said, impatiently.

"Quite the contrary, I fear," said a merry, mocking voice behind me.

I knew, of course, that the owner of this voice must be Ray Marvin himself, and I turned quickly, wondering how much of our conversation he had heard.

"Yes, all about King Ahasuerus and your hair, which you would be very foolish to disturb for him or anybody else, for I'm sure it couldn't be improved," he said, with a gay little laugh and bow, answering my look, for I hadn't said a word. "I was so dreadfully thirsty that I ventured into your kitchen, for a little water, cousin."

Just as he took the water from Mrs. Marvin's hand in came John Marvin, and Sam Dall the hired hand. No danger of their coming up behind anybody and not be heard, I thought, as they tramped in with their heavy boots, and while the cousins greeted and shook hands with each other, I looked at them, John Marvin and Ray, and wondered why I never noticed before how brown-faced, and big-handed, and awkward John was, John that everybody at the Cross Roads and thereabouts called good looking.

Now I had always thought that if a man was straight, and hadn't sleepy eyes, or red hair, or any special abomination, it wasn't so much matter about him otherwise, and as for dress, that was for us women. But Ray Marvin stood before me like a revelation. He was of nearly the same height as John, he was not so much more slender, yet John seemed big, and heavy, and burly, beside him. I couldn't tell how his figure differed, but it did, somehow, and so did his speech, just as if his words were rounded and shaped where John's fell half formed from his mouth. His eyes were large, and dark, and soft, and his hair and beard brown and silky-fine. Then his hands were white, and nobody need tell me again that dress doesn't make any difference with a man. "When I'm Dan's wife," I thought, "he shall wear cuffs every day, and I know I can make a necktie like that."

And then, suddenly, Dan's face and figure seemed to rise before me, and an evil spirit whispered in my ear, "You can never make a Ray of Dan, do what you will. See how much more he is like John." And I sighed, and hated myself for the thought and the sigh, and then wished I'd been born somebody else, or was something different, or somebody else was something different, and so on, in a vague, restless, dissatisfied, miserable state of mind that lasted me till I decided to put off writing to Dan that night on account of being "blue."

And so I stayed down stairs and Ray told stories of places he had visited and people he had seen, sitting at a table, next me, it chanced, with some drawing paper before him, and all the while he talked he'd have a pencil at work, and once in a while, telling of some comical personage, he'd say "illustrated edition," and pass me the paper with the very person, just outlined, but looking for all the world exactly as you'd imagine he or she would look. I couldn't help laughing to save me, and so I forgot all about being blue before the evening was half over.

Then for a long time he didn't give me any pictures, but kept glancing at me, and working and talking all the time, and at last he handed me the paper.

My cheeks flamed in a moment, for it was my own face, but upon my forehead was a crown and one little curl falling from under it, and beneath the picture, he had written "Vashti."

I didn't know whether to seem offended or not, but I wasn't really, for I thought he had made me full as pretty as I was, and I should have been a different girl from what I was to have resented that.

"You don't like it," he said, snatching it back, hastily, and crumpling it in his hand, just as Min Marvin was coming up behind my chair. "Nor do I. It wasn't half pretty enough," and he looked at me with a strange, soft fire in his eyes. But he said this so rapidly and low, that I am sure no one in the room heard a word he said beside me.

"What was that?" said Min. "Why didn't you show it to me, Lina?"

"O," said Ray, answering for me, "I could see that Miss Bent thought that a failure, and I didn't want anybody else's looks condemning it. I'll make you another, ten times nicer than that. But not to-night, though. I'm going out to have a smoke, now."

"Why don't you smoke here?" said Min. "Pa does."

They all laughed at this, but the evil spirit, that I do believe took possession of me from the first moment I set eyes on Ray Marvin, set Dan before me again. "I suppose he'll smoke his pipe under my nose when I'm his wife, the same as John does," I said to myself. And then, as the fragrance of Ray's costly cigar came faintly through the open window, I thought I shouldn't mind so much if he did, if he only smoked cigars like those.

"Real pleasant, ain't he?" said Mrs. Marvin, as I took my lamp to go up stairs. "He's goin' to stay a month or so. He's an artist, you know, and calls it handsome round here, but I can't see much except hills and rocks. Enough of them, the Lord knows. I should like to know if he's stiddy, though."

That's the way it commenced, letting Dan's letter go to hear Ray Marvin talk. That wasn't much, I know, but the next morning I took down the dress I usually wore to school, and it didn't seem fit to wash in, somehow, and I hung it up again and put on a better one, when I'd promised myself to be fairly shabby that term, so I might have the more as Dan's bride. And that wasn't much either, only I was thinking, as I put it on, how Ray Marvin had looked at me when he said that picture wasn't half pretty enough.

The next night, when I left the school-house, Ray happened along at the same time, and we walked home together, and as he talked to me of what there was in the world, that great, glittering, bewildering world of which I knew nothing—the beauty and dress, the pictures and music, and all that money brings and buys—my mood of the night before came back, and everything and everybody round me seemed coarse and homely. And yet, I thought, Ray doesn't think me coarse and homely, that was plain enough, and I wondered if men always talked to women so—that is, these sort of men.

O dear, I guess I don't need to tell you, by this time, that I was a vain, silly girl, and I can't go over all the flattery and foolishness, the vanity and compliments, but there got to be a great many happenings, of one sort and another, and almost before I knew it, I began to think, what if Dan knew of Ray, or what if Ray knew of Dan.

And then, as I have said, I put Dan's miniature out of sight as much as I could, and let Ray Marvin say things to me that I knew he ought not, one hour, and turned a cold shoulder to him, the next.

Ray wanted to paint me, and said he was going to have me for a Jewess, and one day he said, suddenly, "Of course, I must paint you with ear jewels." And he came up behind me and pinched my ear. "Why," he said, "they're pierced. Wait a moment." And he ran up stairs and came down, bringing the handsomest set of earrings I'd ever seen. They might have been garnets, or perhaps rubies even—I don't know much about stones—but at any rate, they were dazlingly beautiful to me. I remember as he held them up the sun shone through them and they were like great drops of flame.

"I bought them in Genoa," said Ray. "Who for, I didn't know. They were so pretty, and perhaps I might have a sweet-heart some day." And all the while he was clasping them in my ears.

"O Mr. Marvin," I said, a little troubled, but rather faintly, I will confess, "I can't wear them."

"O, surely, just while I paint." And there wasn't a bit more meaning in his tone than just the words, though only a moment before I had trembled at every word he said, for fear of the next one, for, of course, all this time I meant to be Dan's wife.

After Ray had painted as long as I wanted to sit, I put up my hand to loosen the earrings. "O wait," said Ray; "just come and see how becoming they are. You can't think what a difference they make." And he led me before the glass. "There," he said, "did you ever look so pretty in your life? Wear them, Lina, while I stay. I like to see you pretty, you know."

I looked in the glass a moment, O they were so beautiful, and Ray was right, they did become me so much. If I only, only could have such things, but still I raised my hand to take them out.

Ray caught my hand to hold it back, and just at this moment the door opened—and there was Dan, and me before the glass, with those earrings in my ears and Ray holding my hand, that I thought he'd never, never drop.

I tried to laugh, to speak, but as true as I live I couldn't, and Ray Marvin never moved an inch, but stood beside me, just as though it was his right, instead of Dan's, who stood, white as death and as still, looking at us for a full minute, I do believe. Then, something terrible came into his face and I heard him set his teeth together, but it passed, and he went out, without a word.

As Dan shut the door Ray Marvin laughed, a little, soft, low laugh, that I could have struck him for, and walking to the window, began humming a song as unconcernedly as possible. And I knew that I had lost Dan, Dan that I loved, spite of all, and who loved me and would have been true to me forever. And what had I got in exchange? The empty smiles and flattery of a man who would whistle me down the wind to-morrow. O fool! fool!

There came a little note for me next day, "Lina," wrote Dan, "I heard about things over to the Cross Roads from Sam Dall, but I didn't believe it, till I saw for myself. Good-by, Lina."

That was all. Well, I deserved it. I never was called very humble, but I thought that if Dan had only come to see me once more, or asked me a question, I would have gone down on my knees to confess and ask his forgiveness.

But Dan never came near, and a little while after I heard that he had left the farm and gone to Lynn, shoemaking, and that his mother said 'twas all on my account, she knew, because he didn't like to be where he couldn't help seeing me. You see, father's farm and his joined.

But he needn't have done that, I thought, bitterly, for I had engaged for another term at the Cross Roads, for the same reason. It seemed to me, I could better bear never to see Dan, than to meet him as I did others. I had heard, too, that hard work was good for anybody that had a weary mind, and I thought the winter school at the Cross Roads would furnish me with that. A man had always taught the winter term, and 'I don't know how they came to let me have it, except that I had got up quite a reputation for ugliness the term before.

It was the bitterest of all bitter cold days. The frost hadn't started a bit all day long on the schoolroom windows, and the air cut like a knife, for all it was so still. John Marvin had been over to the Falls, and didn't get home till we were at tea. "I tell you what, mother," he said, coming in and stamping his big feet till every dish on the table danced, "it's cold—cold. I thought I never see them cattle walk so slow afore as they did to-night. I wont go to the Falls again with 'em such a day as this, if Kate's leg don't get well for six weeks. Has she had any oats, to-night?"

"Yea, yes, John," said Mrs. Marvin; "you always think there's nothin' done, if you aint here. Hear any news over to the falls?"

"Yea," said John, "they're all excited over there about Dan Lowell. He came home from Lynn, the other day, said he didn't feel very well, and his mother thought he appeared like a fever, and sent for Dr. Cane, and they say it's turned out the small pox. They've all got it down to Lynn. I don't know what they'll do at Dan's, for nobody'll go there, of course, and his mother's a feeble old woman, you know."

I suppose there was more said, but I don't think I heard it. I don't, indeed, remember anything more, until I stood in my own room, and it might have been eight o'clock. I scraped away a little place in the frost and looked out of my window. The moonlight lay cold and bright on the snowfields that stretched away to the blue, frosty sky, glittering with ten thousand stars.

"I will," I said, "I will, if I freeze."

I put on my cloak, and my shawl over that, and my hood and mittens, and stole down the stairs and out into the stinging night.

It was five miles to Dan's, but I was a strong girl and a great walker. John Marvin's horse was lame, and if she hadn't been he wouldn't have taken me, I knew, me that they all thought didn't care a straw for Dan.

I never shall forget that walk. I didn't meet so much as a dog on the road. Every creature was housed but me. Cold! cold! everything was cold—the sky, the stars above me, the snow beneath me, the air around me—my face, my hands, my feet, my very heart, even, for fever chills like frost. The cold bit, and stung, and nipped, like some wild beast of icy fang and tooth. Still I walked on and on. And now I didn't feel so cold. Was it growing warmer? What made me so sleepy? O, if I could only lie down and go to sleep. If I could only rest a few minutes, for surely it was warmer now. Everything grew dim, and vague, and far away—even Dan and his danger. Now the whole world seemed to swim and float. I must, I must sit down.

God only knows what heavenly messenger he sent to me at this moment in the shape of memory. Like an arrow, a little sentence that I had read sometime suddenly pierced my misty brain—"When a person is near freezing he becomes drowsy. To yield to this for a moment is death."

I roused myself with a mighty effort of my almost conquered will, and I ran—ran as well as I could with my benumbed feet—for my life, and I never stopped, or bated my pace, till I was at Dan's door.

There was a light in an upper room, and I did not knock, but went straight in and up to the chamber.

Dan was lying in the bed. He was asleep, and his face was white and smooth as it ever was.

His mother was sitting by the bed, and she rose up as I came in. "For Heaven's sake, Lina Bent," she said, in a whisper, "where have you come from, and for what?"

"They said Dan had the small pox," I said, faintly, "and I've walked from the Cross Roads."

She lifted her hands. "This bitter night!" she said. "Poor child! poor child! And he hasn't got it, no more than you have. Just escaped a fever. Just because somebody in Lyun has got the small pox they must set the story going that Dan's got it."

And she began to take off my shoes and stockings, and when my feet were bare I looked down and saw a great tear fall from her eyes on them, but I never felt it, nor the touch of her hands, nor knew whether the water was hot or cold she put them in.

And I never walked on my feet again till there was green grass on the ground instead of snow.

I don't know as anybody will care to know how Dan and I made up, so long as we did, of course. But I believe I said something somewhere about going down on my knees to beg Dan's forgiveness; but though I hope I'm cured of some of my foolish vanity, I'm proud enough yet, and I can't let you think I did that, when it was Dan instead. For he wouldn't hear a word from me, but took all the blame to himself for being too proud to ask an explanation.

"Not one word, my poor little Lina," he said. "Poor little feet, frozen for me!" And there, on his knees, he kissed them, boots and all.

ONE MORE UNFORTUNATE.

BY CAPTAIN FELIX CONSTANT.

It was midnight in the streets of a great city, and in the quieter portion of the town those streets were already deserted except when here and there a house illuminated from garret to cellar told of festivities within, or some departing guest awoke the sleepy echoes with the roll of his carriage wheels, or his measured footfall upon the pavement.

A little way from one of these windows, in the angle of a projecting building, lurked a young girl, as young, as fair, as well born and highly educated as any guest within that house, and yet as far removed from their gay circle as if she had been a worm writhing among the dust at their feet; one whom no mother would have suffered, even for Christian charity, her young daughter to approach, one whose touch was contamination, and whose address an insult. Perhaps she knew and felt all this herself, the poor creature, for as she crouched in her dark corner and peered out at the late revellers passing her upon their homeward way, she drew the miserable shawl close around her shoulders, and moaned and muttered inarticulately.

Suddenly a young man ran down the steps of the illuminated house, and walked rapidly up the street humming the air of the last valse, whose rich strains yet vibrated from the open windows behind him. As he approached, the girl started, sprang forward, then crouched timidly back, but at the last darted from her concealment, and laid her hand upon the arm of the young man, already nearly past her. He started, glanced round, then sternly shook off the detaining hand, and would have passed on, but still the desperate woman clung, murmuring:

"Stop! Stop one minute, Robbie!"

"Let go! Be off, or I will give you in charge! There is a policeman coming—be off, I say!"

"O Robbie, Robbie!" gasped the girl, cowering almost at his feet while her trembling fingers slid from their hold upon his sleeve.

"Don't call me by that name, or any name! Never speak to me again, or dare to recognize me. Be off, I say, or I may be tempted to lay you dead at my feet. It would be the best fate that could befall you. Remember."

And wrenching away the foot at which the wretched girl had grasped, the young man strode on just as the policeman approached, closely followed by another young gentleman who had been speaking with him.

"O Robbie, if you can't pity me, who will? Come back and kill me as you said you would—it is the best thing you can do for me now!"

And the poor wretch, gathering herself up from the pavement, sobbed out these wild words in a strange, strained, horrible voice, the symptom of impending hysterics; a nervous derangement of some species.

"Why, that fellow was Robert Stackpole!" ejaculated the companion of X 3, who coolly remarked:

"Young gents will do such things, but it comes mighty inconvenient afterwards oftentimes, just as it does here. I don't think the better of Robert Stackpole, if that's his name, for turning the gal into the streets and leaving her to the life she's leading."

"You know her then?"

"Know her, Mr. Beecham? Lord, she's been up a dozen times if she has once—Simple Susan they call her, though if she ever was that, it must have been a long while ago. But come, Susan, move along, you know it's against rules to be roving round this way. If the gentleman had given you in charge I'd have had to take you to the lock-up. Move on, Susan."

"He said he'd kill me—O, I wish he would, I wish he would! O Robbie, kill me, and put me out of my misery."

"Here, my poor girl, take this, and go quietly home and to bed and to sleep," said Beecham, slipping something into the hand of the unhappy creature already moving mechanically towards the entrance of the little dark side street from whence she had issued. The cold slender hand closed upon the gift, but Simple Susan offered no thanks, made no halt, and the next moment had disappeared."

"Very kind of you, sir, but maybe not so wise," suggested X 3, with a guarded smile at his young companion's generosity; "she'll lay out that money in gin before she gets home, and they'll have a glorious drunk out of it, all hands on 'em."

Frederick Beecham made no reply, and a moment after, with a gruff "good-night," ran up the steps of the lighted house, and glanced into the drawing-rooms. The guests had nearly all departed, and those who remained were grouped around a young lady and middle-aged gentleman, at the head of the room, making their adieux and expressing the pleasure they had enjoyed.

"Good-evening, Miss Beecham. Nobody knows how to make an evening pass as you do!" half-murmured a young gentleman, with his sister upon his arm, while their mamma was saying at the other side:

"Not good-by, but au revoir, Mr. Beecham, for I depend upon seeing you with Miss Imogen at our little gathering to-night—not that we can offer you anything like the charming time we have just enjoyed with you, but—"

And the dowager swept towards the doorway from which Frederick Beecham precipitately retreated, feeling unequal at that moment to exchanging the commonplaces he saw impending. A few moments later the guests had all departed, and the young man entering the rooms walked slowly down them, towards the spot where his sister and uncle still stood gayly conversing.

"What a pity, what a pity!" muttered Beecham, as his eyes rested admiringly upon the figure of his sister, who stood with her bewitching face a little upraised, a smile upon her lips and in her eyes, while one lock of the golden hair her uncle smoothed escaped from the comb and fell upon her pearl-white shoulders, adding the touch of nature which the artificial style of modern toilets leaves so absolutely out of account.

"Yes, a very successful evening, puss, and owing its success largely to the hostess, let me tell you. Do you know what I said to Robert Stackpole to-night?"

"No, uncle, what was it?" asked Imogen, a sudden wave of rose-color mounting to the roots of the golden hair.

"Why, I said that he wouldn't have to go through the purgatory most young husbands experience while their wives are learning housekeeping, for you were the perfect mistress of a household already."

"O uncle!"

"Why, 'O uncle'? When people are engaged it means that they intend some day to be married, don't it? And I gave my consent to Mr. Bob Stackpole some months ago. So now, Miss Prude, I will bid you good-night, and you had better get to bed and cherish your good looks for the wedding day. Good-night, Fred; you look tired, my boy."

"Good-night, uncle."

"And good night, Fred, for I am going to follow Uncle Harry's advice," said Imogen, putting her hands upon her brother's shoulders and standing upon her toes to reach his lips. But passing his arm about her waist Frederick led the laughing girl to a sofa, and seated himself beside her.

"Jeanie, do you love your brother?"

"Why, Fred, what's the matter! Love you, you silly boy! Why, whom should I love half so well as my own only brother, and we orphans, with no one but Uncle Harry in the world? You know how I love you, Fred."

"And whom else do you love?"

"Why, Fred! why—there's Uncle Harry—and—why, of course, Fred, I care for Robert, or I shouldn't be going to—shouldn't be engaged to him."

"But you love me the best, Jeanie?"

"Of course I do," replied Imogen, stoutly; but a guilty blush burned hotly upon the face she hid against her brother's shoulder, and she remorsefully raised the ring upon her forefinger to her lips.

"Well then, darling, you will not take it too hardly, you will not break your heart, if I tell you that you must for my sake give up Robert Stackpole altogether?"

"Give up Robert! Why should I, Fred?"

And the lovely head raised itself with a jerk from Fred's shoulder, and the burning color burned yet more brilliantly.

"Because, Jeanie, he is a mean, good-for-nothing fellow, and insults you by speaking to you, or even coming into your presence."

"Frederick Beecham! How dare you! How dare you—what, in the name of Heaven, can you mean by such words!"

And now Imogen was upon her feet, her blue eyes blazing with wrath, her lips quivering with indignant scorn, her whole slight figure nerved and braced for resistance. Her brother rose also, and confronted her sadly, but with determination.

"Imogen, you said you loved me. I thought at least that you trusted me," said he.

"And so I do love and trust you, Fred, but when you bring such horrible accusations against the man to whom you were so glad to see me engaged—when you say such things behind his back—"

"I will say them to his face to-morrow, never fear for that, Imogen. I am neither a coward nor a slanderer, although you seem to think me both."

"We won't quarrel, Fred—if we can help it, that is," replied Miss Beecham, coldly; "but I expect you to explain your words."

"Expect me to explain! O Jeanie, you love this stranger better than your own brother, after all," said Frederick, sadly, but Imogen's face never softened.

"Tell me why you call my betrothed husband a mean, good-for-nothing fellow, if you please," said she, steadily.

"Very well, Imogen, if you insist, I will tell you," replied her brother, sternly; "although I wished to spare your ears the pollution of the truth. But you will not take my word, you will not trust my judgment, you set yourself in opposition and defiance towards me, and show a spirit I had not thought was in you. The reason of my calling Stackpole what I did was this: Not an hour ago I saw a miserable woman, one of those unhappy creatures of whom you may have heard, but of whom I trust you know nothing more, approach Robert Stackpole, and address him as her betrayer. She said, 'O Robbie, if you don't pity me, who will?' and 'I wish you would kill me as you threatened to just now.' He threw her off roughly, contemptuously, and bade her never speak to him again, or come near him. The policeman who was with me knew the unfortunate creature, and after speaking of Stackpole as her betrayer, said that she had fallen to the lowest depths of degradation, and rough and hardened though he was, he added words of scorn upon the man who, having led her astray, had then abandoned her, and as it were forced a life of infamy upon her; even a policeman spoke thus of him, Imogen, and can you, a delicate and virtuous woman, defend him or uphold him?"

Imogen remained silent for a moment, all the rich color fading out of her face, while her eyes grew wild and bright with suppressed emotion. At last she asked:

"Did the policeman tell you her name?"

"He called her Simple Susan. Almost all these unfortunates are known by some such sobriquets, dropping their own disgraced names, which are often unknown to their companions."

"And the policeman knew for certainty that Robert was—the man?"

"Certainly. And her own words proved it without his saying anything about it. There is no doubt of his guilt, my poor Imogen, and you will consent to let me tell him to-morrow that he is never to approach you again, will you not?"

"I will tell you to-morrow after breakfast. Good-night."

And with a gesture as abrupt as her words, the young girl left the room and wearily climbed the stairs to her own apartment.

"Strange that she should hesitate, but she will give him up, she must, she shall!" muttered her brother, as he summoned a servant to close the house.

The next morning a little after sunrise, three persons approached the middle of one of the principal bridges leading from the city to the suburbs, so nearly at the same moment, that their meeting seemed a matter of pre-arrangement as indeed it was, so far at least as two of the parties were concerned. Of these, one was Robert Stackpole, who had rowed down the river from the university, as was his daily wont, and the other was Imogen Beecham, who, during these fine early autumn mornings, had suddenly become conscious of the advantage of a walk before breakfast, and was very apt to direct it towards a certain set of steps leading from the bridge aforesaid to the water. And if by chance Mr. Stackpole's boating touched in the same direction, what more natural or defensible than that these two, betrothed lovers as they were, should enjoy a little river excursion together, as indeed they had done many a time and oft.

But on this particular morning, Robert Stackpole's mind was so ill at ease that, instead of his usual steady and beneficial pull, he had indulged in a series of "spurts" and furious efforts, which had brought him to the bridge long before the hour when he had upon the previous night appointed to meet Imogen, and instead of waiting he had rowed on down the river and past the Milldam (for these were the days when Arlington street was not, and Commonwealth Avenue slumbered in the brains of the speculators), so far, that upon his return the "spurts" became compulsory to prevent the rudeness of keeping the lady waiting, an act of which, either as lover or gentleman, Robert Stackpole would never have been guilty.

By this means, however, he avoided encountering the third party whom we have mentioned as proceeding towards the place of rendezvous, and who, having arrived unnoticed, now lay hidden, waiting a fitting moment to join in the interview.

Stackpole, bringing his wherry to the steps by a skillful sweep of the starboard oar, glanced up with a smile at the face steadfastly regarding him over the parapet of the bridge and cried:

"Good-morning, dear! I hope I am not late!—"

But then he stopped abruptly, for upon the white, still face of his betrothed he found no answering smile, in her blue eyes no love-look, but rather one of stern inquiry and determination.

"Imogen! Darling! What is the matter?" asked he, springing up the steps, and seizing her hand.

"I will go a little way up the river with you, and tell you what is the matter," said

Miss Beecham, releasing her hand and stepping unassisted into the boat. Without reply her lover followed, and taking the oars sent the little skiff with one strong impulse through the arch and out upon the clear water beyond.

Meantime the third party concealed in the neighboring arch became uneasy, for the rising tide threatened soon to make the position chosen untenable, and moreover the two lovers in their boat had passed out of earshot. But still the third party lingered, awaiting perhaps their return and the fitting moment for joining in their interview. Meantime Stackpole was saying:

"Now, Imogen, what is it, dear?"

"Robert, do you know a woman called—Susan, Simple Susan?"

And in spite of the young girl's stern resolution to let no womanly scruples stand in the way of a full and fair understanding with her lover, and the ample justice she meant to mete out to him, the scarlet blood surged up over face and neck and even to the tips of her white fingers, as she pronounced this name which she had been told was one of infamy and degradation.

As Stackpole heard it, the healthy color faded from his own face, and his oars dipped over convulsively in and out of the water, then hung suspended, while an indescribable look of horror, shame and astonishment crept over his ghastly features, and stared from his wide-open eyes. Imogen noted the expression well, and with a new pang at her heart, decided it to be the look of conscious guilt.

After a moment of silence, Robert answered, and as the hoarse, unnatural voice issued from his white lips, Imogen glanced up in horror, then pityingly averted her eyes.

"Yes, I know of such a woman. But how dare you to name her?" said he.

"And what is she to you?" pursued Imogen, the momentary relenting dying from her face.

"Nothing—less than nothing. Who links her name with mine?" exclaimed Stackpole, fiercely.

"Nothing? She is nothing to you? Well, what has she been to you in times past? Did not you love her once?"

"I will answer no more questions, Miss Beecham. These inquiries are very strange for a modest young girl to make of any man."

"Even when that man is her betrothed husband? O Robert, they told me this terrible story of guilt and shame, and I would not believe it. I braved all, the reproaches of my friends, my own reluctance, and, as it proves, your bitter taunts, because I believed that when once I spoke openly to you, and gave you an opportunity to explain, you would do it, and deny everything, and I would have believed you. O Robert, Robert, cannot you deny it? Cannot you say there is no stain upon your name and fame?"

"No, Imogen—I deny nothing. There is a stain, a foul stain upon my name, and I had no right to offer that name to you. Forgive me so much for the sake of the love that you once professed, and so let us say good-by."

He took up the oars as he spoke, and turned the bows of the little boat down stream. A few strokes would bring it to the bridge, and Imogen measured the distance with her eye. Just that little distance and they two must part—forever. She turned her eyes imploringly upon her lover.

"Robert! I cannot believe even you, when you speak against all that I have believed you. O, deny that you have any responsibility in this wretched woman's fall, say that there is some mistake, some mystery; say only that you need not blush before me on her account, and I will believe you without another word. O dear, dear Robert, say that I may honor and trust you still!"

"Imogen, I can deny nothing, explain nothing—I can say but one word more to you, though both our hearts should break, and that word is—good-by, and may God in heaven bless and comfort you, my innocent darling."

"O Robert, do but ask me to trust you, and I will do it without another word," pleaded Imogen, and just then the boat shot the arch and rounded towards the landing steps. And now the tide had risen so high that the position chosen by that strange third party to the interview of the lovers had become untenable, and, moreover, the fitting moment had arrived, and she had come to join them. Close beside the steps she lay, her white face and wild dark eyes gleaming from the shadow of the bridge, her long dark hair floating around her, and clinging in melancholy mockery of the modesty so long forgotten, about the bosom left exposed by the miserable dress. One hand was griped upon the dead heart whose last pang was the happiest moment it had known for years, while the other, rising and falling with the restless tide, seemed pointing to the man, who motionless with horror leaned forward, and read that ghastly face.

One moment he stared in silent horror, then throwing down the oars, he leaned over and laid his hand upon that frozen brow, turning the face full towards his own.

"O my God! My God! How can I ever forgive myself! O, my poor, poor child. Susie! Susie! Dead! Yes, dead, and it was I that killed you! I am your murderer!"

He was out of the boat now, and with his arms about the dead woman's waist, was drawing her from the water, supporting her upon his knee, and bending over her with such a ghastly horror upon his face that Imogen could almost have pitied him—and yet not quite, for she was a woman, and felt herself deeply wronged, nay, insulted, that the man who yesterday was her betrothed husband had now forgotten her very presence, while he wept over the dead body of his dead mistress.

"Please to let me pass you, Mr. Stackpole!" said she, coldly; and as Robert neither answered nor moved, nor seemed in the least aware of her presence, Miss Beecham stepped over the sodden skirts of the drowned woman as they rose and fell with the tide, and sweeping past her unconscious lover, she mounted the steps with quick, proud feet, and at the top encountered policeman X 3, who was looking curiously over the parapet.

"Found her floating, eh, miss?" asked he, a little sharply, as the young lady approached.

"Yes," replied Miss Beecham, crisply, and would have passed, but X 3 had out his note-book and pencil and stood in the path, politely but obstinately.

"Please to oblige me with your name and address, miss, before you go. It's like enough you'll be wanted on the inquest."

Imogen turned pale, hesitated a moment, and then, yielding as we all do to the majesty of the law, even in the person of its humbler instruments, did as she was ordered, and receiving official permission to "pass along," complied, with an odd feeling of degradation mingling with the agony at her heart.

Meantime X 3 returned the note-book to his pocket, cast his shrewd eyes up and down the bridge, nodded to a couple of men, muttered a word or two as they approached, and with them at his back descended the water-stairs and laid his hand upon Robert Stackpole's shoulder.

"We'll help you get her out of the water, young man, and I'd like to have you come along with me to the station, just to give your testimony to finding the body, you know."

"The station! I didn't kill her in any way that the law can take hold of!" exclaimed Stackpole, starting to his feet so wildly that X 3 laid a decided hand upon his arm, saying soothingly the while:

"There, there, don't say any more! You'd better not tell me nothing about it, nor so much as speak of killing, for it's an ugly word at the best of times. You just come along quiet with me, and here you, sir, you just help me up with the body, and Dave, you look after the boat, and carry it to Burton's wharf. Tell 'em it was me sent it, and they'll look sharp after it. Now, Mr. Stackpole!"

And ten minutes later Simple Susan began her last journey under custody, lying in the bottom of a light wagon, her dripping clothes decently straightened, her poor white face and staring eyes decently hidden beneath the fine cambric handkerchief which a gentleman in the crowd had silently spread over it. Perhaps the recording angel may have rated that little act of humanity as high as the "cup of cold water" we are bidden to offer each other in distress; at least we must believe that when that gentleman lay down at night, he remembered the occurrence of the morning without regret or shame, although the recipient of his courtesy "was a woman of the city, and a sinner."

In the course of the forenoon, greatly to the disgust and horror of Frederick Beecham, a summons was served upon his sister, ordering her to appear as witness at the inquest to be holden the next morning upon the body of a woman known as Susan Jones, found drowned near University Bridge.

"See now what you have gained by disregarding my advice, and seeing that fellow again! Now you have got yourself mixed up with this disagreeable story, and we shall have the pleasure of seeing your name in every penny paper and Police Gazette in the country. I am really angry with you, Imogen. It is too bad."

"O Fred, don't, don't! My heart is breaking with the sorrow and the shame that have come upon us all, and I cannot bear that you should be harsh too."

And Frederick Beecham, pressing his sister's slender form to his heart, and soothing the golden head upon his breast, vowed silent oaths of deadliest vengeance against the man whose vices and whose deception had fallen so sorely upon that innocent head.

"I hope the law will spare him, for by the living God I will not," muttered he, as Imogen left the room, and the old uncle who overheard him shook his head.

"Fred, Fred, remember who said 'Vengeance is mine,'" said he; "and remember too that none of us are sinless in His eyes; none of us, not one."

"Yes sir, I knew all that, but—" and the young man dashed out of the room and the house. Uncle Harry shook his head again:

"He don't know the man his father was—it is lucky too that he don't. Poor fellow, poor Fred! It would be too hard for his proud spirit to bear."

The inquest was not a long one, for the evidence was terribly direct. Frederick Beecham testified to the conversation he had overheard between the deceased and the prisoner, and the exclamation she had used after parting with him of, "Kill me, Robble, as you said you would!"

Policeman X 3 corroborated Mr. Beecham's testimony, and added his own account of the finding of the body, not forgetting the declaration of the prisoner that he "had not killed her in any way the law could get hold of."

The next witness was Miss Imogen Beecham, and as she was led forward by her uncle and brother, an involuntary murmur of pity and admiration ran through the little group of spectators, for her charming face was as pallid as it was lovely, and her slender figure seemed bowed and shrunken as if by the weight of a load too heavy for endurance. But although her heavy eyes told of sleepless hours and wasting tears, they were firm and brave, and though the silvery voice had taken a pathetic strain that thrilled the heart of every listener, it was true and unflinching. She felt that what she had to say would tell terribly against the accused, but it was the truth, and better to her mind that both he and she should go down to the grave together, than that either should miserably save life or reputation through a perjured oath.

So Imogen told her story, word for word, as it had passed before her eyes, and when asked what were the exclamations of the accused when he first discovered the body in his path, she repeated the fatal expression:

"It is I who have killed you! I am your murderer!"

This was the last; and as she was led away the poor girl murmured in her brother's ear:

"I have sworn his life away; O Frederick, I have sent him to his doom."

"You have told the truth, poor sister, and what could you do less?" replied the brother; and perhaps it was the best comfort he could have given her.

The inquest and preliminary examination were over, and Robert Stackpole was fully committed to jail to await his trial for the murder of Susan Jones, upon whose left temple, beneath the hair, had been discovered the trace of a terrible blow, which some of the jurors were disposed to think had been given by the corner of the stone pier as the girl fell, or was thrown into the river, but which a majority insisted had been inflicted by the head of a leaded cane, whip, or similar instrument.

Public opinion took the matter up, and vehemently discussed it pro and con. The masses, ever eager for the largest attainable horror, believed implicitly in the guilt of the young man whose elevated social position was at once an aggravation of the crime, in their eyes, and an added zest to the expected punishment.

"He wor a studyin' lor over there to the colleges, and for all his studyin', he can't find the lor that'll keep his own neck out o' the sheriff's noose," said Bill, to Joe, as they smoked their pipes over the police report of the committal, and Joe winked knowingly.

"Them chaps is the very ones as wants to be hauled up. They've got eddication and tin, and Lord knows what, to keep 'em straight, and if they goes crooked arter all, why, I say, hang 'em up fer a warnin' to the rest. A poor gal's life is as good as a rich feller's, and if he was the one that sent her to bad in the first place, why, all the more, hang him, hang him, hang him, says I."

Among Stackpole's own associates the verdict was different. Very few believed that he had absolutely murdered poor Simple Susan, but all believed that he had ruined her, and were willing that he should indirectly suffer the punishment of imprisonment and disgrace which the law so unjustly refuses to directly inflict.

Of course the poor girl killed herself, and the trial for murder is all gammon. Stackpole will be acquitted, without the shadow of a doubt; but meantime he will have suffered two or three months imprisonment while waiting for his trial, and the whole matter will be so thoroughly ventilated that the fellow will never hold up his head again, in this city at least, and serve him right too."

So said old Midas to older Croesus, as the two toasted their auriferous shins before the fire in the luxurious back parlor, and Croesus, whose second daughter had been a little disposed to envy Imogen Beecham her conquest, responded heartily:

"Yes, serve him right, the scoundrel. The girls will know now that it isn't every mustached scamp that comes along that will make a good husband."

And Stackpole himself? He said nothing, absolutely nothing. The first lawyer in the country was sent to him, engaged by "a friend who believed him innocent," so said the note of introduction which he presented, and Robert, reading it, smiled sadly, put the little note in his breast pocket, and remarked:

"A beautiful day, I should think, Mr. Markham."

"And what is our line of defence, my dear sir?" asked Mr. Markham, presently.

"I never raised my hand against that poor girl, but I killed her with my words. Make what you can out of that," replied Stackpole, sullenly, and at the end of an hour it was all that the lawyer had gained.

Then came a note from Imogen:

"I do not, for a moment, believe you guilty of the murder, but, O Robert, if you can do it, for Heaven's sake explain away the mystery involving you with that poor girl. Contradict this horrible story which is in every one's mouth. Robert, Robert, do not force me, by your silence, to believe it too, for I had rather see you cold and dead before me, than to believe in your moral and spiritual death. If I must lose you, Robert, let me at least keep my faith and trust in you."

And to this Robert only replied:

"I did not commit the murder, and I cannot explain my connection with the girl. Forget me—as I will never, living or dead, forget you."

And so the weeks and months went on, and the day of trial came. The court was crowded to suffocation, and as the prisoner was brought in, the spectators crowded so tumultuously forward to catch a sight of him, that several persons were thrown down and trampled upon, and the presiding Judge was about to give an order to clear the room, but dared not risk the popular indignation and possible riot that might ensue.

The trial proceeded rapidly. The evidence for the prosecution was very little beyond what had already been produced upon the inquest, and that for the defence was almost wholly confined to testimony to character. No explanation was offered of the connection between the accused and the deceased, or of his singular and repeated self-accusation as her murderer. Neither was any alibi attempted, or account given of the prisoner's occupation between leaving Mr. Beecham's house at a few minutes past twelve and his appearance upon the river at a little before seven. He had occupied his room at the college boarding-house during that time, but no testimony spoke to the hour of his arrival, or that of his departure therefrom.

The case was an eminently obscure and unsatisfactory one, and so felt judge, jury and counsel, not to mention a hungry and thirsty public, who snarled and growled over the crumbs offered them instead of the full report they had expected, in a very unaimable fashion.

But the report was to come, and did, although at the very latest moment, in fact just as Mr. Markham was about to announce that the case for the defence was closed; before pronouncing those final words he rolled his eyes over the faces of the crowd, as if to apologize for the case thus closed remaining so remarkably empty, he caught sight of policeman X 3, cheerfully elbowing a way through the audience, nodding shrewdly to him as he did so, and dragging after him a miserable, hopeless looking creature whose sadden white face and ragged clothes told the story of vice and destitution even at the first glance.

By the time that Mr. Markham had finished the eloquent but unmeaning sentences with which he hastily replaced the final declaration that had been upon his lips, X 3 had reached his side, and, in a moment more, had whispered a few energetic sentences, and pushed forward the woman who stood stupidly staring about her.

"Please your honor I have another witness to offer," exclaimed Mr. Markham, excitedly; and, the court graciously granting permission, Nancy Johnson was pushed into the witness-box, duly sworn, and proceeded to give her testimony, in the depressed, half-articulated voice peculiar to the degraded of either sex. Its amount was this:

Nancy Johnson had been the friend and room-mate of Simple Susan for several months, and had "liked her well enough." Upon the evening of the murder she had been in her own room, just going to bed, as it was very late, when Susan suddenly entered, her face more white and haggard than Nancy had ever seen a living face, and coming up to her had placed a sum of money in her hands, saying:

"I'll make you my heir, Nancy. You're the only friend I've got in the wide world, and you've been good to me when you had money and I had none."

Then taking a little desk out of her trunk and throwing it into Nancy's lap, she added:

"There, that's all I have in the world, and now good-by."

With that, as Nancy hesitatingly averred, and indeed the act seemed almost incredible, the poor girl had thrown her arms around her companion's neck, kissed her twice or thrice, and then ran out of the room and the house.

"And what did you do then, Nancy?" asked the counsel for the prosecution, with a glance at the jury.

"Went straight out and got drunk, fit with Blind Billy, got took up and carried to the lock-up, and next morning was sent over to South Boston for four months. I came back last night, and some of 'em was telling about Simple Susan, and I felt bad—"

"Why did you feel bad, Nancy?" interrupted the counsel, cynically.

"'Cause I was fond of her," replied Nancy; and the touch of nature and kindly feeling at once repaired the damage the wily counsel had led her into doing her own character and testimony.

"I felt bad and I went to my trunk and got out her little desk, and took on over it for a spell," said Nancy, "and while I was at it X 3 he came in, knowing me and Susan was mates, to see if I couldn't tell something more than the rest could about her and that feller. So I showed him the desk, and he found that book, and then he lugged me right up here. I've seen Susan a writing in that book time and again, and crying over it like she'd cry her eyes out, but I can't read; I aint got no learning, anyway, and that's all."

And so the poor tattered and begrimed little journal was produced and handed to the judge, and handed to the jury, and put in as evidence, and Mr. Markham clearing his throat, stood up and read it out from end to end; the poor forlorn little journal which told the whole story in its disconnected scraps, and did not know how much it was revealing. Here are a few:

"I saw his daughter to-day. She is a beautiful creature, and innocent and pure as I was once, yes, as I was when her father first saw me on that fatal visit to the beach. Her name is Imogen, and she has a brother called Frederick after the father. I hope he will not be such a man, or rather I hope no other girl will be so weak and wicked as I was—only five years ago and I was at home, with father, and mother, and Robbie, and they all so fond of me. O my God, to think I should have deceived them so, but it was he that led me on, it was he who planned it all. If his own daughter should meet with such a man, why should not she fall too?

"I saw Robbie, my own darling brother—no, I must not call him so now, but he was all that once—and he went into Mr. Beecham's house. I waited until I could ask one of the men-servants, the women would not have spoken to me, and he told me that Robbie is to marry Imogen Beecham. But if she knew of me! O my God, where shall I hide myself, and how? I will wait until I can speak to Robbie when no one can see us, and I will ask him for a little money to take me to some quiet country place where I can die and be forgotten. I loathe this life so, and I am sick. I know I cannot live long, and if only I could die among good people and in the blessed country where I was born and bred, and where father and mother lie at rest forever. It was I who sent them to their graves, it was I that broke their hearts—Robbie told me so, when he found me crying by their graves, and he said then that he never would speak to me again, never would own me, no, not to save both our lives. I was not so very bad then—it was just after Mr. Beecham had left me; but when Robbie said that, I knew there was no hope, and I just let myself go.

"But now perhaps he will feel differently, and if only he will help me, I will go away and die, and be forgotten. Yes, I must die—if he will not help me, still I must die—O that black deep river—I went and looked at it last night, and then I dreamed of it—but I cannot live this way—no, no, no."

When Mr. Markham finished reading there fell a silence, broken only by the suppressed sobs of the audience and one low, deep groan from the prisoner, as, sitting with his head in his hands, he gasped, brokenly:

"It was I that killed her—yes, though man acquit, God holds me her murderer."

But as he left the court-room, acquitted of every suspicion, and complimented by the presiding justice for his forbearance, courage and self-respect, Frederick Beecham linked his arm in his, whispering:

"I should never dare ask you to forgive my father's son, but for Imogen. My father killed your sister—murdered her, body and soul—but you shall take mine instead, and all shall be forgiven. But perhaps now that you know all—"

"I knew it was your father who ruined my poor girl, but he is dead, and I thought that she was until that night. I never meant that Imogen should guess the horrible truth. I could have died if it had come to that, but I never would have spoken."

"I believe it. Come to Imogen," said Beecham, gravely. And an hour later the lovers sat together, reconciled at last.

But although they married a little later, and enjoyed their share of happiness, who can believe that this tragedy failed to tinge with darkness their whole after lives, or that the sins of the father failed to be visited upon the heads of the children!

HARRY RAYMOND'S RESOLVE.

CHAPTER X.

AFTER THE FIRE.

By the time the fire engine reached the burning house, the flames were so far advanced that there was no chance of saving it. For form's sake a stream of water was thrown upon the flames from the well near by, but the supply was soon exhausted, and produced no effect whatever. So the engine was drawn back to the engine house, the crowd dispersed, and in place of the old house there was a heap of half-burnt rafters and cinders.

The next day the fire was the topic of conversation throughout the village. Being in the store Harry had an opportunity of hearing it discussed by those who "dropped in" to make purchases.

"Was the house insured?" asked old Sam Tilden, filling the bowl of his pipe with tobacco, preparatory to having a comfortable smoke.

"I reckon it was," said another. "The squire's a keeful man. He wouldn't be likely to neglect it."

"Here's the squire himself. You can ask him," said John Gaylord, the chief salesman, who was doing up half a dozen pounds of sugar for a customer.

Harry, remembering what he had seen the night before, looked up with mingled feelings as he saw the rather stiff and stately form of Squire Turner enter the door.

The squire, though not a good looking man, was always carefully dressed. He regarded it as due to his position, and as no one else in the village except the minister and doctor were scrupulous on this point, he inspired a certain respect on this very account. So now, as he entered the store, in a decorous suit of black, with a stiff standing collar rising above a glossy satin stock, swinging in his hand a gold-headed cane, those present looked towards him with considerable deference.

"Well, squire," said Sam Tilden, "you met with a misfortune last night."

"Yes," said the squire, deliberately, "there was a clean sweep of the old house. There isn't much left of it."

"Have you any idea who set it on fire?" queried the old man.

"No," said the squire. "I came in to see if any one here could throw any light upon it."

There was one present who could have thrown some light upon it, and if Squire Turner had chanced to look behind the counter he might have noticed a peculiar expression in the eyes of Harry Raymond, who was watching him fixedly. The fact is, Harry was very much perplexed in his mind in regard to the occurrence. Why a gentleman should steal out of his house in disguise at the dead of night to set fire to his own property was a question which was invested with not a little mystery. But before the conversation was finished he began to understand it better.

"It must have been sot afire," continued Sam Tilden, positively. "There wasn't nobody livin' in it."

"No, it had been empty for several months."

"You haint got no suspicions, I s'pose?"

"Why, no," said the squire, slowly. "I suppose it must have been somebody that had a grudge against me, and took this way to gratify it. But who it may be I haven't an idea."

"I reckon it was insured?" said Sam, interrogatively.

"Yes," said the squire, cautiously, "it was insured."

"I said it must be," said one, who had spoken at an earlier stage in the conversation. "I knew, squire, you was too keerful a man to neglect it."

"It was insured when it came into my hands," said Squire Turner, "and I have merely kept up the payments."

"What was the figure?"

"I really can't be quite certain till I have looked at the policy," said the squire. "I've got all my houses insured, and I can't without looking tell exactly how much there is on each."

"That's the advantage of owning only one house," said Doctor Lamson, as he stepped in for a moment. "I'm not liable to make a mistake about my insurance. In what company was your house insured, Squire Turner?"

"In the Phoenix Mutual, I believe. By the way, Mr. Porter, you may send up a barrel of flour to my house. I believe we are nearly out."

"All right, squire. It shall go up in the course of the day."

"Good-morning, gentlemen," said the squire, walking out of the store.

"I guess the squire wont lose a cent," said Sam Tilden, after he went out. "It's likely the insurance money will pay him handsome if the policy was took out years ago. I shouldn't wonder if he's glad the old house is gone. It was awfully out of repair."

"Very likely you're right," said John Gaylord. "I'd rather have the money than the house for my part."

For the first time a light came to Harry's mind. He felt that he understood the whole matter now. Squire Turner didn't want the house, which would require considerable outlay to make it habitable, and he did want the money for which it was insured. As the shortest way to secure this, he had himself set the house on fire. Now, no doubt, he meant to come upon the company for the amount of insurance money. To Harry's mind this looked like a swindle—like obtaining money by false pretences. Yet here was Squire Turner, the richest man in the village, occupying a very prominent—indeed the most prominent position in town—who was actually going to carry out this fraud. Nobody except he knew that the squire was himself the incendiary. What ought he to do about it? Should he allow the insurance company to be swindled?

"Do you think Squire Turner will collect his insurance money, Mr. Gaylord?" he asked, of the chief clerk.

"Do I think so? Of course he will. He'd be a fool if he didn't."

"But people seem to think that the house wasn't worth as much as the sum it was insured for."

"Very likely not, but it was when it was insured, and the payments have been kept up regular, the insurance company can't complain as I see."

"Suppose the man that set the house on fire should be caught?"

"He'd be tried, and put in prison."

This gave Harry something new to think of. The idea of Squire Turner's being put in prison was certainly a strange and startling one. Probably it made a difference as long as he owned the house himself. Still, if he claimed the insurance money, that again made a difference. Harry felt puzzled again, and in thinking over the matter he made several ludicrous mistakes, among others asking a boy who came in for some molasses how many yards he would have, which led to a mirthful explosion from the young customer, who looked upon it as a brilliant joke.

Not knowing what to do, Harry did nothing. Two days afterwards our hero saw the following placard posted up on the outside of the store, on the left hand side of the door:

"ONE HUNDRED DOLLARS REWARD!—For information that will lead to the discovery of the incendiary or incendiaries, who set fire to the old Jackson farmhouse, belonging to the subscriber, which was consumed on the evening of the 11th inst.

"ELIHU TURNER."

Harry read this placard with interest.

"I could claim that reward," he said to himself, "but would Squire Turner think my information worth paying for?"

CHAPTER XI.

HARRY MAKES A CALL ON BUSINESS.

A FEW days later Harry heard that Squire Turner had made a formal claim upon the Phoenix Mutual Insurance Company for two thousand dollars, the amount of his policy. On hearing this, he no longer hesitated as to his duty. He resolved to call upon the squire, and acquaint him with his information upon the subject. Accordingly, one afternoon, he went up to Mr. Porter, and asked for two hours' time.

"What for?" queried the storekeeper.

"I want to call on Squire Turner. I have a little business with him."

The storekeeper naturally supposed that the business related to the affairs of Harry's mother, and gave permission, as business was generally slack about that time in the afternoon, but requested Harry to be back by half past three.

When Harry got started on his way to the residence of the squire, he began to feel that his errand was rather a delicate one. He, a mere boy, was about to intimate to a gentleman of high social position that he was a rascal—that was the plain English of it—and was conspiring to defraud an insurance company out of a considerable sum of money. It was rather a bold undertaking for a boy of fifteen. Perhaps Squire Turner might be so incensed as to kick him out of the house. Harry was a stout boy, but still of course he had not the strength to cope with a tall man like the squire. Had he been a timid boy, he would have shrunk from the encounter. But Harry was not timid. On the contrary, he was physically and morally brave, as anybody who knew him would readily testify.

"I'll take the risk," he said to himself, firmly. "I don't think Squire Turner will think it best to attack me."

He marched manfully up the front steps, and rang the bell. His summons was answered by a servant.

"Is the squire in?" he asked.

"Yes," was the reply; and the girl indicated the door of the "office."

Harry knocked.

"Come in," said the squire, in his usual grating voice.

Harry did go in.

Squire Turner was seated at his desk. He had a paper before him, which Harry rightly guessed was the fire insurance policy. The squire had been examining it with considerable complacency. Two thousand dollars was a large sum even to him, and certainly a very handsome consideration for the old Jackson farmhouse, which with the land around it he had got, by the foreclosure of a mortgage, at a decided bargain. How the company had ever been induced to grant so large a sum on such a house, even in its better days, was a wonder, but insurance companies sometimes make mistakes as well as private individuals, and this appeared to be one of them.

For two thousand dollars, or a little more, the squire had been thinking, he could build a nice modern house which would make the farm salable at a considerably higher figure than before. This was a very pleasant prospect, of course, and the harsh lines in the squire's face were smoothed out to a certain extent as he thought of it.

When he turned, at the opening of the door, and saw who his visitor was, he naturally concluded that Harry had come about the land warrant.

"I haven't heard anything more about your mother's Western land," he said. "When I do, I will let you know."

"Thank you," said Harry, "but that is not what I have come about."

"Very well," said the squire, a little surprised, "you can state your business."

At this moment James Turner came in hastily.

"Father, I want a dollar," he said.

"What for?"

"To buy a bat and ball."

"Wait a minute or two. I am busy."

James looked at Harry superciliously, as if to imply that his business could not be of any particular importance, and took a seat.

"You may state your business," said the squire.

"I beg your pardon," said Harry, looking towards James, "but my business is private."

"Perhaps he wants to complain of me," thought James, "about the eggs. If he does he won't make much."

"I am not aware of any business between us," said the squire, with dignity, "which is of too private a nature to discuss before my son. I will, however, stretch a point, to oblige you, and request him to leave the room."

"It isn't on my account, but on yours," said our hero, bluntly, "that I wish to speak privately."

Squire Turner looked at Harry in cold displeasure, not unmingled with surprise, at what he felt to be a liberty.

"That's a strange remark," he said. "However, James, you may leave the room. Here is the money."

"You have offered a reward, Squire Turner, for information about the fire the other evening," said, Harry, when they were alone, thinking it best to plunge into the subject at once.

"Yes, a hundred dollars reward," said the squire. "Do you know anything about it?"

"I do," said Harry, promptly.

Squire Turner was taken by surprise. What could Harry know about the fire, and its origin? He himself knew all about it, but of course that knowledge was locked up in his own breast. In offering the reward he felt sure that it would not be claimed, and under the circumstances he felt that it was well to offer it. It would impress the fire company favorably, as showing his determination to ferret out the secret incendiary, and therefore he had forwarded a handbill containing a copy of his offer to the office of the Phoenix Mutual, together with his claim for the amount of insurance money.

Harry's prompt answer led to a suspicion in the squire's mind that our hero was trying to get the reward on false pretences.

"The money will only be given for positive information leading to the discovery of the incendiary," he said, coldly.

"I can give you such information," said Harry, with the same promptness as before.

"Perhaps," said the squire, with a sneer, "you can tell who set the house on fire."

"I can," said Harry, distinctly.

"Who did it?" asked the squire, beginning to feel nervous.

"Squire Turner," said our hero, feeling that the crisis had come, "you have asked me the question, and of course you wish me to answer it truly."

"Of course," muttered the squire, whose nervousness increased.

"Then," said Harry, firmly, "you set the house on fire yourself!"

The words were like a thunderbolt. The squire started to his feet, his face livid with fear, and then purple with excitement.

"How dare you say such a scandalous thing?" he exclaimed.

"Because you expect me to tell the truth," said Harry. "If you will listen, I will tell you how I came to know."

Hereupon he gave an account, in as few words as possible, of his midnight visit to the house of Doctor Lamson, of his passing near the house, and identifying the squire in the act of setting fire to some shavings. Squire Turner listened, evidently in a state of nervous excitement, fidgeting about in a manner which indicated his mental disturbance. When Harry had finished, he spoke.

"This is the most impudent fabrication I ever heard. You mean to charge that I—a rich man, and, if I say it myself, universally respected—actually set fire to my own house at the dead of night?"

"I do," said Harry, firmly.

"I have a great mind to kick you out of my house," said the squire, violently.

"I don't think you will do it, Squire Turner," said Harry, who did not show a trace of alarm.

"Why not?"

"Because I have told the truth, and you know it," said our hero, "and if I told it outside, people might believe it."

"What would your word weigh against mine?" said the squire, but his tone was more confident than his feeling.

"I never told a lie, as everybody in the village will testify," said Harry, proudly. "Of course it is an object for you to deny it."

The squire began to see that the overbearing policy was not exactly the one to pursue in this case. Harry was not to be frightened easily, and this he realized. Besides, there were other reasons why he did not wish to fall out with our hero. Accordingly he thought proper to change his tone.

"My young friend," he said, with a very significant change of tone and manner, "you are certainly under a very strange delusion. I should be angry, but I am rather disposed to be amused. You would only be laughed at if you should spread abroad such a ridiculous tale."

"It's true," persisted Harry.

"Consider a moment," said Squire Turner, with commendable patience, "the nature of your charge. It is rather absurd that I should set fire to my own building. Isn't it now? What possible object could I have in so doing?"

"The insurance," briefly answered Harry.

"Yes," said Squire Turner slowly, "the house was insured, to be sure, but they don't insure to the full value."

"Everybody says that the house was insured for more than its full value."

"Quite a mistake. I would rather have the house than the money. In fact, it was quite a disappointment having the house burnt down."

"I don't know about that," said Harry, sturdily. "All I know is, that I saw you setting the house on fire with my own eyes."

Perspiration began to come out on the squire's brow. He had never anticipated such an obstacle to the carrying out his plans, and it did seem a little provoking when everything had seemed so favorable hitherto. He would like to have pitched our hero out of the window, or kicked him out of the house, but neither course seemed quite expedient. So, though boiling over with inward wrath and vexation, he forced himself to be conciliatory.

"I have no doubt you think you are right," he said, "but in the evening one is easily deceived about faces. I was fast asleep at the time, and indeed, I knew nothing of the fire till my housekeeper came and knocked at my door when it was nearly over."

This was partly true, but the squire didn't say that it was just after he had crept stealthily into the house.

"Still, as I am a friend of your family, and interested in your welfare," he continued, "I don't mind giving you the hundred dollars, not of course as a reward, but to help you along. Of course it is on condition that you say nothing of this ridiculous story. It would only involve you in trouble. Come up to-morrow and I'll give you the money."

"Squire Turner," said Harry, promptly, "I cannot accept your proposition, or money."

"Why not?"

"Because my story, whether ridiculous or not, is true. I don't care for the reward, I didn't come up here to get it."

"What did you come for?"

"I came to prevent your coming upon the insurance company for that money. If you will promise not to ask for the money, I will never say a word about how the fire came about."

"I can't promise that," said the squire; "but before claiming the insurance I will let you know. In the meantime you had better keep the story to yourself."

"I will," said Harry; and rising he left the room, leaving the squire in a very uncomfortable and unsatisfactory state of mind.

CHAPTER XII.

HARTLEY BRANDON.

WHEN the squire was left alone he began rather ruefully to think over the unexpected turn which affairs had taken. If he had disliked Harry before, he hated him now. He felt that the sturdy determination of our young hero was likely to place him in a very unpleasant dilemma. If he should not collect the insurance money, the house would be a total loss, and this would be very provoking. If he should collect it, he had every reason to believe that Harry would keep his word; and as he was a boy of truth many would no doubt believe him, and the insurance company would be sure to stir in the matter. There was another consideration. If he guiltily let the matter pass, and failed to make his claim, or recalled it, for it was already made, it would excite a great deal of surprise, and perhaps suspicion, and thus again he would be disagreeably situated. There seemed to be only a choice of difficulties, as the squire realized. He fervently wished now that he had never burnt the house down. But it was done and could not be undone.

"I wish the young rascal was out of the way," he muttered to himself.

He wished it the more because Harry stood in the way of another plan which he had in view: namely, marrying Mrs. Raymond, in case the Western property proved as valuable as he anticipated. He had an instinctive feeling that our hero would not fancy him for a stepfather, and would exert all his influence over his mother to prevent her accepting him, even if she might otherwise be willing.

"Plague take the young whelp!" muttered the squire. "I wish he was in Nova Zembla, or somewhere else where he would never come back."

His uncomfortable reflections were here broken in upon by the entrance of the servant.

"There's a man at the door wants to see you, Squire Turner."

"Who is it?"

"It's a stranger."

"Well, tell him to come in."

The invitation was duly given, and directly there entered a tall man, very seedy in his appearance, with a repulsive aspect, who looked as if the world and he had not been on good terms for some time. He was probably about the same age as Squire Turner—that is, fifty—but looked still older, probably in consequence of the life he had led.

Squire Turner looked at the intruder in surprise.

"How do you do, Squire Turner?" said the stranger, familiarly.

"You have the advantage of me," said the squire, coldly.

"Yet you used to know me well," was the reply, as the visitor sat down uninvited.

"I don't know you now. Who are you?" demanded Squire Turner, who didn't feel it necessary to use much ceremony with a man so evidently under the frowns of fortune.

"I am your cousin, Hartley Brandon."

Squire Turner started.

"Hartley Brandon!" he repeated in amazement. "I thought you were dead years ago."

"And wished it, no doubt," said the other, with a laugh. "Confess now you are not very glad to see me."

"I am not very glad to see you, as you are sharp enough to guess," said the squire, with a sneer. "You are not a relative to be proud of."

"True enough," said the other. "I see you are not afraid of hurting my feelings. However, I've had so many hard rubs that my feelings have got worn off, if I ever had any."

"What is your object in coming down here, for I suppose you have an object?"

"Suppose I say that it is for the sake of seeing about the only relative I have in the world. There's something in that, you know."

"Not in this case. We may be cousins, but we are not friends, and never will be."

"Come, that's frank—true, too, I dare say," said Hartley Brandon, who didn't appear by any means disturbed at the coldness of the squire. "Well, as you say, it wasn't that. Blood's thicker than water, they say, but there are plenty of people I like better than you, who are my cousin."

"That is a matter of perfect indifference to me," said the squire, coldly. "I don't want to know what your object is not, but what it is."

"I am rather seedy, as you see."

"So it appears."

"This shabby suit with half a dollar constitutes all my worldly possessions."

"Supposing it to be so, what is that to me?"

"Can't you help me a little?"

The squire's mouth tightened, as it always did when there was an attack on his purse-strings. He seldom gave away money, unless he thought it would help him in some way, and he felt even more than usually unwilling to do so at a time when owing to Harry's obduracy he was threatened with a serious loss. No poorer time could have been selected by his cousin for his application than this.

"I can do nothing for you," he said, coldly.

"I don't mean you to give me money," said Brandon. "I only want an advance of thirty or forty dollars, which I will faithfully repay you with interest."

Squire Turner laughed scornfully.

"What security can you offer?" he asked. |

"None at all, except my word."

"That isn't satisfactory."

"I thought you'd say so; but listen, and I will tell you how the matter stands. First, I suppose you would like to know how I have been employed for the last twenty odd years."

"You may tell or not, just as you like. I feel no particular interest in the matter."

"I have followed the sea—I see you are surprised—but this is the way it happened. Twenty-five years since, I found myself high and dry in New York, with no resources, and nobody to look to for help. In my distress I fell in with a sailor who treated me kindly, and proposed to me to adopt his profession. It was not particularly to my taste, and I knew it was rather late in life to begin, but I had no other resource, and I allowed myself to be persuaded. I had a hard time of it at first, as you may suppose, but after a while I became acquainted with my duties, and turned out a very fair sailor. Being possessed of a better education than belongs to the generality of seamen, I found myself able to rise. On the second voyage, I shipped third mate.

Then I rose to second mate, finally to first mate. I might have become captain if I had been a little more steady, but a fondness for drink stood in the way of my advancement."

"So you have been a sailor for twenty-five years."

"Yes."

"It was no doubt the best thing you could do. You don't think of giving it up?"

"No."

"Then I don't see what I can do for you."

"I've a chance to sail as mate next week in the ship Sea Eagle bound for China."

"Why don't you go, then?"

"Because there's a trifle in the way. I owe twenty-five dollars in New York, and if I don't pay it up square the party'll put a spoke in my wheel, and prevent my getting the situation."

"So you want me to advance you the necessary money?"

"Yes, I'll pay you back at the end of the voyage."

"Do you know the captain under whom you are to sail?" asked the squire, thoughtfully.

"Yes, a little."

"What sort of a man is he?"

"O, an average sort of a man—rather a tartar, so I hear from some who have sailed under him. He likes his ease, and leaves the vessel pretty much in the hands of his first officer."

A train of reflection had been started in the squire's mind by the communication of his kinsman. He wanted to be rid of Harry Raymond. Why could he not arrange with Hartley Brandon to smuggle him off to sea, where he would be out of the way of interfering with his plans? It might be difficult to manage, but no doubt some way would suggest itself. As for Brandon, there was no fear of his refusing. He was not troubled with scruples, and a small sum of money would buy his cooperation.

Then again, the sea was a treacherous element. Accidents were frequent. Should Harry once embark on its smooth but fickle expanse, he might never come back again, or if he did, it might be to find him, the squire, his mother's second husband, and the relationship would seal his lips from disclosing the secret of which he had become possessed.

All these thoughts passed through the squire's mind much more quickly than I have been able to state them. The plan which has been briefly sketched seemed the only way out of the labyrinth in which he had become involved, and he resolved to make a trial of it.

"Well, will you help me?" asked Brandon, growing impatient of his kinsman's silence.

"I will," answered the squire, "upon conditions."

"Name them," said Brandon, brightening up.

THE BOAT RACE.

BY ANNA M. TOMKINS.

See the boat leap for the goal,
With a thousand eyes upon her,
While the rowers, with one soul,
Pull as for dear life and honor.

It is only boyish sport,
But if this day, to view it
Came a monarch with his court,
In good sooth they need not rue it.

For the awful stress that waits
Upon that harmonious motion,

Turns the battle at the gates,
And wrests the sceptre from old Ocean.

And the cheery eyes of those Who are farthest from the station,
Would look bright, mid Arctic snows,
In the dead face of starvation.

Then a cheer to fan the flame
Of that noble emulation;
'Tis the same that raised to fame
This indomitable nation!

SILVER ARDEN.

BY MISS CAMILLA WILLIAN.

OUT West, very far out, on one of the great prairies, and five miles from any town, was the farm of Mr. Arden. It was no great of a farm, but was pretty fair, such a one as John Arden, a young man of nineteen, and his

It is pretty hard for a man to think that he has got to delve on a farm and support a family all his life, even after he gets old, and so Mr. Arden talked the matter over with his wife and John, and told them that if they would stay and carry on the little farm, he would go to California and get rich for them.

It was hard to consent to part, but they did consent, and Mr. Arden went.

Two years is not so long a time when people are busy, and it soon went round for the Ardens. Their little farm had prospered, and the absent father had prospered. Letters came from him frequently, and at last came the blessed letter saying that he was to start for home immediately, and would reach there some time in February or March.

Then indeed the little family was a happy one! What plans they laid! How they made everything look as well as possible, and prepared to feast the wanderer who had been so long absent!

"Do you suppose that father will bring Silver back, mother?" Phil asked.

Silver was a pet pup that Phil had given his father on his going away; not that his father wanted a pup, he thought, but because the boy wanted to give him the most precious thing he had, and Silver was the most precious.

Mr. Arden could not refuse, but took the little creature with him, and cherished it, and delighted his boy at home by writing how bright Silver was growing, and what great friends they were.

"I don't know, dear," Mrs. Arden answered to her boy's question. "If he only brings himself safely, we shall have enough to be thankful for."

Mrs. Arden was a very calm and sensible woman; but she was very much moved at the thought of seeing her husband after so long a time, and she could scarcely believe mother, and Phil Arden, a boy of six, could work very well.

So Mr. Arden thought, and he thought, too, that he must positively get rich faster. He had a brother in California who was making money in heaps, and this brother wrote him that if he would come out there and stay two years, he could go back, a rich man, and buy one of the finest places in the West, and live in ease all the rest of his days.

that all was to go on so brightly and prosperously to the end. It seemed to her that something must happen that was painful, everything had gone so well as yet. But she kept these fears to herself, and tried indeed to laugh at them. Every night before they went to bed she and her two boys knelt down, and she prayed that her husband and their father might be brought safely back to them.

The weeks glided away, and the time came when they could say, "Perhaps he will be here this week, or certainly next week."

They couldn't do anything else for thinking of it, but wandered about watching for letters, and looking up the long, long road across the prairie to the next town. It was a long, straight road, and there was nothing grew on it but a few small shrubs, so they could see for miles.

At length they got a telegram. Mr. Arden had arrived safely at St. Louis, and would be at home in a few days.

Then indeed it seemed as though all was going right, and no accident could happen. The family went happily about their work. Their little cottage was as bright and clean as it could be made. They had bought some new things to fit it up, for since father was coming with lots of money, they could afford to spend what they had. Besides this, Mrs. Arden had made mince pies, and a wonderful loaf of cake, a wedding-cake, she called it, and she had a turkey to roast for dinner, and many other good things. They had their own cider and apples, and all those country delicacies to be found on a farm.

"I think he'll be here to-morrow, mother," Phil said one evening as they all gathered round the fire after supper. "It's time for him, and I guess he'll come. Wont he think it looks pretty here?"

Mrs. Arden smiled, but said nothing as she glanced round the room. It was indeed pretty, with a bright new carpet on the floor, pictures on the walls, a new armchair bought on purpose for father, standing in the corner, the little table with the Bible and the shaded lamp on it setting ready for the evening's reading, and the firelight playing over all.

"I hope it will clear off well in the morning," said John, the elder brother. "I'd like father to get home on a sunshiny day."

"Is there much snow fallen, my son?" the mother asked, looking up from the fire in which she had been dreaming.

"There are several inches," the boy replied,

"and it is falling fast now and drifting some."

"I am sorry," the mother said, her face clouding a little. She also would like her husband to get home on a sunshiny day. Besides, if the snow should drift on that long road, it would delay his coming. There was very little travel in that direction, and sometimes it would be days before a road would be broken out after a heavy snow.

"But maybe it will clear away in the morning," she said more brightly. "I think what little wind there is is a fair one."

They all sat still and listened for the wind, and in the silence they heard the soft silken rustle of the snow on the windows. If the father had been with them, it would have been a pleasant sound. But since the snow was falling between them and him, it had a sad sound.

Nothing was said for a long while; then Phil began to repeat their plans for the twentieth time, asking if they would go to town to live, if John would go to college, and so on. John brightened, too, and told what he meant to study, and where he meant to go.

But Mrs. Arden could not talk. She felt sad and troubled, and wished the night away.

"Let's have some cider and apples, mother," John said. "They will help to pass the time away."

"Very well, you get them," she said, starting as he spoke.

John took a candle and plate, and Phil took a pitcher, and the two went down cellar and presently came up again, John with the plate piled with rosy, shining apples, and Phil with the pitcher foaming over with cider. They set them down, and soon were naming apples and drinking healths quite merrily. But though Mrs. Arden tried to be cheerful for the sake of her children, she could not shake off her gloomy feelings, and was glad when their little feast was over.

"Now, boys, we must have prayers, and go to bed," she said.

They sobered themselves while she read a chapter in the Bible, then they knelt down, and she prayed fervently for all, but most, for the safe return of their absent loved one. She prayed so earnestly that when they rose from their knees all three had tears in their eyes, and the boys felt that they must not rejoice too soon, but must remember how uncertain everything on earth is.

Just before going to bed Mrs. Arden opened the door into the little porch, and looked out to see what the weather was. It was not very cold, though cold enough to make her shiver, but the snow was falling very thickly, and all she could see was a white waste. She looked sighing in the direction of the town, and was about going into the house again, when she stopped and listened.

The two boys were still in the sitting-room, and they heard her say in a low, quick voice, "Boys, come here!"

They hurried out onto the step, and saw her leaning out and looking up in the direction of the town. Nothing was to be seen, so thick was the snow, and since there was no moon.

"Listen!" she said, stretching her hand toward them, but without looking round.

With a chill of fear they hushed themselves and listened. A faint sound came, smothered in snow, carried away by the soft, stifled wind. Then a lull, and it came clearly, the bark of a dog!

Mrs. Arden looked round with an excited, pallid face.

"The lantern, quick!" she exclaimed. "Some one is lost in the snow!"

Not a word was said more. With breathless haste, not daring to think what it might be to which they were going, the boys hurried on the boots they had taken off, buttoned their jackets, pulled their caps about their ears, put on mittens, all in a minute, and John taking a shovel, and Phil the lantern, they started out with their mother. She also had hurried on boots, a thick fur sack, tied a shawl over her head, and put a flask of brandy into her pocket.

Silent still they set out, and shovelled their way through the snow in the direction of that barking, stopping when it ceased, and hurrying on when they heard it. Before starting they had set the centre lamp on a table close to the window, and but for that they might soon have lost sight of the house. For the night was nothing but a whirl of snow, and the direction they took was outside of the road.

Nearer and nearer they came, floundering through the drifts, their lantern casting a foggy gleam about them. They were but a little way off, and now they saw something moving before them, and now, with their hearts in their mouths, they hold up the lantern and see a beautiful silver-white dog with brown spots, who looks up at them with large imploring eyes, and tries to paw away the light snow from beneath his feet.

"It is Silver!" cried Philip, almost in a scream. But the other two said not a word. They only push away the snow with frantic haste, and with shivering moans pull out the senseless form of a man lying there under the drift.

The dog with a sharp bark catches a hat in his teeth, and runs after them, and Mrs. Arden and John go staggering back through the drifts with that awful burden, Philip weeping and carrying the lantern.

"O father! father!" muttered John below his breath, as the light from the lantern fell on that well-known face.

"Lay him down a moment," the mother said to John, when they were about half way to the house.

They both knelt in the snow, and bore up the burden on their knees, while Mrs. Arden took the brandy-flask from her pocket and poured a little between the lips of her husband. Then they lifted him again, and never stopped till they reached their own bright sitting-room. There they laid him down, and rubbed his stiffened limbs, and poured the brandy between his teeth, doing everything to keep or to find the breath of life in him. Not a word was said except when Mrs. Arden whispered her directions to the boys. Philip hushed his cries, and did what he could, looking from the pale face of his father to the face, nearly as pale, of his mother.

It was but half an hour, but to them it seemed long hours, before a faint sign of motion was visible in those closed eyelids, and there was breath in the parted lips.

"O, thank God! thank God!" cried out Mrs. Arden, so wildly that the boys looked at her in alarm. Never before had they seen their mother so excited, so almost beside herself. She had controlled her feelings during the time of suspense, and when all her strength and forethought were needed; but it was deserting her now, and when at last Mr. Arden opened his eyes, and looked round on them, and knew where he was, his wife sank fainting on the floor.

Then of course there was a new fright, and the boys were ready to give up quite. But joy does not kill, and in a few minutes their mother opened her eyes again.

It is useless to try to describe the scene that followed, the joy tempered by terror of what might have been, the thanksgiving, the weeping welcomes. It was not till nearly morning that Mr. Arden could tell them how it happened that he so nearly lost his life. He had reached the town just at evening, and being unable to get a horse to take him out home, had determined to walk. The storm did not seem to be much, and he did not dream of there being snow enough to blind him to the road. He walked and walked, growing tired and drowsy, he struggled to keep up, he strained his eyes to see the home-light, and at length, within sight of it, he fell.

Then Mrs. Arden told her story, too, how fearful she had been, how she had gone to look out, and had heard the dog barking.

You may depend that dog was not forgotten, and if ever any little quadruped was in danger of being eaten up with caresses, it was Silver Arden. For it was that same little Silver grown up.

The next day was not quite as merry as they had expected the welcome home to be; but it was happy and full of thanksgiving. The sun shone out, the snow tossed and played in the light wind, and about noon a great express-wagon came down from town with Mr. Arden's trunks in it. The snow wasn't so very deep in the road, but Mr. Arden had lost his way, and got into a hollow.

One of the first things that was to be done was to have a picture of Silver painted by the very best artist that could be found. And that picture hangs in the Ardens' parlor to this day. Opposite it is a portrait of Phil, taken as he was before his father went away, as he stood with his torn straw hat only half covering his bright brown hair, and held his hands out for a last embrace of his dear little pup, the boy almost as much grieved at parting with him as with his father.

Mr. and Mrs. Arden wouldn't sell either of those pictures for untold money.

MILK AND CABBAGE TREES.

Who would think, from this heading, that we were going to tell of two trees? Yet why not?

The wonderful cow-tree of South America gives a plentiful supply of milk to the Indian of the Cordilleras, and it flourishes at a height where no cow could pasture.

Humboldt, the great traveller, saw many of these trees. They grow on rough, stony ground, their leaves are dry and husky, and for many months of the year not a shower comes to cool their foliage; yet when their trunk is pierced, a sweet, nourishing milk flows forth. "The natives," he says, "come with large wooden vessels to catch the milk, which, as it flows, becomes yellow and thickens at the surface. Some make their abundant meal at the foot of the tree which supplies it, others carry their full vessels home to their children."

The cabbage palm of Surinam is another wonderful plant. It is a very large tree, and rises straight and tapering to a great height, ending in a plume of graceful foliage.

The cabbage lies concealed among the upper leaves. It is as thick as a man's arm, and a few inches longer. It tastes like the almond when eaten raw, but is generally cut up, boiled and served with meat.

There is but one cabbage to a tree, and to obtain it, the tree is cut down.

Think of that! Those hungry Surinam people will cut down a great, lofty, noble tree to obtain a cabbage! It's not likely there are many barrels of sour-kraut made in that country, but both trees show how wonderful is the provision of nature for feeding humanity when the soil is poor or the population in certain districts are too lazy to work.

THE HOUSEKEEPER.

APPLE FRITTERS.—Pare and core some large apples, and cut them into round slices. Soak them in wine, sugar and nutmeg for two or three hours. Make a batter of four eggs, a tablespoonful of milk; thicken with enough flour, stirred in by degrees, to make a batter; mix it two or three hours before it is wanted, that it may be light. Heat some butter in a frying-pan; dip each slice of apple separately into the batter, and fry them brown; sift powdered sugar, and grate nutmeg over them.

INDIAN MEAL MUFFINS.—To a quart of meal pour boiling water, stirring constantly, until a thick batter; let it cool; while warm add a small teacup of butter, a teaspoonful of salt, and a tablespoonful of yeast, with two well beaten eggs; set it in a warm place for two hours, then stir it smooth, and bake in small cakes on a griddle; when one side is a rich brown, turn the other; lay them singly on a hot dish, and serve. These may be made without the yeast, and baked as soon as mixed.

OYSTER FRITTERS.—Blanch some of the largest oysters you can get, but do not let them boil; strain the liquor, and season with cayenne pepper and a few drops of essence of anchovies; make this liquor into a thick batter, using a little cream; have your stewpan, with lard, quite hot; then dip them separately into the batter, and fry them; use silver skewers for them; if not, dish on a napkin and fried parsley.

MUFFINS.—Mix a quart of wheat flour smoothly with a pint and a half of lukewarm milk, half a teacup of yeast, a couple of beaten eggs, a teaspoonful of salt, and a couple of tablespoonfuls of lukewarm melted butter. Set the batter in a warm place to rise. When light, butter your muffin cups, turn in the mixture, and bake the muffins to a light brown.

CLEANING PAPERED WALLS.—The prudent housewife who, on account of "hard times," has decided not to repaper the sitting-room, as desirable, will find the old paper very much improved in appearance, by simply rubbing it well with a flannel cloth dipped in oatmeal.

RICE PIE.—Take one pint of boiling water and a small cup of rice. Boil it until very soft, and then take it from the fire, and add a quart of milk, one nutmeg, and six eggs beaten to a froth; add sugar to the taste, and strain it through a sieve. Bake with an under crust, and, if you like, a few raisins.

COLD VEAL OR CHICKEN PIE.—Lay a crust into a shallow tart dish, and fill it with the following mixture; shred cold veal or fowl, and half the quantity of ham, mostly lean, put to it a little cream, season with white and cayenne pepper, salt, a little nutmeg, and a small piece of shallot chopped as fine as possible; cover with crust, and turn it out of the dish when baked, or bake the crust with a piece of bread to keep it hollow, and warm the mince with a little cream, and pour in.

EGG MINCE PIE.—Take six eggs, boil them hard, then shred them very small; take twice the quantity of suet, and chop it very fine; well wash and pick a pound of currants, shred fine the peel of a lemon, add them with the juice, six spoonfuls of sweet wine, mace, nutmeg, sugar, a very small quantity of salt, orange, lemon, and citron, candied. Cover with a very light paste.

LEMON MINCE PIES.—Take a large lemon, squeeze the juice from it, and boil the outside till it becomes soft enough to beat to a smash; put to it three large apples, four ounces of suet, the same of sugar, and half a pound of currants; add the juice of the lemon, and some candied fruit, the same as for other pies. Make a short crust, and fill the pans in the usual way.

COFFEE CAKE.—One cup of butter, one cup of sugar, three cups of flour, two eggs, half a cup of cold strong coffee, half a teaspoonful of soda, half a nutmeg, half a teaspoonful each of cloves and cinnamon, one small nutmeg, one pound of raisins.

LEMON COOKIES.—One quart of flour, one cup of butter, one pint of sugar, three eggs, one teaspoonful of soda, dissolved in the juice of one lemon, and add the grated rind of the same.

SQUAB PIE.—Cut apples as for other pies, and lay them in rows with mutton chops, shred onions, and sprinkle it among them, and also some sugar.

CURIOUS MATTERS.

THE AFRICAN RHINOCEROS.—The black rhinoceros resembles in general appearance an immense hog; twelve feet and a half long, six feet and a half high, girth eight and a half feet, and of the weight of half a dozen bullocks; its body is smooth, and there is no hair to be seen except at the tops of the ears and the extremity of the tail. The horns of concreted hair, the foremost curved like a sabre, and the second resembling a flattened cone, stand on the nose and above the eyes; in the young animals the foremost horn is the longest, whilst in the old ones they are of equal length, namely, a foot and a half or more; though the older the rhinoceros the shorter are his horns, as they wear them by sharpening them against the trees, and by rooting up the ground with them when in a passion. When the rhinoceros is quietly pursuing his way through his favorite glades of Mimosa bushes (which his hooked upper lip enables him readily to seize, and his powerful grinders to masticate), his horns, fixed loosely in his skin, make a clapping noise by striking one against the other; but on the approach of danger, if his quick ear or keen scent make him aware of the vicinity of the hunter, the head is quickly raised, and the horns stand still and ready for combat on his terrible front. The rhinoceros is often accompanied by a sentinel to give him warning, a beautiful green-backed and blue-winged bird, about the size of a jay, which sits on one of its horns.

SYRIAN SUPERSTITIONS.—It was formerly a custom among the Syrians to bury their dead without the walls of their cities; and at the hour when the body of the deceased was lowered into its last solemn resting-place, a cypress tree was planted at the head of the grave by the nearest relative of the deceased, and he conceived it to be his duty after to furnish a copious supply of pure water and rich soil. The tree was visited weekly by the one who planted it, and often by the whole family, who there scrupulously performed their religious rites. Thus it is that the cypress trees in that country are so numerous, and grow to such an enormous size—some of them being one hundred and twenty feet in height. As their dark and sombre foliage overshadows the tombs of the departed, they furnish a welcome resting-place for the wearied traveller, and present a pleasing contrast to the otherwise bright and joyous scenery of the Holy Land.

MADAME REY'S METHOD.—In the mines of the French Alps a very curious proceeding is adopted, which was invented by a lady, Madame Rey. She would explore the mountain, holding a piece of string, to which was attached a five-franc piece, a piece of lead, or a large copper coin, and pretended that this pendulum vibrated on approaching the vicinity of a lode. She marked with stones the places where this happened, and then connected the point with an imaginary line, saying—"That is the direction of the lode." M. Simonin does not attach much importance to this method—which, indeed, contradicts the law of physics, which asserts that bodies of the same nature mutually repel each other—but he allows that Madame Rey has really discovered hitherto unknown mines.

THE HEART TRANSFIXED BY A NEEDLE.—Professor Biffi, at a meeting of the Milan Institute, presented the heart of a lunatic who had died in consequence of gangrene of the tongue which had supervened upon a bite which he had inflicted upon it during a maniacal paroxysm. At the autopsy a needle six centimetres in length was found in the left ventricle, its point, after perforating the valve, penetrating to the extent of one centimetre and a half into the left auricle. On inquiry being made, it was ascertained that the lunatic, twenty-two months prior to his death, had announced to his relatives that he had forced a needle into his heart; but little attention was paid to his statement, especially as no symptoms of any disorder in the chest manifested themselves, the pulse during all this time, too, being quite regular in its beats.

INDIA RUBBER INEXHAUSTIBLE.—There are in America and Europe more than 150 manufacturing of India rubber articles, employing some 500 operatives each and consuming more than 10,000,000 lbs. of gum a year, and the business is considered to be still in its infancy. Nevertheless, there is no possibility of the demand exceeding the supply. The belt of land around the globe, 500 miles north and 500 miles south of the equator, abounds in trees producing the gum; and they can be tapped, it is said, for twenty successive seasons; forty-three thousand of these trees have been counted in a tract of country thirty miles long and three wide.

FACTS AND FANCIES.

A L-E-E-TLE TOO SMART.—Old Rumpfolt was a well-to-do farmer of Stewart County, Tenn. He was regular in his attendance at court at Dover, but seldom turned his face homeward until he had swallowed more whiskey than his skin could well hold, or his legs conveniently carry. On one occasion he got on his level early, and about the middle of a hot July afternoon started for home. He had not gone far, however, when he was seized with an uncontrollable desire to take a nap. He dismounted from his horse, turned him loose to graze, and rolled himself into a fence corner. He was sleeping very sweetly, when he was espied by a buzzard, which was sailing about in the vicinity, hunting for something to eat. Smaller and smaller grew the circles of the buzzard as he approached his victim, cautiously taking observation. At last, but still in some doubt, the bird lit on the ground near its expected feast. About this time Rumpfolt became aware that something was going on, and he partially opened one eye, and saw the buzzard, but was still too drunk to take any active steps to drive it away. He, however, kept a close watch. The buzzard strutted around and around him, all the time inspecting Rumpfolt closely and cautiously to ascertain positively that he was dead; he finally became satisfied that the corpus before him was indeed a carcass, and consequently "his meat;" whereupon he advanced deliberately to Rumpfolt's head, and gave him a severe peck in the face. This aroused Rumpfolt, and, striking out lazily with his hand to prevent a repetition of the attack, he exclaimed:

"Look 'er here—you're a l-e-e-tle too darned smart—I aint dead yet."

A MODEL NEIGHBOR.—"Mrs. H.," exclaimed a little urchin, on running into a near neighbor's house, "mother wanted me to ask, would ye please lend 'er yer candle-molds?"

The molds were given him, and he ran home. In a few minutes he returned with this query: "Mother wants to know if ye'd be kind enough to lend 'er some wickin'?"

The wicking was measured off, and he again departed. But he soon appeared again, and said:

"Mother would be so thankful if you had a little taller ye'd be so good as to lend her?"

Mrs. H. good-naturedly produced the desired article, and as the boy started for the door, she said:

"Wouldn't your mother like to have me come over and mold the candles for her?"

"Wal, yis," replied the boy. "I reckon she'd like it fust rate, oos she sed she didn't understand it very well; but she don't like to be troublin' her neighbors, so she wouldn't ask ye."

TOO GOOD TO BE LOST.—A returned White Piner of Visalia, tells the following good thing:

"A Dutchman lately left Austin for White Pine with something less than a mule load of provisions, tools and blankets, carrying them on his back. On his arrival, not finding a good lead coming out to meet him, he took on a big disgust and left for Austin, carrying with him his stock in trade. On his way home a man driving an empty wagon overtook him, and seeing him so heavily loaded, asked him if he would get in and ride.

"No, py Got!" was his answer.

"But," said the teamster, "my wagon is empty, and you are perfectly welcome."

"No, py Got!" replied he, "I learns dis Dutchman some tings! I learns him to go to Vite Pines! He carries tese blankets, py tam!"

COULDN'T FOOL HIM.—Soon after the telegraph was put in operation on the line of the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad, in Martin County, one of the natives stepped into the office and wanted to know the price of pork in Cincinnati. In a few moments an answer came, with a charge of thirty-five cents for the information; but the "hoosier" was too smart to be caught that way, and replied:

"O no, Mr. Telegrapher, you can't fool me that way. I'm not so green as you think I am. That darn tickin' thing of yourn haint been out of this room, I watched it all the time!"

BUSINESS AND BIBLES.—Several years ago I was practising law in one of the many beautiful towns in Wisconsin. On every warm day, while seated in my office at work, I was interrupted by the entrance of a boy, the son of one of my clients, who had walked into town, six miles, in a blazing sun, for the purpose of procuring a Bible. He had been told, he said, that there was a place there where they gave them away to people who had no money; he said he had no money, and was very anxious to get one of the good books, and asked me to go with him to the place where they were kept.

Anxious to encourage him in his early piety, I left the brief on which I was engaged, and went over with him to the stand of an old Presbyterian deacon who had the much coveted books in charge. I introduced him to the deacon, telling him the circumstances. He praised the boy very highly; was delighted to see a young man so early seeking after the truth, etc., etc.; and presented him with the best-bound Bible in his collection. Bubby put it in his pocket, and was starting off, when the deacon says:

"Now, my son, that you possess what you so much desired, I suppose that you will feel perfectly happy?"

"Well, I do, old hoss; for, between you and I, I know where I can trade it for a most plaguy good fiddle."

MAGNANIMITY.—One of Sheridan's creditors, after having long and vainly dunned him, at length suggested, that if he could not discharge the principal of the debt, he might, at least, pay the interest.

"No," said the wag; "it is not my interest to pay the principal, nor my principle to pay the interest."

Though he had previously hated the man for his vulgar importunity, it is recorded that he took him into favor from that moment, and actually defrayed the amount of his bill, a rare instance of preference, considering that he seldom discharged any debt till he paid that of nature.

Pleasant enough was the person who, being reproached with not having revenged himself of a caning he had received, exclaimed:

"Sir, I never meddle with what passes behind my back!"

TWO GOOD ONES.—Some one mentioned to us the other day the circumstance of a fat, querulous old fellow who was driven from a stage-coach by passengers whom he had annoyed with his growlings and complainings. A cigar was lighted, when at a preconcocted moment one of the passengers exclaimed:

"For Heaven's sake, sir, put out that fire! I have four pounds of powder in my overcoat pocket!"

"Driver! driver! stop! stop!" exclaimed the victim of this "gunpowder plot." "Let me get out—let me get out! There's a man here with powder in his pockets, and he'll blow us all to the —!"

The complainant "got out" accordingly, in no small hurry, and the passengers thenceforward pursued the even tenor of their way, undisturbed by his further annoyance.

The anecdote reminds us of an occurrence which once took place at the long and picturesque bridge over the Cayuga lake, the middle-western barriers of which success or defeat, in times of political excitement, are now predicated. A wag from Syracuse, who, with some half dozen friends, had been disporting at the pleasant and flourishing village of Seneca Falls, determined, on approaching the toll gate in a sleigh, one stormy winter night, to "run the bridge."

"Lie down, boys," said he, "in the sleigh, and when we get under the gate, groan a little and tremble, but don't overdo it. Here, get under these horse-blankets."

They did so, and when the sleigh came under the picket-draw of the bridge, they began to moan and shake, so that "it was piteous to see and eke to hear."

"I have nothing less than this ten dollar bill," said our wag, handing the gate-keeper a bank note, "but for Heaven's sake change it just as quick as ever you can! I have three friends in the sleigh who are almost dead with the small-pox, and I'm in a—"

"Drive on! drive on!" said the terrified gate-keeper, handing back the bill; "drive on—pay next time."

Above the whistling of the snow-laden wind which swept over the frozen lake, and the trampling of the horses' feet on the bridge that night, the gate-keeper heard the loud laugh of these wags, proclaiming that he had been "taken in and done for!"

A SHOWMAN'S SPEECH.—This, ladies and gentlemen, is the porcupig—the animal which resides in the East Indies. He is remarkable for his shooting, which he does with his pricklers, or quills, which stick out of his body before and behind. He shoots his enemies with his quills, and thus saves his hide. The porcupig is a singular beast. He is fond of keeping himself to himself, and depends upon his sagacity for a livelihood. He has two small eyes, as is observable, and he has four feet; with the one he watches his victim, and with the other he runs away with him. He is said to be of a bad disposition, but I know him well, and he is very amiable. It is true, he is not fond of society—but he is a foreigner, and don't understand our language. If you could only see him eat meal, you would be convinced of his sweet temper. John, stir him up! Ladies, look out for the quills!

The Lord-High-Chamberlain of the King of the Sandwich Islands is an Irishman. When the Duke of Edinburgh recently visited the king, the Irishman disgusted the English prince by appearing at the head of the stairs in full state robes, shouting, "Walk up—come right up—the king's at home."

NEW ZEALAND.

A NEW ZEALAND FESTIVAL.

The group of islands in the South Pacific Ocean, known as New Zealand, consists of three. The coast line of the whole group is 8120 miles in length. The French, Spanish and Dutch claim the discovery of New Zealand, but the English Captain Cook, a century later than claimed by either, took possession of the islands in the name of the British crown, and the British crown has held it ever since. It was, down to Captain Cook's time, a cannibal country, but not entirely from taste, it is said, and upon the introduction of pigs and other animals and vegetables, the man-eating custom died out measurably, though there were, among the New Zealanders, till quite recently, old people who confessed that "the flesh of Ngatiapa is sweet," indicating familiarity. The English, upon taking possession of the new contest, proceeded to divide the country into districts, and appoint officials, and New Zealand became the point of emigration, since shared by Australia and other possessions. The first settlers were European and American sailors, who married the native ladies and took an interest in the soil. This was succeeding 1769, the time of Cook's taking possession.

Under British manipulation the colony has grown prosperous, the natives becoming civilized and, as claimed, Christianized, three-quarters of the natives having become nominally converted. Many own property in ships, are brave, cunning, hospitable, cultivate land; but, Dilke says that, notwithstanding all this, their Christianity is but pretended—that there is much in them that is "tiger-like, and it is in the blood, not to be drawn out by a few years playing at Christianity." The late outbreak between the British and natives proved a test of this. The entire Maori race had been baptized, thousands of natives had attended the schools, hundreds had become communicants and catechists, but in a day the number of native Christians was reduced from thirty thousand to some hundreds. The flocks left their pastors and took to the bush, some coming to the native priests to be baptized out of the church! At present but a few thin congregations remain, and small prospect for improvement or encouragement for the future, for their moral perceptions are not keen—in common parlance, do not see it.

We so recently, in the Magazine, gave a description of the Maories, comprising, of course, all New Zealanders, that we need enter into no lavish account of the country or the people at the present time. But an excellent estimate of the former may be obtained from the accompanying illustration, that presents at a glance, an idea of its luxuriance, and the appearance of one of the native "pahs," or villages. The flora of New Zealand is characterized by the large number of trees—some of immense size—the meagreness of herbaceous plants, and the almost total want of annuals. There are 120 species of indigenous trees, and more than 2000 species of plants have already been discovered, of which 507 species of flowering plants are peculiar to the country. The settlement depicted in our illustration lies on the banks of a river on the north, and largest of the three islands. These villages, planted on some hill or precipice near the coast, or perched on some river's cliff, cover from half an acre to two or three acres of ground. A common pah consists of two or three rows (2 or 3 feet apart) of stout split paling, from 10 to 12 feet high, lashed with flax and creepers to posts and cross-rails. It is entered by narrow posterns, and divided by similar paling into numerous labyrinth-like passages, courts, and squares. The houses are little rush and pile veranda huts, devoid of window, door or chimney. The settlement presents a picturesque appearance, decidedly pastoral, but each community numbers not more than two or three hundred, and these are, notwithstanding all that has been said for the natives, in a chronic state of hostility against the neighboring pahs, which leads to the cultivation of a warlike spirit, that, united, presents serious opposition to the progress of the British troops sent to put them down when in rebellion.

The rebellion arose out of a question about the purchase of land. The Land League, formed by the natives, enacted a law that no land should be sold by any of the native chiefs without the collective consent of the entire body of the members of the League. In 1859, the English governor purchased some land of one of the chiefs. This purchase being, on account of the above enactment, illegal, was objected to by the League; in consequence of which, forcible possession was taken by the military, and, of course, this act resulted, as it would have done in any other country, in a war, in which the British lost numbers of brave men, and sent thousands of untutored savages to their last account. A sort of peace was patched up a year or two ago; but, like all things of the kind conducted under such circumstances, it was hollow and insincere on both sides, and the natives only bided their time to break out into fresh irruptions, which they began as troops burnt a village and met with temporary success, but were forced to retreat, losing several of their best officers from sharpshooters. Things remain in this condition soon as practicable. Steps were taken to quell the outbreak, but three times were the hostile demonstrators met, and their enemies in two instances defeated; in the other the

at the present time, and the main hope the government has of bringing the rebellion to a close is that the rebels will die out. That this fate awaits them the Maoris themselves admit. The word "Pakéha" means a stranger, and one of their songs thus prophesies:

"As the Pakéha fly has driven out the Maori fly,
As the Pakéha grass has killed the Maori grass,
As the Pakéha rat has slain the Maori rat,
As the Pakéha clover has starved the Maori fern,
So will the Pakéha destroy the Maori."

This is literally true, and the British have but to wait to see the last accomplished. The fern root was an especial article of food with the Maoris.

During the visits of Captain Cook to New Zealand, the king of one of the islands invited him to attend a festival of a very novel character. It was of the nature of a harvest home and tributary to the deity of the fields. He accepted the invitation, and on landing, found the people very busy in fixing in an upright position several very long posts, the space between which was filled up with yams and other products of the earth, and as they went on filling it, they fastened pieces of sticks across from post to post at the distance of about every four feet, to climb up by, and also to prevent the posts separating by the weight of the enclosed yams. These layers were continued, until a pyramid was constructed some thirty feet high. Two of these were erected, on the top of one of which they placed two baked hogs, on the other a living pig. No further account is given of the ceremonies of the festival, at that time; but on the late occasion of the visit of the Duke of Edinburgh to New Zealand, the natives gave a similar entertainment, upon a grander scale. The pyramid was extended to some ninety feet, the top of which was decorated with flags and pennants bearing many devices. It was wonderful the celerity with which the structure was accomplished. Each shelf was made a platform for the construction of that above, until the height was gained, and so short was the time consumed that it seemed almost the work of magic. Instead, however, of the central parts holding the yams enclosed, these were hoisted and placed upon the shelves as they arose, and the whole seemed a grand agricultural show, a stupendous altar to the god of the gardens. By our illustration a good idea may be had of these structures. The posts are so arranged that the shelves occupy a position between them, and rest against the central pile, and thus it seems a strong and substantial specimen of native architecture. We would not guarantee one against such a blow as went roaring through our city and vicinity some time ago, unroofing houses and toppling over church steeples, but it would, doubtless stand a pretty good blast.

Apropos of native architecture, quite a number of the churches were designed and erected by the natives and their pulpits are occupied by native clergymen, though, as we have stated, since the trouble with the English, the native audiences have left them.

In one respect New Zealand would be a grand place for Mr. Sumner, and after he has survived his usefulness in the U. S. Senate we should not be surprised, though of course pained, to hear that he had packed his carpet-bag for that country. There is no caste there; every Maori is either a gentleman or a slave. Chiefs are elected by the popular voice; not, indeed, by a show of hands, but by a sort of general agreement of the tribe; but the chief is a political, not a social superior. Caste is impossible where the climate necessitates activity and work. As the Maoris are an emigrant race, they probably began on a footing of equality and have kept so ever since.

A recent traveller in New Zealand thus specifies a few of the Maori peculiarities:

"The life which is passed by New Zealanders is one which we should regard very unenviably, for so long as their appetites are satisfied, so long as they obtain 'utu,' payment for an injury done them, they have little else to trouble them. A great deal of time is spent in the preparation of some kinds of their food, especially fern root, which it is incumbent upon the old ladies of the tribe to pound, prepare, and get ready—not for the table—but for being swallowed in a most tactless but yet gobbling manner. The Maoris, when at their meals, sit, or rather squat, round in groups, the men forming one group by themselves, the women another by themselves; strict silence is observed, and so eager are they on the work before them that, although their meals are of short continuance, a large quantity—quality of provisions matters little—is consumed and disappears off the flax kit or stone on which their repast is spread. Their jaws are well stuffed and crammed whilst they are eating; no forks or knives are employed, though now there are many chiefs of tribes who will produce them if they have occasion to share their food with a pakéha, for the Maories are very willing to be hospitable, provided they consider the stranger deserving of their hospitality. I recollect in one native settlement being highly honored by having a noted chief place his tin plate and rusty knife and fork upon a stone for me, and when I knelt on the ground to eat the 'kumara' (sweet potato), and 'kawal,' a species of fish, I was gradually surrounded by the greater number of the inhabitants of the pah or village; and the most annoying part of my meal was that I had to endure the too close proximity of the dirty Maori children, who gape wonderingly at a white man, particularly when he appears in those districts of New Zealand which the Englishman seldom visits.

"All Maoris, men and women, smoke; the habit is indulged in, without any let or hindrance, and the tobacco used is of their own growth. Each family sows seeds, the plants from which are sufficient to keep them in stock from one year to another; though, of course, natives who can afford the expenditure, will purchase the weed sold by the British. The preparation of the native tobacco is very simple; the leaf is merely plucked when green, its ends twisted, after which the whole is exposed to the sun, till the owner deems it dried properly. Common clay pipes are in the possession of the smallest children, male and female, who run about the paha, invariably naked. Occasionally one will see the faces of these young urchins very bright, owing to their having been rubbed over with a kind of oil, which the natives have a very easy way of obtaining, when they are so successful as to catch a shark, which fish are very abundant in the South Pacific, and often fall victims to them, during their piscatory expeditions. When a shark is brought back to the pah, a portion of the intestines is suspended to the branch of a tree, well exposed to the sun, the heat from which soon converts the solid mass into oleaginous matter, with which the natives smear the carving on the figure-heads of their canoes, carved weapons, spears, or other articles which they may wish to look natty and polished.

"Their dinner takes place about noon, at which meal-water is the chief beverage, but should any rum, or 'wai pero' (dirty water), be offered to the diners, it will not be refused, for drinking is a vice, which tends daily more to decrease the race of Maoris, than any other species of crime. They do not occupy their land as the white settlers do in Australia—one living here, and his next neighbor twenty or thirty miles from him—but they, being of a sociable disposition, club and live together in paha."

AT THE ISLAND OF ICHABOE.

In the year 1851 one of our editorial fraternity found himself at the Cape of Good Hope, in the old ship Clarence of Boston, waiting orders, after discharging a cargo of miscellaneous articles, which consisted of everything that could be thought of, from a fine tooth comb to a plough and grindstone, a mill and patent churn. There were not enough hides to furnish us with a return freight, and as for tallow, our consignee declared he could not find sufficient to slush down our main-topmast had we desired it.

We all hoped that we should be despatched to the Isle of France for a cargo of coffee and sugar, but it was not to be, for one morning the captain informed us that he had been ordered to the island of Ichaboe.

"Where in the name of all that is human is Ichaboe?" every one asked, although truth compels us to say that not quite such refined language was used by the men or the officers when the island was first spoken of.

The captain was appealed to for information. He looked over his charts and then said that the island of Ichaboe was in nearly twenty-seven degrees south latitude, and that it was off the western coast of Africa, about a mile from the main land.

"And what in the name of all that is human are we to ship at Ichaboe?" was the next question.

"Guano," was the answer, as surly as man could speak.

O, what mutterings and groanings we indulged in at the mere thought of what we had to undergo in procuring a cargo of the detestable stuff. For weeks we would have to eat guano, drink guano in all the water that we imbibed, inhale guano with every breath, sleep in guano, and do nothing but think and dream of guano until our ship was loaded.

This valuable manure on the island had but recently been discovered and shipowners were crazy to get a cargo before it was exhausted. There was no help for us. Go we must and go we did, and, after encountering storms and calms, dropped anchor a quarter of and other nationalities being employed to deliver the guano to our boats. It was to be placed in bags and then lowered from platforms, or alided down long ropes, one end a mile from the hated island, which in those days resembled the engravings accompanying this article.

We soon contracted for a cargo, at moderate rates, the Hottentots, Chinese, Malays, fastened to the shore and the other to heavy anchors in deep water. In this manner we were enabled to transport quite a number of loads in the course of the day, when the sea was smooth and the wind light, but we could do nothing in rough weather for fear of wetting the manure, water injuring it so much as to make it worthless.

We were nearly a month in completing our in a while we ventured to the main land and traded with the Hottentots, giving tobacco in exchange for curious shells and trinkets of native manufacture. But we were cargo, and although it was uncomfortable and demoralizing to our feelings yet still we had some rare sport, when labor would permit, in hunting for fresh eggs on the island, and in shooting hair seal for their jackets; and once not sorry when the word was passed forward to "man the windlass" and up anchor. Our old ship was headed for home, and glad enough we were to reach it and be clear of the guano trade forever.

BY B. P. SHILLABER.

O, sweet the prophecy of May!
 Presaging the summer glow,
 And the ripeness that shall strew
 Brown plenty in the autumn day.

Nature's most auspicious hour—
 Time of gladness and of mirth,
 When the struggling germs of earth
 Burst their prison-buds, and flower;

When amid the teeming groves,
 The birds, on ever-moving wing,
 Exalt their melodies and sing
 The same old song of blissful love.

The vernal airs, with breathings bland,
 The messengers of God, speed on,
 And the broad fields their livery don
 Of the unchanged, primeval green.

Upon the hill, the vale, the wood,
 The same fair garniture appears,
 As when, in the first blush of years,
 The mighty Author called it—Good.

The sun streams down with gathering power,
 And, neath its fervid melting beams,
 The earth with joyous beauty teems,
 And sweet perfection crowns the hour.

So in the breast warm currents start,
 Neath ardent love's admitted sway,
 And, through the landscape of its May,
 Pour a full tide to cheer the heart.

Ah! the glad hues that tint the skies,
 When primal love's electric kiss
 Wakes possibilities of bliss,
 And grace and beauty deifies!

The young heart sees fair vistas ope
 In the near future, and youth's dream
 Is sweet as strawberries and cream,
 In bowers lit up with radiant hope!

Then is the meed of beauty placed,
 To crown the majesty whose choice
 Love urges with insidious voice,
 In gracing whom, the flowers are graced.

The wreath bestowed in early youth,
 With the glad ardor of the boy,
 May typify a purer joy,
 In manly love and broader truth.

Rejoice in May! creation beams
 In beauty; let the heart be rife
 With glad emotion and the life
 Be joyous as the unsealed streams.

LORD TIMOTHY DEXTER.

Passengers over the Eastern Railroad observe, at the left, before they enter the city of Newburyport from the west, a large house amid surrounding green, surmounted by a tall cupola, and this bearing the effigy of a huge eagle. Before time is allowed for asking a question concerning it, the train moves by, old adage that "fortune favors fools." Though there appeared to be method in much of his madness, and much that passed for luck seemed really the result of shrewd foresight, he was nevertheless entitled to the motley garb, though he sported black and assumed to be "the first in the east, the first in the west, and the question is rarely asked. This was the residence of Lord Timothy Dexter—a rich and queer combination of shrewdness, ignorance, credulity, self-esteem, imbecility, licentiousness, prodigality—who lived in Newburyport many years, and died, in the house above named, October 26, 1806, at the age of sixty-five.

His life presents a strange catalogue of events, affording another illustration of the and the greatest philosopher of the known world."

Timothy Dexter was born in Malden, near Boston, in the year 1748, and was bred to the leather-dressing business, which business was almost exclusively confined to Charlestown. This was the time when deer, sheep and goatskins were prepared for clothing, and at the period of his apprenticeship, the secret of preparing morocco, similar to that brought from the Levant, was discovered, a part of the monopoly of which Dexter probably enjoyed. Commencing business at twenty-one, he by industry and frugality became thrifty, married the widow of a neighboring leather-dresser, and had accumulated several thousand dollars in specie at the close of the war. At this dark period, when the national paper currency was reduced to a merely nominal value, and it was sacrificed at a ruinous discount, John Hancock and Thomas Russell, Boston merchants, attempted to keep up the public confidence by buying this money, which attracted the attention of young Dexter, for he believed such men would do no unsound act, and he proceeded to invest every cent he possessed, and all that his wife possessed, in purchasing the government scrip that was in the market. All doubt was soon after removed by the funding system of Hamilton, and Dexter had realized a princely fortune, for that day. There is hardly an instance, in our own season of quick fortunes, that can surpass this for rapidity, but the only claim to shrewdness that can be seen in it is in the imitation of Hancock and Russell, that has little more merit than might be claimed for instinct.

With the acquisition of fortune came the craving for distinction, but society of that period was of a kind that no parvenu foot could enter. The accident of wealth gave no entrance card to the merely moneyed, and Dexter found himself shut out. Boston rejected him, Salem treated him worse, if anything, and he alighted, money-bags and all, in Newburyport, which he made the scene of his exalted career. Lands were cheap, and at that time the failure of some merchants who had ventured too largely enabled him to purchase deeply, which he did, buying two "palaces," as they were then regarded, one of which he sold, the other one—that which we see from the car window—he occupied. Here he commenced that career of extravagance, which won for him the title of "Lord," that he, with his craving for prominence, accepted, an account of which he thus gives: "I'm the first Lord in the Yountied States of Amercary Now of Newbury port it is the voise of the peopel and I cant Help it and so let it goue."

To act in a lordly manner, he commenced a course of dissipation and prodigality. His elegant mansion and grounds he at once disfigured by procuring rudely carved figures of great men, whose names were familiar to him, that he placed in the most slightly situations, outraging taste, but at which the vulgar stared and wondered, while the shrewd laughed. His roof was graced, with minarets tipped with gold balls, and everything was resplendent in the glory of bright paint. Directly in front of his door was a Roman arch, on the centre of which stood General Washington in his military garb; on the left, Jefferson, on the right, Adams. Washington alone was covered, as he would allow none other to wear a hat in his presence. He had some reverence, and always took his hat off when he passed the statue of Napoleon, one of the collection. On columns in the garden were figures of Indian chiefs, statesmen, military characters, philosophers—and mythology suggested others—to his artists—who doubtless made a good thing out of it. He adopted a system of changing the names, occasionally, for his statues, in order to give greater variety—thus the William Pitt of one day became the Albert Gallatin of the next. A little paint made all the needed change.

An account of the fate of these images is given in Samuel L. Knapp's life of Dexter published some years since: "These images were all in good repair when Dexter died. The first that time or accident threw down was the gigantic Cornplanter, the mighty progenitor of a race of illustrious sachems. The rest of the columns stood the sunshine and storms until the great September gale, which happened in 1815, when most of them were thrown down in that tornado. The three presidents rode out the storm. The executor of the estate sold the images at auction. The goddess of Fame sold for the most money—she brought five dollars. The image of the great premier of England, William Pitt, was sold for a dollar, and an ecclesiastic who had been named the 'Traveling Preacher' brought only fifty cents." The image of Dexter himself, prominent among the rest, was not bid on at all. It is estimated that the cost of these images exceeded fifteen thousand dollars.

His garden rivalled in elegance the famed garden of Lucullus, and was an object of admiration to thousands of visitors—many, females from the country—and it was a custom with him to insult such as were strangers, under the guise of the greatest liberality in giving them fruit and flowers. He got into frequent trouble on this account. This erotic disposition procured him many severe visitations, and the back of the "first Lord" was again made familiar with vulgar leather, in the form of a bit of green hide.

His family consisted of a wife and two children—a son and daughter, attended by a princely retinue of servants. The dissipation and tyranny of the father affected the whole house. The wife would one day be driven from home with blows, the next paid a large sum to come back. His son was a drunken profligate, his daughter not much better. This house, fitted in the extreme of elegance, hung with curtains that rivalled those of the Hancocks and Otises, became filthy through the domestic orgies that were held in the fine rooms. Vulgar books and paintings denoted the prevailing taste, though extravagant sums were paid for gilt bindings, tawdry frames and more tawdry pictures.

This description of one "unstable as the water," is unpleasant to write, and we therefore give some of the facts illustrating the better side of his character.

He embarked in commerce, and at the close of the Revolutionary War, with the growing energy of the land, there were the rarest facilities for making money, of which it would seem he was capable of taking advantage. He was engaged extensively in trade with all parts of the world, and in all his ventures was successful. And in this connection are given those tales of what is regarded as luck, but which Dexter himself claims, in his quaint and bungling way, as foresight. A captain of one of his vessels wanted some "stay stuff," which Dexter construed to mean whalebone. He purchased all there was in the market, caused a "corner," and made a strike. The purchase of warming pans for the West Indies resulted in the employments of the lids for strainers, the pans for ladles, and a large sum was made. There are other things named that were equally wild; but the one thing that gives character to his shrewdness was his investment in the Newburyport bridge, the construction of which he favored and in which he largely invested. This stock yielded a grand return, the shares in which formed a principal feature in the bequests made in his will. He left two thousand dollars to be put at interest for the benefit of the poor not in the workhouse; and also gave the town of Malden three hundred dollars for a bell, and the sum of two thousand dollars, the interest of which for a hundred years was to be devoted to the support of the gospel.

He had small regard for ministers. He held them to a strict accountability. "I suppose," said he, "they are good men; but I want to know why they don't agree any better? They are always at sword's points, and will not enter each other's pulpits, or hardly nod at each other in the streets." He liked old Parson Milton because he was not afraid to "roast sinners to a crisp" but he had "too much of the Alphin and Omegin" for him. "I wish," said he, to his clock-maker, regarding these ministers, "that you and I had the winding of them up; if we had, they would not tick so loud, and would go better than they do now. His idea of the abstract man, as expressed to the same gentleman, is worthy of the genius of Billings: "I have come to the conclusion, Mr. B., that man is a wonderful toad! Sometimes I think he is a woodchuck, and digs a hole to keep out of sight, until he gets a fair chance at the clover; now he looks to me like a weasel that can creep into a small place to catch a cat; sometimes he is as cunning as a fox, then as stupid as a jackass, and pretty generally I do not know what the d—l to make of him."

He appeared before the world as an author, and published "The Pickle for the Knowing Ones," which contained descriptions of the improvements about his premises and matters personal to himself, occupying a goodly sized pamphlet, but without a punctuation mark from the first page to the last. In a later edition he gives the following direction to the printer: "Fouder mister printer the Nowing ones complane of my book the fust edition had no stops I put A Nuff here and thay may pepper and salt it as they pleser." Then follows a page of stops, quotation marks, etc., for the use of the reader.

The bequests, put to their respective uses, are hardly known even in the towns that were to be the recipients of their benefit; but that given to Newburyport for the aid of those who managed to keep out of the almshouse has an original tone to it that commends it to the reason as a very sound provision, but whether it is employed for the purpose we do not know.

With this we close our account of the life of this singular being, who illustrated in his life the futility of wealth when not judiciously directed. Though he was charitable, the recipient laughed at or pitied him, the thoughtless scoffed, the few were grieved, and when he died there were none to do him reverence. His children died childless, his estate was divided, and there is little that is worth remembering about him.

ABOUT ARABIA.

The land of romance and poetry—the land of thieves and fleas, of hospitality and debasement—is Arabia, with legends of which the ear of youth is beguiled, and genial, good and bad, assume real proportions, and move before the startled eye with the exactness of fact. From the stories of Aladdin we turn to those recitals of cruelty visited upon unfortunate mariners shipwrecked upon the Arabian coast and carried across vast deserts, enduring terrible privations, to sufferings worse than death in Arabian slavery, the fate of “Christian dogs,” whose groans are, or were, delightful music to the ears of the “faithful.” Now, however, although the disposition prevails, there are less means to gratify it, save in universal speculation, and waste may be traced, here and there, particularly near the mountains in the south half of the peninsula, some green spots which receive the benefit of the annual rains; and the valleys, descending from the rain-collecting heights, figure only as so many green lines more or less strongly marked in the dazzling sunburnt prospect. But it is seldom that the tracts of cultivated land, even in the plains, attain a width of twenty miles; so that all the irrigated lowlands, and all the green vales of Arabia taken together, bear but a small proportion to the whole peninsula.

The hypothesis regarding the descent of the Arabians from Ishmael, the son of Abraham, is not fully authenticated; but it is the great desert has been robbed of much of its terror by a better system of navigation, and the presence of Artesian wells that bubble up in the path of travel. Commerce has tended to effect this change, and wrung from Eastern self-complacency the admission that the Christians are really a power and can defend themselves against the inhabitants of the great peninsula.

Notwithstanding all the new facilities, Arabia proper remains almost as much unknown as ever. The treacherous character of the people, the hot climate, the extortion of guides, the stony deserts, the risk of robbery, the danger from religious bigotry, still hold sway in preventing exploration, and the most courageous and indefatigable hesitate before going beyond the coasts or the principal cities. We know, however, that Arabia, taken collectively, is an arid, sun-burnt wilderness; the hills, naked rock; the plains, rough stones or drifting sand. In this dreary shown by ethnologists that they are a divided race. The Ishmaelites were the Bedouins—the wild Arabs of North Arabia—who showed their derivation by adhering to pastoral tastes, entering into their commerce and modes of life; while those of the peninsula revealed quite different predilections, their trade tending to spices, precious stones and gold. These were supposed to have descended from the Queen of Sheba, possessed of refinement and lived in houses, but afterwards being driven from their homes by a great freshet, in consequence of the breaking of a huge dam made for irrigating the country, they went over and conquered their Ishmaelitic occupants, and both degenerated into the unwholesome and dishonest race of to-day.

The “ship of the desert”—the camel—in the early days of commerce, did the exclusive carrying of merchandize between various points, and is a prominent vehicle at the present day. As a means of travel it is most important, for which purpose the Arabian camel is exactly fitted, not being strong enough for heavy freight. Doctor Smith, Bayard Taylor and others have described riding these uncouth beasts, whose appearance is so repulsive but that are to the Arab the most valuable friends, and towards whom the heart of the Bedouin warms as to a bosom companion. The ride upon a camel's back is described by travellers as being very uncomfortable, until long practice renders the motion familiar. It resembles somewhat the pitching of a boat in a short head sea, and a feeling similar to sea-sickness is at first induced. The camel, in almost all cases, constitutes, with his tent, and long guns, the entire property of the wandering Arab, and he knows no want beyond these effects. He lives very abstemiously—a handful of dates and a little oil or honey being sufficient for a day's sustenance—and with opportunity to steal, and a firm trust in Allah, his life is a very simple one. The travel depicted in our illustration, is that of merchants crossing the great Arabian desert, and gives a lively presentment of the performance.

The physical appearance of the Arabs is rather prepossessing, where their habits are cleanly. They possess in general a light, active figure, oval face, regular and finely turned features, and a forehead neatly formed, but somewhat narrow. Their look is bold but often melancholy. Their eyes are very fine, their teeth pearly white, and their complexion a dark olive, though in some sections of the country they are nearly white, and at others, near the sea, nearly black, owing to the mingling of African blood. The ordinary dress of a well-conditioned Arab is a cotton shirt, cotton drawers, and a woollen mantle, which is sometimes exchanged for a blue cotton frock with very wide sleeves. Round the head is bound a fringed kerchief, striped green and red, over which a shawl is worn in winter as a turban. Bedouins often cover their heads only with a lappet of cloth, despising straw hats, which are worn by those who labor. The women, however, who when young have a very engaging appearance, are much fairer than the men, go barefooted, with rings on their toes. Their brows and eyelids are darkened with antimony, the palms of their hands and their nails stained red with henna. For increase of their attractions, they rely chiefly on henna and the scent of jasmine. The married women among the Bedouins wrap themselves, so as to conceal the face, in black cloaks, which leave the arms exposed, and have a very unprepossessing look. The young girls, on the contrary, have but little clothing, and are content to adorn themselves with shells strung together. The women perform all the domestic labor, not enjoying a position at all respectable, or rising anywhere to the dignity of possessing a "sphere." The men pride themselves chiefly on their arms; their jembla or long dagger, their sword, from India or Persia; their light spears, tufted towards the head with horse hair or ostrich feathers; and their matchlocks.

tents in which they live are made of a coarse kind of dark-colored cloth, woven by their own women, drawn over poles fixed in the ground, the larger ones having several compartments so as to have separate rooms for the men, women and domestic animals. They occupy one locality till the pasturage around is exhausted and necessity obliges them to change their position. Rents to the careless Bedouin are of no importance. He squats at will, nor fears the visitation of any remorseless or inordinate landlord. His lease matures with the consumption of the grasses, and he moves without warning, folding his tent and silently stealing away, as we are told by Mr. Longfellow. They have no industry, and are incapable of patient exertion, yet at the recent excavation for the Suez canal they were found able workers, acting, however, capriciously, for they would be held by no rules, and would only work when they were disposed—working night and day while the fever lasted, but abandoning it as soon as the excitement ceased. The care of their few cattle and pillage comprises their almost entire occupation. They are exceedingly hospitable to strangers within their gates, but it does not extend far outside. In entering the tents of the Bedouin or the palace of the pacha, the modes of salutation are formal and verbose—a series of inquiries after the health and happiness of the visitor and all his connections—mere empty forms of speech; but, when eating, an Arab, whether in the house or by the wayside, however scanty and poor may be his food, always presses the wayfarer to join him, and means it. The Arab will cheat his visitor in trade, but never as a guest. He is temperate, too, a virtue in licentious times, and his life is a strange mixture of nobleness, independence, simplicity and craftiness. There are, of course, villages and cities, but the true descendant of Ishmael sticks to his tent. Trade and agriculture demand more stable habitations. Leach, the "Sentimental Idler," speaks of some of these villages: "Instead of being built for convenience on the plain, they were perched high upon the crags commanding it. The people we had passed were a wild, daring-looking set, wearing the long tartush of the Neapolitan brigand, drooping over their white turbans, armed generally with long guns, knives in their sashes, and carrying the knotted club, the universal companion of the Syrian peasant. Half-starved fellows were armed thus, driving along lean donkeys loaded with straw and grain, that would not have been a rich prize for a Chicago rat, and you naturally ask, Why is this poor fellow, clothed in rags, armed thus cap-a-pie? The old answer—blood revenge. Perhaps one of his ancestors, five hundred or a thousand years ago (look ye! these poor wretches can trace back their lineage far enough to make our first families tremble), killed a man—perhaps it was for a stray goat, a pound of camel's hair, a woman, or some such trifle, and that man's family killed another in revenge—then the villages and tribes took it up, and many eyes were taken for many teeth, and no cheeks were smitten but what others were smote again; and thus, from generation to generation, the vendettas have been going on, until just now the Arab stalks about without a shirt, perhaps, but he has a long gun; without shoes—but he possesses a spear; without the wherewithal to appease his hunger—but he still has his knotted club; and if he does not sow nor reap, he at least can fight, and is always prepared for war—war, while he lingers with his goats on the mountain side, with his donkey on the road. Imagination makes the avenger of blood follow him like his shadow, and whole families have been compelled to fly from their home and seek protection among strange tribes."

The towns and cities alone show the march of progress. The Ishmaelite of to-day has changed not for thousands of years—no more than the sphinx of the African desert—and all of civilization that has touched the Arabians is to be found in the cities. The Arabs have a literature, many writers, and poetry is held in high estimation, the one gifted in rhyme being readily welcomed to the tent of the wanderer. Much of this Arabic poetry has been reduced to English by our own townsman Rev. Wm. R. Alger, and has been greatly admired, for its wildness, singular melody of rhythm and beauty of sentiment. The mode of teaching children to read is illustrated in an accompanying engraving. The teacher writes the Arabic letters on a board, and the boys copy them with their fingers in the sand outside the tent. Sometimes they have the board before them, and at other times they are asked to write them from memory. It is a rude sort of a school, and not many of the children get much of an education. The missions, however, have schools, whereat the young are taught by better modes.

The Harpers published, in 1889, a book of Travel in Arabia by "an American," from which we make few selections:

"There exists among them that community of interest and property for which radicals and visionaries contend in civilized society. The property of the tribe is to a great extent common, and their earnings, or the profits of their labor, are shared among the whole. A Bedouin's wives are his own; and as the chastity of woman is guarded by the most sanguinary laws, his children are generally his own; his tent, also, and one or two camels are his, and the rest belong to his tribe. The practical operation of this law is look to find her by the side of her natural lord, giving a richer charm to the hospitality he is extending to a stranger. It would repay one for much of the toil and monotony of a journey in the desert, if, when by chance he found himself at a Bedouin tent, he could be greeted by her sunny smile. Dark and swarthy as she is, and poor and ignorant, it would pay the traveller for many a weary hour to receive his welcome from the lips of an Arabian girl. But this the customs of the tribes forbid. When the stranger approaches not attended with any great difficulty; for, in general, the rest, or that which belongs to the tribe, is nothing; there are no hoarded treasures, no coffers of wealth, the bequests of ancestors, or the gains of enterprise and industry, to excite the cupidity of the avaricious. Poor is the Bedouin born, and poor he dies, and his condition is more than usually prosperous when his poverty does not lead him to the shedding of blood.

"In the tent of the Arabian patriarch, woman, the pride, the ornament, and the charm of domestic life, is the mere household drudge. In vain may one listen for her light footstep, the woman retires; and so completely is she accustomed to this seclusion, that, however closely he may watch, he can never catch her even peeping at him from behind a screen or partition of the tent; curiosity, which in civilized life is so universally imputed to the daughters of Eve, seems entirely unknown to the sex in this wild region. Nor is this the worst of her lot. Even when alone, the wife of the Bedouin is not regarded as his equal; the holy companionship of wedded life has between them no existence. Even when no guest is present, she never eats with him. I have seen the father and sons sit down together, and when they had withdrawn from the tent, the mother and daughters came in to what was left.

"One word as to the hospitality of the Arabs. I had read beautiful descriptions of its manifestations, and in some way or other had gathered up the notion that the Bedouin would be offended by an offer to reward his hospitality with a price; but, feeling naturally anxious not to make a blunder on either side of a question so delicate, I applied to my guide Toualeb for information on the subject.

Toualeb's knowledge of his people for my guide than I should have done by acting upon what I had read in books.

"Among these barren and desolate mountains, there was frequently a small space of ground, near some fountain or deposit of water, known only to the Arabs, capable of producing a scanty crop of grass to pasture a few camels and a small flock of sheep or goats. There the Bedouin pitches his tent, and remains till the scanty product is consumed; and then packs up his household goods, and

His answer was brief and explicit. He said there was no obligation to give or pay, it being the custom of the Bedouins (among friendly tribes) to ask the wayfaring man into his tent, give him food and shelter, and send him on his way in the morning; that I could give or not, as I pleased; but that, if I did not, the hospitable host would wish his lamb alive again; and from the exceeding satisfaction with which that estimable person received my parting gift, I am very sure that in this instance, at least, I did better in taking seeks another pasture-ground. The Bedouins are essentially a pastoral people; their only riches are their flocks and herds, their home is in the wide desert, and they have no local attachments; to-day they pitch their tent among the mountains, to-morrow in the plain; and wherever they plant themselves for the time, all that they have on earth, wife, children, and friends, are immediately around them. In fact, the life of the Bedouin, his appearance and habits, are precisely the same as those of the patriarchs of old."

THE STRUGGLE FOR MAVERICK.

A Dramatic Story....In Three Parts.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

PART SECOND—XI.

THE day that followed the death of Augustus Maverick, and the night of that day, cast the gloom of death over the household, and all that were of it looked and acted as though the solemnity of the occasion received all their thoughts. So it ever is in the presence of this mysterious, dreadful visitor. He may have taken one who was little or nothing in our affections, and whose decease would of itself cast no cloud upon our hearts; but nevertheless it is the voice of Death that has called to us from the silent land, and we pause and step aside from our daily plans and avocations, and give all our attention to the event. So it was at Maverick. The man who had died there was beloved by none, and there were none to weep for him; but all paid respectful deference to the fact that he lay dead in the house, and all the hopes and fears, the doubts and the anxieties which in the minds of those at Maverick were connected with this event were alienated now; and for a brief time the mansion was given up to the silent, solemn presence of death. That day and the night that followed it passed, and another day, till the hour of three o'clock in the afternoon, when the funeral was to be held. The dead master of Maverick lay in his coffin in the front parlor; and seated near it, during almost every hour of the days that it was in the house, were Oliver Maverick and his daughter, conspicuous to all who came to look upon the face of the dead. Their own faces were marked with a degree of sorrow quite unexpected to those who knew the long and bitter estrangement between the brothers; and it was also remarked that the young lady was dressed in deep mourning. The portmanteau that came with them to Maverick had been carefully packed, and, as it seemed, provision made for the event that had now occurred. And under this ban of silence and solemnity the preparations for the funeral were made, the operations of the household were carried on, and its members, or some of them, met at the table, where hardly a glance revealed the emotions that would struggle in their breasts. Mrs. Roesselle had put aside, with such an effort as only such a woman as she is capable of, her own strong feelings, and quietly took charge of the preparations for the funeral. And so carefully had the words and actions of this household been governed for the past few days, that not one of the servants, saving perhaps Toby Small, had gained any inkling of the meaning of many things that seemed strange to the servants. The gardener was quite old now, and almost superannuated; but all his life had been passed at Maverick, and he had been accustomed to observe what passed there. He had seen and known of many strange things occurring at the mansion, more than he had even hinted to his old crony, Roger Brill; and he had never reported anything to anybody until Mrs. Roesselle came to take the housekeeper's place. The old man had an unfailing loyalty to this woman; in his eyes she was the best and kindest lady that ever lived; and thenceforth he was as scrupulous in telling her of things that he thought strange or remarkable, as he had been before careful in withholding such information from everybody.

At three o'clock on the day of the funeral the parlors were filled with the people who came to attend it. There were some friends of Mrs. Roesselle, and some of the old families of the neighborhood, who came out of respect for the old family that they supposed before coming had given its last representative to the great estate. It was a neighborhood much given to concerning itself with other people's affairs, and the landed gentry and their families had speculated much during the last days of Augustus Maverick as to what disposition would be made of his property. The estrangement between the brothers was well known, and it was generally supposed that the estate would be given to some stranger; but when they were ushered into the parlors at Maverick on the day of the funeral, and saw the brother and niece sitting near the coffin, with all the aspect and manner of chief mourners, their opinions changed at once, and they concluded that Oliver Maverick must have received some positive assurance from his brother that his inheritance would not be interfered with. As a consequence, the living Mavericks received many deferential bows, which had before been given to the dead Maverick.

There were no services at the church; Augustus Maverick had never attended worship there, and the good sense of Mrs. Roesselle forbade the inconsistency. She had brought herself after a severe struggle to face Oliver Maverick the morning after the scene at the deathbed, and ask him what particular arrangements he desired to have made for the funeral; but he had begged her to take charge of it, and do what she thought proper.

"I am grievously disturbed, my good Mrs. Roesselle," he said, with a corner of his handkerchief to his eye, and an artificial quaver in his voice. "I do not think my brother recognized me; he left no word, no forgiveness for me. Did he not mention my name in any way during the last day of his life?"

The housekeeper gave him an abrupt "no," and left him, indignant at the exhibition of such hypocrisy. "He might as well throw off the mask now," she thought. "He knows that I understand him; he has no further object to deceive me."

The funeral services were conducted by a clergyman from the city; the same who had performed the marriage and funeral ceremonies of Alvin Roesselle, and who was often invited to officiate among the old families of this region. The resident clergyman assisted. Both knew the character of the deceased, and they wisely refrained from any attempt to smooth over its vices and defects, and to give it any meretricious gloss. They knew as well as those about them that this man had been hard, selfish and sinister, and that his life had been far from a virtuous one; they knew that he had benefited no one by it, and that the community would in fact be better for his death. And therefore what was said over his corpse was put in the form of a lesson to the living, not an eulogium upon the dead.

The coffin was borne out to the hearse; a long procession followed it on foot, for the family tomb was close by. The services there were soon over, and the throng slowly dispersed. The dead was buried; the living could return again to their struggles.

But the clergyman from the city was a guest at the mansion, and he remained there until the following morning. His presence barred the meeting between Oliver Maverick and Mrs. Roesselle, to arrive at an express understanding as to the matters upon which they had been silent since the death of Augustus. It was a meeting that the housekeeper dreaded. He was prepared for it, and she was not. And both of them, in these different frames of mind, labored under constraint until the clergyman had gone on the following morning, and felt a species of relief when he was out of the house.

They had both accompanied him to the door, and when the carriage that was to convey him to the boat drove away, Oliver Maverick said abruptly:

"I wish to talk with you, Mrs. Roesselle. Will you step into the parlor with me?"

The words and the manner in which they were spoken were trifles, but they plainly intimated the assertion of this man to the mastery of the estate.

"In a few moments, sir," the housekeeper calmly replied. "I have something which demands my immediate attention."

He looked at the hall clock.

"The subject that I wished to speak to you about is also one demanding immediate attention," he said. "It is now ten o'clock; shall I see you at half past ten in the parlor?"

"Say eleven," she said. He contracted his brows into a slight frown, but bowed as she passed into her sitting-room. He immediately rejoined his daughter up stairs.

Anna May was accustomed to go into this sitting-room at pleasure, and she had been there at this time for an hour. A few moments before the housekeeper and Oliver Maverick conducted the clergyman to the door Mr. Grayle had sent word to Anna that he would be pleased to see her; and she had directed the servant to conduct him to this room. When Mrs. Roesselle entered it she discovered them seated by a window, earnestly talking together. The gentleman rose as she appeared, and Anna exclaimed:

"We were wanting to see you so much, mother; there is something we want to talk with you about."

"In a little while," the housekeeper replied, and motioned to Mr. Grayle to resume his seat. "In a very little while," she repeated, absently. "I want to think, now." She sat down near the door, and became for a while unconscious of their presence. They glanced furtively toward her as they talked, and continued their conversation in whispers.

In a moment more she rose abruptly, and laid her hand on the door-knob. "I shall be gone but a moment," she explained, as she saw that their eyes followed her. "Please remain here; I want to see you both."

She left the room and hurried up the stairs, through the hall, and to the suite of rooms. They had been locked ever since the body of Augustus Maverick was confined and borne out from them; and until that time, from the moment when he breathed his last in the midst of the alarm that his outcry had occasioned, she had not left the dead-room for a moment. "I wish I had kept them locked all the time," was her bitter thought as she successively opened the doors. "I might have known they would steal it; I was not careful enough. I don't see how it happened; there was dreadful wickedness some way about it; but it did happen, and I know I might have prevented it by greater caution." She sighed and threw open the door of the dead-room. Its air was heavy and disagreeable, for it had not been ventilated, and she threw up the window. Everything remained exactly as it had been left by her upon the morning of the removal of the body. The bed was still disarranged, as when the body of Augustus Maverick, living and dead, had lain on it; she had not permitted any one to make it up. She locked the door behind her, and dragged the bed-clothing in a heap on the floor. She tore off the case from each of the pillows, and searched them eagerly with eyes and hands; she ripped open the pillows at the ends, and explored their contents. Her search was fruitless. Not satisfied, she threw both feather-bed and mattress from the cords, felt under the ticking through the former, and then moved the bedstead back and looked over the carpet where it had stood. And still her anxious search was barren.

She sighed deeply, and threw herself down upon the disordered heap that she had raised in the centre of the room. There was no hope here. The bare possibility that the dying struggles of Augustus Maverick might have forced the envelop into some involuntary concealment about the bed had occurred to her as she sat below, and she had acted immediately upon the ray of hope it afforded, and had in that hope, faint as it was, come up here to search. There was not even a ray of hope left now. The will had undoubtedly been stolen; her wily adversaries were triumphant!

She was alone; she was in no danger of discovery or surprise; and overcome by her misery and her weakness she gave herself up to unrestrained grief. She groaned with anguish; she wept, and tried not to check the flow of her tears; she even prayed in frantic, intemperate supplications, imploring Heaven that the great wrong that was impending might not be permitted. She had found Anna May a beggar, and the triumph of Oliver Maverick must send her forth a beggar again; she had worked and waited with heroic and undaunted courage, through long and weary years, for the day when she could say to Anna, her darling protegee:

"It is all yours, now, it is yours by right, as the only child of Augustus Maverick. Yet it might never have come to you but for me; remember it, my dear, so that you may always love me as I have loved you." Instead of that day, another had come; the black, bitter day when she must say to her darling: "We must leave our dear old home forever, and go out into the world; I know not where. Though you are the daughter and the only child of the man who owned all this, yet the law does not recognize you, the law will deny it to you. I cannot say it; I cannot give it up to them; I cannot leave this place, and bid her leave it with me," were her woful cries, repeated over and over again. "Pity me, Father, and help me to see my way."

The life of this woman, from the moment of her marriage, had been given over to sorrow, and darkness, and mystery; the misery of others had been laid upon her shoulders like a heavy cross, and she had bravely borne it through years of silent suffering; she was no stranger to sorrow, and she had learned in the school of experience to bear its common visitations with equanimity; but this sorrow that racked her as she writhed upon the floor there in that deserted dead-chamber was deeper, more grievous, more penetrating than all.

She grew calmer when the first violence of her distress had passed, and remembering that the moments were passing, and that two separate interviews awaited her below, she arose and arranged her disordered hair and dress, and bathed her face. Her hand was placed upon the door-knob, when she paused a moment for a last thought. Was there really no hope? Was there—was there no way to avoid this dreadful extremity? And suddenly, like a revelation, the thought of Mr. Jenks flashed upon her.

Sometimes, in our very direst extremities, a happy thought comes to relieve us, like the welcome flash from the lighthouse upon the fog-bound mariner on a dangerous coast; and such a thought had come to the relief of Mrs. Roesselle. There was strength and assurance in it, and she eagerly received its suggestion. The revulsion from despair to confident hope was so sudden that tears came to her eyes again; and then a hopeful smile irradiated her still handsome face as she dried them, and resolving to go to the village at once, as soon as she could release herself from her engagements, she passed rapidly into the hall again, and down the stairs.

The parlor door was open, and Oliver Maverick stood within it. "The clock struck eleven some minutes ago, madam," he said, with an air of assumed severity; and he awaited her approach with a frown wrinkling his face.

Before the thought had occurred to her which a moment since had filled her with sanguine hope, Mrs. Roesselle would have allowed the remark and the arrogance of manner that attended it to pass her unchallenged; now, flushed with new strength, this unnecessary and insolent reminder that she was tardy in fulfilling her appointment with the new master of Maverick irritated her beyond control.

"Sir!" she said, indignantly, stepping outside the parlor.

"I have been waiting for you," he said. "I repeat, the clock struck eleven some minutes since."

"And if you will listen, sir, you will hear it strike twelve in about forty minutes," she rejoined. The words were trivial and hasty, and she regretted them at once, because she was not used to speak in this way. Oliver Maverick's withered cheeks colored at the retort, and his voice trembled with anger as he asked abruptly:

"What do you mean?"

Perfectly composed again, the lady replied:

"I meant to intimate that impatience on your part is quite as wrong as tardiness on mine; but I spoke hastily, and was not courteous in my reply. For that, I trust Mr. Maverick will pardon me."

He mumbled something unintelligible, and stood waiting to close the door after she had entered.

"I must beg your indulgence a very little longer, sir," she said. "I have been unable to finish what I had to do when you spoke to me; but I shall not be detained much longer. I am sorry; but it is unavoidable. I will be at your service in ten minutes."

She left him standing in the doorway, almost shaking with rage. The importance to be attached to the ownership of Maverick, and the deference to be paid to the owner, had become fully impressed upon the mind of this man; and he had arisen that morning with the idea prominent of making himself understood to the household, and of peremptorily asserting his authority. His first essay was with the housekeeper, and he now felt as though he had not obtained a large recognition of his authority.

"Damn her insolence!" he muttered, staring at the door through which she had passed and closed again. "Damn her insolence! She's had her way here so long that she thinks she's to have it forever; but I'll get that notion out of her head when I get sight of her again. She can have time enough to pack up and get what's owing to her, and then she and that little impostor that she put up so cleverly to ruin me shall travel. They shall have no more chance for that kind of thing, I promise them!"

He seated himself again, and in mingled anger and impatience awaited the return of Mrs. Roesselle.

XII.

As she entered the sitting-room Roscoe Grayle placed a chair for her near where he and Anna were sitting.

"I wanted to say something to you about what occurred the night that Mr. Maverick died," he said. "I do not know what object you had in keeping those people away from his bedside—although I have my suspicions; and I do not know why they were so anxious to be there, against your wishes—though I have my suspicions about that, too. But—"

Mrs. Roesselle interrupted him.

"It need be no secret from you, Roscoe, nor from Anna; I want you both to know. They are the legal heirs of the deceased; they knew he was almost certain to make a will before his death that would cut them both off. That will was made, and it did cut them off; though I cannot think that either of them absolutely knew the fact, or the contents of the will. They were bent upon getting into that chamber before his death, finding the will, and destroying it. This they expected would put them right again, as the only heirs of Augustus Maverick, and this explains the presence of Laura Maverick in his chamber as we found her there. I do not doubt that she abstracted the will and carried it away with her; and I do not doubt that it was immediately destroyed. It is not to be found, and this is the only presumption."

Anna listened intently; Mr. Grayle nodded.

"That is exactly what I suspected, from what I have seen," he said. "But how was it that we were thrown into such a stupor that she could pass through the room without the knowledge of any of us, and into the sick-room, without the knowledge of the nurse, who sat close by the bed?"

"Have you no suspicion about that, too?" asked the housekeeper.

"Not only a suspicion," the young man instantly replied, "but a certainty that we were all drugged. I know it, because from my feelings when I was aroused by that terrible cry that awoke us all. I knew that a certain preparation of opium had been administered to me. I have some knowledge of drugs, and I have prepared it myself many times; and once I experimented upon myself with it to ascertain what were its effects. I found them to be precisely as we have experienced them. The drug was slow in taking effect, as I have no doubt it was with us, though I do not know when it was administered to us. I was plunged into a very deep sleep, which lasted for about an hour, when a loud shout by another person whom I had previously instructed, instantly awakened me. After what you have told me, I have no doubt that these people possess the secret of compounding this drug—which, by the way, is obtained only from old and rare books, not in general use—and that they administered it to all of us some time before Mr. Maverick's death. But how did they administer it?—what chance did they have?"

Mrs. Roesselle looked thoughtful, and passed her hand over her face.

"I comprehended that it must be as you have said," she answered; "but I have thought little about it since it happened; my mind has been absorbed with other things. We were drugged, certainly; and I know of no chance that they had except by putting it into our tea. But they could not do that without some of the servants being privy to it; and since I dismissed Jerry Small I do not think there is one left who could be bought or tempted in any way to such baseness against me."

"Still," Anna interposed, "I believe it was done then; for, if you will recollect, Mr. Maverick did not come down, and Laura did not drink any tea."

They looked doubtfully at each other. In the light of the facts that Anna recalled, Mrs. Roesselle began to fear that more treachery had been developed among the servants; and before she could say anything more, there was a tapping at the door. Anna opened it, and the housekeeper heard her ask:

"What is it, Ellen?"

"Let me come in, miss, please," was the answer, and one of the kitchen-girls entered. She was much agitated, and only recovered the use of her voice when Mrs. Roesselle kindly said:

"Sit down and get your breath, Ellen, and then you can tell us what the trouble is."

The girl placed in her mistress's hand a rudely folded paper, upon which was scrawled with a pencil, "To Miss Roese." The lady unfolded it and cast her eyes over its contents. Her attention was instantly fixed upon it, and she read it through with repeated exclamations of surprise and pain.

"Ellen, where did you get this?" she asked.

"We found it pinned to Jane Shorey's pillow," the girl replied. "Nobody around the house has seen anything of Jane since the night Mr. Maverick died; and when we tried to get into her room we found it locked. We thought we wouldn't say anything about it for a day or two, if you didn't notice her being away, as I suppose you would at any other time. We thought she'd be back yesterday; but she didn't come, and this morning old Toby said he'd break the lock and see what was the matter, and then we might speak to you. This letter was all we found; and we're afraid Jane has gone off and killed herself."

"There is no reason to think that, Ellen," said Mrs. Roesselle. "She has left us, and has taken a strange way of going. You may tell the servants so."

The girl curtsied and retired; and the housekeeper handed the poor outcast's letter to Mr. Grayle. He read it and then Anna read it; and the three sat in silence for a moment.

"It is all explained now," said the housekeeper. "Poor girl! I pity her, though she has done us a dreadful injury. I wish she had spoken to me before her fright overcame her."

Now for the first time did Mrs. Roesselle understand the desperation of those against whom she contended; and she wished at the same time that she might have understood it better before she allowed the conspirators to occupy the outer room. But regrets were vain, and she was too stout-hearted to give way to them. Her mind quickly returned to the relief that the thought of the lawyer had brought her, and she rose to leave the room, for time pressed; and time at this critical juncture might be of the highest importance.

"There is much about this strange business that I wish to say to both of you," she said; "but it can be better said to-night or to-morrow. You will remember, Roscoe, that I asked you, when you came, to remain here until Mr. Maverick died, as a favor to me."

Mr. Grayle bowed.

"I am not ready yet for you to go. I wish you to stay at least until to-morrow, then—"

She paused and trembled at the thought that her words had invoked. To-morrow—to-morrow! Where would it find Anna and herself? It would, she thought, see the end of this struggle, and somebody established at Maverick as its owner; but whom? Again she put away the troublesome reflection, and continued.

"I can only say that I am not ready for you to go yet, and that we will talk again about it."

"I am quite at your service, Aunt Helen," he replied. "Knowing nothing at all of your arrangements in case this place could no longer be your home (which of course I cannot know), I have been wishing to ask you to take this time to visit my mother, in Maryland. Anna, of course, would come with you; and as I am about ready to return, I will go along and show you the way. Can't you say yes to this?"

"Thank you, Roscoe; to-morrow will tell. I do not know myself whether Maverick is to be the home of Anna and me after to-day; a few hours more will tell. These momentous few hours will claim every particle of my time. I shall go to the village in half an hour; and as I do not wish it to be known where I go, or to excite any remark that may reach Oliver Maverick or his daughter, I shall walk, and go by myself. I should like your company, Roscoe; but for the reason I have named, I cannot have it. I think I can leave the house without being noticed; and if my absence is made the subject of remark, or if any calls are made for me, you will say I am particularly engaged in my room. It is a deception—but the end will justify the means. You will please vacate this room, Anna, and lock the door, that the deception may not be discovered."

Mr. Grayle passed out before her, and walked through the hall. Anna lingered a little, and when he was out of hearing detained the housekeeper by the sleeve.

"One moment, mother," she said, with trembling voice. "There is something else that troubles me, and I must speak of it before you go."

Mrs. Roesselle understood what was coming. She closed the door, and put her arm tenderly about the girl, who laid her head upon her shoulder.

"What is it, Anna?" The housekeeper spoke softly, and smoothed the fair young head with her palm.

"I am almost afraid to say it," was the hesitating reply, and the girl looked around, half frightened. "But I understood Mr. Maverick to say when he was dying, that—that—I was his daughter."

"He said so, Anna."

"Was that true?"

"It was."

She hid her face in her foster-mother's bosom, and the gentle hand never ceased to caress her. She looked up at last, and said:

"It frightens me to think of it. You told me that I was an orphan, and that you took me from the family where the poor-officers had bound me out as a charity-child. I remember when I lived with the Gaunts, and when you came to take me. I never knew a father or a mother, and I never thought either could be living. But since Mr. Maverick died, I have thought what I wish were true, that you might be my mother."

The face of the speaker was raised to that of the housekeeper with an affectionate, pleading look, and a tear stood in the lady's eye. The head was drawn down upon her breast, and both her arms were embracing her.

"I did not tell you that you were an orphan, dear; it was because your own mother died soon after you were born. No, Anna, you are not my daughter by birth; God never gave me any children, and I have more than once thanked him that it was so, that I could be a mother to you."

"You are my mother: I owe everything to you," said the girl gratefully. "My life would have been nothing, or worse than nothing, but for you."

Mrs. Roesselle bent down and kissed her.

"I knew that you were the child of Augustus Maverick," she said; "but he never suspected that I knew it. I kept the truth from you for your own good; because I knew he did not love you as a father, and that he suffered you to be here with me only for a purpose of his own. You will know very soon how this was so, and you will know how faithful I have been to you. Kiss me good-by for a little while, and go to your room and pray to God to send success to my efforts to-day for you."

"Who was my mother?"

The question came abrupt and sudden, and the housekeeper started back as Anna raised her face toward her. Her own face she quickly turned over her shoulder, that the girl might not see how white and scared it grew.

Who was her mother? To what purpose would Mrs. Roesselle obtain a settlement of the rights of this girl under the destroyed will; or to what purpose would these desperate adventurers be driven forth from Maverick, and Anna Maverick (as we must henceforth call her) established as its rightful owner by process of law, if that dreadful, haunting question was to continually arise? And not that question alone; let it once be answered, and the answer would instantly open the way to other questions which Helen Roesselle hoped and prayed might never be asked. Secrets which she hoped were buried in the grave forever; the blame of the dead, which had long lain unknown in the grave; the dreadful story of the past, and the miseries of others which she had silently borne for years—all these things she knew must be dragged into the light, and herself made a witness of them, by the answer of that question—who was this girl's mother?

It must be escaped; how, she could not tell; and she resolutely put away the troublesome question until her return from the village. She kissed the anxious, pleading face that was raised to hers, and replied:

"Your mother was a dear, good woman, who suffered a great deal, and who is now in heaven. Do not ask me to tell you more, my child; you can surely feel that what I hold back from you is for your own good."

The face of Anna Maverick was sorrowful and full of wistful anxiety; but she trustingly returned the kiss of her foster-mother, and the two left the room together. Anna saw her enter the parlor; and seeing that there was no one to observe her, she locked the sitting-room door, and put the key in her pocket.

Oliver Maverick was pacing back and forth through the parlors when the housekeeper came in. He paused as he saw her, and then advanced to within a few feet of where she stood. Their eyes met; he looked arrogant anger upon her; and she (for she could not help it) looked defiance upon him.

"I am at your service, sir," she said.

"You will cease to be, immediately," he retorted, giving a literal turn to her remark. "Please understand, madam, that you are now dealing with the owner of this house and its lands." He paused, evidently expecting a reply; but she made none.

"I shall take immediate possession of this place," he said. "In fact, I consider myself as now virtually in possession. And you will please hand over to me at once the keys of the house, and all the property of the estate in your possession."

The housekeeper continued to look quietly at him.

"Immediately?" she said. "You forget, Mr. Maverick, that I have had entire charge of this house for more than ten years, and that there must be various unsettled accounts between the estate and myself. I have always paid all the servants and kept account of the domestic purchases, and I think you would experience many embarrassments, were I to leave you forthwith, without rendering you a written statement of many important matters. These things should be considered."

Mr. Maverick had overlooked them; and he was forced to confess it.

"I suppose this is necessary," he said, coldly. "How much time do you ask?"

"Only what is necessary. A few hours."

"Then you will be ready to vacate the house to-night, with your daughter and nephew."

The lady felt her anger rising, as well as the insult of the words themselves, as at the tone in which they were conveyed. Most keenly did she feel the unnecessary harshness of this man, who, with his mask of hypocritical politeness thrown aside, was ready to drive her summarily from her old home. She answered with heightened color, and with much warmth.

"This is not just such treatment as I had a right to expect," she said. "I admitted you and your daughter here under circumstances in which most people in my position would have felt it their duty to shut you out, you—"

"I decline to hear anything further on that subject," he interrupted, angrily. "Your language is impertinent, madam; confine yourself to the subject. Name the earliest hour you can leave this house with your friends."

"To-morrow noon," she abruptly replied, stifling her resentment at his treatment. He bowed, and opened the door.

"You will then, in addition to the matters you spoke of, have ready a statement of wages due to yourself and all the house-servants. I shall probably discharge all of them. The management of the farm needs close looking after, and I shall probably discharge Mr. Terry also. The carriage will be ready at twelve o'clock, precisely, to-morrow, to take you and your friends away. You, of course, will avoid giving any directions or instructions about the house between now and then; your functions have already ceased."

He went directly up stairs after these uncourteous words, and communicated to his daughter the result of his interview.

"We shall see the last of them very soon," he said. "And when we are once rid of them, we shall never be troubled by them again. By the way, Laura, I want you to go down into the kitchen and give the servants the necessary instructions about dinner. I will go with you, and inform them that they will now take their orders from you only."

Before they descended on this business Laura looked from her window, and gave a troubled thought to Roscoe Grayle. Would he never disturb her again after he had left Maverick? Would she ever be able, in the enjoyment of her new wealth and station, to entirely expel these harassing thoughts of the man who despised her from her mind? And, since men were proverbially fickle, was it not possible that he would see cause to change his mind when he knew that she was really the mistress of Maverick, and would one day inherit all this wealth from her father?

Musing thus, as she looked from the window, she saw a female in a large black shawl and a large, homely sunbounnet, which hid her face, emerge from the back of the house, swiftly cross the grounds to the stables, and thence pass into the orchards, where she lost sight of her. Her father also saw the figure from where he sat; but neither of them thought the incident an unusual one, and no remark was made upon it. They did not suspect that the woman was Mrs. Roesselle, who in this disguise was making her stealthy visit to the village, by a circuitous route.

XIII.

MRS. ROESSELLE entered through the orchards into a farm road, which passed for a considerable distance through the woods, striking thence across the meadows to a common adjoining the estate, from which the highway was easily accessible. She walked rapidly, and in less than two hours she was at the top of Mr. Jenks's office-stairs in the village, tapping for admission. She heard his voice calling "come in," and she entered. The lawyer was busy with some papers at a desk, with his back to her; but seeing who his visitor was, he immediately left his occupation and hastened to her.

"Good-morning, madam," he said, in a loud, cheery tone. "I am glad to see you here, where you come so rarely. What can I do for you?"

As Mr. Jenks had stated in a former conversation with Mrs. Roesselle, he had known her long and favorably. She, on her part, had the highest esteem for him, both as a lawyer and a man. At the time of the death of her husband she had found it necessary to consult him often about matters pertaining to the little property which was left; and in various ways since, he had befriended her and shown his good-will. She knew, therefore, that she could trust him with the disclosure that she proposed to make, and that she could implicitly rely on his opinion and advice.

Simply prefacing her statement by the remark that she had come to advise with him upon a matter of the very gravest importance—upon which he crossed his legs, put the tips of his fingers together, and dropped his head on his breast, in that attentive way which becomes a habit with professional men—she told him in a straightforward way of some of the late occurrences at Maverick.

Without deeming it necessary to disclose to him that Anna was the child of the Maverick last deceased, she said that from her knowledge of the estrangement of the two men, she had been satisfied for some years that Augustus would never allow Oliver to inherit his property; and she had also good reason to think that when the former made his will, it would be found that Anna was the one chosen to receive it. She described the unexpected coming of the brother and his niece to the mansion, their domestication there, and her discovery of the treachery of Jerry Small. She asked him to remember everything connected with the drawing and execution of the will, and what passed between himself and the brother; which Mrs. Roesselle of course did not know. She then described the means by which the brother and niece were admitted to the outer room; the stupor of herself and the other watchers; the alarm; the discovery of Laura Maverick at the bedside of the dying man, and the discovery of the loss of the will. Lastly, she handed to him, and he read, the letter of Jane Shorey; and concluded by informing him that Oliver Maverick had assumed control of affairs at the house, and warned herself and Anna to leave.

"I comprehend all these startling facts," said the lawyer, when she had finished, "and they amaze me—for several reasons. However, lawyers have no business to be amazed; it is no part of the profession; and we will skip that. I see that a very serious question arises upon these facts; and that I may be sure that I understand exactly what you have come here for this morning, please state it in your own language."

She did state it, briefly and clearly.

"To learn whether the wishes of Augustus Maverick can still be enforced, notwithstanding the loss of that will. In other words, is Anna to be deprived of that immense property, because the will that gives it to her is lost?"

Mr. Jenks nodded.

"That is the exact question that I supposed you would wish to settle," he said. "Before saying anything further, however, let me correct your phraseology a little, and refer to the will in question as something destroyed—not merely lost. You may be certain that this is so. After hearing your statement, it does not admit of a doubt in my mind, that the will was destroyed by these parties within ten minutes after they obtained it."

Mrs. Roesselle instantly agreed with him.

"Very well. Now, putting myself in the place of a jury, I think there can be little or no difference of opinion as to what these facts show. It is all circumstantial evidence, to be sure; but it is strong enough to convict of murder, if that were the charge involved. In fact, I fail to see how it can be distorted to any other conclusion than that these parties, after a course of plotting to that end, deliberately stole and destroyed the will."

"But what is to be the effect of that?" the lady eagerly asked.

For a moment the lawyer evaded a direct reply.

"I think I see one effect of it," he said. "If I correctly remember the law, they have committed a misdemeanor, for which they may be punished; fined, and possibly imprisoned for some months."

Mrs. Roesselle tapped the floor impatiently with her foot.

"I do not care for that," she said. "Any light punishment that could be inflicted on them would do no good. It would not give the property back to Anna; it would not undo this monstrous fraud, and enforce the will of Augustus Maverick. That is my question; how can that be done?"

Mr. Jenks had been thinking all the time that he talked, and the more he thought, the more serious his face became.

"My dear madam," he said, "it is the constant misery of the life of every lawyer who has any heart at all, that, like the humane physician, he is called upon to look upon pain and misery that he is powerless to alleviate. Year after year, as I sit here in this dingy room, I am appealed to by suffering innocence to interfere for it against rapacious fraud, or force, or rascality; and in five cases out of every ten I am appealed to in vain. It is all because of the imperfection of human law. The man who first said that human law was imperfect, uttered a truth that has never been again the less true since it was uttered, and that probably will never be any the less true, to the end of time."

"And this means," the lady faintly said, "that there is no relief for us in this case?"

"It means that I fear it, and what I have said is intended to prepare you for just such a miserable infirmity in the law. Let me examine the statute, however. I would not attempt to give a decided opinion in a matter of this importance without a careful reading of it."

He rose from his chair, and taking down from the shelves a bulky calf-covered volume, he opened it and ran down the index with his eye. Turning to a place in the volume, he read for a moment, paused, thought, read again, and then resumed his seat. Mrs. Roesselle saw in the distress of his sympathizing face that there was no hope; but she waited for him to speak.

"I find it just as I feared," he said. "The law gives the court the power, in cases of wills lost or destroyed by accident or design, to take proof of their execution and validity, and to establish them—subject to certain rules. Those rules should be broad enough to embrace such a meritorious case as this; and they fall short of it. The statute reads all well for us until we approach the close of it; and there we are confronted by these words:*

'But no will shall be allowed to be proved as a lost or destroyed will, unless its provisions shall be clearly and distinctly proved by at least two credible witnesses, a correct copy or draft being deemed equivalent to one witness.'

"You will not fail to remember, madam," the lawyer pursued, "what occurred at the bedside of Augustus Maverick just after we entered the chamber together. There was no one in the room but you and Mr. Maverick and I; and you stepped up to the bed and said, 'Here is the lawyer, sir, come to draw the will.' He opened his eyes, and seemed to understand. 'Will you have any one present but Mr. Jenks?' you asked; and he immediately and very plainly said 'no.' You then left the room, and did not return to it until I called you in to witness the will with me. And I presume you heard nothing of what passed between Mr. Maverick and myself after you left the room."

The housekeeper shook her head in despair.

"The door was shut all the time," she said, "excepting once when you came to ask me if I would be the executrix; and it was shut again just as soon as the few words necessary to the request had passed between us. I know nothing of the contents of the will excepting what you told me in the lower hall, as you were about to leave the house. Will that do?"

The lawyer shook his head.

* The lawyer in the story quotes correctly the law of the State of New York.—ED.

"I am sorry," he said, "that you are without remedy; and as helpless as I am sorry. The law, as you have heard, requires the evidence of at least two witnesses of the contents of the will; and I am the only person who has that knowledge obtained in such a way that the law will permit me to testify to it. The will was not read to you; you know nothing of its contents. I do not think it within the range of possibility, under the circumstances; that the directions that Mr. Maverick gave me for drawing the will were overheard by any person; it is too speculative to suppose anything of the kind. I must be regarded as the only witness who can testify to the provisions of that will. What then? There is not a person of my acquaintance who would not unhesitatingly believe that Augustus Maverick upon his deathbed gave his whole estate to that girl, upon my evidence of the fact; nay, there is not a reasonable person anywhere—there is not a jury that would refuse to give the fact implicit belief; it is a fact beyond all cavil; and the law will not allow it to be established. Why? Simply because it has said that in such cases there must be two witnesses. The law is unbending; it will allow of nothing less; it becomes in this case the shield of villany, the upholder of fraud, the oppressor of the innocent. I am very sorry to say that we can do nothing."

Mr. Jenks rose abruptly with the last words, and hurried away for a glass of water. Mrs. Roesselle was deathly white, and her consciousness seemed leaving her. A little of the water dashed in her face, and a swallow of it, revived her, and with a "thank you," she sat some moments longer, striving to collect her thoughts, and to recover her strength. Mr. Jenks did not disturb her; but when she arose to go, he came forward and gently detained her by the hand.

"I hope you will not go yet, madam," he said. "Although the affairs of your foster-child seem hopeless, so far as this estate is concerned, yet you may need some further counsel and assistance as to your future. I have thought that you would have something further to say to me."

"Not now," she replied, tremulously; and she thanked the kind-hearted lawyer for his sympathy. "To-morrow, perhaps, I may have to consult you again; now I must return."

She went to the door; he held it open for her, and inquired if she was quite strong enough to walk. She told him that she was, and then paused in the doorway. She hesitated and looked away from him; he saw that she was still agitated, but did not see the conflict that was going on in her face.

"Instead of calling upon you, to-morrow," she said, raising her eyes, "I may ask you to come to Maverick."

"I will cheerfully come, to oblige you," he said.

"I will send word in the morning, if I think it necessary," she continued. "And as I have no longer the control of the stables, or of anything else, at the mansion, will you excuse my not sending you a horse?"

"Assuredly, madam. You know I have one myself."

He bowed again, and as she descended the steps, he reentered his office.

XIV.

MRS. ROESSELLE walked on through the streets of the village and along the highway like one stunned and mazed. She was conscious of her interview with the lawyer, and knew what she had heard from him; but she tried to cast the whole matter from her mind, and give it no thought. She realized that on the morrow the last act of the drama of fraud and wickedness at Maverick would be played, and Anna turned away from her own door, unless—and there she halted in her thoughts, and shrank back from the alternative, as the traveller in the darkness shrinks back from the edge of a precipice suddenly revealed to him. Beyond the hope that her interview with the lawyer had destroyed, there had risen before her from the very moment of her discovery of the loss of the will a shadowy hand, pointing as from the grave to a certain way of escape from this network of villany; and from that shadow she turned now, as before, and shudderingly refused to look upon it. She hurried along in the brightness of the warm May sunshine, listening to the songs of the birds, and looking at the flowers that sprang by the wayside, and striving to think of nothing else.

In this way she had completed half the distance back to Maverick, when she became conscious that in her abstraction she had wandered from the public road, and had nearly reached the parish church. Her name was pronounced by some person very near her as she made this discovery; and she saw that she was passing the little habitation of Roger Brill, the old sexton. He was much older than when we last saw him, and his hair fell white over his shoulders. He sat in his accustomed seat on the bench, in front of the house; and he called aloud to her.

"Good evening, Mistress Roesselle," he said. "Wont you stop a moment and tell the old man the news?"

She paused, and then came nearer to him.

"There is no news, Rogér," she said, "since the death and funeral at the mansion."

"Ay, ay," rejoined the garrulous old man, "I heard of it, and I should ha' gone up to the great house, but I'm a trifle rheumatic, and walking is not easy to me. And so another of the Mavericks has gone? I knew him when he was a stout and comely-looking fellow, not much like the skeleton they say he dwindled to before he died. But I've not seen him these ten years and more."

"When was that?" she asked. Her thoughts were absent from the old man's gabble, and her question was idle and almost involuntary.

"'Twas the night of the day that good Parson Roesselle was buried. He came here for the key to the church."

The lady's attention was instantly excited by his answer.

"Did he go into the church?" she asked.

"Ay, mistress; he did."

She drew nearer to him.

"Do you know what he went there for?" she asked.

"No; that's what I couldn't find out, mistress. I went to the church after him, but he'd locked the door, and I saw nothing but the light of his lantern, flashing up and going down in a curious kind of a way."

The woman who listened to this unexpected revelation knew what the object of Augustus Maverick was in making that night visit to the church; and there was another listening to Roger Brill who also knew. A man sitting on the bench by him when Mrs. Roesselle stopped continued to sit there after the two had begun to talk together. The lady merely looked at him once, and then gave him no further attention; but he heard all that passed, and when Roger spoke of the visit to the church he bent towards him with a start. Rising when the old man paused, he approached quite near to the lady, with the remark:

"You do not know me, Mrs. Roesselle."

She looked at his strong, bold features and sunburnt, swarthy face, but saw nothing familiar in it. He was a man of something less than thirty years, with all the evidences of exposure and hardship in his face that years of seafaring and roaming by land are apt to make. Still, it was a frank, open face, and one that carried an assurance that the man could be trusted. His clothing was an odd medley of both seaman's and landsman's costume, and the lower part of his face was covered with a heavy beard.

"If I ever did know you," Mrs. Roesselle replied, "it must have been years ago. I do not know you now."

"And yet," he said, slowly, "you will know me if I speak my name. It is Edson Bayne."

"Edson Bayne!" she repeated; and her eyes were fixed as if with fascination upon his face. She placed a hand upon his shoulder, and eagerly scanned his features. "It is—it is!" she said, and took the hand that he offered. "My God, is this fate, or chance? or is it something more than both? I shall be forced to go as I am driven—to do what I am compelled."

The man looked at her and listened to her words.

"I do not know," he said, "whether or not you can guess what brings me here now. I have become a wanderer from choice, since you last saw me; the ocean is my home, and I am uneasy when I'm away from it. Can you guess what has brought me here?"

Too much agitated to speak, she made an affirmative sign.

"I thought you could," he said. "But I don't know all that has happened since I left this place; I have been pumping old Roger for an hour to learn, and have got little from him yet. Tell me briefly about Augustus Maverick and his doings, and then I may be able to tell what to do."

"Let us step aside, so that Roger cannot hear us," she said; and they walked two or three rods away from him. He watched them, and saw them talking together, the man gesticulating earnestly, and the lady seeming to speak now and then, but for the most part averting her face, and showing unmistakable signs of distress. They talked thus for half an hour, and then they came back again to where they had stood before.

"Can I stay with you all night, Roger?" the sailor asked.

"Bless your heart, Master Edson, yes, if you're willing to put up with my poor place and poor fare," was the reply.

"Then we will be at the mansion by nine o'clock," said Bayne, to Mrs. Roesselle. "You need say nothing to the old man about it; I will bring him with me."

"Had you not better wait till I send you word?" she hesitatingly asked.

"Why wait?" he answered, with impatience. "In plain words, ma'am, I consider you much too squeamish about this business. I can't go back to my ship and be easy, till I've seen the thing righted; and righted it must be. No, madam; your duty is plain. I don't want any signals when I see a craft in distress; I always bear down to relieve it, as quick as I can. I've got a plain story to tell, and I've come just in the nick of time to tell it. So to-morrow, ma'am, at nine o'clock, you'll see me bearing down on the house up yonder, with old Roger in tow."

Mrs. Roesselle sighed and looked at the speaker; and then bidding him good-morning, she walked back to the road, and continued on her way to the mansion. She reached it by the same way she had left it, undiscovered, as then; and meeting Anna in the hall she obtained the key of the sitting-room, and entered it.

"Nothing to-day, my dear child," she said, as Anna followed her into the room. "Leave me to myself, please; bear with me, dear. To-morrow this will be over; and then—"

She stopped abruptly, and pressed her hands to her brow.

"It aches and burns," she said. "But I will bathe it, and it will be well."

"You are sick, mother," Anna anxiously said. "Your face is flushed and your eyes are red; you are excited far beyond your strength. Let me put you to bed and nurse you."

"No, no—not to-day. I am not sick, Anna; I am nervous and excited; but that will soon pass off. Leave me to myself, my child."

Most unwillingly Anna obeyed; and through the day and night that followed the door was locked against all intrusion. Towards night one of the servants tapped and asked that Mrs. Roesselle would take some tea and toast that Miss Anna had prepared for her; but she met with a peremptory refusal, in such a tone of irritation that she could hardly believe that it was the house-keeper that spoke. And at night, when Anna on her way to her chamber tapped at the door, and asked leave to enter, she had only the reply:

"I can't see you now, my child. I am not sick; but I can't see you till morning."

She wanted to be alone; alone with her thoughts; alone with herself, to fight out the terrible struggle between duty and pride, between duty to one dear to her, and shame and disgrace to the good name she bore. She might have looked forward to the morrow impatiently, for the victory that she knew it would bring to Anna, and the discomfiture and defeat with which she knew it would overwhelm the guilty conspirators; but she painfully realized that this victory was now to be reached only through the path of deep reproach to the name that her wedding-ring had given her. She had tried—O, how had she tried—to reach that consummation by another way; but the abstraction of the will effectually barred that way, and left but this one avenue open. She had no choice—she must go on, whether she would or not, for events were hurrying her past her power to control them. The acknowledgment of Anna as his daughter by the dead Maverick; the girl's awakened anxiety to learn the whole truth; the knowledge that she had gained from the lawyer that the will was the same as though never made; the disclosure of the sexton; the astonishing appearance upon the scene of Edson Bayne, and his fixed determination to right a monstrous wrong, so far as he could—all these were as so many positive assurances to her, that whatever might be the consequences to herself, the rights of Anna Maverick must and should be asserted to the world.

The night, when it came, found her down upon her knees, wrestling with herself in prayer, and earnestly beseeching Heaven for light to guide her, and for strength to bear her up. And almost in the words of Him who two thousand years ago prayed at night in the garden, and wrestled with the agony of approaching pain, did she entreat the Hearer of all prayers that her bitter cup might pass from her.

"Spare me this humiliation, my Father! Show me how to do my duty without this sacrifice! Deliver me, O God, from this trial, and let the crimes and errors of the past be mercifully concealed! Not as I will, but as thou wilt, O Father—but spare me—spare me—spare me!"

And by-and-by, when the fervor of her prayer had passed, and she still knelt by her bed, a picture from the past came before her. It was of her home at the pleasant parsonage, years before, and in particular one night in May when she waited tea for her husband; of his return from his parish calls with a man who looked stern and forbidding; and of a secret interview in the study that lasted far into the night, and sent her lonely and almost frightened to her chamber; and of her waking in the morning, and finding that her husband was still absent. How he came into the breakfast-room, haggard and pale, wet through with the rain that had fallen as he paced back and forth outside the house; and of his silence when she tried to learn his trouble. She could not learn it then; but one day it was all revealed to her, with its dreadful import; and from that day her peace had vanished, and this secret of misery had gnawed like a vulture at her heart.

But now her peace came back, her agony was soothed, and the path of duty was made plain. For, as she knelt there and fell into a kind of trance in thinking of the dreadful past, she seemed to feel that Alvin Roesselle stood by her side, with a blessed, cheerful smile upon his face, where she had been wont to see nothing but pain, and sorrow, and remorse; that he laid his hands upon her head, though she could not feel them, and bade her go fearlessly on and protect the innocent.

"Nothing can harm me now," were the words she seemed to hear; "and one day God will reward you, dear wife, for all that you suffer now."

And so peace came at last to her bruised heart. She slept the night through peacefully; and the hours brought on the morning when the mystery was to be revealed, and Maverick given to its true owner.

PARTED.

BY MATTIE WINFIELD TORREY.

So far from thee, my love, so far!
The weary miles of distance are Between us like a fateful bar.

We cannot cross the dreary space,
I cannot see thee face to face,
Thy well-remembered features trace.

The endless years still come and go,
Their weary moments dragging slow
Across a life o'er-full of woe.

So far from thee! My soul is rent
With pain and growing discontent,
Till with the conflict I am spent.

How dark the future looks! Afar
My lost hopes glimmer like a star;
High out of reach the blessings are.

So thou art happy, naught care I
How slow so e'er the moments fly,
When youth and hope shall pass me by.

So far! O Fate, thy cruel blow
Hath lain the dreams of manhood low,
And quenched ambition's richest glow.

I grieve that all my days should run
To waste, and that beneath the sun
There lies no hope that may be won.

The days go on! Unto the past
Whose haunting memories hold me fast,
I turn for happiness at last.

UNEARTHED.

BY ESTHER SERLE KENNETH.

ONCE in a while there occurs, in real life, an episode which outrivals all the imaginary tales that ever were written.

Somewhere between New York and Maine are the remnants of an old town. Most of the old people have died; the few children born there have gone away. The residents dwell like hermits in their antiquated houses among their moss-grown orchards, knowing absolutely nothing of the march of time save as marked by additions to the stones of their hillside graveyard. Telegrams and express trains are legends to them. Once a week a yellow old stage-coach rumbles through the grassy lanes and quiet streets, bringing a few letters, and sometimes, out of the unknown, fable-like world, a son or daughter, who has "come home," for a visit. In the spring the ploughmen make a faint stir of life. The blue-birds come earlier and stay later than elsewhere. There is no hand lifted against them; they bask in the old cherry trees unmolested. The cattle linger, on their way to the pasture, to crop the lush grass in the shadows of the roadside elms. Once a week, an aged man, who lives by the river, draws a handcart of fish through the old town, calling customers by the blatant echoes of a tin horn. The silence of pasture, wood and grassy doorway is seldom broken save by a whistle of a herd's-boy, or the lowing of a cow.

Here lived old Peter Felix and his grandchild Salome. They resided on the outskirts of the town, in a poor hut, situated in so remote a spot that the other residents of the place seldom saw them. But if you had asked about these people, you would have been told that old Felix was a Jew, and in spite of the old shanty, that he had plenty of gold. Probably the story of his wealth was not true, but that Salome's beauty was of the Jewish type was unmistakable. Her great black eyes, the shower of dark curls, the small, voluptuous mouth, and the deeply stained cheek were Ishmaelitic. She was fifteen years old, and innocent as the birds whose songs she mocked. She had lived here ever since she could remember; the old hut was all the home she knew.

Less known than these people was a man who lived in a house called "The Castle," in the woods. It was a large stone building, so old that the woods had grown up around it and shut it out from the rest of the world. That man, who was called Stacy, had lived there for six or seven years. He was seldom seen. Some people said that he was a good-looking man of about forty, others declared that he was grizzled, aged and frightful. He had a servant, who was seen, sometimes, hunting for his cow, and the servant's name was said to be Duval. The master never came into the town, and no one ever visited the Castle.

One day Salome's linnet flew from its cage. She called to it, but it would not return. Step by step it led her out of the garden into the woods.

It was spring weather. Other linnets were singing in the trees. The tame bird fluttered to the branches of an oak, and called for a mate. In vain the young girl sought to allure it. Nature was stronger than habit. The linnet flew higher and sang more sweetly. At length it took to wing again.

Panting with apprehension, the girl followed, winding through the trees, leaping over brooks and stones—tearing her clothing on the shrubs and thorny vines. Now and then she would lose sight of the linnet; again she would see him sporting across her path. All at once he rose in a swift, unerring flight, and was lost from her sight over the tops of the trees. At that moment darkness fell, and Salome, looking around, found she was lost.

Never before in her life had she penetrated the woods to this depth. Everything looked solemn and strange. The bird songs died with the fading light, and all was very still. A little rivulet trickled through the leaves at her feet.

"I will follow the water," said the girl, bravely.

She followed the streamlet until it became so dark that she could not see it sparkling among the leaves. She put down her hand, and found that it had not stopped, but she could not see to trace its course any further.

At first she was very much frightened, but the stars had come out and were looking down on her so peacefully that she grew assured and began to feel safe. The dew drew out the many faint fragrances of the woods, and made the air very sweet. So, at length, Salome crept into a bed of fallen leaves, under the low branches of a shrub oak, and prepared to spend the night there.

"I can sleep here very well," she said; "and in the morning I can find my way home."

She was tired and slept soundly all night in her strange bed. At last the red beams of the sun penetrated to her resting-place, and made her stir uneasily. At length she opened her eyes, and found a horrible old man kneeling on the grass beside her, looking eagerly at her. With a scream she started to her feet.

"Mam'selle need not fear old Duval," said the old man, with a horrible grin. "He thought he had found one little wood-nymph."

"I am Salome Felix," said the girl. "I got lost last night, in the woods, and could not find my way home. Will you show me the path?"

"Out—out!" said the old man, "let mam'selle follow me."

He led the way. He was stunted, twisted and yellow. He limped. In his hand he carried a great ox-goad. He looked at Salome now and then, with his hideous grin.

"He is repulsive," thought Salome, "but I need not care, if he shows me the way home."

The sun shone like gold into the woods; all the little birds were carolling. They crushed the fragrant wild violets beneath their feet.

They continued to walk until the beams of the sun became hot, and Salome was very tired.

"I did not think I wandered so far last night," said she; "but, indeed, one thinks of nothing else when they are chasing a lost linnet."

Her face was so bright and sweet that the old man bent upon her another of his frightful grins.

They walked on. They met the little streamlet again which was glittering like a chain of diamonds among the brown leaves.

"Will not the streamlet lead us out?" she asked.

"No," said the old man.

Though it was getting towards noon, the way seemed growing dimmer, instead of brighter. The trees stood close, and wove their branches into a great net-work overhead. This cast a green light on the face of the old man and made him look more ugly than ever.

"I am getting tired," said Salome, at length.

The old man stopped and looked at her with a strange look.

"Is mam'selle weary at last? Ah well, then, suppose we stop at my house and get a little rest, before we go on?"

"And I am very hungry," said Salome, ready to cry.

"So? I will give mam'selle some bread and a cup of milk before we go on."

"Well," said Salome, faintly, "if your house is not very far."

"It is not very far," said the old man, grinning, and nodding his wicked old head.

He turned abruptly and came to a strong wooden gate behind a hedge of yew trees. He unlocked this gate, and pushed the way through a narrow path, bordered with high shrubs, to some stone steps that led to a low door in a large building. He unlocked this door which was of iron, and grated on its hinges, and led the way into a large low room where there was a bed, and a table, and a chair. On the table were the remnants of a meal—a roasted rabbit on a platter, and some bread. Though it was May, a little fire, smouldering on the hearth, was very welcome the air of the low room was so chill. As soon as the old man and Salome entered this apartment, the place echoed with the baying of a great bloodhound which was chained to a kennel in a corner, and whose heavy black muzzle and bloodshot eyes were frightful to the young girl.

"O, I dare not stay," she cried. Just then she heard the responsive barking of other dogs from other parts of the house.

"Mam'selle need not fear," said the old man. "Lie down, Turk!"

The dog slunk into his kennel, as the old wretch lifted his ox-goad, and all the barking gradually ceased.

"Come and eat," said old Duval, bringing a clean plate and knife from a corner cupboard for the young girl.

Salome's hunger had vanished, but she managed to swallow a little bread. She noticed that though the plate and knife were coarse, the goblet for water was of fine, pure silver, beautifully enriched with molten roses. She thought it a very strange place; she was uneasy, and rose, at last, to go away. But the old man had gone, and had taken the dog in his chain with him.

She sat down to wait for his return. A very pleasant smell, as from a garden, came in at the open door. A beautiful butterfly—all purple and black and gold—followed the rays of sunshine in, and sported around her. A rosebush had shed its red petals at the top of the stone steps, and they blew in and danced over the floor.

Salome waited and listened, thinking this a queer place to which she had come. She had never heard of "the Castle." Now and then she thought she heard steps in a room above, but the moments crept by, the sunshine withdrew from the room, and no one came. She began to tremble with cold and fear. This was worse than being lost in the woods.

She kindled more fire, but she left the door open, for she could not bear to shut herself into that lonesome room. The stars and the singing of the garden insects seemed company. She was familiar with both. But at length a great bat flew into the room, and beat about her head until she screamed, and when he flitted out, was glad to close the door on him.

She sat on the hearth and fed the fire, and wondered where she was, and who the old man was, and what her poor old grandfather would think, crying over her troubles, for a long time. But she was very weary, and became sleepy. She looked wistfully at the pallet, covered with warm blankets, but she feared to go to sleep. The horrible old man, the dogs, the lonely house, inspired her with vague suspicions of evil. Of the two, she had rather have slept unsheltered in the forest; but at length fear gave way before exhaustion, and throwing herself upon the low bed, the girl fell into a heavy slumber.

When she awoke in the morning, she saw upon the table a tray laden with steaming food. The service which contained the viands was of fine porcelain; the cups were of gold and silver. A fire was also burning upon the hearth.

Approaching the table, the half-famished girl drank of the chocolate, and ate of the fine wheaten rolls.

"The old man has come back," she thought, "but if he does not appear, when I have finished my breakfast, I will go forth alone. I had far rather wander in the woods than to be confined here."

But when she had eaten her breakfast, the old man did not come, and she opened the great door, and ascended the stone steps in the garden. All was fresh, dewy and sparkling in the morning sun. But the spot was very still; the songs of the birds seemed distant.

Half fearfully Salome passed down the path before her. It was choked with rank cypress vines, and she had not gone far before a rabbit ran before her feet. The path grew narrower, for the thicket of shrubbery on either side met and tangled and blocked the way. At last it grew so dense that she was forced to pause and turn back to find another path.

This one she noticed as opening to the right of the stone steps, but she could not tell which one she had come by. She went but a short distance on it, and found it choked up by a thorny vine. On turning to go back, she found another path leading from it. She followed this for a long way, but it led into another that looked so wild and dark, under a line of yew trees, that she hesitated.

"Do you find your walk pleasant?" asked a voice, near her.

She started in affright, and turning, saw a man emerging from the shrubbery. He was handsome but for a reckless, unkempt look he had, as if he slept in his clothes, and never combed his hair. It was matted in thick black curls on his shoulders. He had a bunch of roses in his hand which he offered to the young girl, while his eyes sparkled strangely.

"I wish to find my way out of this garden," said Salome, in a trembling voice.

"You are not in a pleasant part of it," said the man. "Come with me."

Parting the tangled shrubbery with his hands, he opened a way to a green glade enclosed by locust trees in blossom. Here was a fountain, beds of flowers and some seats.

"Sit down and rest, you must be tired," he said.

"No," Salome said, "I cannot stay. I have been lost from home since day before yesterday. An old man offered to show me the way, and brought me here. Now I cannot find my way out."

"But would you not like to stay here?" asked the strange man. "You have not seen yet the pleasant rooms which this house contains. It is quite an abode of luxury."

"I want to go home," said Salome.

"But your home is poor and mean. If you will consent to stay here, you shall have all the comforts that money can buy."

"No, no," said Salome, fearfully.

"But you must stay here," said the man, his eyes beginning to glitter irefully. "My servant brought you here to please me. I intend that you shall remain, and you may as well consent as to oppose me."

Salome burst into tears. The man drew near to comfort her, but she sprang from him in affright.

"O, please let me go to my grandfather," she begged.

"Why, how foolish you are!" said the man. "How can you desire to return to that wretched hovel? Here you can have ease and luxury. You can have anything you like, provided you do not make a noise to attract people's attention to us. I will devote my life to making you happy."

But Salome only wept and trembled.

"If you are anxious about your grandfather I will send Duval to say that you are well and happy, and to carry him a bag of gold," said her companion.

"O, let me go home!" prayed Salome.

"Take care! do not try my patience too far," exclaimed the man.

Salome hushed her sobs for fright, and stood with her face hidden.

"Will you consent?" asked the man.

She trembled, but shook her head.

"I will leave you to yourself for a while," he said, angrily, and strode off.

When Salome found herself alone, she darted away from the spot, and with beating heart and streaming eyes sought to find egress from that hated garden. In vain she hurried to and fro, tearing her clothes and wounding her hands among the thorns and briars. The garden seemed one dense, overgrown wilderness; the paths leading one into another, never terminated at the gate by which she had entered. At length she threw herself down upon a bed of flowering moss and cried bitterly.

As the day wore away her dread and terror increased. How could she spend another night under that hated roof? Again she started on a fruitless search, to pause exhausted, as the evening gathered, where the rank shrubbery, close as a wall, shot up around her. If she could only escape to the woods! Their loneliness seemed comparative safety to her, as she stood listening and shivering at the faint noises of the garden.

The stars came out again; the dews crept dark and chill around her. With pallid face and sobbing breath she wandered on until she came to the stone steps and the open door.

She knelt down here and prayed, and then fell asleep with her face against the cold stones. At midnight she awoke, and after listening to the stillness for a little while, crept into the little bed, and slumbered more sweetly.

When she awoke, she forced herself to eat the remnants of yesterday's meal. She felt weak and ill, and the room seemed turning around to her. She went out into the air, and sat down upon a stone bench under a tree. The fresh air revived her. She buried her face in her hands and prayed for deliverance.

All at once she saw the man who inspired her so with terror standing among the shrubbery, and watching her. He approached her slowly.

"Will you consent to live here with me?" he asked.

"No, never!" she answered.

He laughed, cruelly, and turned away.

She remained in the garden all day. At night she slept, unmolested, upon the pallet.

In the morning she ate a little bread that was left upon the table. Another day she spent wandering in the garden, but she was weak from much weeping and insufficient food; and at dark lay down to the deep slumbers of exhaustion.

She rose again, but she had no food. The terrible suspicion that the master of this, her prison, meant to starve her to a compliance to his wishes, came over her. With a shudder, she lay down again, quite too ill now to bear the violence of her emotions. She lay shuddering with cold and illness.

A biting thirst and a bitter hunger came over her. Her lips were parched, her tongue was swollen. A burning fever succeeded her chill. Rising from the couch, she staggered to the table, took therefrom a goblet, and crept up the stone steps. She wandered on in search of the fountain.

At length she heard it running over its basin, and though her heart beat quickly with fear, dreading lest she should meet the master of the garden, she crossed the sunny glade, and dipping the goblet in the basin, drank with feverish eagerness.

For a few moments she seemed stronger. Observing a small summer-house beneath the locusts she entered it.

The walls were of lattice-work, and it had a door at either end. A luxuriant grape-vine clambering over the roof, made the place dim and cool. At first she did not see that the place was occupied. She sank into a seat, discovering at the moment a table containing books, glasses and a dish of strawberries—and before she was hardly seated the figure of a man rose from the bench where he was lying. With a cry she started to her feet.

"Sit down—you need not run, for you cannot run away from me," said the tyrant. "You hardly look as fierce as you did yesterday morning."

She sat passive, almost fainting. Her companion drew a seat to her side, smiling slyly as he observed how instinctively she shrank from him.

"Not tamed yet? How obstinate beautiful women are! My maid, Nanette, who is old and ugly, would give more than her life for a diamond like this;" and as he spoke he slipped a massive and beautiful ring upon her little cold hand.

"I am ill and hungry," moaned Salome.

"You have only to promise to be mine, to have instantly the daintiest food and richest wine brought to your hand."

She turned her face from him. The next moment she felt his arms glide around her. With a strength given of terror, she wrenched herself from his embrace, striking him, with her small clenched hand, full in the face.

"Little fool!" he hissed, glowing with anger.

He would have said more, but for a sharp sound at the end of the summer-house, like the click of a lock. With a vengeful look at the vibrating frame and pallid face of the girl, he turned to see what occasioned the noise. Suddenly the baying of the great bloodhound sounded in the garden. The man paused, turned pale; trembled. He suddenly sprang to the other door, but staggered back, for a colossal form towered in the entrance. A huge man, dressed only in dusty, ragged vestments, his eyes like coals of fire, his air weary and resolute, came, step by step, towards Salome's tormentor who retreated before him.

"Coward! traitor! murderer!" he said, in a low, intense voice. "Do you know me, then? I know you only too well. Do I not know the man who betrayed my trust, seduced my wife, and robbed me of my hard earnings? Let this witness that I set my seal upon him;" and the swish of a knife, driven into flesh, turned the horrified girl faint.

A pool of blood ran across the floor; her tormentor lay in it. The stranger discharged a pistol full in the face of the prostrate man, turned, and left the summer-house.

He strode away. Salome watched him go. A moment after she heard a horse galloping through the wood. She hesitated an instant, glanced at the dead man upon the floor, and ran after.

The path by which the intruder had gone led straight to the open gate. She flew out into the open wood. She ran on till she found wheel ruts. She followed them for more than a mile. At length she emerged upon an open road. She was miles from home, but a good-natured carter took her up and brought her to her grandfather's door.

Salome's strange story spread far and wide. A party was made up to investigate the matter. Suspecting that the "Castle" was the scene of these strange deeds, they proceeded thither. The dead body was found in the summer-house, the "Castle" had been deserted by the servants who had evidently taken away many valuables. Some money and many rich articles were found in the rooms. Fortunately the dogs, who bayed furiously at this intrusion, were chained. As they were discovered to be all of the pure bloodhound breed, they were fed and appropriated by new owners. The furniture was sold to defray the burial expenses of the corpse, which was laid in a nameless grave.

In the course of fifty years more the "Castle" crumbled to the ground. The murderer was never discovered, but many old legends concerning him cling around the spot.

MY MIRACULOUS ESCAPES.

BY SELF SHARPNER.

I HAVE read of many narrow escapes, both by sea and land, from bloody pirates, or engulfing waves, of the one, and merciless savages, or wild beasts, of the other. With a shudder I recall my own experience, to which, after a lapse of nearly a score of years, I cannot look back, without thanking a kind Providence for my remarkable preservation.

In the year 1853, I took passage on board a ship at San Francisco, California, for the Isthmus, on my way home from the gold mines. Our ship, the Ida, carried some two hundred passengers, mostly returning miners. Some like myself had been unsuccessful, whilst others had gathered rich rewards from the golden sands.

According to the old adage, "a good beginning makes a bad ending," we might have been prepared for ill luck, for a vessel never left her port with a brighter prospect than did ours.

It was a beautiful balmy morning in September, with just breeze enough to fill the sails; a day to make one feel young and buoyant, and glad that he is amid the living to enjoy it. How grandly we sailed out into the beautiful bay. In fancy I can yet see the crowd upon the wharf, and the waving of hats and handkerchiefs, as they bade us a silent farewell. How gloriously we passed through the "Golden Gates," those portals through which the wealth and expectations of nations have gone and come; those guardian sentinels that stand to protect the most beautiful bay in the world.

Our voyage for the first half of the way was most cheerful and prosperous, but as we sailed into the tropics storms began, light at first, but each succeeding one grew more severe. They came on with a regularity seldom equalled, until we could almost certainly expect one every evening. They sometimes gave us little warning, and several times our vessel was in danger of capsizing, or being thrown upon her beam-ends; then any fluttering or neglect of duty might have been fatal to her living freight. Had it not been for one of these storms, and my own carelessness, I perhaps would not have this story to relate.

It is said "familiarity breeds contempt." I think this was true with me. I was a great coward, during the first bad weather, but I gradually became accustomed to it, so that I kept on deck during some of the worst hurricanes we had, and I enjoyed the sight of the wild warring elements, watching our noble tars as they kept the vessel taut and trim in the midst of the howling storm.

On the eve of the twenty-third of September, well do I remember the date, a hurricane came on just at dusk. I hastened on deck, without any premonition of what was to follow. The crew had taken in nearly all the sails, and we were scudding along under bare poles, at the rate of seven or eight knots an hour, through the angry storm; red, blue and yellow lightning was playing and darting athwart the stormy sky; great drops of icy rain struck me in the face; I grasped the gunwale tightly to secure myself; the mate was issuing some orders to the crew, this I well remember. The next instant I was overboard in the foaming, seething waters, whether from a sudden lurch of the ship, or my hold giving way, I know not. Upon rising to the surface, I distinctly heard the cry above the noisy elements, of "man overboard, man the boats!" and saw the vessel fast leaving me to my fate, until the waves and darkness hid her forever from my view. I was an excellent swimmer. I swam towards the fast receding ship with all the strength I could exert, in hopes that the boats, if searching, would find and take me in. Vain hope, futile exertions! If they ever tried to find me I know not. I soon became so exhausted that I ceased all attempts in that direction, and gave up all hopes of being rescued by my late comrades. Something struck me on the head, knocking me nearly senseless, I grasped it—it was a thick, heavy plank, eighteen inches in width, and about ten feet in length. I got upon it—it buoyed me up sufficiently to rest myself without making much exertion to keep my head above the water.

I could now review my situation; awful indeed did it appear to me—the glowering darkness, vivid flashes of lightning, and the furious driving storm. I knew my late comrades were far from my reach, and I could not blame them for it, for I doubted if a boat could live in the gale, much less could the ship lay to, to enable them to search for me; and they had probably done all they could to save me in throwing the plank overboard that I now rested upon. I thought it might be only a question of time between my loss and theirs, for if the hurricane continued long it would drive them upon a rocky coast, which would prove fatal to them and the vessel. These thoughts passed through my mind as I tossed upon the angry waves, a hopeless castaway.

How I passed that dreadful night I can scarcely remember. The morning broke clear and bright, the storm was over, but the waves ran mountains high. With my plank yet under me I was sometimes on the pinnacle of the topmost of them, and again deep down in the trough of the sea. Soon as it was light enough, from the highest waves I looked eagerly around. Not a sail was in sight, nothing but the wide expanse of rolling, heaving waters. My spirits sank, for until now I had a faint hope that a vessel, in passing, or a sight of land would greet my eyes. Vain expectations! I prayed and cursed by spells until I was nearly crazed and almost exhausted. Thus time passed, and I grew calm—the calmness born of despair.

About the middle of the day, from the highest waves I tossed upon I thought I could see land, looking like mountain tops. I could not clearly determine, they might be clouds, and now how anxiously I watched for them. After an agonizing interval of several hours, again I saw them; this time I was sure it was land, thrice blessed land! But now the question arose, "can I reach it alive?" This seemed very doubtful. I was cold even under a tropical sun; I was nearly famished from my long fast. Hunger and thirst, with my exertions, had almost exhausted me. Life was dear to me, and I would exert my utmost to reach land, even though it be a rocky, barren coast. Slowly I struggled onward with my plank yet under me. I dared not give it up for fear I should sink to rise no more. Just before daylight faded away I could see land plainly, and I fancied I saw trees growing along the shore, yet I was not sure but it might be imagination.

Kind Providence seemed to favor me, for a strong wind began to blow towards the land. I now made a much better headway, but another difficulty now beset me. I could not keep awake; tired and wornout nature must give way to sleep. This would be fatal to me, and I exerted myself to the utmost to keep my eyes open, ever and anon arousing myself as I felt my hold giving way upon my plank.

Thus the second night wore away. When it became light I had just energy enough left to look for land. There it was! scarce a league away; but hope and strength were almost gone. I could do but little now to reach it, yet the waves were lending me their help. I knew they would cast me upon it, dead or alive. I hoped the latter, yet it did not seem to matter much which.

How this day passed I have no distinct recollection. I dimly remember of darkness closing around, still clinging to my plank, still obbing towards the land. I thought I must be dying. Feebly I said a short prayer, then a stunning sensation, and I knew no more.

I awoke out of a refreshing sleep, and looked eagerly around; I could scarcely credit my senses, the past seemed a horrible dream. I was safe on land; the merciful waves had thrown me high and dry when life had almost forsaken me. But now a dreary looking prospect was before me—a long sandy beach, as far as the eye could reach, hemmed in by towering cliffs, on the sides of which grew some stunted pine and cedars. I tried to get upon my feet, but could not for a while, I was so fearfully sore and bruised. At length, with the aid of a reed that lay near me, I managed to stand erect once more.

I was so nearly famished with hunger and thirst that I reeled like a drunken man. I staggered along the beach in search of something to appease my ravenous cravings. I came to a small spring of pure water, and eagerly swallowed all I could hold. I think that was the best water I ever drank in all my life. This strengthened me, and I continued my search for food. Soon I found a dead fish, cast ashore during the night, that the vultures had not yet discovered. I devoured it ravenously; it was not the best of food, yet I thought it was the sweetest meat I ever ate. I now felt like a different being, and I traversed the base of the cliffs, in hopes of finding an opening or pass. By frequent resting I travelled a long distance without any show of success, and I began to fear night would overtake me in close proximity to my late enemy, the salt water. But at length I came to a banyon, through which flowed a stream of water. A narrow road or trail led along one side; this I gladly followed, not knowing nor caring much whither it led me, so that I got away from the vicinity of the ocean. I found plenty of berries of an agreeable taste; these I ate to my satisfaction. Darkness found me in a dreary, wild-looking place, but less rough and mountainous than that I had passed through. I was in hopes of finding some village or human habitation before nightfall; and now I was in a wilderness, how vast I knew not, nor did I know how to get out, unless by following the trail, which was now much plainer. This I believed to be the best policy, so I went ahead as fast as I could.

Suddenly a crackling in the bush warned me of the near approach of some wild beast. I looked—a low growl, two shining eyes that looked like balls of fire were within twenty paces of me. Horrortruck I stood transfixed. I knew but too well what it was, and that I was in imminent peril. There, with glistening eyes, waving tail and erect mane, just fixing for a spring, was the lion of the Isthmus. A moment only I gazed, then ran with all the strength I could exert, terror lending fleetness to my feet. I could hear the beast leaping close behind me, and expected every instant to feel his fangs in my flesh. Soon I was so nearly exhausted that I was on the point of giving up, when a small tree was just before me. I made a leap up as far as I could and grasped the trunk tightly with my arms, but before I could get higher out of his reach, the furious beast made a bound for me, just a little short of his object, but succeeded in tearing the flesh open to the bone, from my knee to my ankle, with his sharp claws. However, I was soon out of his reach. Securing myself amid the branches of the tree, I took off my shirt and bound up my wounded limb, and partly stanching the blood, which was now running in a stream. I soon got so weak from my late exertions and loss of blood that I had to secure myself in the forks of the tree to keep from falling. My enemy made some desperate leaps for me, but finding they were short of the object, he finally gave it up, and lay down at the foot of the tree and watched me with his terrible eyes.

I was safe for the time, but how long he would stay I did not know, but I judged he would leave at daylight. From my cramped position, and the pain of my wounded limb, I passed an awful night. However, it wore away at last, and I was free, my captor having left at the approach of day.

My exertions in descending the tree, with my wounded limb, caused me the severest pain. I hobbled along the trail some two miles or more and came to a plain, well-travelled road, running nearly north and south. Judging that south would lead to Panama, I followed it. About the middle of the day I became so faint I could go no further. I lay down by the roadside so wretched that I scarcely would have risen to my feet to save my life.

I fell into a stupid slumber, from which I was rudely awakened by some one shaking me by the shoulders. I opened my eyes and beheld a company of muleteers, who had, at sight of me, paused in the road; they spoke to me in Spanish, which I understood, asking who I was, how I came there, where I was going. I freely told them of my troubles and escapes, and of my severe wound. They listened in astonishment and much wonder, and ended by giving me to eat and drink of their provision. One of their number, who was quite a surgeon, dressed my wound; they then divided the pack of one mule amongst the others and gave him to me to ride. They were going to Panama, which they said was two days travel yet.

To make my long story short, I will add that I arrived in Panama safe. After staying there two weeks my wound was so far healed that I continued my journey to Chagres, there took passage in a steamer, and in due time arrived safe home, after having passed through almost incredible dangers. As for my late shipmates, I never heard from them, and fear that the vessel with all on board was lost.

THE MYSTERIOUS WRECK OF "ROBBERS' REACH."

BY HARRY REMICK.

A long, low, barren sandy reach,
'Gainst which the waves swash mournfully,
Where jagged points of broken reefs
Project their arms into the sea.

No shrub nor vine to greet the eye,
Nor grateful shade, whose cool retreat
Invites repose; but scorching sands
Throw off a fervent, baleful heat.

No form of life, no flight of bird,
To break the silence on the shore,
Unless it be the sea's low mean
That wails a dirge forevermore.

And out among those pointed reefs,
The old wreck's bleachen ribs I mark,
Like some leviathan of the deep,
Half-hidden in the waters dark.

Around her form the dank sea-weeds
Cling with their noisome touch, to hide
The ghastly whiteness of her ribs
That sway with motion of the tide.

And ever as I look, the waves
Dash, in their sullen fury, o'er
The hulk, as if it strove to hide
From human gaze forevermore.

For only when the angry surge,
Beneath some subtle influence, leaves
Its usual haunts along the cliffs,
One only then the wreck perceives.

For nigh a century she has lain,
Yet none can tell her history,
Or name, or build, or destined port,
All, all is wrapped in mystery.

Yet, 'mong the dwellers of the isles,
There is an ancient legend told,
That ere this ship became a wreck,
Her chief was murdered for his gold.

And stranger yet, the legend states—
The ship was wrecked, while yet a calm
Rested upon the harbor's breast,
Doomed through the vengeance of His arm.

Now, on this barren reach, the sea
Is never calm, nor groweth here
Nor shrub nor vine, to greet the eye;
Where once was life, now all is mere.

And should you doubt this eerie tale,
The islanders will jeer at you,
And wag their rimy beards and say,
"But can you these strange facts eschew—

"That nothing grows! that nothing lives!
That round this wreck the ocean raves?
And there you see the hulk yourself,
And see the tumble of the waves."

In truth, these are existing facts
One cannot quite explain away;
Therefore, I take the wisest course—
Think as I please, nor say them nay.

MR. SMALLPIECE'S LEGACY.

BY FRANK H. ANGIER.

WHEN people wanted to get to the office of Mr. Smallpiece, they were obliged to go up a very dirty street and through a dirtier alley, and then under a dark and gloomy archway into a little open court, where Mr. Smallpiece's sign, a square sheet of tin painted white and lettered in black, revealed the fact that the occupant of the office over whose door it was nailed, was Simon Smallpiece Esq., Attorney and Counselor at Law. The office itself was quite pleasant and cheerful when you once got inside of it, for its back windows opened upon a sunny little bit of common, green with soft grass and waving trees in summer, and spotlessly pure with an expanse of virgin snow in winter. On many an afternoon had Mr. Smallpiece, sitting at his worm-eaten old desk in the antique window-space, looked up from his work and catching sight of a dicky-bird hopping about among the rustling leaves outside the open window, become lost in dreamy reverie which led him to waste whole hours in following the unrestrained vagaries of idle thought. In fact, dreaming was almost the only recreation which Mr. Smallpiece ever had now. He could remember, and that easily enough, a time when he was not the childless old man which life had left him years ago. There had been a day when a cheerful home, graced with the luxuries of life and rendered sacred by the love of wife and daughter, was not the least of his worldly possessions; and now his wife lay sleeping under a round, green mound of turf in the churchyard yonder, while his daughter—

"Worse even than dead!" exclaimed Simon Smallpiece, clenching his hand as he thought of her. "Worse even than dead. May my curse go with her, and with him who robbed me of her."

And then he sat back in his leathern-covered chair, biting the end of his penholder savagely, and thought, with bitterness in his heart, of the day, so long ago, when she had come to him holding Will Allen by the hand, and when Will, standing proudly before him in the full nobility of stalwart manhood, had asked him for Nellie as his wife. Mr. Smallpiece remembered, too, with a chuckle of exultation, how he had shown Will Allen to the door at once and forbid him ever entering his house again; how he had sent Nellie to her room in a flood of tears, and how he had himself returned to Will Allen all the foolish letters and keepsakes which he ever had the audacity to send to Simon Smallpiece's daughter. The old lawyer could not but acknowledge to himself, as he sat thinking of these things, that he had made somewhat of a jackass of himself, after all, for Nellie had obstinately refused to marry the wealthy suitor whom he had selected for her, and had persisted in her silly attachment for this lout of a countryman, whom she ultimately ran away with and married. But Simon Smallpiece had sent his loudest curses after them, and had never seen the face of his only child from that day to this. He never would forgive her, and there was comfort in assuring himself of that, at all events.

And so old Simon had lived alone ever since, his temper soured against all mankind, and his heart, if he ever had one, which is doubtful, chilled to a thing of stone. He was reputed rich, but few ever saw the color of his money. No beggar ever came to him for alms, or if he did so once, was very careful to keep clear of him forever after. His lodgings, in the upper story of the same old building with his office, were miserable and mean in the extreme. His clothes were threadbare, and his face was pinched with the hard lines of avarice and selfishness. With no charity for the suffering, with no feeling of kindness for the unfortunate, with his heart closed to every appeal from womanly tenderness or childish innocence, Simon Smallpiece avowed himself the enemy of the world, and passed his life in picking quarrels with it. This perhaps was one reason of his success in business—a success most signally evident in his ability to "nurse" his suits tenderly, and to grinding their litigation in a most marvellous manner.

One lazy afternoon, Mr. Smallpiece, chancing to look up from the misty depths of a long chancery bill in which he was just then submerged, caught sight through the open window, of a little child standing upon the step of a house on the opposite side of the common. There was nothing interesting to Mr.

Smallpiece in children. As a general rule he hated them, but as he happened to glance at this wee little lady, standing, so plump and rosy, upon the doorstep, she suddenly clasped her chubby hands together and gave such a joyous little scream of delight that Simon actually smiled. Yes, he did, and it was something he had not done for a very long time. Looking in the direction in which the child was gazing, he saw a man, clad in the dress of a workman, coming across the common. And this person, when he came to where the child was standing, caught her up high above his head with a little laugh, and bringing her down into his arms again, kissed her. Whether Mr. Smallpiece's heart was a trifle more tender than usual just then I cannot say, but it seemed to him that there was something in the movement of the workman very pleasing and pretty. He remembered a time when he was wont to do the same thing to his own child himself.

The child, catching a glimpse of Mr. Smallpiece's bald head shining brightly at the open window, said something to the man who held her, and the latter putting her down upon the ground, led her slowly across the lawn toward the attorney's office.

"Whose brat is that?" said Simon, when they had approached near enough for conversation.

"She is not a brat," replied the man, quickly. "Doesn't she look pretty enough to be called something better than that?"

"Hum," grunted Mr. Smallpiece. "Well, child then. Whose is it? Yours?"

"She's mine now," replied the man, "but I'm not her father. She's my brother's child, sir."

"She seems almighty fond of you," said Simon, "seeing that you're not her natural parent."

"She is fond of me, aint you, Daisy?" rejoined the workman, stooping down to pull her yellow curls through his fingers.

For answer the child put her little round arms about his knee and laid her dimpled cheek close against it.

"Why don't your brother take care of her?" asked Mr. Smallpiece, looking at the little girl a trifle less sourly than he usually looked at people.

"My brother is dead, sir," said the man. "The child has no father but me."

"Where's her mother?"

"Her mother was left very poor," he replied. "She had one little boy besides this child, and was hardly able to support them both with her unaided hands. She lives a many miles away, sir, and once in a while Daisy and I go down there to see her—on holidays and such like."

"What does she do for a living?"

"She does plain sewing, when she can get it."

"A hard way of earning a living," said Mr. Smallpiece, "very hard. But I dare say she don't work any harder than I do—not a bit, not a bit."

"Perhaps not," said the man, "but she is a woman. I am a bachelor like yourself, sir, and I offered to take this little one and care for her while I lived. I am very glad I did it, for she has made the whole world bright to me—a great deal brighter than it ever was before."

"Bah!" said the lawyer, with a gesture of disgust. "All humbug. I don't want any young ones about me, I can tell you. Those that want 'em can have 'em. I don't."

The man laughed and caught the child up in his arms again.

"She's a pretty child enough," said Simon, looking at her again critically through his glasses. "I've got an apple in my desk here. Do you think she would like it?"

The child held out her fat hands, eagerly.

"Here," said Mr. Smallpiece, taking a red apple out of his drawer and tossing it to the man, who gave it to the little lady in his arms, "new go away quick. I'm very busy."

The man laughed again, and touching his hat withdrew, holding one of the chubby fists in his great brown hand and making believe to bite it, while the child munched the apple which she held in the other.

When they had gone, Mr. Smallpiece leaned back in his chair and reflected upon his unparalleled weakness. What interest had he in children, that he should feel so soft-hearted toward this little one? Was he getting childish in his old age? He did not know. Possibly so. At all events, a new feeling, or rather an old feeling revived, had sprung up in his breast and caused him to look upon his own cynical nature in something of a new light.

The next afternoon the child appeared again upon the step and again did the man toss her high above his head when he met her. Looking across the little green common, the workman recognized the lawyer with a pleasant nod, and then began an uproarious romp upon the soft grass with the child. He lay down and allowed her to roll over him. He made believe to chase her and then, when she turned upon him, ran away feigning great terror, so that the child's clear laughter rang out into the still afternoon air like a peal of little silvery bells. He went down upon his hands and knees, and, putting the little one on his back, trotted about the lawn, pretending to be a horse, and otherwise conducting himself in a manner so extravagant and ridiculous, and sending his companion into such convulsions of merriment, that Simon Smallpiece, quite before he was aware of it, found himself leaning back in his chair and laughing almost as heartily as they.

"I should like to do that, myself," thought Simon. And although you may not believe it, it is actually true that the old lawyer left his work, and, putting on his hat, quit his office by the back door and walked across the common to join them. To be sure, he took no part in their sport, and only stood under the trees to watch the proceedings, but before he went back to his writing, the child had another great red apple, bigger this time than both her chubby fists together.

And so between these people a sort of half-familiar acquaintance sprang up, which gradually became to Simon Smallpiece so pleasant and agreeable, that at last, whenever the workman and his niece failed to appear on the pleasant afternoons, the lawyer would experience a shade of disappointment. Unconsciously to himself, the attrition with the innocent nature of the child was rubbing off some of the hard protuberances of selfishness and uncharity upon his own character. Somehow he could not think of this little one and his own daughter, who was once a child, too, at the same time (and when one was present in his mind so also was the other), with opposed or differing feelings. When he laughed at the gambols of the workman's niece or pinched her rosy cheeks playfully, he could not find it in his heart to utter his accustomed curse upon the memory of his own child whom he had driven from him years ago. And as one thought led to another, he began to reflect at times when he sat alone in his chamber at night, that it would be a pleasant thing to have a woman's or even a child's presence there, to brighten his declining years and to make him feel more kindly toward the world. But who was there to do for him what the workman's little charge had unconsciously accomplished for her uncle? He had no brother to bequeath him children. His daughter had found a better shelter than he could give her, although he knew not where it was. She was happy, doubtless, and in her daily thoughts and prayers he never found a place. Yet he could almost have wished to see a little child or two whisking about his room and perhaps calling him grandfather. It would have been pleasant, after all, to have a rosy elf, all smiles and dimples, climbing up into his lap after supper and burying a pair of pink cheeks in his waistcoat. But that, alas, although it might have been, was not to be thought of now.

The summer waned and autumn came in her rustling robes of brown and gold, strewing the grassy space behind the office with a loose carpet of crisp and withered leaves. The intimacy between Simon and the child, extending now even to taking her in his arms and kissing her, had clandestinely smuggled an element of kindness into the lawyer's nature, which had kindled in his heart a warmth which it had not known for very many years. On every sunny afternoon he walked across the common to meet the workman and his niece, and sometimes stooped himself to gather a handful of the rustling leaves with which to playfully cover the child's flaxen curls.

One afternoon he saw the man approaching with a singular, halting gait, as though it were painful for him to walk. The hour was a little earlier than that of his usual return from work, but the child was waiting for him under the trees. As she saw him coming, she clapped her hands with her characteristic little shout and ran toward him. But he did not catch her in his arms as usual, and as he took her hand, put his own great brown one up quickly to his heart and staggered a little unsteadily. Then, without a word, he fell forward suddenly upon the grass.

"My goodness!" said Simon, leaping at once out of the low, open window and running across the common toward them. "Something has happened to the man."

When he reached the spot, the workman lay upon his face, and the child was clinging to him with screams of terror. Several persons who had seen him fall, came quickly up and tried to raise him to his feet, but when they recognized the truth, they laid him back again and tried to unclasp the arms of the little girl.

"It was heart disease," said one, softly.

"Is he dead?" asked Simon, bending over the prostrate form in awe.

"Quite dead," replied the other, who was a neighboring physician. "Is the child his?"

"The child is mine, now," said Mr. Smallpiece, firmly, raising her in his arms. "Will you go with me, my little one?"

"Is the world coming to an end?" asked one of the bystanders, grimly.

"A part of what I have been to the world has already come to an end," replied Simon, pressing his lips to the tear-stained cheek of the little one in his arms. "Take the poor fellow to his house. The child shall go with me."

And he took her home, and locking the office, sat down in his big chair and tried to comfort her. As he held her in his arms, all the feelings of paternity, so long dead within his breast, came suddenly uppermost, and greatly to his own astonishment he found himself doing, without the least awkwardness or embarrassment, the needful things which seemed best to draw her mind away from what had happened. When he had quieted her sobs with cheery stories, he carried her up stairs and fed her royally with bread and milk, even going without his own supper because he would not leave her to go out after the necessary purchases. After it had grown dark he concentrated all his powers upon the problem of undressing her, and so, after breaking most of the hooks and fastening the various strings in the hardest and most vexatious knots, he got her into bed at last, and buried her up to her chin in his own somewhat dilapidated blankets.

Then, and not till then, did he sit down to ponder upon what he should do with her. It was evident that he could not keep her with him as her uncle had done. Why not? Because—well, because he was a stranger to her mother and she would never consent to it. And that led him to think that if her mother was only here, he could perhaps provide a home for her and her children too. He certainly was able to do it, and the loss of the money would never be felt by him as the loss of the child would be. And then, perhaps, the world would remember, after he was gone, that he had done at least one kindly act during his lifetime, and recollecting that, would forgive him many of his more selfish ones. Yes, he would keep the child, and he would help the mother too.

But how was he to get word to her? The workman had told him of the town where she resided, but had never spoken of her by name. He might have asked the child, but although Simon Smallpiece was an experienced lawyer who usually thought of everything, singularly enough he never thought of this. Ah! now he knew. Where was the paper?

Sitting down at his desk, he headed a sheet of letter paper with the day and year. Then a tiny voice came up from out of the bed-clothes, reminding him that something had been forgotten.

"And what is that?" asked Simon.

Dear little heart! She had not said her prayers.

"Did your uncle always want you to say your prayers?" asked the lawyer, going to the bedside.

"Yes, always."

"Then say them for me, little one," said Simon, and kneeling down by her side, the old man rested his scattered gray hairs upon the counterpane while the tiny voice repeated a simple prayer and the chubby hands were fast clasped together. And in that prayer, following her every word, Simon Smallpiece's heart was touched as it never had been touched before, and from his lips there went, with the supplication of the child, an earnest prayer to be made better and more worthy of the charge which had been placed within his keeping.

He returned to his letter at last, and finishing it, directed it to the postmaster of the town in which the object of his search resided, informing him of the fatal event of the afternoon and requesting him, if possible, to forward the information to Daisy's mother. Then he put on his red flannel nightcap, blew out his candle and went to bed, holding the child's hand, as with her he passed to the unknown land of dreams.

The next day passed, and the next. The preparations for the poor man's funeral were simple and few, for he had no friends in the neighborhood where he lived, and little seemed to be known about him. Simon offered to bear the expenses, whatever they might be, and in the afternoon, when the man had been laid in his coffin, took Daisy with him for a farewell look at his peaceful face. But Daisy shrank from the cold and awful form in wild terror, at which the lawyer was glad, for it proved that her love for her former friend would not all be given to him in death as it had been in life, and that there was still room for a little affection for himself, after the workman had been forgotten.

But on the third day, which was the day of the funeral, there came a knock at the door of the lawyer's office, and there stood upon the threshold a woman, closely veiled and holding a little boy by the hand.

"My husband's brother is buried to-day," she said, a little sadly. "I am told that you have kindly cared for my little girl."

Great heavens! That voice! It seemed to Simon Smallpiece like the peal of a sweet, sweet bell, ringing back to him the sad changes over a half-forgotten world which had fallen from the firmament many long years ago. He arose from his seat trembling with a strange emotion.

"Your little girl is quite safe," he said. "I shall have a proposition to make you in regard to her, after to-day's sad ceremony is over. May I ask your name?"

"I think you know it," she said, raising her veil.

"O Nellie! My daughter Nellie!" cried the old man, falling suddenly down upon his knees before her. "May God forgive me for the wrong I have done you and yours! O my child! Be merciful to me, for I ask your forgiveness at your feet."

"I have nothing to forgive, father," she said, assisting him to his feet. "Whatever there was between us, has been forgiven long ago."

"And you will stay with me now always?" asked Simon, half incredulously.

"Always, if you wish it, father."

"The hand of the Lord is in it," cried he, catching up Daisy in his arms. "It is this little one who has prepared his way, and she has made my path straight."

And who shall say that Simon Smallpiece's legacy was not better than gold or silver, since it brought him a new heart?

SAVAGES—WHITE AND TAWNY.

BY W. H. MAOY.

WE were lying off and on at Aroral, commonly laid down on the charts as Hope Island. Many of the natives who came off to drive a barter trade with us, appeared personally known to Captain Sisson, and recognised him at sight. I thought this strange, and expressed my wonder to the captain, who said that he once lived for several weeks on the island.

That evening, when we were more at leisure, he told me the story of his involuntary residence among the savages, which I give, as nearly as possible, in his own language.

I was, at the time it happened, only twenty-two years old, and was third mate in the Antelope. She must have been so named in derision, for she was an old wagon-built ship that would sell, as the saying is, almost as fast as you could whip a toad through tar. We had been out two years, and had made many changes in the crew, so that we had a motley crowd in the fore-castle, who might be classified, not as good and bad, but rather as bad and worse.

We had lowered in chase of a body of sperm whales one day, being then some five miles under the lee of Aroral, with light trades and fair weather. The old man had given up the starboard boat to me entirely, for he was getting along in years, and was quite willing to rest on his laurels. My boat-steerer was a man we had shipped at Sydney, an ugly, pock-marked Liverpool Irishman, with a head like a bulldog's. I had always managed to keep the right side of McSweeney, and had never had any serious trouble with him. At the bow and midship oars were two other Australian "beach-combers," who would swear black was white at McSweeney's bidding, while the boy at the stroke-oar was more of a salt than a seaman, and might be easily influenced, especially for evil. There was only one in my boat upon whom I could rely at all times—the tub-oarsman, a wiry little Frenchman, who had stuck by us since we left home, and was much attached to me.

The mate struck a small whale soon after we lowered, but the school did not bring to, and we had to chase them to windward after they were "gallied," which, you know, is an uphill job. The second mate and I got separated in pursuit of different "pods," and being both young and ambitious, we continued the fruitless chase longer than we ought. It was growing late, indeed the sun was not more than an hour high, when I decided to give it up and return.

We were then not more than two miles distant from the reef, which makes off from the lee-side of the island. A few canoes were out, but they were not near us, having gone to leeward towards the ship, which had drifted with the current since taking the mate's whale alongside, so that she was now further from the land than when we left her. I estimated her to be quite six miles from us, and, on sweeping the horizon with my glass, could see nothing of the second mate.

I gave the order to cease pulling and step the mast, in order to set the sail. As I did so, I noticed quick glances interchanged between the three men in the forward part of the boat, and heard a few words in a slang which I did not understand. I was in the act of lifting the mast to launch it forward to McSweeney, when with two strides, he made his way aft, and stood over me with the gleaming boat-knife in his hand.

"Put down the mast!" said he, enforcing the order with a flourish of the knife.

Taken entirely by surprise, and at disadvantage, I was powerless to defend myself. I glanced at the others. Atkins and Jones, his two satellites, had also drawn their knives to support him; the boy Tom was of little account either way. Philippe, the little Frenchman, rose to interfere in my behalf, but was felled like an ox by a swinging blow from the boat-bucket in Jones's hand.

"Give me the steering-oar, and sit down!" said McSweeney, "unless you choose to keep her going to windward. If ye do, we'll pull her and ye may shteer."

"What do you intend to do?" I demanded. "Where do you wish to go?"

"We're going ashore, here—we three—Jack Jones, Atkins and myself. The rest can do as yez like, after we've landed. We don't want to commit any murder, but ashore we're going, so yez can go with us—or go overboard."

"I'll go with you," spoke up the boy Tom.

I saw that I was helpless in the hands of this gang of ruffians. Poor little Phil, with his head bleeding severely, still lay half insensible where he had fallen.

"All right!" said L. "Put up your knives, and let me up. If you must go ashore, the sooner we get there the better. So I'll steer, and you can all pull."

They seemed relieved at my decision; for neither of them, as I think, had any personal enmity against me; but were determined to desert from the ship at any cost. They took their places at the oars, and piled them vigorously, but still kept a vigilant watch upon me, with their weapons conveniently at hand.

I steered directly for the place which I judged to be the entrance of the lagoon, for I hoped to get rid of them and return to the ship that night, even if I did so with no help but that of the Frenchman. I confess it was very humiliating to think of making my report to the old man, that I had been overpowered by my own boat's crew.

But it was nearly dark when we reached the landing-place inside the lagoon, and the clouds showed every indication of a wet, squally night. We were surrounded at once by a yelling crowd of savages, who seized our boat and dragged her up high and dry. They did not seem in a hurry to permit me to leave them, even had I thought it prudent. And I did not fail to consider that if I ran down to leeward, and missed the ship in the darkness, I should find it an impossible task to get back again with only one man to help me, and he with his head broken. So I determined to pass one night, at least, on shore.

The king of Aroral, savage though he was, treated us well, and assigned us lodgings, as soon as we ceased to talk of leaving the beach that night.

The three conspirators kept together, and Philippe and myself did the same, while the boy Tom was taken in charge by an old woman, who, I should judge, was the king's mother, or queen dowager. The king, noticing that I was very solicitous about the safety of my boat, gave me to understand that he would be responsible for her. Nevertheless, on going down the coral slope early in the morning, I found her whole broadside stove in. There was no escape for me unless they chose to carry me off in one of their own canoes, which was not likely.

But at daylight, no ship was to be seen in the horizon. I thought of the strength of the current, which, among this group of islands, runs, at times, like a mill-slutice. If the ship had drifted out of sight, it might be weeks before she could make the land again by a circuitous route. I confess the prospect was anything but a pleasant one to me.

McSweeney and his two cronies at once made themselves at home among these people, and each set himself to work to get the king's ear, and acquire influence, so as to have the advantage of the others. For there is very little honor among thieves, according to my experience and observation, and it is wonderful how quickly a white man—at least, a bad white man—acquires power among barbarians. Before we had been a week on shore Jones was impaled by a spear in the hands the king, who had been incited thereto, as I knew well enough, by his two rivals.

As the Frenchman and I had but little to do with them, they did not plot against us, knowing that we would leave the island at the first chance that offered. But day after day went by and no sail appeared in sight. This life was monotonous enough, to say nothing of a constant feeling of uneasiness, akin to fear, as we felt that our lives were at the mercy of villanous plots and savage caprices.

As soon as they had got rid of Jones, McSweeney and Atkins began to plot and counterplot. And each feeling that his hour might come at any moment from the schemes of the other, they found it necessary, as desperadoes in such situations always do, to take the law into their own hands and protect themselves.

I was lying in the hut one sultry afternoon trying to kill time as best I might, when I heard a confused noise and shouting, and, stepping forth, beheld these two ruffians, naked to the waist, engaged in mortal combat with their knives. I cannot give you the details of the dreadful struggle; it makes me shudder now at the recollection. The arch-mutineer was stabbed to the heart, and the fight was, of course, ended. But Atkins did not live long enough to secure the fruits of his victory, though the king made much of him for his valor, as he would have done by the other, had the fortune of the day been reversed. His wounds were severe, and for want of surgical knowledge and care he died in a few days.

I breathed more freely after these accou-drels were all disposed of; and, pursuing the same quiet course as heretofore, Philippe and I managed to keep on good terms with all those in authority. I saw very little of the boy, for the old woman guarded him with the most jealous care.

We had been about six weeks on the island, and were falling into savage ways, and becoming truly "Romans in Rome." We always kept a lookout for vessels, skinning up one or the other of the tall cocco-palms at least half a dozen times a day, but nothing had been discovered.

We went out one night in the canoe to torch flying-fish, as we had several times done before—old Tubokee, our "landlord," the Frenchman and myself. No objection was raised to our going on these cruises, for there was no fear of our escaping in the night; at least so the king thought.

There were a dozen or more canoes out that night, but they took up their stations at a considerable distance apart, in a line along the coral barrier, as is their custom. The large triangular sails of matting are spread, and the flying-fish, attracted by the glare of torches, rush for it in swarms, or, perhaps more correctly, flocks, and, arrested in their headlong course by the sail, drop into the canoe. We continued our sport until a late hour, when having used up our torches, we prepared to return to the shore, nearly all the others having started in advance of us.

Suddenly Philippe touched my arm, and pointed seaward without speaking. A light was visible, at first faint, then flashing up brightly, it revealed the foremast of a ship, with the rigging distinctly traced, and the shape of the foresail. She was not far from us, but, owing to the glare of our own torch-lights, had not, until now, been seen.

"A whaler, boiling!" said I. "Phil, we must mutiny, and serve old Tubokee as those ruffians served us. He may go with us—or go overboard."

The old man remonstrated hard, for he was a chief of rank, and felt that he should be in bad odor with his king and countrymen, if he suffered us to get away without ransom. But there was no help at hand, and Phil and I had matters all our own way. We seized him without ceremony, and were in the act of hoisting him over the side of the canoe, when he yielded to necessity, and seizing a paddle, signified his readiness to follow us.

In less than an hour we were alongside the ship, which, as we had already conjectured, was no other than the Antelope. She had run south into the variable winds, and then worked to the eastward, making a large circuit as the only way of getting up to the island again. The captain had almost given us up for lost, but, of course, determined to seek here for us, as there was a possibility of our having gone on shore.

The next day we opened negotiations to recover the boy Tom. The king, as well as the old dowager, was disappointed in not securing a heavy ransom, as he had hoped and expected; but, as we held the old chief Tubokee as a hostage, it was simply a fair exchange, though we did not fail to throw in a few presents, as a return for his kind treatment of us when we were wholly in his power.

THE FACE IN THE CROWD.

BY BRITOMARTE.

Silent I sit in the shadows, apart
 From the group whose gayety saddens my heart,
 And they marvel my silent mood to see,
 As they sing their laughing jests at me;
 But I give no heed to the merriest wile,
 And my face sends back no answering smile;
 For my soul is sick, and my heart is sore,
 For the loss of a dream that is mine no more,
 For a face that is gone, but it haunts me yet—
 A face that I know I can never forget;
 A brave young face, a manly face,
 Just touched with its boyhood's lingering trace;
 It flashed on me from the crowd, to-day,
 As I sauntered idly down Broadway!

'Twas little to shake my soul, I know;
 Only a face—but I loved it so!
 Not the same; yet it was the same,
 Though its owner bear not the dear-loved name;
 So like to a face that I may not see,
 That is dearer than heaven's own light to me!
 It came like a wraith, like a wraith it fled;
 The shadowy ghost of a daydream dead;
 Bringing back to my heart its carking care,
 And driving me wild with fierce despair!
 I am mad with longing and heart-sick pain,
 Only to look on his face again—
 The face that I saw in the crowd, to-day,
 Rushing and thronging down Broadway!

"THE THIEF IN THE NIGHT."

BY BETT WINWOOD.

I.

GERTRUDE.

"You are to receive no more visits from Dick Chilton, remember that, Gertrude Wynne. He is an idle, good-for-nothing fellow, and sure of coming to some bad end. I am not going to shut my eyes any longer to such ridiculous goings on between you and him."

When mamma spreads out her skirts in the real duchess style, and beats herself in an easy-chair with her hands folded in her lap, beginning straightway to rock violently back and forth, as she did in the present instance,

I always know she is dead in earnest, and twice as dangerous in such moods as are those women who scold, and rant, and tear, at the slightest provocation. Were I a bit of a coward, I should feel quite afraid of her at such times; but there is a strong leaven of reckless daring in the Wynne blood, and Gertrude, the one lambkin of the flock (meaning myself, of course), is not without her due proportion of it.

"I am sorry you don't like Dick, mamma," I said. "There can be but one perfect gentleman, in your estimation, though, and he is Barton Ray. You are prejudiced, and poor Dick does not stand the ghost of a chance."

Mamma colored. She rarely mentions his name, but I can see that her heart is quite set on bringing about an attachment between Barton and myself. Thus far, she has been shrewd enough to give matters their own time for developing, however.

"I am surprised at you, Gertrude, for speaking of the gentlemen in such unmaidenly terms," she now said, quite gravely. "As for Mr. Ray, you have always done him injustice, and that because Dick Chilton has stood in his light. I feel compelled to insist that all this shall come to an end. You are free to act your own pleasure, so far as Mr. Ray is concerned. But I beg you to remember that Dick is henceforth to be under the ban."

Mamma likes to put on airs, and she now dismissed me with a gracious wave of the hand, as much as to say that I had been made acquainted with her sovereign wishes, and nothing remained for me but to abide by them. Precious mamma! I like her all the better for those grand ways of hers!

Barton Ray is one of our near neighbors. But for a perverseness and obstinacy that seems to be the legitimate birthright of most women, I am sure I should very willingly have obeyed the scriptural mandate to "love my neighbor as myself," for Barton is one of the grandest specimens of mankind I ever knew, not even excepting Dick Chilton. But mamma decidedly favors him, and there is no spice in accepting a lover to whom there is no opposition. For that identical reason have I snubbed him, and smiled on Dick, though I verily believe— Well, it does not matter what I believe, I'm a fool, and that is confession enough to make!

After leaving mamma, I strolled into the garden to gather some bouquets for the vases in Uncle Reuben's room. He is extremely partial to moss roses, and I knew there were some fine ones in bloom, and meant he should enjoy them. He is just home from California with a mint of money, and of course it is the thing for me to play the attentive. How queer it seems to think of Gertrude Wynne as trying to be politic in anything!

Before half a dozen roses were clipped, and laid away in my basket, I heard Dick's whistle just beyond the garden hedge. It is a whim of his to steal upon me when I am least expecting him. Mamma's injunctions were straightway forgotten, and I ran down the path to meet him, quite overjoyed at the thought of a long tête-a-tête. When he held out his hand, though, and ejaculated warmly, "What a dear girl you are, Gerty," it all came back to me again, how I had been forbidden to see this man.

"Go away, Dick," said I, pushing him from me. "You are not to come here any more. Mamma is quite vexed with me, already."

At that, he fixed his handsome eyes upon my face in a look of astonishment which was assuredly of the genuine sort. And I must acknowledge, that he seemed the least bit angry, too.

"What is the meaning of this, Gerty?" he asked. "I thought you loved me very dearly, and had promised to become my wife."

"Then you were mistaken, sir," I returned, wondering that it caused me so little pain to say it. "I never promised anything of the sort. Besides, I could not keep it if I had; mamma and Uncle Reuben are both prejudiced against you, and of course I shall never think of marrying without their consent."

He folded his arms, and went stalking up and down the path before me. He was frowning, and his lips were compressed. Finally he came back, facing me again.

"You cannot mean, Gerty, that you and I must part forever?" he said, hotly. "Surely, you will not be so cruel?"

He looked so heart-broken, so utterly wretched, that I could not help but pity him, and woman-like began to cry. Upon that, he caught my hand suddenly, pouring forth a perfect torrent of mad words, avowing that he loved me as maiden was never loved before, and entreating me, in the most impassioned tones, to fly with him to some far-off spot where we could be happy together.

I don't know how I had the strength to resist him, under the circumstances, but resist I did. For a wonder, my perversity was taking a new turn, perhaps for the better. Women were always riddles, if the other sex are to be believed, and I was now proving to Dick my right to be classed among the sphinxes.

Somehow the poor fellow did not seem very much taken with this new phase in my character. He was sorely at a loss how to meet me in it, and men hate above all things to enter into a contest with a woman where they are likely to be worsted. The moment he realized how resolute I was, not another word of pleading escaped his lips.

"It seems very hard that your life and mine should in this way be blasted to gratify the whim of two old fogies," he finally said, in an impatient tone.

Here was a reflection on mamma, and I never could stand by quietly and hear her 'insulted.

"I don't know whom you are calling old fogies, Dick," and I looked away, at the blue sky overhead, at the pleasant landscape softened by the summer haze, at a bed of tossing fleur-de-lis on the other side of the path, everywhere save into his handsome face, for the sight of that might have weakened my resolution, and this was a time when I ought to be strong. "Nor do I understand your talk about 'blighted lives.' To whom does the term have reference? Not to me assuredly."

He ground his teeth at that, and I looked away all the more persistently, really afraid that I should lose all respect for him, if I saw him in an angry mood. Finally he took a step or two nearer.

"I have nothing further to say, after listening to such remarks from your lips, Gerty," he began, in an aggrieved tone. "I am going away. You must promise to see me once more, though. We may have some last words to exchange before I bid you good-by forever."

Of course I gave the promise—where could be the harm? I had told him frankly that mamma and Uncle Reuben were opposed to him, and I could never become his wife. Under the circumstances, another meeting was not likely to put any false hopes into his heart; otherwise, it would never have been granted, for I already felt some prickings of conscience on account of the course I had pursued towards him, though Heaven knows I had never meant to give him any real encouragement.

"What a pity that Dick is such a wild, reckless fellow," I sighed, as I went back to my roses again. "Mamma is right in calling him a good-for-nothing, I suppose. It is a little singular that nobody knows what his history was before he came to Mapleton last spring. People have good grounds for calling him an adventurer, though of course I do not believe such a ridiculous story."

Barton Ray was in the parlor with mamma when I came in with my basket of roses. I only stopped to say "good-morning," but he took my hand and looked into my eyes in such a curious, earnest fashion that I went away with hot cheeks, thoroughly angry with myself, nevertheless, because they burned so uncomfortably, and because, for my life, I could not have helped it.

While I was arranging the flowers in the vases in Uncle Reuben's room up stairs, that dear old savage came running up, making noise and clatter enough for a whole regiment. He claimed a kiss, when he saw what I was doing, and then stole half a dozen more in spite of me, though I pretended to be very angry, and shook my fist in his face, calling him a "rude Californian bear!"

"Rail at me to your heart's content, Gerty," he said, laughingly. "But you will find the 'bear' a very loving one, after all. I have not been digging gold all my life without having something to show for it, and a certain somebody I could mention will come in for a good share of it, upon her wedding-day."

"Don't talk nonsense, Uncle Reuben," I interpolated, trying to appear perfectly at ease.

"I don't intend to, my dear. By the way, there are fifteen thousand dollars locked up in the library desk, at this moment. I ought to have banked the money to-day, but was too lazy. Now, it can't be done until to-morrow, for I must ride across the country to Farmer Winslow's this evening, and shall be away through the night. You must take care of my money, Gerty," he added, pleasantly. "Remember, I leave it in your exclusive charge. Don't let anybody run away with it while I am gone."

"Never fear. Whoever takes the money, will have to include me in the bargain," I answered, sturdily.

Uncle Reuben laughed, and nodded approval, as much as to say that I was a "brick," and he felt perfectly at ease in trusting me.

Sitting here in my chamber, at set of sun, something has impelled me to write out the partial history of the day that has passed, though I have not the remotest idea what object is to be served by so doing. Mamma would call it one of my "whims," no doubt. Well, mamma is usually correct in everything, and I, too, will regard it as a "whim."

There is Dick's whistle in the garden again. I must go down to say good-by to him, because I promised that I would. I wonder, though, how it is possible for me to feel so indifferent about it. At one time, I really thought myself in love with that man. It must have been his handsome eyes I was enamored of! may Heaven help me to do what is right, and for the best.

II.

BARTON.

THERE is nothing under the sun that I, Barton Ray, despise more heartily than the character of an habitual eaves-dropper, a sly, slimy creature hiding about in unsuspected nooks and out-of-the-way places, and who possesses no higher end and aim in life than to gain possession of secrets that were never intended for his ear. And yet there may be extenuating circumstances in all cases. For instance, it does not seem to me that I was very culpable, when, on seeing Gertrude Wynne go gliding down one of the garden paths in the dusk of twilight, I followed her, knowing at the time that she was about to keep some appointment with Dick Chilton, and that I was not expected nor desired to appear as a witness to the said meeting.

The fact that I was in love with Gertrude, and more than a little jealous of Dick's handsome face and person, does not plead my excuse. Some feeling, both irresistible and inexplicable, impelled and guided my footsteps. I was perfectly satisfied in my own mind that Dick was an adventurer and a fortune-hunter, when you had put the best phase of his character on the outside. He had gained the entree of Mapleton society on false recommendations, and by a brazen impudence that almost won him my admiration, had thus far sustained his place in it. Gertrude had been quite friendly with him, from the first, and that is what vexed me more than anything else, for I did not like to see the dear girl imposed upon. Nor did I care to come out in accusations I could not prove, for she has a will of her own, and I was fearful for the result of such a movement on my part.

The two had held more than one private interview, without doubt, but no meeting of theirs had ever distressed me as did this at the foot of Mrs. Wynne's garden. A thousand nameless forebodings agitated my mind, and I stole cautiously along in Gertrude's footsteps, wherefore I could not have told, though some indefinable feeling seemed to be urging me on.

The dear girl was some rods in advance of me, and in consequence, I did not hear the first words exchanged between the two. On nearing them, I paused behind some acacia bushes to listen. At the time, Dick was crying out impulsively:

"I cannot go away without one hope for the future, Gerty. You are cruel to ask anything of the sort."

He looked sullen and desperate. I could see that Gertrude was paler than her wont, and that she trembled.

"I am sorry, Dick, so sorry," she said, softly. "There are a great many better women than myself in the world, and those who would make you happier than I could ever hope to do. Life will brighten, and you will marry one of them, by-and-by."

"Humph," he muttered, impatiently. "As if love could be transferred like a note payable on demand! As if I could ever care for any woman save you!"

Gertrude sighed quite audibly. At that moment, somebody came galloping down the avenue to the right, only concealed from us by the thick hedge that bordered the way.

Dick gave an eager start, peering curiously in that direction, quite forgetful for the moment, as it seemed, of the fare he was enacting.

"Who was that?" he asked.

"Uncle Reuben. He has to ride to Farmer Winslow's, to-night. I wonder he did not take an earlier start."

"You will have a lonely night without him."

"Yea," returned Gertrude, glibly, as if glad of a pretext for diverting the conversation into a new channel. "There will be nobody but mamma and Chloe in the house. Tom, the coachman, is having a vacation, you know; servants must have their vacation as well as other people. The worst of the matter is that Uncle Reuben has left fifteen thousand dollars in the library desk for me to take care of."

Dick started violently. He had been holding her hand, but he dropped it suddenly, shading both eyes with his own, for one brief moment. For my part, I came very near to crying out. Reuben Wynne had confided to me the secret hiding-place in which his money had been deposited, but I had not supposed that any other member of the household so much as knew there was such an amount of money about the premises. Dick Chilton was the very last person to whom a confidence of that sort should have been made.

He put away his hand, keeping his eyes steadily averted.

"Fifteen thousand dollars is a large sum of money—a very large sum," he said, slowly.

"Yea," Gertrude nodded a weary assent.

Now the confession was out, and past recall, she seemed very much annoyed to think it had been made at all.

"Uncle Reuben would not compliment my stewardship, if he knew what I have been saying to you," she said, with an uneasy laugh.

"As to that, there is no harm done, unless we have been overheard," he returned, quickly. "I would not advise you to repeat the same story to anybody else, though."

Then he went back on the old strain again, pleading with the dear girl for some promise that would bind her to him. The allusion to Reuben Wynne's money had put me out of sorts, and I had no patience to listen longer; so I pushed out into the path, and went straight up to them.

Dick greeted me with a savage scowl, but Gertrude, on the other hand, gave a pleased start, and turned to me with a sigh of evident relief, as if she considered my arrival very opportune.

"Is it you, Mr. Ray?" she asked. "I will walk back to the house with you in one moment's space. Good-by, Dick," extending one of her delicate hands for him to take. "I shall hope always to hear good news of you."

All this was done so rapidly that he could not have made the slightest opposition, had he been so disposed, even. As it was, he saw himself compelled to say his adieus, and go away. But there was a baneful glitter in his dark eyes that warned me he was in a dangerous mood.

Gertrude and I went slowly towards the house, walking nearly a rod apart (which was her fault, as you may be well assured). I was wishing, all the way, that she would be as frank and friendly with me as she was with other men.

"I am sorry that you spoke of that money to Dick Chilton," I said, suddenly.

She looked quickly into my face.

"Were you near enough to overhear our conversation, Mr. Ray?" she asked.

"Yes," was my brief reply.

She colored, but said no more. In the parlor, she left her mother to entertain me, a frequent procedure on her part, and one that annoyed me not a little. Only once did she manifest the slightest interest in anything I had to say, and that was when I entreated with an unnecessary show of earnestness, that I should be allowed to occupy a room in the house for that one night.

"You are very kind, Mr. Ray," she said, turning about from the centre-table at which she had been standing, engaged, in adjusting some flowers, and speaking up quick and sharp, before Mrs. Wynne could possibly put in a word. "I know you think we need a protector, now that Uncle Reuben is away. But, most fortunately, neither mamma nor I belong to the timid sort. Thank you all the same, though."

"Gertrude is right," assented Mrs. Wynne. "In a quiet community like this, there are no risks to be run."

Of course I could say no more after that. As I walked slowly homeward through the starlight night, however, my thoughts kept running very much after this fashion:

"I see plainly how it is. Gertrude suspected my motives, and wanted to show me how brave she is, and how capable of getting on without me. Well, she can banish me from the interior of the house, but thank Heaven, she has not the power to hinder me from watching outside, to see that no harm comes to her."

Now I have said my say, and will make my bow to the reader, merely adding, for parenthesis, that my chapter of this history is written two days subsequent to the events therein recorded (as is also the one from Gertrude that immediately follows), and that it was prepared at her urgent request. But she wishes to come upon the stage again to conclude the narrative, and of course I shall not object, since like most women, "when she will she will, and there's the end on't."

III.

GERTRUDE.

It may be egotistical for me to say it, but shrewdness runs in the Wynne blood, alongside of daring. When Barton Ray offered to remain in the house over night, I knew at once that he was thinking of Uncle Reuben's money, and the danger that might menace us all on account of it, should any disreputable character become aware of its being in the house. I likewise thought, from a remark he made to me while we were coming up the garden path together, that he more than suspected Dick Chilton's honesty. Of course I could not agree with him in this feeling though.

I am frank to confess that I should have felt much more at ease knowing he was about the premises. But my ridiculous obstinacy stood in the way again, and I vetoed his proposition in hot haste, and mamma sanctioned my remarks. She knew nothing about the money, however, or she would, I am sure, have brought in an entirely different verdict.

When Barton was gone, and Chloe had put out the fires and retired, and nobody was stirring in the house save mamma and myself it did seem gloomy and silent enough; and when I thought how Uncle Reuben and Tom were both away, I began to be sadly nervous, and soon proposed going to bed, fearful that mamma would suspect the state of my feelings and inquire too closely into the cause, if I remained as her vis-a-vis much longer. She would have walked the parlors all night, had she known of the fifteen thousand dollars which that dear, careless old uncle had left in the library desk.

"Sleep as soundly as you please," I said, on kissing her good-night at her chamber door. "There is no need for you to be wakeful. I shall keep an eye and an ear open, and shall be sure to know it if there is any unusual stir in the house."

Mamma laughed at that, of course.

"Silly child! You would be the first to hide yourself were thieves to break in. However, one cannot expect extraordinary bravery from a young girl."

"Golden silence" held my powers of speech, or I might have said something spiteful to dear mamma. "I almost wish something dreadful would happen," I thought, as I put on a loose dressing-gown and lay down on the outside of my bed. "Then I could prove to more persons than one that I am a greater heroine than they imagine."

I did not intend to sleep a wink that night, but the flesh is woefully weak, as has been proved in the experience of more than one poor mortal since the world began. In vain I meditated upon the lonely situation of the house, removed by several rods from any other dwelling, and thought of the money down stairs over which I had been instituted guardian; a dull drowsiness would steal over me, in spite of all my efforts, and presently I was fast asleep.

The great clock on the stairs, striking the hour of twelve, awakened me, and I found myself sitting bolt upright clinging to the bed-clothes as if for dear life. Instantly realizing the occasion of my alarm, I lay down again, trying to laugh off my foolish fears, and to compose myself to sleep once more, doing the best I knew how to reason myself into the belief that there was not the slightest cause for uneasiness.

The night was sultry, and I slept with my window open. Just as I was beginning to drowse for the second time, I was startled by hearing a low growl from the house dog, Jip, whose kennel was on that side of the building. Raising myself on one elbow to listen, I heard the growl repeated, this time a trifle louder, and the next moment a man's voice called softly:

"Jip! Jip! There, be silent; that's a good fellow!"

The tone was singularly familiar, but I took no thought of that fact, nor that the dog had given a short bark of recognition, for the next sound to break upon my ear was a low, awful "thud" that seemed like a stealthy, treacherous blow, and then Jip broke into something between a wall and a whine, a horrible gasping noise that fairly made my blood run cold, and that momentarily grew weaker and weaker, and finally ceased altogether.

"Poor Jip! He is being murdered," I thought, in a dazed, bewildered way, rising with difficulty, crossing over to the window, and peering anxiously into the starlight night. I could just discern the figure of a man standing on the walk beneath, and a dark object lying on the lawn grass a few feet away that must have been Jip.

The man disappeared, the next moment coming close under the wall. As for myself, I stood like one stunned, assured that an attempt was being made to enter the house, and that by somebody perfectly familiar with the premises (else he could not have succeeded in imposing on poor Jip so successfully), and yet finding myself utterly unable to move hand or foot.

Uncle Reuben's money! That thought flashed suddenly upon my brain, sending the hot blood tingling through every vein in my body. Some wicked person had learned of its hiding-place in the house, and was come to steal it! I had promised Uncle Reuben to keep it safe until his return—it was a sacred trust. No earthly power could save it if I were to prove the mean, pitiful coward that everybody thought me.

The spell was broken, volition was mine again, the power of locomotion came back to my palsied limbs, and a stern, unreasoning determination took possession of my whole being. Gathering the skirt of my wrapper into one hand that I might move more noiselessly, I stole cautiously down the stairs in my stocking-feet, hardly daring to breathe as I passed mamma's room, lest she should hear me and call out.

Instinct guided my footsteps. The library-door was ajar, and as I peered in, the man I had seen on the walk outside was just leaping into the room through the window, which, as I afterwards discovered, he had opened by cutting a small piece of glass from the pane just above the bolt, after the fashion of a professional burglar. He allowed it to stand open, as a means of retreat, no doubt, and crept cautiously into the middle of the apartment, pausing there long enough to suddenly send the light of a dark lantern successively into every corner, to make sure, I suppose, that nobody was lurking about to disturb his operations.

At one point of the examination, the lantern was brought very near to his face, so near, in fact, that every feature was discernible. Suppressing a cry of surprise and horror, I leaned against the wall, giddy and sick, for the countenance I looked upon was that of Dick Chilton! This dreadful discovery took away all my strength and I felt myself trembling in every limb. I was like one paralyzed again, though in momentary dread that he would open the door for a look into the hall, and thus discover my proximity.

"O Gertrude Wynne, you fool, you coward!" I muttered, under my breath, pinching my flesh savagely, and trying to bring back a grain of courage in that way. "Yonder man is nothing to you; he is a villain, a thief who breaks in at night to steal. Harden your heart against him, little simpleton, and ask God to give you strength to outwit him, and to be the means of punishing him as he richly deserves."

It was a tough struggle, but the Wynne grit of which I am so proud gained the mastery. When I again applied my eye to the crack in the door, he was at the desk, trying all the keys about his person, in the lock. Hitherto I had watched his movements through the small crevice by the hinges, and through the keyhole, successively, but now he was exactly in my line of vision where the door was ajar, and I could discern his various manoeuvres with much greater ease and accuracy.

The keys were of no avail, and he next had recourse to a chisel, trying to pry the desk open. A pistol lay on a chair at the right and behind him, just within reach at a moment's warning. I caught the dull gleam of the weapon, and it held my fascinated gaze like the deadly eye of a snake. My breath came and went in hoarse gasps that he must have heard but for his preoccupation. A swift, sudden hope that hinted at salvation and safety had flashed upon my mind.

His back was towards me, and he was working away as if for dear life, steadily and cautiously, for the lock had given signs of yielding. Biding my time, I pushed the door noiselessly open, and went gliding in, silently as some visitant from the other world. Even my heart seemed to stand still. I reached the chair—my fingers closed steadily over the weapon—it lay in my grasp.

Venturing to breathe for the first time, I drew back a pace or two, cocking the pistol. The sudden click startled him, and he turned sharply about, facing me. A suppressed oath fell from his lips, and then he shrank away, confused and sullen.

"Gertrude!" he whispered, unwittingly, as it seemed.

I raised the pistol in a line with his head, my aim steady and true.

"Don't dare to name me," I cried, menacingly. "You are a low-lived thief. I do not know you."

At that, he grew fairly livid with rage. Glaring at me for one instant like a hunted animal at bay, he suddenly caught up the lantern in one hand, prepared to dash it on the floor.

"Stop," I said, in a low, steady tone of voice. "You are in my power. A single treacherous movement on your part, and I will shoot you through the head."

He knew I would do it, and quailed before me. It is not so easy to face certain death and make no sign. Then he drew back against the wall, folding his arms on his breast.

"What is your will, pretty one?" he asked, a leer on his handsome face.

Gliding up to the desk, I stood before it.

"Uncle Reuben's money is here. I promised to take care of it. I intend to keep my word."

A muttered curse escaped his lips. He made a sudden turn, standing between me and the open window now.

"I wanted your money, Gertrude," he said, maliciously. "You would not marry me, or there would have been no need to resort to theft."

"Hush!"

There was more scorn and hate in that single word than I could express in whole pages. He felt the tone, and there were still some grains of good in the man, for it pricked him all over like stinging nettles. He writhed under it, uneasily at first, and then put on a more desperate mood.

"Your forte is farce, pretty Gerty," he began, sneeringly. "But all things must have an end, and I for one, am heartily tired of this mockery. Put up your weapon, my dear. I hope you do not think I am afraid of a pistol that is not loaded?"

"You are trying to deceive me, Dick Chilton," I returned, coolly. "To prove that you are, I will pull the trigger."

White with terror, he drew back, putting up both hands.

"Don't!" he broke out, breathlessly, careless now of betraying the attempted ruse. "For God's sake don't murder me!"

He must have thought me wonderfully brave. But I had seen what he had not, a strong stalwart figure creeping in at the window just behind him—the figure of Barton Ray! The excitement of the moment was all that prevented him from hearing Barton's entrance, for it was effected too rapidly to be quite noiseless.

I stilled the throbbing of my heart, and schooled my face to make no sign. The first that he knew of the presence of a third person in the room was when Barton thundered in his ear, with the cold muzzle of a pistol against his temple:

"Scoundrel! coward! thief! You are balked at all points. There is nothing left you but to surrender or die."

Dick uttered a yell of surprise and fury, then sank into the nearest chair, cowed and sullen. He saw that the game was up. Barton regarded him angrily a moment and then crossed over and stood beside me.

"What are we to do with this fellow, Gertrude?" he asked. "You shall pass sentence upon him."

The color flamed into my cheeks like fire. I turned my back on Dick, hating and scorning myself beyond all expression that I had ever felt a thrill at the sight of his handsome face with its glitter of perfect teeth, and flash of midnight eyes.

"Let him go free," I said, slowly, feeling it would not be a very fine thing to have said that a quondam lover of Gertrude Wynne's was under arrest for attempted robbery.

Barton pointed to the open window.

"Let not to-morrow's sun shine upon you in Mapleton," he said, loftily, to Dick; and the wretched fellow slunk away, out into the quiet night.

Barton and I were alone. I was all of a tremble now, and he had to support me with both arms, or at least he did so, and I suppose, of course, he must have thought it necessary.

"How came you here?" I asked, not knowing what else to say to him, and feeling an eager desire to set him talking, since in that way he might be made to forget to stare at my burning face so outrageously.

"I have been loitering about the grounds since half past ten," he answered. "I only went home to fetch my pistol, for I was determined to constitute myself your protector, whether you wished it or not, since I scented possible trouble. I am more faithless than was Peter and the sons of Zebedee, however, for, instead of watching, I fell asleep under the hedgerow. Otherwise, Dick Chilton would not have succeeded in effecting an entrance to the house so easily."

And then, dear reader, something very silly happened—something I shall not repeat, and that Barton will never dare to tell so long as he retains a wholesome dread of a woman's tongue.

I have but a single word to add. Mamma is proven a true prophetess in one respect and a false one in another. She always said that Dick Chilton was a devil, which was very true; but she never dreamed that her heroic daughter would be proven a heroine!

P. S.—BY BARTON RAY:—Gertrude, the dear girl, has accorded me permission to write a line or two by way of closing up this narrative, providing that I "tell no tales out of school." But since that is the very thing I was anxious to do, and since the shrewd reader will readily guess the nature of the communication I would gladly have made but for a woman's dixit, I here will make my bow for the second time, and bid you a kind adieu.

THE SPIRIT-LAND.

BY MARY HELEN BOODEY.

Oft in my dreams the scenes of Spirit-land
 Are opened to my sight, my brow is fanned
 By the soft gales wafted from Aidenn's shores,
 Where star-eyed beauty reigns forevermore,
 O lovely Spirit-land!
 Then as my heart's pulsations come and go,
 High swells the tide of happiness below,
 And o'er my spirit falls the wondrous spell
 Of pure entrancing music that doth dwell
 In Spirit-land.
 Ah! many a weary traveller hath found rest
 In the bright land of dreams supremely blest,
 To list the sounding anthems echoing free
 Through each fair bower and softly murmuring tree
 Of Spirit-land!

Then often do we wake and falsely deem
 'Tis but a fickle fancy, phrased a dream,
 Nor think a pitying angel's gentle hand
 Hath led us through the bowers of Spirit-land.
 There mountains rise with ever verdurous sides,
 And oceans roll their oft-recurring tides,
 There broad streams rush along and brooklets sing,
 And beauteous birds are ever on the wing.
 Far lovelier temples through the distance rise
 Than e'er on earth can greet our mortal eyes;
 Their graceful columns wreathed with wondrous flowers
 Of soft, rare tints more beautiful than ours.
 A clear, pure atmosphere, a roseate glow,
 Like morning sunlight flushing spotless snow,
 Lights up the landscape with a softer hue
 Than earth can gain from skies of fairest blue.
 No serpent lifts its head with outstretched fang,
 No touch of sorrow yields the heart a pang,
 But for each blighted hope, each hour of woe,
 Sweet floods of rapture o'er the spirit flow.
 And as a star each effort for the right
 Adorns the spirit's coronet of light.

Love is not blighted in the Spirit-land,
 And there is gathered many a joyous band
 Whose hearts on earth were wrung with grief and pain,
 Whose dearest, faintest hopes bloomed but in vain.
 The aching heart that lost its loved and best
 By realization of its dreams is blest.
 Those who on earth went all unrecognized,
 Their love unsought, their wealth of mind unprized,
 Are welcomed by the gifted and the great,
 Freed from the sorrows of an adverse fate.
 The praise of an unnumbered host above
 Ascends as incense to a God of love.

Thus much my dreams have told me, and my heart
Trusts to the joyful hope my dreams impart.
When sorrow's shades, like thickly falling night,
Close round the heart concealing all things bright,
E'en through that murky darkness shines a ray,
A golden sunbeam from the beauteous day
Of Spirit-land.

AFTER A DRINK.

BY J. P. MILLER.

ONE hot sunny day, some fifteen years ago, the whaler in which my first voyage to sea was made was slowly nearing the specks of land, in the waste of waters of the Pacific Ocean, called the Easter Islands. No one in the ship had ever been there before; but the inhabitants were credited with all the vices and faults in the list, including the trifling one of cannibalism—in the yarns which were spun around the windlass and abaft the try-works, as we neared what we hoped was to be a watering-place.

The boatsteerers, and the one or two old whalers in the fore-castle, told thrilling tales of the fate of unhappy men who had lost their lives from the savage barbarity of the natives, or of marvellous escapes; but where they found their authority for such stories no one could ever discover.

Our faith in the islanders' virtue being so weak, it was little wonder if we looked earnestly and curiously at the green, heavily-wooded island, as we moved lazily towards it on that bright, sunny, summer afternoon; but we saw nothing to warn us of danger—everything was calm and peaceful—and at about four o'clock our starboard anchor went into the water with a splash and a plunge, the anchor chain, ranged abaft the windlass, went over it and out of the hawse-pipe with a great clatter and a cloud of dust. The canvas was rolled up "after a fashion," and the N— lay as still as though anchored in Boston harbor, hooked to the bottom of the Pacific about five miles off a point of land which apparently divided a large bay into two equal portions.

No native had we yet seen; and the officers' careful scrutiny of the shores of the island with their glasses, disclosed no signs of human life.

We had been anchored for several hours, and were scattered about, some on the windlass or try-works, and others sitting on the rail or lying on the forehatch, smoking after our suppers, and discussing the chances of our being able to increase our shrunken but by no means short stock of water at this island, without having any of our number served up for dinner—when we were roused up by the mate, a big, powerful man, with a voice like the bull of Bashan's, and a heart that was a lion's for courage and a woman's for kindness and charity, who gave us something to do by issuing the order, "clear away the larboard boat."

The term "port," as opposed to "starboard," was not then (nor do I know if it is now) so universally used in whaleships as in the merchant service; the "larboard" side and the "larboard watch" being always used in whaler's parlance, and "port" side or watch in the merchant seaman's.

The larboard boat, which is always "headed"—or commanded and steered—by the chief mate (the boatsteerer of any boat steering only after a whale is fastened to, while the officer kills the huge animal with the lance), was cleared of its gribes, the paddles and over-thwart gear, such as irons, lances and spade, hatchet and knives, taken out, the cranes swung from under her, and with Mr. C—in the stern, and his long Martha's Vineyard boatsteerer in the bow, and followed down the side by four men (not the regular boat's crew) whom the mate had selected, she was lowered into the smooth water, and pulled steadily away for the point of land nearest us. They were going on a voyage of discovery, to try and "spy out the land," and find fresh water, if possible, before dark.

We watched them till they were about half way to the shore, when the second mate, who had been talking earnestly with the captain for a few minutes, called out:

"Lay aft here, a couple of you, and get up the muskets;" and as my chum and I were going down the cabin stairs with him, in obedience to the command, we met the third officer coming up with a small sack in his hand, which we recognized as a cannon-cartridge, such as we had made up some months before for our old twelve-pounder signal-gun.

"What's up, sir?" said I, to the second mate, Mr. B.; "think we're going to have any trouble?"

"Don't know of any, Dick," replied Mr. B., "but I want to have things ready if anything should turn up. These black thieves are infernally treacherous—you can't trust 'em any further than you could heave an elephant by the tail. I've seen as much of 'em as I want to."

We got out muskets enough to arm every man in the ship's company with one, and loaded them carefully with powder and ball, of which we had abundance, but no cartridges; and when we returned to the deck we found that the third mate had carefully loaded the old cannon, filling it about half full of spikes, nails, and such bits of scrap iron as could be found—there being no cannon-shot of any kind on board, except a half dozen thirty-two pound ones that were kept in the try-pots to prevent rust from collecting, but which were of course too big for our twelve-pounder.

At eight bells all hands were called aft, and the captain told us that he felt as if every caution was necessary to be exercised, as the people of the island had a bad reputation, and might endeavor to harm us in some way; that it was every man's duty, as well as interest, to keep his eyes and ears open on watch; and concluded by ordering the arms and ammunition to be distributed, and sea-watches to be set—as it was not safe to trust the ship to an anchor-watch of one or two men.

The watch below stood their muskets up in the angle formed by the fore-castle scuttle and the windlass, throwing an old stun'-sail over them to keep off any possible, but not probable, dew, and turned in "all standing," that is, without removing their clothes. The boat-steerers and carpenter saw that their craft (as harpoons, lances, etc., are called) was ready to hand. And the watch on deck marched about, carrying their muskets at every possible angle and in every possible manner, or smoked and yarned on the fore-hatch or in the waist—except two, who were stationed, one between the knight-heads, forward, and the other on the coach-house, aft, as lookouts.

At eleven o'clock, just as the word had been passed to rouse the watch below to take their turn on deck, the lookout aft reported a noise of oars approaching. We supposed it was our own boat, of course, for the South Sea Islanders use canoes propelled by paddles; but the watch was roused in a hurry, and muskets, lances and cutting-in-spades were held in readiness to give any unwelcome intruder a warm reception. The oars, however, did belong to our boat, and were pulled by our men, who were all back again safe—though they bore evident marks of having been handled a little bit roughly. It was pretty certain that they had seen natives, if we had not.

The boat was hoisted up and secured, and then each of her late crew became at once the centre of a group of eager inquirers, all anxious to know what had been seen, heard and done on shore. They had been among the islanders sure enough.

After reaching the point, and seeing nothing particular there, they had pulled along the shore for several miles, and at length saw a small fire some distance back from the beach, which they cautiously pulled in for. This fire we did not see from the ship, though the light at the ship's mast-head was seen by the boat's crew the whole evening.

On the beach they were met by several natives (including a number of women and children), who gave them fruit, and by signs invited them to land, and come up to the fire. For a while their invitations were disregarded, but their manner was so apparently gentle and kind that the men at last inconsiderately left the boat, and were soon mixed up among the islanders, who seemed to be fairly overflowing with hospitality.

Some time had been spent in "becoming acquainted" with their entertainers, when the boatsteerer, who had been the last man to step on shore, and had been jealously watching the boat ever since, having several times visited her to see that all was right, noticed that a much larger proportion of the savages were men than was the case at first, and that our boat's crew was very much scattered. He mentioned his suspicions to the mate—that the savages were gathering, and for no good intent—and the officer at once agreed that the sooner they were afloat the better it would be for them.

The men were warned to get closer together, in as quiet a manner as possible, so as not to attract the attention of the natives, and to look out sharp for any movement on their part. None of the savages spoke English, so the arrangements were easily made, and the crew got within supporting distance of each other, near the fire, without apparently arousing their suspicions.

The mate and his men were armed but poorly for a conflict; the sailors had nothing but their sheath-knives, and the officers and boatsteerer nothing at all, to fight with; while the natives were armed with weapons of wood—two kinds, one a stick about sixteen inches in length, with a large knob on the end, which they throw with unerring aim, and with force enough to break a man's skull, unless he has an unusual supply of that article; the other implement was simply a heavy club, made in various forms, and ornamented with rude carving. How the carving is done I cannot explain, as no iron tools were seen among them but an old hatchet and a boat-hook, probably sold to them by, or stolen from a whaleboat.

The boatsteerer was directed to go down to the boat alone, which he could do without exciting suspicion, having done the same thing several times before since the landing was made. Once there, he was to get out the spare lances and irons from under the thwarts, and at the same time call one of the crew down to assist him. It was hoped that the two men would be able to get their arrangements completed without attracting the attention of the savages; and if they were successful, as soon as they were all ready the mate and his three companions were to start boldly for the boat, in a body. If they were assailed, as they expected and feared to be, then the two men from the boat would be able to lend powerful assistance by attacking the natives who might get between the boat and her crew, with the deadly lances.

The plan was perhaps the best that could be laid under the circumstances; and it succeeded so far that the boatsteerer and one man did get to the boat (round which the natives had begun to cluster pretty thickly), and had got out one lance from beneath the thwarts when the collision took place—the fight commencing at the fire.

The bow-oarsman, Gilbert, had on a Panama hat; and one of the natives, who had been trying to buy his sheath-knife for a lot of fruit and a mat, suddenly snatched the hat off his head, and turned to run. He was not quick enough, however, for Gilbert, a big, raw-boned man, struck him on the side of his head with his clinched fist, knocking him fairly into the blazing fire.

"Out with your knives, men—make for the boat," roared Mr. C.; "come on, K. (to the boatsteerer), use your lances—fight for your lives, men—fight like devils!"

The boat's crew needed no urging. Gilbert, the moment he had struck the native, had snatched a club from another and felled him with a blow that would have killed an ox. The mate had grappled a savage, who, though but a child in his grasp, still managed to retain his weapon, till the black Portuguese from Cape Verd who pulled the midship oar drove a knife into his side—when the mate got his club. He was then an ugly customer to face, for any man. The savages, though probably somewhat taken by surprise at the commencement of the attack so soon, crowded around the little party, striking at them with clubs, yelling, and throwing stones and their short sticks. Several of the sailors had been hurt, but none disabled, when they got close down to the boat—the big mate fighting a passage, knocking out of his way everything that got in it, and cheering on the men all the time; while Gilbert and the other two men defended the rear as best they could. Our men were vastly superior in physical strength, if inferior in numbers; and they knew well that they were fighting for their lives. But all this time the boatsteerer and his man failed to make any diversion in their favor—the fact was, they had their hands full where they were.

When the shout arose at the fire for assistance, K. seized the lance and called on the other man to "grab the boat-hook," which he did; but they were instantly attacked by a crowd of the savages, effectually preventing them from giving any assistance to the mate and his little party. The lance was not the best tool to handle in such a melee, but K. managed to drive it through the naked breast of one unhappy wretch, when a second, who was too close to him to render the long lance available, aimed a blow at his head with his club. K. relinquished his lance and sprang aside in time to escape the club, whose owner he clinched, and the two whirled and twisted in a death struggle for the mastery, the infuriated natives who were crowding round being unable to strike the seaman for fear of injuring their own friend. The boat-steerer had succeeded in getting the club from his antagonist, and had a grasp on his throat with his left hand which would soon have terminated his life, while with the cudgel he kept off the others as best he might, when he was struck a glancing blow on the back of the head by one of the short clubs, thrown at him from a considerable distance. Dazed and reeling with the blow, he dropped both the native and the club, and in a moment was down under the feet of a dozen of the savage wretches. His fate was apparently certain, when the man with the boat-hook made his appearance, and put a new face on the matter.

This man was a son of "ould Ireland;" and in his hands the despised boat-hook had proved far more effective than the trusted lance had been in the boat-steerer's. The handle of the hook was a stout piece of white ash, about nine feet long; and, holding it by the middle, with his two hands, Pat had fought with both ends, using either one to parry or strike with, and occasionally giving some one a punch with the pike, or a tear with the hook. He and his hook were a grand success; and it was well for the boat-steerer that Pat had managed to fight his way round to his part of the boat (they having been on opposite sides of her when the fight began), just as the savages had got the white man to the ground.

A tear of the hook into the naked flesh of a native who was kneeling beside the prostrate man and trying to get a blow at his head, a dozen rapid but heavy whacks of the boat-hook on the unprotected pates of the demons, and Pat waved his improvised shillalah in triumph over the living but still prostrate body of his friend, just as the mate and his men broke through the howling crowd into the open space cleared by the boat-hook.

"Hurrah! boys—here's the boat!" shouted the mate; "give 'em the devil, buillies—we'll weather 'em yet."

A glance told him the whole story (except that he supposed K. to be dead, when he wasn't—for he is living yet), and he gave his orders with the desperate coolness of a brave man who knew that he was expected to save the lives of the boat's crew—if they were to be saved at all.

"Gilbert, Pat—whack 'em back, whack 'em back. You Peanuts and Beef (the 'purser's names' of the two Portuguese sailors), put K. in the boat—the hell-cats shan't have a dinner out of the N—'s crew, by —; then run the boat off and get out two oars." And all the time he was issuing these commands he was beating back the savages from the front, while Gilbert with his club defended one side, and Pat with his boat-hook took care of the other.

The insensible boat-steerer was tumbled into the boat, and she was shoved off the beach, by two Portuguese; one of whom, the black Cape de Verd Islander, carried between his teeth the reeking sheath-knife with which he had sent more than one of the assailants to their long home. It was fortunate for the crew that the boat's bow only was on the beach, so that the two men could launch her; had she been entirely hauled up, not a man of them would have left the beach alive. The moment the boat was afloat, the natives, as if satisfied that a desperate effort only could now prevent the escape of their prey, rushed upon the three men who were still on shore, and dashed out into the water to attack the boat, or perhaps to haul her again on shore.

One native seized the boat's gunwale only to fall back as Beef's knife passed with a jerk across his neck; and another was beaten down by Peanut's oar. But the whalemen were beyond the reach of reinforcements, and such fighting as they were engaged in would soon exhaust them. There were only two things for them to do—escape or die; to conquer was out of the question—for fresh men took the places of the natives as fast as they were knocked over or disabled.

"Now, men," called the mate, to his two companions, all three of them having been gradually forced backwards by the assailants until they were knee-deep in the water, the boat's bow being close to them, and the Portuguese lending a hand at the fight when they saw a chance; "now, men, stand by to jump aboard when I count three; stand by your oars, you two—one, two, three." And with the last word Gilbert and the mate tumbled into the boat, which immediately backed off a few boats' lengths, leaving poor Pat alone, to what seemed a certain death.

Pat, however, had no intention of submitting to his fate with anything of lamblike gentleness. On the contrary, he fought with a cool fury (to coin a phrase—the only one I know that will convey my meaning), that kept the savages from getting any effective blows at him, while he called out to the men in the boat, in tones of agonized entreaty:

"For God's sake, boys, you wout leave me here now?"

He was obliged to retreat further and further into the water by the closing in of the natives, until he was so far submerged that the water seriously interfered with the working of his long boat-hook, one end of which was often below its surface; and another minute would probably have been fatal to Pat, when the boat came once more on the scene.

The mate had got aft to the steering-oar, and Gilbert was seated on his thwart, when Pat was missed; and at the same moment his appeal for help reached their ears.

"Pull in, pull away, pull, boys, pull," ordered the mate, hurriedly, to the two Portuguese; "Gil, get out an under-thwart iron—quick, quick!" And the brave men in the boat again pulled in, ready to face anew the terrible danger from which they had so recently escaped, but not to desert their shipmate in his extremity. The crew had gallantly supported each other—to which conduct they owed the ultimate safety of all their number; the Portuguese seamen might easily have backed the boat out of danger's way when they first got into her, and left the rest to be destroyed; as also might Pat have now been left to his fate, without risking the rest of the crew. Perhaps, in view of the almost hopelessness of saving him, those in the boat would have been justified in refusing to again face the perils of the beach; but they did not stop to consider the matter—they pulled straight in for where the fight was still going on, instead.

Not many strokes were needed to take them there; and the iron from Gilbert's hand transfixed one native, at the same time that the boat's bow struck another, knocking him down; and profiting by the surprise occasioned by this unexpected attack from an enemy they had supposed to have fled, Gilbert grabbed Pat by the hair with one hand and by the arm with the other, and singing out, "stern, stern!" with all his might hauled his man in over the bow, somewhat battered and bruised, and a good deal exhausted, but alive and "as well as could be expected." A few stern strokes of the oars took the boat off into darkness and deep water, and all danger was over.

"By the three geese! but wasn't it warm work?" said Pat, as he settled himself on his thwart and shipped his oar; "but I lost the boat-hook, Mr. C.; couldn't help it, sir—the thieving vilyuns tuck it away from me!"

"O, hang the boat-hook—let it go," said the mate, in spite of himself having to laugh at such an apology at such a time, and under such circumstances. "But have a lookout at K.; see if he's alive, Patrick."

"Yes sir," responded Patrick, and thrusting his hand inside the boatsteerer's shirt, he continued, "alive? It's himself that is, then; hey—wake up, mate; what are yelayin' down here for, and we goin' off to the ship?"

Some salt water on his face soon brought the boatsteerer to, and he was seated in the stern-sheets of the boat; and though still weak and ill, he was able to climb the side when the boat got alongside. Old Beef had a bad hurt on his left side, and all were more or less bruised; but no lives had been lost, nor any serious, permanent injury sustained, by any of the boat's crew.

The utmost vigilance was exercised for the rest of the night, but no other disturbance took place.

The next day was calm; and our officers and captain consulted together as to the propriety of leaving the islands without attempting to procure water, as it was manifestly madness to trust the natives—particularly after what had occurred. The shores of the island seemed as destitute of life as they had when we first viewed them; and the third mate (whose boatsteerer I was), about noon lowered his boat, and pulled in for the land—not intending, however, to try the mate's experiment over again.

We kept a safe distance off shore, and kept a sharp lookout at it, as well; but we saw nothing to alarm us, so we pulled down past the point, on the opposite side from where the mate had gone the preceding evening, for about two miles. Here we found what was evidently a small stream of water, little more than a brook, running into the bay; and we knew it must be fresh water, though we did not dare to land, to test it by drinking; we should not have seen it at all but for a slight break in the dense growth of trees and brush—a species of mangrove growing on the banks of the brook, and nowhere else.

"That's the place, boys," said the third mate; "we must get water there, or not at all."

We returned to the ship without having seen anything suspicious, unless the absence of the natives from sight might be accounted such, and another conference took place among the officers. It was agreed that the third mate (not the second, who generally gets the water, on board a whaleship), who knew where the stream was, should tow a small raft of casks to the watering-place the ensuing night, under cover of the darkness; fill the casks and roll them out as fast as possible before rafting them again, so that they would be, as much as possible, concealed by the salt water, and there anchor the raft, so that it would not be driven in shore again by the advancing tide. As soon as the raft was afloat, it was to be taken in tow, and the "whett" set in the stern as a signal for the other boats, which were then to come down boldly, well-armed, and help get it alongside.

The manner of rafting casks is as follows, two rope beckets are put on each end of a cask, and secured in place by the hoops—four beckets to a cask. A rope is then run through the beckets, the bight of it being around the end of the last cask, so that the casks all follow each other, end on; and are towed with greater ease, once the raft is started, than a single cask with its broadside to the boat.

Our casks had been becketed for some time; so during the afternoon six three-barrel casks were strung together and put over the side, in readiness for our midnight occasion. We cleared our boat, taking out everything but the oars and water-keg; a good lunch was stowed away in her; and a grand mustering of arms took place, to furnish us with the means of defence if we should be molested—which was not expected to happen, as we hoped to be able to get the raft started for the ship before the natives observed us. Once started, we did not imagine they would attempt to interfere; or if they did, a few musket shots were expected to put them all to flight.

As to arms, we made rather a poor show. There were plenty of muskets, but the third mate would take only two in the boat, saying they would only be in the way. Each man was furnished with a cutlass; but of pistols there was a most lamentable dearth, there being but one on board the ship—a wretched little "pepper-box" belonging to the captain, and called a "revolver" from courtesy—which would not go off half the time, and when it did, would hardly have hurt a man at ten feet distance. This Mr. S. (our officer) declined to take, saying he had much rather have a half brick to trust to in a fight.

At about ten o'clock we left the ship with our regular boat's crew (Peanut, the black Portuguese, who had been on shore with the mate, pulling our midship-oar), towing the light raft, and at about midnight we arrived at the break in the woods which was our guide to the brook. The latter we easily found; and by four o'clock our casks were filled, rolled out in the water as far as we could manage it, rafted, and the raft anchored. The tide was still falling, but as the day was breaking we dared not show ourselves any longer; we depended for our safety on being able to conceal our presence from the savages until the casks were floated by the incoming tide, and then getting on board the ship before they could muster in force enough to annoy us.

Having finished the raft, we fisted the boat and ran her up in the bed of the little stream till she was wholly concealed by the mangroves; and then settled ourselves to wait with what patience we might for the raft to float. We stuck to the boat, the mangrove swamp not being a very inviting place to roam in, even if experience had not taught us a lesson. Daylight came; we could see the ship, which was pleasant, and could not see any natives, which was equally agreeable. The sun had got well up, and the tide had risen very perceptibly, and still everything was apparently going on all right. The vague sense of uneasiness which we had felt at first, and which had kept our eyes pretty wide open and our mouths closely shut in the early part of the morning, gradually gave way to a sense of satisfaction at the manner in which we were outwitting the natives, and we chuckled a little bit among ourselves, though in a somewhat guarded manner, certainly.

"The raft's nearly afloat, boys," said Mr. S., at ten o'clock or thereabouts; "we'll be off in half an hour, and the black thieves can bag their heads. Halloo! what's that? Take a look at the ship, Dick."

The exclamation was drawn from him by a low, dull booming sound from the direction of the ship. Jumping into the little stream, from the bow of the boat, where I had been lying, I parted the mangroves and looked out. The ship was all right, and nothing appeared to awaken distrust; but while I looked, a puff of white smoke rose from her waist, and I saw a dark object run up and down from her taffrail to the end of the spanker-gaff, several times. It was the "whett," or recall flag, which did not blow out so as to show well, the day being hot and still. The ship was signalling our return, and running the whelt up and down was to emphasize it. In a few moments the dull boom of the cannon again reached us.

"The whelt's running up and down, sir, and they are firing the gun," I reported to our officer.

"Launch the boat—off with her, boys," said Mr. S., sharply and decisively; "there's a screw loose somewhere; the sooner we're off there the better. Off she goes."

We ran the boat into the water, shipped our oars, and started for the ship. As we passed the raft I remarked, "The raft's all afloat, sir."

"Pull away—never mind the raft; lay back, my lads," was the reply, as we left the anchored casks astern.

The sun was hot, but we pulled a long, sweeping stroke, that was rapidly taking us out clear of the point, when the signal-gun again boomed forth its warning, this time much louder and more startling, as we were considerably nearer than when it was first fired. All hands had been looking anxiously round to discover the cause of the evident uneasiness on board the ship, but nothing had rewarded our search. We knew that we must be visible from the ship, for they knew just where to look for us, and we were less than six miles distant. What could such anxiety on their part mean?

"Lay back, men," said the third mate, commencing to "back up" the after oar for the first time since we started; "lay back; there's the devil to pay somewhere, that we can't see. Spring her, boys, spring her!"

All felt as if, as Mr. S., had said, "the devil was to pay somewhere," and we laid back with a will, shooting our light boat through the water at a rate which soon took us clear of the point. The earnestness of the ship's men was all explained now. There, less than a mile from us, fair abeam, and paddling rapidly for the ship, were at least twenty large canoes, holding probably forty men each. To resist such a force in our boat was hopeless; our only hope of salvation laid in gaining the ship before they did.

As we were pulling straight for the vessel, and the canoes were aiming for the same point, we were of course rapidly nearing each other; our aim was to be ahead of the natives before the converging lines of our respective courses should meet. It was a hard race—to an uninterested spectator it would doubtless have been very fine; but we didn't think much of it. Pulling for life, the stake is too heavy for the contestants to enjoy it. No breath was wasted in talk, for none needed urging to lay out the last ounce of strength. The musket in the bow bothered me a little—I missed a stroke, and tossed it overboard. The third mate said nothing, but ceased heaving on the stroke oar a moment, to toss over the other. So much weight was gone; and that was of more importance than all the fighting we could do, if we were overhauled.

We had reached within a mile of the ship, when it was evident that if there was any advantage in speed, it was on our side—we were certainly a little ahead of the other racers. The savages, a set of naked, howling demons, eager for vengeance, and accustomed to the heat of the climate, plied their paddles with a will; while we were encumbered with clothing (not much of it, to be sure, but still enough to make a difference), and were but a few months away from the cold and cheerless region of sea, north of Behring's Straits. But men will work hard for life—we did. Five minutes more would decide the race, one way or the other.

We had pulled in a direct line for the ship; but the savages had headed a very little across our course, hoping to cut us off, so that some of their canoes were now in our wake, and well astern. But the leading one was a little on our quarter, and not more than a ship's length off. Two years' practice in whaleboats had trained our muscles well, but, though we had many a hard tug after "fast boats," we had never seen occasion for such exercise as this race was giving us, and aching wrists and labored breathing warned me that not many more miles would be needed to finish me; nor were the others less distressed. One man only of our crew seemed fresh—Peanuts the black Portuguese, who bent his long back as he reached the blade of his eighteen foot oar nearly forward of mine, and then bent the stout ash as though it were a bit of willow, without "turning a hair" with sweat. Half blinded with the perspiration which streamed from our foreheads into our eyes, we could not spare even the moment required to dry our faces, but labored on, scarce able to see our oar-blades, the silence in our boat, broken only by the rapid, steady rollocking of the oars and the deep breathing of the rowers, contrasting strangely with the infernal yellings of our pursuers. Mr. S. could see the ship, of course, as he faced that way, but the boat's crew could not, and the third mate could not see the canvas; but neither party could spare an instant to look around. Moments were too precious just then. Peanuts was the first to break the silence which had been observed since we first saw the canoes. Gnashing his teeth at the enemy, he said, half to himself and half to them:

"You black dev! we beatee you," and suddenly elevating his voice to a yell, he continued, "we beatee you?"

"Do we drop 'em any, Dick?" gasped Mr. S., without turning round.

"Yes sir, I think we do, a little," answered I; for I could see that the gap between us had increased.

"Hurrah, boys!" continued the third mate, "they haven't got us yet. Then we bring the ship this way, a boat's length every stroke. I can see the gun-barrels shine—there's men in the tops with muskets. Lay back, boys, another half mile and we're safe."

Encouraged by the prospect of victory in the race, hope and a feeling of defiance lent new vigor to our weakened and over-exerted muscles; and as the sound of a cheer from our shipmates reached our ears, telling us how eagerly we were watched, and how ready our companions were to assist us if possible an answering shout went back from us—drowned though it was in the yelling of the natives.

"Keep your stroke now, men, keep your stroke now," said our officer; "don't hurry your stroke—we'll do 'em brown yet—keep your stroke and lay back; one minute more and we're there. Steady and cool's the word. Ha! there goes a musket."

We heard no report, nor the whiz of the bullet; but a commotion in the leading canoe indicated that some one was hurt. "Aha! you black dev!" screamed Peanuts, "come on; we killee you—you black dev!" [Peanuts himself was black as the ace of spades, but was very fond of applying to other colored men the term "black devil" so often applied to himself.] A moment later and we could hear the report of the muskets which the men in the tops were firing at our pursuers, and the whiz of the bullets over our heads.

Some people may think the whistling of bullets nice music, but I don't. I frankly acknowledge that I prefer even the dulcet notes of the worst hand-organ. But "on this occasion only" I enjoyed the singing of the leaden messengers—and so did the rest of our crew. In spite of himself, and his admonition to us to keep cool, a yell of exultation broke from the third mate, and was joined in by all hands. We had good cause to exult. Several of the natives must have been hit, judging from the confusion in the foremost canoes, which still pursued, but had evidently lost heart in the chase, so that we were rapidly gaining away from them; and we could distinguish the shouts of our shipmates as they cheered us on, mingled with rapid musket-shooting and cursing at the savages. And then came the chief mate's hail, "Pull round the stern, Mr. S., pull round the stern."

"Ay, ay, sir," answered Peanuts; and so suddenly had our spirits risen that something akin to a laugh took place in the boat.

We shot round the ship's stern, and alongside; in a few seconds we were on deck—exhausted, but safe. Each man grasped a weapon to face the foe; but they evidently had no intention to attack. On the contrary, they were paddling as fast as possible to get out of range of the bullets, which were being sent at them from the deck, now, as well as from the tops. The signal-gun, from which the "assorted" charge had been drawn before signalling to us, had been reloaded, and was pointing out of the waist at the canoes. Mr. S. rushed to the galley for the hot poker, and returned with it in his hand to fire the cannon.

"Stop, Mr. S.," said the mate, "for God's mercy, stop. There's no use in killing the poor wretches—they're clearing out as fast as they can, now. Stop firing, men," he continued, shouting to the crew.

The firing soon ceased; but Peanuts, whose blood was up, and who was fairly foaming with rage, saw the captain's "pepper-box" lying on the capstan, snatched it up, ran to the waist, and snapped it at the vent of the signal-gun. For once, the wretched pepper-box went off the first time it was snapped; and a deafening report ensued, the spikes and other missiles spattering thickly in the water around the retreating canoes, and doubtless doing much injury—we had no means of telling how much; while the overloaded old gun kicked square over the main hatch, landing on its back with the carriage uppermost, against the opposite bulwarks.

That was the last shot fired. How many, if any, of the savages were killed, we could not tell; but there were enough of them left to paddle back to the shore again nearly as rapidly as they had come, at any rate. As the canoes neared the land on their return, the captain, who had been looking at them over the rail, suddenly turned to the mate. "Man the windlass, Mr. C.; we'll get out of this hole. Give the boys a glass of grog, sir; I'll send the steward up with the brown pitcher."

The anchor was lifted and our canvas being filled with a light breeze, we soon left the accursed islands astern; and the sun rose next morning on an unbroken horizon of water. Our raft of casks may be anchored there yet—we never went to look after it again; and its loss put us on short allowance of water until we reached Tumbes, in Peru, some time after. If any one wants to go to the Easter Islands for water, he can go; but I shall beg leave to decline keeping him company.

For a week after that race I felt the effects of that half hour's terrible suspense and over-exertion; and it is certainly a human feeling, if not a Christian sentiment, which makes me hope that each of the natives was as much used up as I was. If I ever emigrate from New England, it will not be to the Easter Islands.

AVARON.

BY GEORGE H. COOMER.

"Under the lofty cloisters
Of the abbey of St. John,
For fifty golden summers paced
The good monk Avaron."

SOMEWHERE, I have read a ballad with an opening like this, calling up a thousand visions of the rugged old days, and of histories not written in books. Who was Avaron, save the recluse he seemed? In sooth, I know not, for the beautiful ballad leaves each reader to his dream. Let us subtract thirty from the fifty golden summers, and he shall have trod for a score of years beneath the lofty cloisters—a stately monk, such as few convent piles have sheltered.

Never saw England a period of greater violence than succeeded the usurpation of Stephen. The Empress Matilda, the rightful heir to the crown, invaded the country from Germany, and for the brief season of her triumph the monarch was himself thrown into prison. Robber knights committed outrages in all portions of the land. The great nobles became little better than brigands, and their castles were scenes of riot. During all this outward turmoil, the monk Avaron paced the solemn cloister. So strong of limb he was, and so martial of bearing, as to seem a warrior priest.

Not far from the convent of St. John, dwelt a woodman named Robert, with whom and his good dame abode their daughter Maud. One cannot imagine anything more lovely than this fresh young English girl of the twelfth century. Let the reader picture the fairest creature he has ever known—none love of his glad young days—and then imagine her far away in the time of King Stephen, dwelling "under the greenwood tree." Maud was a poem, wondrous sweet, whose spirit, as read by the neighboring rustics, found but wretched translators.

There was one, however, who felt in the cotter's daughter an interest surprising to himself. This was the monk Avaron; and Maud had come to welcome his holy footsteps. His benignant spirit was sure to leave her happier, sweeter and nobler than when it found her. Well may we imagine the calm delight that Avaron found in this one bright oasis which bound him yet to earth. Sad and stern enough was he in cloister, but in the exercise of a kind of guardian love his spirit passed out of long frozen fountains, out of tempest, or whirl, or cataract, smooth and gentle, and deep, and with a joy unspeakable.

That the contemplative spirit of the monk, wearied with the flights of learning and scarred in the warfare of a world not yet forgotten, should have found pleasure and rest in the exercise of a spontaneous guardianship over one so lovely, was not wonderful. But there was something more than this—a deep, paternal love for the simple and beautiful child, such as she was when he first met with her, for the blushing, rose-lipped maiden, such as she had now become. Often the thought of her colored the page which the holy father read, till he would arise and walk toward the cot of the forester Robert, as if fearing that some great ill was about to befall his gentle charge. Dear is the cost of a loving nature, yet who would exchange it for indifference? Do not its own sweets a thousand times repay the anxiety, from which its worldly way is inseparable?

But if in the midst of stormy memories, and of heart-burnings, which his holy vestments covered but could not smother, the troubled priest found peace in his grateful office of counsellor and guide—no less did beautiful Maud reap benefit from the blessed communion. What knew her rude companions of the sweet conceptions of her heart? What knew the daughter of old Erwolf, or the sister of Gurth, of the Dale?

"They are stocks and stones," mused Father Avaron; "they receive nothing, they reflect nothing; they have no transparency of soul. But my little Maud—Maud, Maud; what a dear, sweet name! O, if evil should befall her! How clear her young fancy. Her soul is like St. Mary's spring in yonder valley. As the sun of her life rises higher and higher, she reflects all beautiful things. Nothing hath she lost of all that I have breathed to her of the wonders of the old time—nothing of the deeds of warriors, of the martyrdom of priests. To her companions, the forest and the heath end all; for the stone takes no impression. I tremble for the rose that may fall, for the fountain that may be drank up by a horrible draught. O, these troublesome times! Yet happier the serf than the baron!"

It was beautiful to see the good father wending his way through the green wood upon missions of charity or gentle consolation. The holy cross gleamed upon his breast like a golden star, wonderfully in keeping with the benignity of his features. Yet in that lofty face, though checked in its worldly impulses by his high and sacred faith, dwelt a spirit of dauntless resolution. Often the bugles broke upon his ear, as the neighboring nobles spurred in the forest chase, and as often, remembering the lawlessness of the times, he feared for lovely Maud.

"What lady of all their castle halls," he mused, "is so fair as she? I have armed her mind against artifice and dissimulation, but where these may not succeed, power and violence may. The daughter of a forester, yet she hath the Norman features—O how like, how like to those that live in my heart! And the name, too, the blessed name of Maud! It is a strange coincidence, as if the sweet spirit reincarnated, had stooped hither to mellow and make dear my seclusion."

Then the holy father would fall to musing upon the past, coming instinctively to the troublesome times of the present—the slaughter of the brave Earl Arundel, and the devastation of many a broad estate. What of the unknown champion, whose deeds filled all the country-side? Where was his abode? and for what especial wrong did he wreak vengeance on Matilda's partisans?

"How life repeats itself!" cried Avaron. "Is it not the same story—devastation and murder, then a knight in dark armor, retribution and terror. It is mine own history reenacted, and methinks, almost, that I have two identities!"

Meanwhile the life of Maud was not without its adventures. Once, in the deep forest which custom had made familiar, she was startled by a charger's tramp, and raising her head, beheld a mounted knight in sable. No less surprised than the young girl, he checked his steed for a moment, but upon the appearance of old Robert, he turned slowly away, not, however, without a graceful gesture of salutation.

When Father Avaron heard of this incident he was somewhat anxious, but he became the more so when a week later, Maud, who had no secrets from the holy monk, told him of an adventure still more stirring than her encounter with the knight. A wolf had pursued her in the forest, but just as he was in the act of springing upon her, the arrow of an expert archer laid him dead at her feet. Her rescuer was a blue-eyed youth, a stranger to all the neighboring rustics, but though his garb was coarse, Maud could perceive that he had nothing about him of the servile air of a cottar. It might have been, Maud thought, that service in the train of some great nobleman had given that mellowness to his manners which none of her rude acquaintances possessed. He seemed a wall thrown out by the stormy sea of that violent period.

Again and again, as by the merest accident, Maud met the blue-eyed youth, who abode, as she learned, with a stout woodman some leagues from Robert's cot. Robert himself was strongly prepossessed in the young forester's favor, for that he could be a boon and brave companion was sufficiently evident. Charming Robert by his ruder nature, he charmed Maud by his gentler. The maiden's soul was all poetry. She would have shrunk intuitively from a villain, however cunningly disguised; but Arthur, her young deliverer, was earnest and noble in his love. If he poured into the girl's impressionable nature a poetry of his own, it was because he felt it. The waterfall, and the birds, and the green leaves were his helpers, and with these he wrote upon Maud's heart. Now no more alone must she listen to brook or bird; another heard for her, and she for him.

The artless nature of his young charge soon unwittingly revealed to Father Avaron the true state of affairs, and the good priest was troubled. He had himself met with Arthur and been favorably impressed by his modest and frank demeanor. But here was a resolution—a venturing forth, never again to return. The thing which had been could never again be. It was not time or distance of which he thought—only change. It was an event which here drew a line separating a certain mellowness, and happiness, and beauty from the present and calling it a thing of the past. O, the misery of putting aside living offices of affection and calling them dead. Were we each morning to place in some beloved hand a bright new rose, would we not in this connection be unconscious of any past, feeling only the sweet flowing present, as if yesterday, to-day and to-morrow were bound together in one? But the border of the past is marked by the last rose. Beyond it are the things that were. So Avaron felt when he thought of Maud and the new channel which the fountain of her heart had found. Yet he knew that this must be—he felt sad, that was all.

With care for the woodland maiden weighing heavily upon his heart, the priest sought a long interview with Arthur; and when the latter rose from the confessional, the good monk's face expressed unusual pleasure. He was satisfied; a sweet peace beamed from his Norman eyes, and he felt that Maud's danger—for he had ever entertained a presentiment of danger to her—must be looked for at other hands than those of her youthful lover. Then the two men conversed of war, and peace, and of political economy, and falling from the lips of a peasant, the martial sentences of Arthur would have surprised any save the good monk Avaron.

"I would that these wretched days were over," cried the latter. "The nominal sway of Matilda is but a mockery. The nobles in her interest have become but brigand chiefs, with no strong hand to restrain their rapacity, or check their vengeance upon supposed enemies. The Count of Blois was ever energetic as affable, and even before he seized upon the throne his name was a power in the land. I could have wished that he had been less ambitious, and that Matilda might have quietly succeeded her father; but since both church and state have acquiesced in the advancement of Stephen; since the crown at his demise can easily be returned to the hereditary line; since we behold the disorders which his brief imprisonment has already brought upon the land, and since no other hand can readjust the confused elements of society, I long for his return to power."

"But how, holy father," said Arthur, "is this to be accomplished? The walls of Arundel Castle, where he lies in durance, are defended by the flower of Matilda's forces. The single black steed and his rider," he added, with a deprecating smile, "would hardly be equal to such an enterprise."

"True," replied Avaron. "I feel that the condition of affairs is almost hopeless. Robert Earl of Gloucester is the soul of his party, and Matilda's enemies cannot make head against her while that nobleman exercises his present authority. Without him, her presence would become intolerable even to her own partisans, for she is weak, imperious and cruel."

"And what the king is to ourselves," said young Arthur, taking up the monk's idea, "such the Earl of Gloucester is to Matilda and her followers. I have it, holy father; without Gloucester, the hands of our enemies fall; with King Stephen at liberty, assured triumph is ours. So simple a proposition solves the problem of our affairs. But the proposition itself, how shall it be realized?"

"I know not," said Avaron, "but thou art young, and mayest yet see the dawn of brighter days. Would that I might have taken myself wholly within the cloister; that I had no anxieties beyond; but the weal of the human race is still dear to me, even the mere earthly weal. Should the fame of Maud's beauty once reach the lawless gentry—should any ill befall her—O my son!"

"But she has a guardian that she dreams not of," replied Arthur; "and besides, holy father, at the first whisper of danger, as I have heard thee say, she must take sanctuary in the abbey."

Maud's danger was greater than they imagined. Her fame had indeed gone abroad; a young, rollicking esquire had stared rudely at her as she passed under his gaze at the cottage door; another had met her in company with the holy father; and even the fierce baron, Sir Ralph de Montmorencie, had drauk to the forester's daughter.

It was not long subsequent to his interview with Arthur, that Avaron was surprised by the arrival at the abbey in the darkness of evening, of Maud and her parents, escorted by several horsemen, among whom a knight in black armor was the most conspicuous figure. A band of lawless retainers of the train of Montmorencie had attempted to abduct the young girl from the cottage, and were just placing Maud forcibly upon a palfrey, when a small band headed by the knight in sable, charged them with irresistible fury.

"I had received intimation of the enterprise," remarked the dark warrior, apart to Avaron, "but had nearly been too late."

"Thanks, O thanks to the Virgin for her blessed interposition!" cried the good monk.

"And now," said the sable knight, "I will leave Maud in the keeping of the holy sanctuary. I have a mission which brooks little delay. Tell her that thou hast met with Arthur the woodman; that his heart is with her, but that business involving her hopes and his has for the moment called him to a distance. Adieu, holy father, till we meet again!"

A night and a day passed, and then Sir Ralph de Montmorencie attacked the abbey with his fierce retainers. It was a monstrous and sacrilegious act, but one to which there could be no successful resistance. In the confusion of the assault, Father Avaron led Maud and her parents from a secret postern, and they fled through the darkness, finding shelter in a wild covert of the green wood.

There was almost a fierceness in the air of the monk. His stalwart figure seemed taller, broader-shouldered, and more warrior-like than ever before; and how bitterly, how vehemently he spoke. But after the first ebullition, as Maud cowered close beside him in the sylvan dell, he seemed recalled to his calmer self.

"My child, my blessed child!" he said, "they cannot harm thee—surely there must be a way opened for thy deliverance. I know not why, but even in this terrible moment, I feel a presentiment of approaching good to thee and to all of us. This wretch who has invaded the sanctuary is the son of one who was himself guilty of monstrous crimes. Thou hast not been the first to suffer from the villainous race of Montmorencie."

The gray dawn had begun to light the faces of the concealed fugitives, and the forester looked inquiringly and almost with alarm towards the holy father as he spoke.

"Years ago, good Robert," continued the friar, "the elder Sir Ralph wooed a maiden who rejected his suit. She was highborn as beautiful, and many a proud baron knelt at her shrine. The lady's choice, however, fell upon a nobleman whose deeds in arms had already won him the favor of both king and people. They were wedded. A twelvemonth passed, when an uprising of the great barons called the happy bridegroom forth in the service of the king. In his absence, his castle was attacked by Montmorencie, but the Lady Maud, such was the name of his beloved, fled to the forest, as a second Maud has this night done, and for the moment escaped his hand."

"On the subsequent day, however, Sir Ralph de Montmorencie, Sir Geoffrey de Bohun and Sir Hugh de Grantmesnel scoured the greenwood in pursuit. It was arranged that the beautiful fugitive should be the prize of him who might first secure her. This brutal agreement they deemed a most excellent jest. At length they espied the lady fleeing at their advance. Her flight lay towards a cliff overhanging a rapid torrent, and inaccessible to horsemen."

"Mine, mine is the Lady Maud!" cried Montmorencie, flinging himself from his charger and leaping up the cliff. "Mine, Sir Hugh, not thine!"

"Hardly had he spoken, when stumbling in the rugged way, he fell with a force which forbade all further progress."

"The gigantic baron, Sir Hugh Grantmesnel, sprang furiously past him. The Lady Maud had reached the summit of the cliff, and was prepared for a leap below. The baron stretched his hands to grasp her—but in the forest there crouched an unseen figure. Stooping on one knee, a stout woodman drew his bow, the cloth yard arrow sped; and Grantmesnel, throwing his arms aloft, fell stark dead upon the rock!"

"Heaven's blessing upon the head of him who would have saved the Lady Maud! Vain, alas! was the act, as it was daring, for at that very moment she leaped from the cliff. The retainers of the slain nobleman caught a moment's glimpse of her floating garments as the swift torrent whirled her away. In vain they pursued the woodman; he vanished in the forest; and the story of this terrible scene was left to be related by the vassals who witnessed it. None ever heard of the woodman more, nor of the hapless Maud. O, how like to thee, my daughter, how like to thee!" he added, turning to the forester's child.

"And didst thou know her, holy father?" asked Maud.

Robert the forester dropped upon his knees at the feet of the monk.

"Holy father," he cried, "I fear that I have done a deadly sin in thus far withholding from thee a confession long since due. I myself am the woodman whose arrow was met with the blood of Grantmesnel. But I have more to say. Returning to the scene of the catastrophe, when the ferocious enemy had departed, I discovered that the lady had been miraculously preserved from instant death. The swift current had swept her beneath a rock, hiding her from the view of those upon the cliff. Still able to walk, she accompanied me to my cabin where my good dame attended to her needs; but a week later, upon the birth of her sweet little girl, the beautiful lady died. Meanwhile I became aware that Grantmesnel's retainers suspected me of having slain Sir Hugh, and to escape their vengeance I removed to a distance.

"The child became the idol of our household; and not even to thee, when long afterwards I first saw thy blessed face, did I make confession of the truth, lest in some manner the angel should be taken from our hearth and bestowed among the great. What became of her father, in those turbulent days, I could never learn, further than that he in some way fell under the displeasure of the king and was imprisoned at the very time of the catastrophe; but as to Sir Geoffrey de Bohun and Sir Ralph de Montmorencie, they were both struck down and cloven from crown to chin, by a knight whom no man knew."

"My child, my blessed child!" cried Avaron. "Thus the whispers of nature have been true through all these years! Myself was the Lord of Oakland. The machinations of Montmorencie made the king my enemy, and I was imprisoned. I pierced the dungeon wall to reach those who had destroyed my fame and desolated my hearth; and, vengeance once appeased, I sought the cloister. Beautiful, marvellously beautiful, even in our days of trouble, are the dispensations of Heaven. Thou, sweet Maud, didst spring up as a flower almost by the portal of my cell. But hark! It cannot be that our enemies in pursuit would sound the bugle!"

Avaron started to his feet, and as he did so, the sound of trampling horses from two opposite directions smote his ear. The beams of the rising sun, lighting a narrow glade, flashed upon the armor of two opposing squadrons.

"What have we here?" cried the monk. "The sable knight, as I live! and opposed stands the son of him I slew."

"Montmorencie! Montmorencie!" "Arundel! Arundel!" and the two stalwart noblemen with their heavy armed squadrons, thundered to the shock. In a moment all was over.

"The blessed saints be praised!" exclaimed Avaron. "Thou art saved, my child, and thine enemy is gone to his account! His retainers are fleeing in terror!"

The fugitives stepped forth to view, nor need I describe the greetings that passed.

"Arthur, Earl of Arundel," said Avaron, "let me present thee to the Lady Maud, daughter of Ethelwald, Earl of Oakland."

Lord Arundel dashed the helmet from his head.

"Mine own Maud," he cried, "dost thou recognize Arthur the woodman in this cumbersome garb of steel?"

There was no mistaking the deep blue eyes and sunny clustering locks, and Maud threw herself into the mailed arms of her lover.

"Thus," cried Arundel, "have I avenged the slaughter of my father and the desolation of his estate. The Montmorencies are vile from root to branch, and he who would have ruined thy hopes and mine, helmed but the baseness of him who defamed the brave Earl of Oakland, my father's friend, and made desolate his hearthstone by the murder of his young bride."

In the vehemence of her feelings Maud would have spoken of the revelation so lately given, but a gesture from Avaron restrained her. Not here—not before those rude warriors, would he be sought but the holy father.

"My bands are strong," said the Lord of Arundel, "I have possessed myself of the abbey and dispersed many of my men through the forest, in quest of both friends and enemies. For weeks I have been mustering forces for a secret enterprise from which I but this morn returned to find you in such imminent peril. At the monastery, holy father, thou wilt find Robert, Earl of Gloucester, whom I captured as he rode in the chase."

"Then," replied Avaron, "assured triumph is ours, for the earl's ransom must be found only in the person of King Stephen."

And thus it was; Matilda's party, struck with consternation at the captivity of its champion, at once offered the king in exchange. Under the able head of Stephen, his oppressed partisans rallied, a compromise was effected, whereby the son of Matilda was designated as the king's successor upon the latter's demise, and the imperious princess retired from the land.

Arundel and beautiful Maud, in the presence of King Stephen, were linked by Avaron in the holy bonds; and not till the rite was over did the king or his great baron learn the worldly name of him who wore those sacred robes.

Days of peace succeeded, and blessed were the visits of the holy father to Arundel Castle. Years later, his declining hours were soothed by the ministrations of the gentle Maud; and when he had departed, the brotherhood of the monastery wondered what had been his human record.

"The holy fathers knew not,
But they buried Avaron
Under the lofty cloisters
Of the abbey of St. John."

SAVED FROM DEATH.

BY LOTTIE BROWN.

"GUILTY!" When that word rang through the crowded court-room, there was not a sound to break its awfulness. It struck like a heavy blow upon the silence, and made the hearts of every listener for an instant thrill with pity. Some one was doomed to death. Somebody stood on the boundary of eternity, with all life's worth and wealth luring him back, with mocking smiles and scornful eyes.

A hush for a moment hung like a cloud over the assembly, then there burst forth a dry, tearless sob, and some one with a wailing, despairing cry said:

"Father!"

Then all again was silent, but eager eyes peered sharply to discover the owner of that grief-broken voice, and heads were bent earnestly forward. Then there came a shuffling of feet, and the officers with the prisoner came down the room.

He was a magnificent specimen, and seemed to verify the words, "God created man in his own image." He towered several inches above any one near him, and his chest was broad and perfectly developed. A handsome head with a broad forehead, white as milk near the hair, and bronzed a little lower down, as was the entire lower portion of his face, exhibited a thoughtful and generous nature, and his eyes were tender as a woman's. There was not a sign of distress save the grieved white lips, otherwise the face was as serene as a summer's day. Just behind him walked a child—his child you knew at once, by the striking resemblance—a little girl of eleven or twelve years of age. There was not a tear in the glittering brown eyes, but her face was white and rigid as death, and her tiny hands clenched fast together, betrayed a fearful struggle within.

"You will not drive me away yet, will you?" she pleaded, as they neared the door. "I want to talk with poor father."

"I've nothing to say about it. I can't let you go below with us, but I guess you can come to-morrow," said the officer.

"Can't I go now?" she asked, grasping his arm.

"No, not now."

She said not a word but sprang forward and clung to the prisoner.

"Mary, little daughter! Do you forget poor mother?"

"No, no, no! But what can I say to her? How can I tell her? What can I do?"

"Tell her to pray for me, and trust in God. Be a brave little girl, and comfort her as I would."

She stood up.

"And I shall tell her that I'll die to prove you a good man; and, father, I shall do it."

She stood aside and watched them as they walked down the hall, and disappeared; saying to herself, "Yes, I'm going to save him. He shall not die, he shall not be—" her white lips trembled at the word, "hang." She did not notice the crowd that was surging through the open door and rudely pushing her. She saw nothing but the path he had taken down the hall into the open air. Her brown eyes were dull and vacant, and her lips cold and white. It was a strange sight, and the curious crowd gathered in hundreds about her. She did not see them; a hazy, filmy veil seemed spread before her eyes, and a numbness like death possessed her.

"It's poor little Mary Neilson," said a kindly voice, from the crowd; "some one order take her home."

"Little Mary," said a woman, stepping forward and taking her hand.

She did not hear them, but when the woman's arm stole around her, she sank bereft of life and strength into her lap.

"She must go home," said the woman. "Poor thing! she's a weakly creature, and this has proved too much for her. No wonder. Poor Neilson!"

"Hush!" The thin hand was raised. "Hush! He will not die. Some one says it is all well. Some one says, 'Mary, don't cry,' and Mary will not. I can see him climbing a hill where purple flowers and long-stemmed grasses wave their heads. There is a river at his feet, in which pebbles and yellow sand are lying as thick as they can lie. Now he's walking swiftly over the plain, talking wildly, and turning back to the white house away up on the hill. Then he goes on, on, on, O, so very fast that I cannot—O, I cannot—yes, I see him. It is the train which passed under the bridge below our house, and he is going away in it. O! O! mother, mother!" She threw out her hands, and her face expressed the wildest emotions with fear and horror predominating. "Right down over the steep, slippery bank with a fearful crash. Don't you hear them groan? See, they are bringing them out all covered with—O! with blood! There he is, but, he is not dead. There's a cut upon his head, and his arm hangs down at his side."

A convulsive spasm passed her face, and she moved wearily, and the awe-struck crowd pressed nearer.

"He is very weak and sick. I cannot speak to him. He is miles on miles away. It is a little bit of a house, on a broad field where there is not a tree in sight. There are flowers and grass, a lot of it, and when I look away off, it looks like water. They will take care of him and make him well, but he should not toss and growl so much. He talks about some one—some woman, I think—I am not sure, for I cannot hear her name."

Again that terrible convulsion swept her face, and she passed her hand across her brow. Her eyes grew again bright and deep, and she stood up with an effort, and looked in wonder upon the crowd.

"Are you ready to go home, Mary?" asked the woman who had held her.

"Yes. I forgot where I was. Have I been asleep?"

"Perhaps so."

The crowd parted, and allowed her to pass with a deference and tenderness they might give a queen, and with her companion the condemned felon's child passed out.

It was a wonderful case. Months before young Ray Berkely had disappeared. Neilson was foreman in the great factory of which he was a joint owner. They never agreed. From the hour of his coming, with his vague ideas of mechanism, gathered from books carelessly read, and from men who knew less than himself, there was open warfare. For fifteen years Neilson had lived in the heart of that great, noisy crashing mass of animated iron and steel, and there was not a bolt nor bar, screw nor valve, that he was not as familiar with as with his own name. He smiled at first at young Berkely's suggestions, but when he found the man in earnest, he stepped forward with the superiority of a practical machinist, and remonstrated against the foolhardy alterations which were then under consideration. Berkely was not a snob, but his education had given him as vague and indefinable ideas of equality as of machinery, and when Neilson, in his rough overalls and dirt-begrimed face, came forward and stood there beside him, in his snowy linen and perfectly fitting broadcloth, he felt a right to order him, with a severe censure for his boldness, back to his work.

Neilson obeyed, but his teeth left a mark upon his under lip, and from beneath his sullen brows he shot an angry glance at his perfumed superior.

"It's no use, Ray," expostulated the senior partner, his uncle. "Neilson has managed the works for fifteen years, and the profits have been immense. It is all folly to think of making alterations."

And Berkely went away muttering about old fogies and ignorant louts.

He was betrothed to Genie Hosmer, the heiress of Riverland, a fine old estate situated upon a high hill which overlooked the river. In these stormy days her heart and temper were sore tried. He seldom came without a bitter story of his miserable attempts at alterations, and innumerable curses for Neilson and other rebellious spirits, which seemed to hold, in a demoniacal power, the entire control of his mighty machines in the old factory.

He became like a haunted creature, and wandered in feverish restlessness, pursued forever by the intricacies of his works, and their presiding genius, Amos Neilson.

One night Genie Hosmer said as she stood at her door:

"I am half afraid to trust you, Ray. The servants say that there is a great stir among the workmen. Your desire to reduce the power will throw many out of employment, will it not?"

"Yes, and save one half the expense under which we are now laboring."

"But you are making money enough. Neilson is an old workman and understands everything well, and why don't you let it go on? Let Neilson have his way. He knows best."

Poor Genie was terrified by the look he gave her.

"And so you turn away from me! O God, Genie, I believe I am growing crazy."

He did not pause to say good-night, but hurried away through the darkness, and she in her heart half believed him right when he spoke of growing crazy.

It was a heavy night, with only an occasional flash of blue light to break the dense darkness, and very few ventured beyond the village street. There was sufficient to keep them busy, and those who were not at home were in the barroom, the post-office or the stores, talking and commenting upon the strange battle between Berkely and Neilson.

A little past eight Neilson looked into the grocery store, and said to one:

"Have you a horse here, James?"

"No, I walked down. Do you want him?"

"It is no matter. I am going over to the Hill to get the doctor; my wife's a little out to-night, and I thought if you had your horse here I would borrow him for an hour or so. However, I can walk about as well."

"It's a little duskish, aint it?"

"Yes."

He walked away, and the crowd went on with their gossip. On the following morning Neilson made his appearance in a pitiful plight. He was as pale as death, and over one eye, a long cut extended quite across his temple, back beneath his hair. A fall, he said, from the plank bridge, which spanned the river a little way below the highway, had caused it. He ventured, on his way home from the Hill, to take the footpath through the woods, and the planks gave way and let him fall into the water. No one doubted him then.

Before night the town was noisy with inquiries for Berkely. He had not been seen since he left Genie Hosmer at her door, and he could not be found within the limits of the town.

Just at nightfall, a party of laborers, crossing the plank bridge where Neilson had met his accident, found a glove, a handkerchief and a knife. The glove was torn in several places, and the handkerchief which bore the letters R. B., and the clasp-knife, were covered with blood.

Of course they were identified as belonging to the missing man, and immediately the air was thick with blood and murder. Before noon on the following day, Amos Neilson lay a hopeless, helpless prisoner in the jail.

The well-known feud which existed between them was sufficient to convince the public mind that Neilson had killed Berkely, and other circumstances combined to make as clear a case of wilful murder as ever came before a court of justice.

Neilson had a few friends. The senior Berkely was one. He too thoroughly understood the honest, high-spirited fellow to doubt him, and knew the nature of his nephew too well to deem him incapable of suicide, or any other rash, impetuous deed which his ill temper suggested. He testified to the fact that Ray left him on the night of his disappearance, in a perfect fury. The combatants had exchanged words during the day, and Ray swore to be avenged. He even begged his uncle to discharge Neilson, and fairly ground his teeth in rage when he refused him.

Miss Hosmer's testimony verified the truth of Mr. Berkely's statement. Ray was in a state of terrible excitement, and seemed capable of doing anything to rid himself of the troubles which were pursuing him.

The testimony of the workmen went further. Occasional threats from Neilson were distinctly remembered, and the conversations between the two were many of them entirely repeated.

Others, ten or twelve at least, recognized the clasp-knife as having belonged to the prisoner, and the evidences of a struggle were clear in Neilson's pale face, and the bruises which were afterwards discovered.

It was fully believed, that on his return from the Hill he overtook Berkely, and that they resumed their quarrel and a fight ensued, in which Neilson conquered, but he denied all knowledge of the affair. He stood up before his accusers, when they sought to beg a confession from him, and only replied:

"I am innocent, so help me God!"

In the spring-time he had his trial, and they led him back to his cell, a condemned man.

Through the dreary days of his imprisonment little Mary had been his comforter. She had flitted from the bedside of her sick mother to his dismal cell, and worked with a will which shamed many a woman. She had so much faith in her father that she could not believe they would condemn him. She had told him so, with a radiant, smiling face, day after day, when he sat gloomy and despondent, and many times cheered him so well that he began also to have hope. But the blow came, and crushed and broken, he reentered his cell, from which he was never to come forth until he came forth to die.

From the hour of the strange scene in the courthouse, which one imputed to hysterics, another to clairvoyance, and one or two willfully skeptical ones to her own artfulness, little Mary became bright and cheerful. She went on with her work, with a courage and light-heartedness surprising to every one.

Neilson was condemned to die, but the day of his execution was indefinable, and she reminded every one who came near her of this fact.

"My father may be saved—" she would quietly say.

Miss Hosmer was her best friend. In her grief for her betrothed her generous heart did not forget the more than orphaned child, and in each other's company these bereaved ones found great comfort.

"If Mr. Berkely had only listened to you, Miss Genie, he would have been happier. Don't you think so?" asked Mary, one day.

"To me? What did I say?"

"Did you not tell him to be content with what he had?"

"Yes, but who told you?"

"I don't know. Somebody did. Somebody tells me a great deal of late. But, Miss Genie, it is not clear. There's a great load upon my head. I often think that if you would put your hand there, it would all go away. You or somebody like you. Sometimes when you take my hands there's a strange feeling goes up, away up into my shoulders, and it pricks, pricks, like many little pains."

A faint smile came to Genie's white lips. She prayed that she had no mesmeric power to touch this strange child, and wake her slumbering spirit to action, for to her it seemed horrible.

"Will you rub my head, only just a little, Miss Genie?"

She mechanically put forth her hands and laid them up on the low white forehead.

"O Genie, how pleasant it seems. It all slides away like a heavy great cloud, and I feel, O Genie, as though I stood away up on a tiny place in the blue sky, with nothing but air, air, air!" Don't move your hand! If you do I'll fall! O, there's a strange face—I've seen it before. It is one that would bring you, and me, and others a world of pleasure. I'm going to bring it here. It would have been here days ago, but for that rolling field, and the lame arm, and the bad temper that would not let the arm get well. It can't be a great way off. And yet it looks so strange—so white and calm, and it used to be dark and stormy like the Hill on a winter's night. There'll be a great time in the street. They will shout and laugh as you and I will. Genie, do you see that face?"

"No, child," answered Genie, with a shudder.

"You will by-and-by. You'll be very glad to see it. I suppose you'll see it clearer than I do. Sometimes it is hid away from me, by a crowd, or smoke, or a hill. Strange things come up, but I never lose it. I always know where it is, even if I don't see it. O the garden, the air, the flowers, Genie—"

The little head fell back upon her arm, and the child lay motionless as a corpse. A desire to keep the reappearance of this singular state a secret, possessed her, and gently removing her head to the sofa she arose and fastened the door. The long windows were open, but she knew that none of the servants would enter there, and throwing a shawl over the child she sat down beside her. Through the long afternoon she slept, breathing with a regularity that indicated peace in mind and body. Miss Hosmer would not awaken her, for she knew that she was exhausted, and needed rest, and twilight crept on, and still she sat there.

With the increasing darkness came a desire for company, but not caring to arouse any one, she drew the lace curtains and lighted a lamp.

"Genie! Why, I'm still here!" And Mary suddenly sat up and looked wildly about her.

"Yes, dear. You have been sleeping all the afternoon. Hark! There is some one on the piazza. I wonder who has called at this hour?"

"Shall I go?"

"Not yet. Whoever it is, I shall be at leisure to entertain you until I can send one of the servants home with you. It is not safe to go alone. I do not feel like seeing visitors."

There was a rustle at one of the curtains.

"If you say so, Genie, I will go away again." And Ray Berkely sprang in and stood before her.

She could not speak. Her eyes were wild with terror, and had he not caught her with his warm, living hands she would have fainted and fallen to the floor.

"Why, Genie, are you frightened? You look as though you had seen a ghost."

"I thought you one. Are you alive, or am I dreaming?"

"I am alive, I believe, and you are awake; but if this young lady does not cease her strange antics and tears, I shall believe neither one nor the other."

In five minutes he knew the whole story, and with tears in his eyes he turned to Mary, who in her happiness was crouched upon the floor at his feet, and gathered her up in his arms.

"Thank God, that I am not too late."

"And to-morrow we will go and open the prison doors, and lead poor Neilson home in triumph."

"No, Genie, not to-morrow, but to-night. Think, darling, how wearily each hour drags to a condemned man. To-night he must know it; he must be liberated if it can be done."

In his lonely cell Neilson sat counting the hours as they dragged on, or pacing up and down, praying, moaning, begging for mercy, when through the clear air came a confused murmur of voices, that swelled into a roar and echoed like thunder in his ears. Some one was coming rapidly down the corridor, with loud cries. Impatient hands were at the door, and when it opened, a flood of light streamed upon Mary, Miss Hosmer and—O, it could not be!—yes, Ray Berkely were dragging him forth.

How he ever came out beneath the free blue sky he never clearly knew. He only felt himself borne above a crowd who were shouting his own and Berkely's name, and soon after was kneeling in peaceful silence by the bedside of his happy wife.

"I fled from Riverland," said Berkely, in telling his story, "and ran hastily down the footpath across the plank bridge. Upon the bridge I fell, and as a moment before I had taken my knife to cut a staff from the hedge, it was of course my fortune to cut myself severely. I instantly tore aside my glove, and wrapped my hand in my handkerchief. This did not stay the bleeding, and angrily I threw them all away and gathered some leaves from a bush beyond the bridge. I walked on all night, and part of the following day. Then I became exhausted, and at the first town, found the depot, and entered the cars. I travelled night and day for nearly a week, not knowing nor caring whither I was bound. At the end of the seventh day we were thrown into a deep and rock-bottomed valley, by the carelessness of the engineer, and there I paused. I was dragged from the wreck with a broken arm, and a terrible cut upon my head. In a cabin on the prairie I found a resting-place; and there I worried myself into a fever, and cursed myself and all the world. Something came over me while I lay there, a calmness, a knowledge of my folly and wrongdoing. When after months of suffering I arose from my bed, I felt like a new being. Neilson, you and I can thank God together."

"I knew it would be so, did I not, Miss Genie? Somebody or something told me so. It never came before, but in our great trouble it saved mother and me, and perhaps all of us." And Mary laid her head upon her father's arm. The works went on as they had gone for fifteen years, and Berkely had so much faith in Neilson, that a year ago he admitted him into the firm.

Old ladies tell long tales of Mary Neilson's gift, but she has forgotten it, and only calls it a dream, or any name that occurs, as seems the whole of those dark months in her young life.

SAVED BY A RING.

BY FENNO HAYES.

HE had heard the boat's keel grate on the sand half an hour before, and he knew his ship but waited for him in the harbor below to up with her anchor and away, and when before had he been last on board? Standing in the deep embrasure of a window, a glance without now and then showed him the two sailors walking impatiently up and down the beach, but still he lingered, watching a little figure that danced as lightly as if Captain Charley Grayson's ship was just coming into port instead of being just ready to leave it; or as if Captain Grayson were no more to her than any other sailor that came and went from Rockport.

The least bit of a figure it was, with great, deep, baby-blue eyes, a skin white as milk, a mouth like a ripe cherry, and hair, not gold nor flax, but just yellow, with not a straight inch in one of its curling threads. Captain Grayson looked at this pretty creature, and asked himself if it wasn't all a dream that that cherry mouth had kissed him only the night before; that the yellow curls had floated over his shoulder while the baby-blue eyes had looked up in his dark ones, with tears for his going. Why she hadn't missed a dance that evening but never once had danced with him, and as for the air at the north pole, that he had breathed more than once, it wasn't to be compared to the atmosphere that surrounded her for him, though there were smiles enough, and to spare, he thought, for everybody else.

What did it all mean? Was it true, what Basil French said of her, that Genie Lawton was the veriest flirt in Christendom? He couldn't—he wouldn't believe it. Well, the stars were growing pale in the skies, and he must be gone. But he must speak with her first, if he had to interrupt her in the midst of a dance. Did she think he could vow everlasting love to a woman one night, and leave her the next for a voyage half round the world without a word?

Fortune favored him a little, for just then, for the first time since he had entered the ballroom, Genie stood a little apart and alone between the dances. Captain Grayson crossed the room and said, almost imperatively:

"Come out into the garden a minute, Genie. I must be gone in five minutes."

"Indeed, Captain Grayson," she answered, coldly, "the dew would do neither me nor my dress good, I fancy. Since you are going, good-by." And quick as a flash she slipped a ring from her finger and as she gave him her hand as if in farewell, she left the ring—the ring that had been his token of betrothal—in his hand as she withdrew her own.

Then the music began again. Somebody came up and claimed Genie for the dance, and Captain Grayson found himself out in the garden alone a moment afterwards, without the slightest recollection of coming thither. The ring was still in his hand. Should he cast it away? Somehow he could hardly do it. She had worn it on her little white hand, and he was one that was slow at unloving. And as he held it, feeling more bewildered than angry yet, Basil French, his old friend, came up the walk.

"You here, Charley?" he said. "Why, I thought you out of sight of land by this time. What's up, old fellow?"

"Everything," said Grayson, impulsively, opening his hand and disclosing the ring.

Basil French laid his hand on his friend's shoulder.

"I didn't think you were so hard hit, Charley. She has served you better than most," he added, a little grimly; "I think her jewel-box must be quite well filled."

At that the ring sped out of Captain Grayson's hand with emphasis.

"Good-by, Basil," he said. "My men have waited long enough for this fool's play."

Basil French remained a while longer in the garden after Grayson's departure, pacing up and down the walks with a quick step, and smiling once in a while as if his thoughts were pleasant, and yet the moonlight falling full on his face scarcely showed a pleasant smile. Once he stooped and picked up something and put it in his pocket.

"Who knows but it may save me buying?" he said, in a low undertone. "Two engagement rings exactly alike would be a romantic coincidence, and all women love romance—pretty fools!"

"You've had a merry night of it, haven't you, child?" said Mr. Lawton, as the carriage whirled them homewards at last, just as the gray dawn was peeping over the hills. "I was such an old fool, seeing you so gay, that I couldn't bear to take you away, and here's daylight close at our heels. Come, your old father is about as good to you as any of those young popinjays could be that were so thick round you to-night—eh, Genie?"

The young girl crept a little nearer her father and laid her cheek fondly against his. How happy he thought she was, his gay, light-hearted Genie! If everybody could be so cared for and protected as was this fair child of his! Ah, but there is no garrison for a woman's heart, no fortress through which the arrow of treachery and deceit may not find its mark.

Virginia Lawton's feet had been much lighter than her heart that night, for she was proud and had plenty of spirit, for all her childish look, and no man should imagine that she wore the willow for him. She had come into the ballroom with a shadow on her bright spirit, it is true, for the parting that was so near; but to be wretched when one loves and is loved again is hardly possible. Youth, and hope, and love build such rainbow bridges across absence. Some caprice had led her to ask of Grayson not to speak of their engagement to her father.

"Wait till you come back, Charley," she said. "You know it is all right, for he likes nobody so well as you. He's such a tease I should have no peace of my life if he knew."

Grayson had told her he should not be able to come early to the hall—he was so busy getting ready to sail; but come he certainly would to dance at least one dance with the "sweetest lass in all the round world," to whisper something besides "good-by" in "the ear that no sea-shell of any shore he ever trod matched."

Perhaps some memory of words like these haunted her brain, for her cheeks were like rose leaves and her mouth smiled as if some one were speaking to her as she stood by a window alone.

It was but for a moment; then some one came up. Of course she had a bright smile for Basil French. Wasn't he Charley's best friend—the man who owed his life to her gallant lover?

He was a handsome, frank, open-hearted looking fellow, you would have said. His forehead was broad and white with brown hair waving back from it, his nose straight and shapely and his mouth smiling. If there was any fault to be found with his face it was with his eyes. Perhaps it was their being so very light that made them seem cold. At any rate the smile of his lip never crept up to them. Of easy address, notably good-tempered, Basil French was a universal favorite.

"Do try to console me, Miss Lawton," said French. "I'm as much in the dumps about Charley Grayson's going as if I were Laura Rice herself."

It can't be denied that a little sudden pallor came over Genie's cheek at these words, and a strange feeling of constriction seemed around her heart, but she answered lightly:

"And who is Laura Rice? and why should she be disconsolate about Captain Grayson's departure?"

"O, a little girl over to Middleton that he's saying good-by to now, I suppose. Charley always tells me all his love affairs, and as it's 'off with the old love and on with the new' at every port with him, they make quite a list. But there's Davenant, that I've been trying to find all the evening. Excuse me, Miss Lawton," and he was gone.

Genie felt one minute as if she were ice and the next fire. Basil French had spoken so carelessly and yet so assuredly, and she knew very well that if Charley Grayson had a friend in whom he confided it was Basil French. But yet he could never have spoken of her to him, for French's manner hadn't a shade of meaning in it. She couldn't think he lied, for even if he had the disposition, which had never been attributed to him, where was the motive? Then came little memories that stung like scorpion bites. How often Charley Grayson rode over to Middleton, a town four miles distant, and it was to be remembered that he never spoke of why he went. Laura Rice? Yes, she had heard of a girl by that name there, said to be very beautiful. How willing Grayson was not to speak to her father of their engagement. "His first, his only love," he had called her—"a love in every port," said Basil French. "What does a woman know of men?" she thought bitterly; and then Virginia Lawton, fiery and impulsive, made up her mind that her name at least should be off this gay gallant's list. And all the while these thoughts rankled in her heart she danced and smiled as if she hadn't a care in the world.

Captain Grayson was late, very late—"quite a ride to Middleton," thought Genie, scornfully—but when he did come Genie never gave so much as a look his way, and when he did come up to her but the least toss of a word and her card was full to the very last dance.

This was a bold game Basil French was playing, but he had planned it well. Virginia Lawton was high spirited he knew—it would not take much to rouse her, and at this late moment Grayson would have hardly time for inquiry or explanation, and as for letters hereafter, he would look out for that. For himself, why should Genie suspect him of falsifying his dear friend, Captain Grayson, and least of all would she suspect him of doing it for love of her, to whom he had never seemed much more than politely indifferent.

A nobler, truer heart never beat than Charley Grayson's, or a baser, more treacherous one than that of Basil French. How two such could be friends for years without the true discerning the false is hard to explain.

Some three years before, at some foreign seaboard town, Grayson had rescued French from drowning, he having been seized with cramp while bathing. French was a man who simulated gratitude gracefully, to say the least; and indeed, so long as Grayson did not stand in his way in the slightest, he doubtless liked him as well as he could anybody. The two countrymen became friends at once. French took a cruise up the Mediterranean on the Ariel, Grayson's ship, and then the two parted, the one to saunter through Europe at such pace as he liked, the other to "range the seas over." One day, long afterward, French saw the Ariel lying amid the crowd of shipping at Liverpool, and wasn't long in overhauling her captain. It chanced that Grayson was going to set sail at once for Rockport, French's very home, and Basil decided to return on the Ariel with him.

A few days after their arrival at Rockport, French, strolling about the quiet old town with Grayson, vowed there hadn't so much as a leaf on one of the trees changed since his departure four years before. Down on the wharf the same old weather-beaten men sat on casks and kegs and told the same old stories of pirates, and sharks, and running the blockade; nobody had moved into town or out. If anybody had died it was nobody that Basil missed, for all the old familiar faces and forms moved about the quiet streets, or sat behind the counters of the small, dingy shops. Basil found it unspeakably stupid, but still his accommodating mouth had a ready smile for every one, his smooth tongue spoke as warm words of gladness to be home again to everybody that shook his hands as could be desired. And everybody thought Basil French was such a pleasant young man, while he walked on repeating to himself that it was "well enough to have the good-will of a dog."

As they turned a corner Mr. Lawton put out his hand, which Basil took with a sudden recantation of his vow that nothing in Rockport had changed, if that was Genie Lawton by her father's side. He had a faint remembrance of a little fair-haired girl, but this—this was a very fairy queen.

While Mr. Lawton was assuring him, in the usual form of an introduction, that this really was his daughter Virginia, Basil French was thinking of several things—first, that circumstances made it very desirable that he should have a wealthy father-in-law, and Mr. Lawton could furnish that desideratum to anybody that married his beautiful daughter; second, that it might be profitable for him to remain longer than he had at first proposed in Rockport; third, that he didn't like the look the young lady gave Grayson; and fourth, that when he had taken his aim everybody must stand out of the range. Perhaps, had French known that Virginia Lawton, from a love of contrast it may be, disliked fair men and considered six feet the proper standard for a gentleman's height, he would have liked still less the look she gave Grayson who was a handsome man, both dark and tall, while French was light and rather short. Mr. Lawton gave both gentlemen a cordial invitation to call upon him and passed on.

"I never saw so pure and innocent a face in my life," said Grayson to French.

"Take care, Charley," laughed Basil. "Report says she's a rare flirt. I believe that's the way always with these women that look like angels."

Basil knew Grayson disliked a flirt above everything, and he thought, at any rate, it would do no harm to throw out this hint in the beginning; Grayson might be frightened off.

But at their very first call at the Lawtons, Basil, who was an adept at reading faces, saw that in a fair field he should stand no chance beside Grayson, and as for the captain himself, it was very evident he thought the prize worth winning. So Basil decided not to show his true colors at all for the present, and at the same time determined to "move heaven and earth" but he would have his will. The father's money and the daughter's beauty were altogether too desirable not to try for.

"Grayson will have to leave soon, and then the game will be in my own hands," he thought. So, apparently indifferent to Genie, he let the matter alone until the very night of Grayson's departure, when he began his evil work as we have seen. French was acute enough never to lie when the truth would serve, so his occasional falsehoods found ready credence.

Anger and mortified pride swallowed up every other feeling with Captain Grayson as he turned his steps from the garden to the shore. He had never loved a woman before, never had even a passing fancy, and he had disclosed all the passion of his heart to add to the triumphs of this jilting girl. He wondered if many women were such adepts in simulating love.

There was a rough sea running for a day or two after Captain Grayson sailed, but he was more tossed about in mind than in body.

As the first heat of Grayson's anger subsided, the face of Genie Lawton, so innocent in its childlike loveliness, seemed ever before him. What if there were some mistake—some misunderstanding? If he only had had the chance to ask an explanation! But Basil had said he was only one of her numerous victims. He never thought of doubting Basil's word—why should he? But perhaps report had wronged her. So in softer mood he dwelt on this idea until he determined to write and beg some explanation. "I cannot give her up so," said poor Charley, to himself. "Why, it seemed to me I was as sure she loved me as that the stars shone over us when she whispered it." And by the very first chance he sent a letter to Miss Virginia Lawton, enclosed in one to Basil French.

"I dare say you'll think me a fool, Basil," wrote Grayson, "but the truth is I can't give her up easily." Then he recounted the sudden returning to him of his ring, and expressed his hope, his almost conviction, that there was some misunderstanding. "I enclose the letter to you," he said, "because she took a decided fancy to keep our engagement a secret from her father until my return, and I yielded to it because she wished it, though I would much rather not have done so. If Mr. Lawton sees a letter for his daughter with a foreign postmark, it will, of course, excite his curiosity, and I do not wish her to be annoyed, however she may regard me. I know I can rely on you to see it safely delivered."

Basil French took up a habit shortly after Grayson's departure, of lounging in the back room of the post-office about the time of the arrival of the mail, and cultivated the acquaintance of young Lane, the postmaster's son and clerk, in a manner that decidedly flattered the young man. Careful to keep out of the way, never seeming to take any interest in anybody's affairs in the matter of correspondence, Basil had managed to find out the number of Mr. Lawton's box, and watched with the eyes of a lynx any letters that were deposited in it. Captain Grayson wrote a very bold, peculiar hand, and this, with the foreign postmark, Basil was sure would serve him to detect it, if any letter should come from him. If there did, why then he would secure it in some way that he did not think it necessary to play until the spur of the moment should aid him. But his watch was a short one, for as we know, unsuspecting Grayson played into his hands in an unexpected manner by the first foreign mail that arrived.

Basil read Grayson's letter to himself with very much the same smile that he had worn in the moonlit garden a few weeks before, then broke the seal of that addressed to Virginia Lawton and perused it, the smile growing more and more into a sneer at every line. "What stuff a man like that will write to a woman," he said, and then, twisting the letter in his white, shapely fingers, he held it over the blaze of a lamp till it turned to ashes.

"Now a line to you, my beloved friend, and I think you will not trouble me with any more letters for Miss Lawton."

He drew his writing-desk toward him, and wrote, in the middle of a long letter:

"And now, Charley, I dare say you've skipped half the preceding, looking for something about Miss Lawton and the way she received your letter. I delivered it into her own hands, hinting that I knew what had passed between you as excuse for its coming through me.

"She took the letter, and tearing it open read it at once in my presence. As she finished, she broke into one of her musical laughs—you know how sweet her laugh is, sometimes—'Dear me,' she said, 'what an absurdly in earnest man your friend is! Only read this, Mr. French.'"

"Of course I declined, but how a woman could look a very saint while acting so like a Satan is one of the mysterious dispensations of Providence, I think. But forgive me, Charley, for speaking lightly of what I'm afraid is rather a serious matter with you. I thought it best to tell it to you just as it was. Forget her, old boy; she isn't worth a thought."

"There," said Basil, sealing the letter, "if she should become my wife, why, men have said harder things than that of women and married them afterward. I should tell Captain Grayson, and, of course, there would never be any explanation between them. If I don't marry her, it's likely he'll never see her again. And now he's disposed of I think it is about time to be about my own wooing." For French had been too wary to make any move until Grayson had been gone some time.

Meanwhile, poor old Mr. Lawton had been puzzling his brains as to what was the matter with Genie, or whether there was anything the matter with her, or was it all his imagination? It wasn't that she was less gay, rather that she was too much so, seeming restless and uneasy unless her life was a whirl of excitement. Somehow he missed something in her—the old childish way she had of being pleased at nothing, and once or twice she had burst into sudden tears when he had stroked her hair and called her his "yellow-haired lassie"—the very name Grayson had called her more than once. But when her father asked anxiously the cause of her tears, Genie laughed and said she "guessed she cried because she was too happy—people did, sometimes."

Perhaps that was the reason she cried sometimes in the night when the wind raved and tore, and the big waves tumbled in the harbor and broke, booming like guns of distress, on the beach. Why couldn't she forget him—him who had his love in every port? That was the ugly ghost that refused to be laid, but rose and walked before her if ever she had a thought that she might have been hasty. Laura Rice might have been a mistake, but, of course, Basil French knew his friend's character. Then Genie would vow to herself, as she had a hundred times before, never to think of Grayson again.

There were only these two, Genie and her father, for Mrs. Lawton had died early, and everybody in Rockport knew that Genie dearly loved her father whose heart was bound up in her. Basil thought it might be well to have a friend at court, and commenced his wooing by making Genie's father her proxy. Basil's garden and Mr. Lawton's adjoined, and one day Basil came and leaned over the intervening fence while Mr. Lawton was at work among the flower-beds, his favorite occupation.

Basil was very entertaining that morning. He had seen so many beautiful gardens, public and private, abroad, and he described them well and suggested little imitations of some of their beauties that might be made, on a small scale, in Mr. Lawton's premises. Then he remembered that he had somewhere seeds of various foreign plants that would undoubtedly grow in America. He would hunt them up, and if Mr. Lawton liked, he should be very happy to have him try them. And then he went away, leaving Mr. Lawton thinking what a very pleasant fellow young French was.

The next morning Mr. Lawton was called away on business, and so Genie went out to water the flowers alone. Basil, seeing a movement among the shrubbery, thought at first that it was Mr. Lawton, but coming nearer, the gleam of a light muslin showed him that he had made a mistake; a decidedly pleasant one, he thought, as he stood for a few moments behind the bole of a large tree near the fence watching the fair face that was just then bent above a lily of exquisite beauty.

The morning was a lovely one, and Genie Lawton's was a beauty that seemed in peculiar harmony with blooming flowers and smiling skies. Here, among the blossoms, young and healthful, she had forgotten all save that it was sweet to breathe in so lovely a world; but as she looked up from the lily, the sight of Basil, as he stepped forward, reminded her of that which she was even trying to forget, and the color on her cheek deepened into crimson.

"Good-morning, Miss Lawton," said Basil. "I saw something moving among the trees, and thought it was your father, to whom I promised some seeds yesterday. So I came down with them, but the flutter of your dress told me my mistake before I was half way. They should be sown at once, and as I may not be here for a day or so, I think I will leave them with you for him."

Genie shared her father's enthusiasm about rare plants, and there were questions to be asked and answered, and it is not to be supposed that Basil spared less effort to entertain his companion of to-day than that of yesterday. Yet he was very careful not to have the slightest air of emproisement. He had determined upon his role for the present—that of the kind, neighborly friend, the man who should show every attainment that he possessed in the best possible light, and command respect, admiration and confidence. He rightly judged that Grayson had been an ardent, passionate wooer—Genie would be apt to recoil from anything of the kind from another. Patience, the ingratiating himself into her father's particular favor, the gradual unfolding of himself from her father's friend to her lover, paved by a watchful but unobtrusive attention to her comfort and wishes, these were the steps Basil had laid out for walking, if not exactly into Genie Lawton's heart, at least into her acceptance of him as a husband, if her father strongly desired it.

So, cautiously and warily, he followed up the beginning he had made, and every day Mr. Lawton became more convinced that there were very few young fellows like Basil French, so ready to put himself out for anybody, willing to sit and read the paper an hour at a time for an old gentleman whose eyes were failing him.

Then when Mr. Lawton began to suspect that Genie might be the magnet that drew Basil so often to his house the idea was not unpleasing to him. To be sure he had once thought that Captain Grayson and Genie were going to make a match of it, but he had been mistaken. He was getting old, and if he should die Genie would be left all alone in the world. Basil's father had left him a handsome property (of which Basil had left a very large portion in Europe, but Mr. Lawton didn't know that), and in fact Mr. Lawton didn't know of anybody he would sooner trust Genie with than with Basil French.

As for Genie, though she could not help liking Basil for his attention to her father, and being a little touched by his silent devotion to herself, she had made up her mind that there was no such thing for her as loving any man again. She might have many friends, but hers was a nature that admitted of but one love.

But one night there came a sad blow for Genie. Her father had a paralytic shock, and in her distress and alarm Basil appeared so honestly sympathetic, so helpful and strong, that the poor girl really clung to him; for this man could wear the "livery of heaven to serve the devil in" with so consummate a grace that he might have deceived an angel. Basil was sadly tempted to declare himself at this very time, but he never acted from impulse, and he reflected that this might shock Genie. But he was so thoughtful, and tender, and kind—so good to Genie! She could never forget it, she thought.

When Mr. Lawton rallied somewhat from his illness, he appeared much broken and shattered, and a little childish. He manifested a great affection for Basil, and was very anxious about Genie, being constantly tormented by a fear of dying and leaving her alone. "What will she do when I am gone, Basil," he said, one day, "my poor lamb, all alone in the world?"

"My dear sir," said the saintly Basil, "would you entrust her happiness to my care if I could prevail upon her to honor me so?"

"To nobody so quickly," said the old man, pressing Basil's hand in his feeble clasp.

Armed with this "good-speed" Basil sought Genie and urged his suit with the same tenderness that had marked his manner all along.

But Genie would give him no encouragement. "I shall never love any man," she said, vehemently, a fiery blush suffusing her face, "it is impossible—impossible."

Basil received this rather emphatic answer with a sad resignation, only begging of her if ever it was possible for her to give his suit any consideration to remember that he should never withdraw it. And then he troubled her no more, but was the same kind, respectful friend as ever.

But Mr. Lawton was at first disappointed and grieved, and then angry at Genie's refusal of Basil. With the petulance of sickness he reproached Genie for refusing to let her poor father have the comfort of knowing that she was provided with a safe protector before he died. Meanwhile Basil gained more and more influence over the weak old man, and this marriage of Basil and Genie gradually took the form of monomania with him.

He entreated and expostulated with Genie day after day till she was almost wild. Sometimes she would think, "Why not? He has been good to me—he always would be, I suppose. Perhaps I should be as happy as many other women." But she knew very well all the time that she was only trying to make herself willing to become a sacrifice for her father's sake.

One day she went into her father's room and he began, as usual, bemoaning the probability of his soon leaving her alone, and how strange it was that she could not let him die happy, knowing that she was safe with so good a man as Basil French. Genie listened in silence, thinking how little like her old indulgent father was this querulous, complaining invalid, and asking herself why it was that she could not do this thing upon which his heart was so set; and as she thought a tear stole unbidden down her cheek.

Her father saw it. "Virginia Lawton," he said, suddenly, "I believe you are crying after that puppy of a Captain Grayson."

"Don't say that blue eyes cannot flash. There was fire in Virginia Lawton's, and her cheeks, brow and bosom flamed a fair crimson as she said, 'Father, you cannot despise Captain Grayson more than I do. Moreover, you may tell Basil French, if you like, that if he still cares for such regards as I can give him he is at liberty to tell me so." It seemed to her at that moment that she would die sooner than live with the possibility existing of ever listening again to such words as those her father had spoken of Captain Grayson.

Now Basil French congratulated himself that the game was won, and he only wished to hasten the wedding, for he was tired of his goody part and of dull, stupid Rockport. Genie's money would take them abroad in good style. He didn't flatter himself at all that Genie loved him—indeed, she had honestly told him that she had consented to marry him for her father's sake—but he didn't know but it was almost as well. A woman who loves is always exacting, he thought, and a little apt to be sharp at spying out occasions for jealousy, and, in truth, Basil's words about Captain Grayson, "a love in every port," would apply very well to himself. On the whole, Basil was very well satisfied.

Why is it that so often a criminal, after having laid some admirably and carefully concocted plot and carried it out almost to the end, at the very last does something absurdly rash and foolish? Basil French bethought himself that he must furnish an engagement ring, and then he remembered his little speech to himself in the garden. He unlocked a box and took the ring from it. "It must have cost a pretty sum," he said. "I cannot afford such a one in the present rather reduced state of my funds."

He examined it carefully. There was no mark by which it could be identified, and Basil French decided to give Genie Lawton the ring Captain Grayson had given her.

When he brought it to Genie a sudden palor came over her face. "Where did you get that ring?" she gasped.

"Are you faint, Genie?" said Basil, anxiously, and with the most innocent air possible.

"No, no," she said, "but where did you get that ring?"

"I ordered it from Tate & Co, New York," he said. "What is there about it that affects you so?"

She looked keenly at him, but his eyes unflinchingly met her own, and there was upon his face only a puzzled, anxious expression. It must be only a cruel coincidence, the similarity of the two rings, but how could she wear it, to be a constant reminder of that which she prayed and strove to forget?

But she must, she thought wearily, for least of all could she bear any questioning that touched ever so unwittingly upon this subject so painful to her heart. "I am not quite well, to-night I think, Basil," she said, extending her hand for him to place the ring upon it. "I fancied that I had seen a ring like this before. It is very beautiful," forcing herself to look at it and speak naturally.

The moment Basil French had given Virginia Lawton the ring he repented it, and inwardly cursed himself for a fool for doing it. He went home uneasy and ill at ease, and taking up the evening paper the first thing his eyes fell upon was not at all calculated to dispel these feelings. It was the ship list, headed by the arrival in Boston of the Ariel, Captain Grayson.

"Hang it," said Basil, "who knows, if I don't go where he is but he'll be coming here, and that won't do just now. No, no, I am so anxious to see my dear friend that I cannot wait a day to join him in Boston. Depend upon it I'll stick closer than a brother to him while he's on shore this time."

When Genie Lawton escaped to her own room, after her trying interview with Basil, she tore the ring from her finger and threw it upon her table. It seemed to burn her hand like a flame. "Will nothing allow me to forget that man?" she said. "I will hide it, lose it, anything rather than wear a perpetual reminder of him."

Then a sense of the strangeness of the two rings being so alike struck her, and she took up the ring and examined it closely. It was a perfect fac-simile she thought. She opened a drawer to put it in a box. A small microscope, a favorite toy of hers, caught her eye in the drawer. She remembered that she had looked at the first ring through this, and an impulse rose within her to look at this in the same way. Why, there it was, that very little flaw in the same stone, a flaw too small for the naked eye. She trembled like a leaf, for she knew that she held in her hand, not the fac-simile of Grayson's ring, but the ring itself.

At this moment a servant tapped at her door and said that her father was waiting for her to read the evening paper to him. She had no time to think or wonder now. She must go down at once, for her father didn't like waiting for the news.

The ship news was always the first thing that Mr. Lawton desired read, and here again fate thrust memory before her as she read, "Arrived—Boston—ship Ariel, Grayson."

Well, she read on, telegraphic, congressional, general news, anything, everything, but it all might have been so much Greek or Hebrew, so far as the words conveyed any sense to her, for, though her mind was not left free enough to conjecture how the ring came to be the same, she was repeating over and over in her mind, "it is the same."

Before the paper was finished Basil French came in again. "I am called to Boston, suddenly," he said, "and as the train goes early I must say good-by, to-night."

Genie did not follow him to the door to say farewell, as lovers have a fashion of doing when others are by. "Good-by," she said simply, giving him her hand, coldly, he fancied, and as she did so he noticed that the ring was not on it. This worried him a little. "By heaven!" he thought, "what a fool I was to give her that ring! I must have been crazy."

The paper was finished at last, and Genie was at liberty to go back to her room. It seemed to her afterward as if something entirely without and beyond herself controlled her action that night, for she went immediately to her writing-desk, and taking a sheet of paper wrote:

"CAPTAIN GRAYSON:—This ring, once given me by you, Basil French gave me to-day for an engagement ring. How did he come by it?
VIRGINIA LAWTON."

In this note she enclosed the ring, and folding it and placing it in an envelop directed it to "Captain Charles Grayson, ship Ariel, Boston." Then she went swiftly down the stairs, and found Tom and bade him take it to the post-office that night, so that it might go by the early morning mail.

While doing this Virginia Lawton had scarcely thought at all, only that she must ask of Grayson this question, but when the letter was past recall a dozen tormenting surmisings came to her. Grayson might have sold it to Basil, or to the jewellers. O, why had she not thought of all this before she wrote? And in an agony of pride and remorse the night went by.

Two more congenial friends you would have thought were seldom met together than Basil French and Charley Grayson, as they sat together in a snug room at Grayson's hotel when a servant entered with a letter.

Surely Grayson knew that delicate hand. He opened the letter. What was this?

Basil French, too, saw the ring, and for once his face played him false. The smile and color both forsook his lip and cheek, and Captain Grayson, looking up from the few words of the letter, read convicted treachery and deceit written in every line of the face of him he had thought his friend.

He strode to French's side and grasped his shoulder with fingers that felt like the grip of steel. "Where did you get this ring?" he said, holding the ring before him. "Did you give Virginia Lawton the letter I sent her?"

French tried to rally, but he did not know how much, or whether any, of his falsehoods Virginia had exposed, and he only managed to say, with rather a poor show of calmness:

"Why, picked it up, to be sure, Charley; you know I never let anything slip through my fingers."

"I wish I had let you slip through my fingers at Leyden," said Grayson, "for I believe you are a treacherous, lying villain."

Grayson was fairly trembling with rage, but he controlled himself with a mighty effort. He opened the door of the room.

"Basil French," he said, "if you do not go out of that door in one instant of your own accord you will by my help. Go," he said, as French hesitated.

He looked at him and went without a word.

In the evening of the most wretched day Virginia Lawton ever spent, a ring at the door was followed by Hattie's announcement to her mistress that a gentleman wished to see her.

Genie went down listlessly. Probably somebody on business, for Genie's father was too feeble to bear much and so the most of the burden fell on her.

She opened the door and looking in walked a step or two forward as if in a dream. Then somebody came up, and taking both her hands turned her full toward the light so that he might look down into her face. "Virginia Lawton," he said, "do you love me?"

She trembled, she blushed, and ended with a shower of tears that Captain Grayson found himself wiping away with kisses a moment afterwards in the most unaccountable manner.

Then it all came out, of course, and as the story of each was told, it would have been quite touching to have heard the soft sigh, "my poor Genie," "my poor Charley," if anybody had been there to hear it.

But "all's well that ends well," and Genie and Captain Grayson soon forgot past sorrow in present joy. As for Basil French, he never troubled his friend Charley Grayson with his presence again, and I think it was quite as well for his dainty body that he didn't, after Grayson knew all.

SINK OR SWIM:

—OR,—

HARRY RAYMOND'S RESOLVE.

BY HORATIO ALGER, JR.

AUTHOR OF "LUCK AND PLUCK," "RAGGED DICK SERIES," "CAMPAIGN SERIES," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XIII.

A LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

It is unnecessary to detail the conversation which took place between Squire Turner and Hartley Brandon, since the nature of it may be guessed from the events which followed. As might be expected, Brandon was by no means squeamish, and made no objection to what was proposed. Indeed, he made an occasional suggestion which was adopted by his kinsman. The squire did not, of course, think it politic to reveal the real causes of his hostility to Harry, nor of the reasons which he had for desiring that the boy should be out of the way.

He was too cautious a man for this, and moreover had too little confidence in Brandon, whom he regarded as an unprincipled fellow, being in this opinion not far from right. He merely said that he had reasons for wishing Harry out of the way, and expressed his willingness, should matters turn out satisfactorily, not only to make Hartley a present advance of fifty dollars, but to pay him over a further sum of five hundred when the affair was over, besides what might be needed for preliminary expenses.

To the shiftless vagabond who had been tossing about the ocean for a quarter of a century, five hundred dollars was a large sum, though we may consider it a trifling compensation for an act of villany. So he readily promised the squire his cooperation.

"It is best that you should leave Vernon at once," said the squire, when the arrangements between them were concluded.

"Why?" asked Brandon, rather disappointed, for he fully expected to be the squire's guest till the next day.

"Because it won't do for you to be seen by the boy. He would recognize you when you meet in the city, and this might lead him to suspect something wrong."

"What do you want me to do?"

"I will have my horse harnessed to the carryall, and will take you over to the Wrexham station, where you can take the cars for the city."

"What time do the cars start?"

"In a couple of hours. We have no time to lose."

"Have you got anything eatable in the house? I'm almost famished. Haven't eaten anything since early this morning."

"I will look to that. Stay here, or rather I will lead the way up stairs. Some one might be in. How will some beefsteak suit you?"

"Just the thing. Only let there be plenty of it. I've got a famous appetite."

Brandon was conducted up stairs to a back room on the second floor, where the squire suggested that he might as well fill up a portion of the time till lunch by brushing his clothes, and performing ablutions which appeared to be needful. He then went down stairs to give the necessary directions to Mrs. Murray.

"Broil some beefsteak, and plenty of it," said the squire. "You may boil two or three eggs also, and send up a loaf of bread and some butter."

"Where shall I set the table?" asked Mrs. Murray.

"Never mind about a table. You can carry all up on a waiter to the back chamber when ready."

Seeing that the housekeeper looked surprised, he added in rather an embarrassed way:

"The fact is, the man was a schoolmate of mine, who hasn't turned out very well. Out of pity, I am going to help him a little, but don't care about his being seen in my house."

This seemed plausible enough, particularly when Mrs. Murray saw Brandon, who certainly looked very much like one who had not turned out very well. The rapid manner in which the abundant meal melted away under his vigorous attacks was certainly a tribute to the culinary skill of the housekeeper, who was led to form a more favorable estimate of the shabby stranger in consequence.

In a little more than half an hour Squire Turner was on his way to Wrexham, Brandon occupying a back seat. They reached the depot ten minutes before the train arrived, so that there was ample time to buy a ticket.

So the train was set in motion, which was to lead to important changes in the life of our young hero. These it shall be our task gradually to unfold, and set on record.

Four days passed quietly. The villagers had ceased to talk of the fire, as another exciting occurrence had succeeded. Deacon Watson had been thrown out of his carriage, and broken his leg, and the details of this accident were still fresh in the mouths of all.

Harry pursued the even tenor of his way in his new position, trying to make himself as useful as possible, and succeeding to the satisfaction of his employer. Always prompt, always reliable, Mr. Porter felt that in spite of his youth he fully filled the place of Alfred Harper, whose temporary loss he now regarded with equanimity.

Harry was weighing some sugar for a customer one afternoon when John Gaylord, who had just got through sorting the mail, said to him, "Here's a letter for your mother, mailed at New York."

"Let me see it," said Harry, who felt some curiosity as to who might have written to his mother, for her correspondence was very limited.

He took the letter in his hand, and looked at the direction. It was in a dashing business hand, quite unknown to him, and revealed nothing.

"I will take it home when I go to supper," he said.

"Has your mother got friends in New York?" asked Gaylord.

"Not that I know of. I don't recognize the handwriting."

"Maybe it's a lawyer's letter informing her of a legacy," said the senior clerk, jocosely.

"Very probably," said Harry, smiling.

It was already the hour when he usually returned for supper. Accordingly he put on his cap, and went out of the store. Being a little curious as to the contents of the letter; he hastened his steps, and entered the house out of breath.

"You're a little early," said his mother. "Supper isn't quite ready."

"I hurried, because a letter came by this afternoon's mail. 'It's mailed at New York.'"

"New York!" repeated Mrs. Raymond, in surprise. "Who can it be from?"

"I don't know. Haven't you any friends in the city?"

"Not that I know of. Harry, you may take up the tea and toast, while I am reading the letter."

She tore open the envelop, and first, as was natural, turned to the bottom of the second page, and read the name appended to the letter.

"Lemuel Fairchild!" she repeated, thoughtfully. "I don't recall the name."

"Read it aloud, mother," said Harry.

She complied with his request.

This is the way the letter read:

"No.—Nassau street, Room 7, New York, Nov. 7, 18—.

"DEAR MADAM,—Though personally a stranger to you, I knew your husband well, and have heard with the deepest regret of his sad fate. We hadn't met for years, but I have always cherished a warm regard for him, though on account of the absorption of my time by important business I have not been able to keep up a correspondence with him. But, without further preface, I will come to my object in writing.

"If I remember rightly, you have a son who must now be a boy of sixteen or thereabouts. No doubt you are anxious to get him into some kind of employment. In the country I am aware desirable opportunities are rare, and I presume you are at a loss how to secure him one. Now I am desirous of taking a boy, and training him in my own business. Having no one in view, it has occurred to me that it might be a pleasant arrangement for you as well as for me, if I should take your son. I may add that I am a commission merchant, doing a large business. Can you send him up at once? As to wages, I will give him twelve dollars a week at first. He will not earn half that, but I shall feel that in overpaying him, I shall be assisting the widow and son of my old friend.

"Yours very truly,

"LEMUEL FAIRCHILD.

"If you accept my proposal, I should like to see your son at my office some time Monday."

Mrs. Raymond looked at Harry in perplexity, after finishing the letter.

"Lemuel Fairchild?" she repeated. "It is strange I never heard your father speak of him."

"Perhaps he may have done so, and you do not recall the name."

"It may be so," said Mrs. Raymond, slowly, "but I do not think so."

"At any rate," said Harry, "it's a splendid offer. Think of earning twelve dollars a week, to begin with, in New York?"

"Yes, it's a good offer, but how can I spare you?" said his mother, sorrowfully. "It will be very lonely without you. Don't you think you had better remain in Mr. Porter's store?"

"That will only be for a few weeks, you know, mother. Alfred Harper will be getting well before long, and then I shall be out of a situation. I think we had better say yes."

Harry's ambition was fired by the prospect of a place in the city. Like many another country boy he had the most splendid visions of what city life was. By the side of a position in a city office his present situation looked mean and contemptible. Even had the pay been the same, he would have preferred New York to Vernon; but the fact that the salary offered in the city was just double was an additional inducement. Why, John Gaylord, Mr. Porter's chief salesman, though already twenty-five years of age, and with several years' experience as clerk, received just that and no more. That Harry should be offered the same salary at fifteen was indeed a compliment.

"I expect board is higher in the city," said Mrs. Raymond.

"Yes, I suppose it is, but next year I shall probably have my pay raised. Who knows but I may get into the firm some day," said Harry, glowing with enthusiasm, "and make money hand over hand? Then I can take a nice house in the city, and you and Katy can come up and live with me. Wont that be nice?"

Mrs. Raymond confessed that it would be nice. Still she did not like to let Harry go. But he gradually won her to his side, and she admitted that there was something in his arguments. So, before he went back to the store, it was virtually agreed between them that the offer was not one to be refused.

"Let me take the letter, mother," said Harry. "I would like to show it to Mr. Gaylord and Mr. Porter."

CHAPTER XIV.

HARRY ARRIVES IN THE CITY.

ON going back to the store, Harry showed the senior salesman the letter his mother had received. Now John Gaylord was in the main a good-natured young man, but he was not without the fallings incident to humanity. It happened that he had himself been secretly desirous of going to the city, and obtaining some position which promised better than that of chief salesman in a country store. But he had no friends to help him in New York, and he was wise enough to feel that it would not be expedient to throw up a fair place in the country for the uncertain prospect of one in the city. But for all that, he used to think oftentimes that his business abilities deserved something better than weighing out tea and sugar in small quantities for country customers. So when he learned that Harry Raymond, an inexperienced boy, had received an offer which he would gladly have accepted himself, he naturally felt a little envious, and provoked with Harry for his good fortune.

"What do you think of it, Mr. Gaylord?" asked Harry.

"I think you had better stay where you are," was the unsatisfactory reply.

This was rather a damper to Harry, who had expected to be congratulated.

"Why?" he asked.

"Because you're a mere boy, and can't expect to earn twelve dollars a week."

"No, I don't suppose I shall at first, but then, you see, Mr. Fairchild was a friend of my father."

"But when he finds that you don't earn your money, he'll get dissatisfied with you, and send you home."

"I don't know about that," said Harry, stoutly. "I mean to do my best."

"You have no experience."

"I shall get it."

"O well, suit yourself," said the young man; "only if it turns out as I tell you, you mustn't be surprised."

Harry made no reply, being rather offended at the manner in which his communication had been received. He did not suspect that John Gaylord was secretly envying him all the while, and contrasting his own poor prospects very discontentedly with Harry's. But he was not in the least discouraged. He had faith in himself, and felt sure that if he did his best, as he meant to, he should get on well enough. He gave Mr. Porter notice that he should leave him at the end of the week. The latter congratulated him on his good prospects, and expressed satisfaction with his services while in his employ.

The next day, as if by accident, Squire Turner entered the store, and advancing to the counter behind which Harry was standing, said with unusual graciousness:

"Well, my young friend, how are you getting on?"

"Very well, thank you, sir," said Harry.

"I think Mr. Porter may find it for his interest to engage you permanently."

"I have accepted another situation," said our hero, with a little excusable importance.

"Indeed!" said the squire, in assumed surprise. "In Vernon?"

"No sir, in New York."

"I am surprised to hear it. It is not easy to obtain a situation in the city. How did you hear of it?"

"A friend of my father's, a commission merchant in Nassau street, wrote to my mother, yesterday, offering it to me."

"What is his name? I may know him."

"Lemuel Fairchild."

"Lemuel Fairchild," repeated the squire, slowly. "I don't recognize the name. So you are going to accept it?"

"Yes, I am going up Monday morning. I am to have twelve dollars a week."

"An excellent salary. Well, I am glad to hear you are so fortunate. When I go up to the city, I will call and see how you are getting along. What is the number?"

Harry gave the number, which the squire copied down in his pocket-book, and with a friendly salutation left the store. He had found out what he wanted to know, that the decoy letter had been received, and that the plan was likely to work well.

"He has swallowed the bait," he said to himself, with satisfaction. "I hope the rest of the plan will work as well. I shall not dare to draw my insurance money till he is out of the way."

The cordial manner of the squire impressed Harry rather favorably. In fact, he felt very much puzzled about him. It seemed hard to believe that he was meditating a fraud upon the insurance company. But, as might be expected, his own affairs occupied the greater portion of his thoughts, which was just what Squire Turner wished. The change in his mode of life was so great and so important that he could scarcely think of anything else. Besides, there were preparations to be made for his departure. He needed a new suit of clothes. It would be inconvenient to pay for them now, but the village tailor readily promised to give him a four weeks' credit until he should be able to pay him out of his wages in his new place. This suit was to cost twenty dollars, and so good progress was made in getting it ready that Harry was able to wear it on Sunday to church, where he received the congratulations of his friends and schoolmates.

As Harry had never been to New York he was placed under the care of a gentleman who proposed going up to the city on Monday.

He was up bright and early, of course, having slept little, if the truth must be told, on account of the excitement which he felt. His mother was up, also, and prepared a better breakfast than usual.

"I don't know how I shall get along without you, Harry," she said, despondently. "The house will be lonely."

"O, I'll come home soon to pass Sunday, mother," said Harry. "Besides, you'll hear from me soon; I'll write twice a week, regularly. Then you'll know I'm doing well."

"I'm afraid you'll get run over in the streets. They are so crowded with wagons."

Harry only laughed at this.

"Don't fear," he said. "I'm old enough to take care of myself. You forget how old I am, mother."

"You're only fifteen."

"A boy of fifteen ought to be smart enough not to get run over. You see, mother, you're a woman, and don't know much about boys. I'll do well enough, and you'll feel better about my going away soon."

What Harry said was partly true. If the situation which he had been going up to fill had been a genuine one, his pluck and good principle would have been likely to insure his success. But he little knew what a plot had been formed against him, and what a series of adventures lay before him ere he would again see his mother and home. Could he have foreseen all this, brave as he was he might well have quailed. But he supposed that all was fair and aboveboard, and that he would have nothing to encounter beyond the usual experiences of a boy in a city counting-room.

Time never waits for any one, and the hour of parting came. Harry hastily embraced his mother and little sister, and with a certain swelling of the heart which he could not quite repress, hurried out into the road to the carriage which was to convey him to the railroad station.

Mr. Falkland, his companion, was not a resident of Vernon, but had visited the place on business, and had readily undertaken to act as Harry's guardian as far as the city. He spoke civilly to our hero, and asked him how he expected to like the city. But after getting into the cars, he took out a book and began to read. Harry took a seat behind where he could look out of the window, and was sufficiently interested in watching the varied scenery through which he was whirled rapidly by the cars. His spirits began to rise once more, and bright dreams of the success he was going to achieve in the city swept across his mental vision. He was undecided whether, when he got rich, which he confidently hoped to be at twenty-five, he would install his mother in a nice house in the city, or build a house for her in Vernon, say as large as Squire Turner's. However, as he wisely concluded, there was no immediate necessity for deciding about this. He might leave it subject to further reflection.

So the train whirled on at the rate of twenty-five miles an hour, and in about two hours he found the houses growing more and more numerous, until the cars came to a final pause in the New York depot.

Mr. Falkland put his book into his carpet-bag.

"You have never been in the city before, I think," he said.

"No sir."

"Then, of course, you don't know the way anywhere. I'll go with you at once to Nassau street (that's the place, I believe), and then you'll be all right."

Harry was a little bewildered by the strangeness and novelty of the scenes to which he was introduced. So this was the great city of which he had heard so much. It was here that he was to work his way. Most boys would have felt a momentary depression and loss of confidence, but Harry had a good deal of faith and courage.

"Plenty of men succeed here," he said to himself; "and I'm bound to succeed, too."

Just then his courage was reinforced by the thought of his motto, and he repeated to himself, "'Sink or swim, live or die, survive or perish,'" closing the quotation in a manner suited to his circumstances and determination.

After a while they reached Nassau street, and the number which was mentioned in the letter.

"What is Mr. Fairchild's business?" inquired Mr. Falkland.

"He is a commission merchant."

His companion looked rather surprised at this statement, as Nassau street is scarcely the place where a commission merchant would be likely to establish himself. However, he did not feel called upon to express any opinion on the subject to Harry. It was, no doubt, all right, and he had business of his own to occupy his thoughts. As long as he conducted Harry safely to his destination, he would have done all that he had agreed to do.

They paused at the foot of the staircase, at the bottom of which, on either side, was a sort of directory of names occupying the apartments above. Opposite No. 7, was the name, Lemuel Fairchild.

Harry pointed it out to his companion.

"That is the right name, is it?" asked Mr. Fairchild.

"Yes sir."

"Well, I suppose you won't have any trouble in finding it. You don't need me to go up with you, do you?"

"No sir," said our hero, promptly. "I'm all right now."

"Good-by, then."

"Good-by. Thank you for taking care of me."

Harry shook hands with Mr. Falkland, and ascended the stairs. The staircase was rather narrow, and not particularly clean. It did

CHAPTER XV.

HOW THEY DO BUSINESS IN THE CITY.

THE room into which Harry entered was possibly twenty feet square, and had rather a desolate look. It was poorly lighted, having but one window looking upon a courtyard. At one end was an elevated desk, with a large ledger lying upon it. There were two armchairs in the office, on one of which a man of forty-five sat smoking a cigar. He was rather a hard-featured man, with stiff, wiry black hair, and rather a seedy look.

"Is Mr. Fairchild in?" asked our hero, dubiously.

HARRY'S INTERVIEW WITH MR. FAIRCHILD.

not look quite so magnificent as Harry had anticipated, whose ideas of places of business in the city were rather brighter than the reality. But, then, he reflected that people at any rate got rich in the city, and that was the main point.

When he arrived at the head of the stairs he saw four doors, the highest number, of course, going up to 4. It would be necessary to climb another flight. This he did, and found himself very soon standing before No. 7. He was not quite sure whether he ought to knock, or go directly in. On the whole, he thought it best to knock.

"Come in!" said a voice from within.

Harry opened the door, and found himself in the presence of his employer.

"I am Mr. Fairchild," was the unexpected reply. "Are you young Raymond?"

"Yes sir," replied Harry, feeling considerably disappointed with the appearance of his employer as well as the office in which he was to work.

The fact was, he had formed a very different idea of both from the present reality. He supposed Mr. Fairchild would be a portly man, handsomely dressed, and his place of business a large warehouse several times as large as Mr. Porter's store, which he had just left. But here was a miserable little twenty-foot room, at which, he felt very confident, John Gaylord would turn up his nose. He fervently hoped that none of his country friends would come and see him. After all the glowing anticipations he had formed, this was certainly something of a come down. Then, he was disappointed in Mr. Fairchild himself. He certainly did not look by any means like a prosperous city merchant doing an extensive business.

"Have you just reached New York, Raymond?" asked the merchant, picking his teeth with the small blade of his pocket-knife.

"Yes sir," said Harry. "I came right here."

"All right. I was expecting you. So you want me to make a business man of you, eh?"

"Yes sir," said Harry, wondering if he should dress as shabbily when he became a commission merchant.

"Well, I'll do my best for you."

"How is business, sir?" asked Harry, a little anxiously under the circumstances.

"Pretty good," answered Mr. Fairchild.

Harry involuntarily looked round the empty room with a puzzled air. He wondered what Mr. Fairchild had to sell, and where he kept it. He could not help wondering, also, where his salary of twelve dollars a week was to come from.

"Yesterday I sold a cargo of sugar," resumed Mr. Fairchild—"ten thousand dollars worth. I must have you make out the bill presently."

Harry looked and felt astonished. He began to suspect that in spite of appearances considerable business might be done even in this little room. Probably Mr. Porter's sales for an entire year would not amount to more than twenty thousand dollars, yet here was a sale of half that amount in a single day.

"Do you often make such large sales?" he asked, with a new feeling of respect.

"Do you call that a large sale?" said the merchant, indifferently.

"I should think it was, sir."

"Ah yes, your being from the country explains that. I sell large quantities of merchandize on commission. I never take any consignment worth less than a thousand dollars. It wouldn't pay."

"Indeed?" said our hero, becoming more cheerful. The office was small and dull. Still the amount of business done there redeemed its significance.

"Day before yesterday I sold a cargo of cotton, amounting to—let me see—"

Mr. Fairchild went to the desk, and opening it, took out a small blank book.

"Twenty-seven thousand five hundred and thirty-three dollars, seventy-five cents," he read, from the book. "What would my commission on this sale be, at two per cent? I want to see whether you are quick and correct at figures."

"About five hundred and fifty dollars," answered our hero, making a rapid calculation in his head. "If I had a pencil and some paper I would give you the exact figures."

"Quite right. I see you understand the principle. That's doing very fairly for one day, isn't it?"

"Yes sir," said Harry, considerably impressed.

At this moment a man entered, and with a hasty glance at Harry, addressed Mr. Fairchild.

"Ah, Miller, how are you?" said the merchant.

"Very well, but in a great hurry. Have you sold that cargo of silks yet?"

"Not yet."

"Have you thought over my offer of this morning?"

"Seventeen thousand dollars? Yes, I have thought of it, and I can't accept it. My price is eighteen thousand."

"Too much, but I'll tell you what I'll do, I'll split the difference, and say the five hundred."

This offer, after a little chaffering, was finally agreed to.

"Raymond," said Mr. Fairchild, "make out a bill against Mr. Miller, Thomas Miller, of $17,500 for the cargo of silks, at present on the ship Argo. You will find pen and paper on the desk."

Harry stepped to the desk, and with some tribulation made out the bill, as he would have done for a supply of groceries. He feared that it would not answer, but on handing it to Mr. Fairchild that gentleman made no criticism. He just glanced at it, and handed it to Mr. Miller.

"Very well, I'll send round a check for the amount in the morning."

"All right."

"Good-morning. I am in a hurry," and the silk purchaser went out.

"What do you think of that specimen of doing business, Raymond?" asked Mr. Fairchild, complacently.

"It didn't take long."

"No, that's the city style. And it pays too. Just calculate the commission on that sale at two per cent."

"Three hundred and fifty dollars," said our hero, promptly.

"I dare say you are not used to such transactions in the country."

"No sir."

"Well, it's a very comfortable way of doing business. Probably I may have no other sale to-day—possibly not to-morrow, but two or three large sales a week count up."

Harry began to think he should not have to work very hard, and his doubt as to Mr. Fairchild's making money enough to pay him his wages disappeared.

"Do you want me to go to work at once?" he asked.

"Yes, I have some copying for you to do. Open that ledger."

Harry did so.

"You may commence at page 51, and copy down the entries upon these sheets of paper. You are used to copying, aren't you?"

"No sir, but I can do it well enough."

"Very well. You may go to work at once. I must make a business call. I will be back in an hour or two, and take you to dinner."

He took his hat and went out. Harry began to copy industriously. The transactions entered appeared to date several years back, and Harry did not exactly understand what connection they had with Mr. Lemuel Fairchild's business. But then, as he reflected, he was not competent to judge of that. All he had to do was to obey instructions, and after a while he would know more. It was certainly very astonishing the way in which business was done in the city. The prospect of being cooped up in a small dark room was not very pleasant. Still Harry recalled the pleasant circumstance that he was earning two dollars a day, and was at the same time learning business. So far as he could see, the commission business was not very difficult to learn. Perhaps Mr. Fairchild might eventually admit him as a partner in the firm. If so he would soon realize a fortune.

Harry kept on copying steadily while these thoughts were passing through his mind. After an hour or more, the door opened, and Mr. Fairchild entered.

"How much have you copied?" he asked, advancing to the desk.

"About two pages and a half," said Harry.

"Is it done right?"

His employer glanced at the writing carelessly.

"Yes," he said, "it will do very well. You have a good business hand."

"I shall improve as I go on, I hope," said Harry, modestly.

"O, of course. I've no doubt I shall be able to make a business man of you. But I suppose you are getting hungry."

Harry admitted that he was a little hungry.

"Well, we will go out as soon as a friend arrives whom I have invited to accompany us."

Fifteen minutes later the friend referred to arrived. It was Hartley, the same man who had visited Squire Turner in Vernon the week before.

He glanced sharply at our hero, and said something in a low tone to Mr. Fairchild which Harry did not understand. He little dreamed that the new-comer was to be intimately connected with his fortunes. Still less did he dream that he was an agent of Squire Turner, and that all the profitable business transactions of Mr. Lemuel Fairchild were merely fictitious, and got up solely to deceive him. Harry was a smart boy, but even smart boys are likely to be taken in in matters of which they have no previous experience. But Harry's eyes were to be opened very soon.

THE ENCHANTED NECKLACE.

LITTLE Gertrude sat eating a piece of brown bread by the tiny brook that flowed over the round smooth pebbles, at the foot of her father's garden.

"O dear," she exclaimed, at length, "I wish I had something better than brown bread to eat. I wish I had a fairy godmother who would give me everything I wished, like the little girl in my story book. I wish I could see a fairy this minute."

Here a rustling of the leaves caused Gerty to look up, and lo! there stood a beautiful lady, not more than a foot tall, with floating gossamer robes, and hair like braided sunbeams.

"Child of earth, your wish is granted; take this necklace, and as long as you wear it, whatever you wish will come to pass;" and placing a golden necklace, with a diamond clasp, in the child's hand, she disappeared before the astonished Gerty could find words to express her thanks.

"O, what shall I wish for?" thought she. "O, now I know, I wish I was a grown-up woman, with a beautiful house, and splendid furniture, and plenty of money, and plenty of servants."

The words were hardly out of her mouth before she found herself in a gorgeously furnished parlor, seated at a grand piano, trying to drum out a piece of new music that lay before her.

"How hungry it makes me to practise my lesson," she exclaimed; "I wish dinner was ready."

Instantly the folding-doors of the parlor flew open, revealing a table, covered with a snowy cloth, and the richest silver, and costliest china, and nice white bread and golden butter, and fried chickens, and jellies, and cakes, and fruits of all descriptions, and behind her chair stood a servant ready to do her bidding. This is something like living, thought Gerty. But hardly had she tasted the first morsel, when a huge black mastiff bounded into the open doorway, his eyeballs shining like coals of fire, and the white froth dripping from his open mouth.

"He is mad," shrieked the servant, springing through an open window.

"I wish I was in China," screamed Gerty, and, at a bound and a whirl, she was high in the air, and in an instant she landed in the midst of a dark-skinned, black-eyed crowd, who stared at her and talked in a language she could not understand.

"O, I wish I was at my own father's house," said Gerty, and with another whirl she was again in the air, and then she found herself at her father's gate. Her mother was at the door.

"O mother," cried Gerty, "I am—"

"Who are you?" asked her mother.

"Why, I am your Gerty; do you not know me, mother?"

But the woman only laughed, and said:

"You my Gerty? Why, Gerty is only a little girl, and you are a woman. No, you are not my child," and she entered the house and shut the door.

"O, what shall I do?" sobbed Gerty; "even my own mother does not know me." And she darted through the gate just as a runaway horse dashed along. She tried to get out of the way, but it was too late. She slipped and fell directly in front of the horse, and would doubtless have been crushed had she not thought of the necklace.

"I wish I was a rabbit," she shrieked; and in an instant she bounded from under the horse's feet in the form of a plump gray rabbit. She did not pause till she reached the forest, when, looking up, she beheld a sportsman with a gun about to shoot her.

"O, I wish I was a bird," she gasped; and, lo! there she was flying through the air in the form of a beautiful bird, pausing now and then among the leafy branches of the trees, and singing a few notes of joy.

"I shall be perfectly happy now," thought Gerty, but glancing up she beheld a hawk about to seize her.

"O, I wish I was a little girl again. I wish the fairy would take back the hateful necklace." And she flung the trinket from her with such force that she awoke.

Gerty started to her feet.

"I am so glad it was a dream," she said; "I am sure I will never grumble about brown bread again, nor want anything more to do with fairies." And she kept her word, for when she found herself wishing for things she could not have, she thought of the enchanted necklace, and was contented.

BESSIE FOLLEN'S NAP.

BY MISS CAMILLA WILLIAM.

It was a terrible thing for Bessie Follen when her mother died. Not that the child realized what it all meant; but she missed her mother, and she was frightened at the solemn look of everything. She had always thought it a very fine thing to have a drive in a real carriage, with two horses; but, some way, she did not much enjoy the drive to her mother's grave.

But, as I said, she did not know what it all meant. She only knew that everybody looked sober, and that she had a black dress on, and that she couldn't find her mother anywhere. She went to the poor little chamber where they had slept, and where her mother had been sick, and the bed was all taken away, and the windows open. She searched the house over, but found her not. She went, crying, out into the yard, and looked up and down the street; but still no mother appeared.

The neighbors were kind to her; but they were poor people, and had many things to attend to, and could not spare much time to comfort her. So she wandered about the whole day, and cried herself to sleep that night, and the next day a man came and took her away to the poor-house.

Bessie didn't know what that was either. She was but four years old, and hadn't yet learned much about the world we live in.

At first she was rather pleased, for the man said that he would give her a drive and that by-and-by she should see her mother. So Bessie looked on impatiently while they tied up her little bundle of clothes, and let the woman kiss her, and did not cry when the strange man drove off with her. They gave her her gray and white kitty, and the man said she might keep it, and they gave her the basket that her poor mother used to go to market with.

Well, they rode and rode till the little girl was tired. Out of the city they went, and into fresh country roads. And after what seemed to Bessie about a hundred miles, but which was really only six, they drew up before a large brick house, in a pleasant place, with trees round it. Here a woman came to the door, and stood waiting for Bessie to come to her after she had been taken out of the wagon by the man.

"Run right in," he said, to her, and drove off towards the stable.

"Come!" the woman called from the steps.

But Bessie didn't stir. She was afraid, and she didn't see her mother, and she didn't like the looks of this stranger.

"Why don't you come in?" the woman called, quite sharply. "I can't stand here waiting for you."

At that Bessie began to cry, but did not go a step nearer.

"Dear me!" the woman exclaimed. "I've got to have the bother of a bawling young one, with all the rest of the plague!" And she came down the yard, and taking Bessie by the arm, almost pulled her into the house.

"There, there! Don't cry so!" she said, for the child was screaming now. "I aint going to hurt you; but I can't stand waiting for you to cry and sulk. There, now. Go and play with your kitty."

Bessie held on tight to the kitty, and went out into the yard again, meeting the man just coming in.

"I want my mother!" she sobbed, looking up pitifully into his face.

He patted her on the head. He was a kind sort of man.

"Don't cry now," he said, "and she'll come by-and-by. You may have your basket to put kitty in. Do you want it?"

Bessie took the basket and put her kitty into it, and kitty curled up in the bottom, and made believe go straight to sleep. But she looked out of the corners of her eyes with little bright looks, and watched everything. For she was a very knowing kitty.

"I want my mother," Bessie repeated, looking up into the man's face again, not sobbing this time, but with her pretty eyes full of tears, and her pink little mouth trembling. "Where is she?"

"O, she lives away over there," he answered, pointing off towards the westward. For he hated to tell the child that her mother was dead. "If you are good, you may go to see her some day. Now don't cry any more, but play out here with your kitty, and by-and-by you shall have some dinner."

At that the man turned away and went into the house, and Bessie stood and looked the way he had pointed, saying that her mother lived there.

"Mew!" said the kitty, softly.

Bessie looked down into the basket, and the kitty winked at her with both eyes, then jumped out and ran through the gate, looking back, and stopping when she got outside.

Bessie understood just as well as if the kitty had said, "Come, let's go and find mother!" and her pale little face grew suddenly red, and her dim eyes began to sparkle. She glanced at the house to be sure that no one saw her, then she stole softly into the road, and when she was outside of the gate, began to run as fast as she could run. The road was winding, and in a few minutes she had lost sight of the house; but still she ran. It seemed to her that she heard voices calling her back, and steps running after her; but it was only her poor little heart beating and knocking in her bosom. Presently she came to a narrow grassy lane that crossed the road, and she turned into that. Little as she was, she knew that the more turns and twists she made, the more sure she was to get out of sight.

Kitty ran softly along beside her young mistress, never stopping once to mew, but looking up now and then in Bessie's face.

"I'm awful tired, aren't you, kitty?" the child said, at length.

The kitty stopped short at that, and looked behind her. There was no one in sight. So the two walked more slowly.

It was a very pretty road, trees growing close to both sides of it, and flowers of all kinds under the trees. At one side the prettiest little brook in the world ran with a pleasant gurgle over the stones, and the birds were singing merrily all about.

Somehow this soothed Bessie's heart, and pretty soon she forgot to cry. It seemed likely that she would soon find her mother, and she was sure that the poor-house man and woman could never find her. Then, she had spent a whole year in the city with her mother, and in all that time had seen nothing of the country. Now, as she walked along, looking at the flowers to right and left, and listening to the bird-songs, it began to seem as though she had seen that place before.

And so she had; for Bessie was now near the place that had been her and her mother's old home in happy days before poverty came.

Bessie's mother had been the wife of the gardener on a large and beautiful estate belonging to Mr. Slade, and they had lived in a tiny cottage on the edge of his grounds. The gardener had grown intemperate though, and been turned away, and then he died, and his wife died, and there was no place for their little girl but the poor-house.

Well, Bessie and her kitty walked along this narrow, shaded road a while, and presently they came to another road crossing it, and there they stopped. The road they were on was the pleasantest and easiest, for this cross-road was open, and at one side ran up quite a hill; but still the hill looked as though she might see from it where her mother lived. So Bessie thought best to go that way.

But just as she was about starting, she heard steps coming on behind her, a sound like some one running. At that all her fears returned, and, without stopping to think, she ran into the woods followed by her kitty, and hid behind the bushes. Scarcely was she hidden when she saw the poor-house man come running past, looking right and left in search of her. Her poor little heart quaked as she saw him stop at the crossing and look every way, uncertain which of the three directions to take. But after a minute he went straight on, probably because he could see the road a good way in each of the other directions, and saw that she was not in them.

No sooner had he got out of sight than poor Bessie started up and ran into the woods as fast as she could run, which, indeed, was not very fast. For the way was rough, and she fell over the stones and sticks, and the great roots of the trees. But she didn't care for that. Only let her get out of the way of those poor-house people, and she would find her mother some way. But if they got her back, they would shut her up, she knew they would.

At length, when she could run no further, Bessie sat down on a green bank where the flowers grew, and a tall tree kept the sun off of her. She set her basket down, too, for she had brought it all this way, and kitty took a seat. And then the two looked at each other, and didn't know what to do next.

"I'm awful tired, aren't you, kitty?" Bessie asked, kissing her pet on the top of its white head.

"Mew!" says the kitty, meaning yes.

"And I'm most starved to death, aren't you, kitty?" pursued the little girl, weeping.

"Mew!" says kitty, meaning yes again.

"And I'm sleepy, too, aren't you?" asked Bessie.

The kitty said nothing, so Bessie asked no more questions, only sat there and felt the heat, and grew more and more tired and sleepy. It was but a little past noon, and she had always been in the habit of taking a nap at noon, and felt the need of it now. First her head nodded one side, then the other, then it came forward and almost jerked off. After a while she couldn't stand it any longer, but just laid down at full length on the bank, put one arm under her head, and dropped off asleep.

Kitty sat upright beside her little mistress, and watched that no harm came to her. Flies, and bugs, and butterflies came peering round, but kitty soon sent them about their business, and as for a little gray bird that sung loudly over the sleeper's head, as if to wake her up in spite of everything, kitty opened her mouth, and gave a jump, and the little bird flew away for its life. And while watching Bessie, her gray guardian kept an eye on the basket too, and not even an ant dared poke his nose into it.

And so the hours rolled away while Bessie slept, and the sun got round and shone in her face, and in kitty's face, and began to fill the basket full of sunshine. Then kitty put her head a little one side, as if wondering if it were not almost time for Bessie to wake up; and then she pricked up her ears; for there was a sound of steps.

They came nearer and nearer, and presently a lady and gentleman came walking slowly through the edge of the wood, both dressed in black, and both looking very sober.

"What is that?" the gentleman said, seeing the top of kitty's white head above the herbage.

They went a little nearer, and then they both stopped, and exclaimed. For there in the midst of the green foliage they saw a lovely little girl asleep on a bank. The tears were hanging from her long eyelashes, and on her cheeks, for they had flowed even while she slept, and her shoes were muddy, and her frock torn.

BESSIE FOLLEN'S NAP.

The gentleman and lady looked at each other, and in the same breath said the same thing:

"O, if we could have her!"

For these two had lost all the little girl they had, and had just been to visit her grave in the country graveyard, and were returning home by the shortest way.

The lady bent down very softly, and kissed Bessie on the mouth.

"Wake, my little dear!" she whispered, and kept so near that the child could not see her face.

Bessie stirred and opened her eyes as she felt the kiss, and flung her arms around the lady's neck, and cried out:

"Mamma!"

But when the lady took her up, and she saw a stranger, Bessie began to cry, and to all their questions would only say that she wanted her mother.

So the gentleman took her in his arms, and carried her to his home, he and the lady coaxing and soothing her all the way, and promising to find her mother. Kitty followed after them, seeming to be very well pleased, and the lady carried the basket.

Pretty soon they came to a beautiful house, with trees and gardens about it, and the most elegant rooms with everything in them that could be desired. Kitty immediately laid herself down on a cushion, and went to sleep, making herself quite at home.

She had no notion of going any further.

"Now, little dear," the lady said, taking Bessie on her lap, "tell me what your name is."

"Bessie Follen," said the child, not very plainly; but they knew the name at once.

"Bless me!" the lady cried. "To be sure! I see the look now. She is poor Follen's little girl, Mr. Slade. I didn't know that her mother had come back here. We must find her."

"If she has come back, she has come to the poor-house," Mr. Slade said.

"Poor thing!" the lady said. "Do send down and see."

So Mr. Slade sent right off to the poor-house, and found out the whole story.

"Poor, dear little orphan!" the lady said, weeping. "Will you stay and live with me? Your mother has gone to heaven, and you cannot find her now."

Bessie cried a good deal, but her kind friends consoled her, and soon she grew happy again. Children cannot grieve long, and so much the better for them.

Mr. and Mrs. Slade adopted Bessie, and now she is a beautiful young lady, with everything she wants. And her adopted parents say that they could not be fonder of her if she were their own.

The kitty, I am sorry to say, is dead, but she has a good many grand-children living, which is the next best thing to living one's self. And Miss Bessie has a beautiful photograph of her little pet. And, moreover, she still keeps that basket.

THE HOUSEKEEPER.

OYSTER FRITTERS.—Line some patty-pans with a fine puff paste, put a piece of bread into each, cover with paste, and bake them. While they are baking, take some oysters, beard them, and cut the remainder up into small pieces, place them in a tosser, with a very small portion of grated nutmeg, a very little white pepper and salt, a morsel of lemon peel cut as small as possible, a little cream, and a little of the oyster liquor; simmer it a few minutes, then remove the bread from the patties, and put in the mixture.

APPLE FRITTERS.—Take two or three large russeting apples, pare them thin, cut them half an inch thick, lay them on a pie-dish, pour brandy over them, and let them lie two hours; make a thick batter, using two eggs, have clean lard, and make it quite hot; fry two at a time, a nice light brown, put them on the back of a sieve on paper, sift pounded sugar over them, glaze them with a shovel or salamander; dish on a napkin. After they are cut in shoes, take out the core with a small round cutter.

FRITTERS.—Are made of batter the same as pancakes. Drop a small quantity into the pan, have ready apples pared, sliced and cored, lay them in the batter and fry them; they may also be made with sliced lemon or currants, the latter is particularly palatable. They should be sent to table upon a folded napkin in the dish; any sweetmeat or ripe fruit will make fritters.

BEST SPONGE CAKE.—Take one coffee-cupful of sugar, and four eggs; beat them to a cream; add a piece of saleratus as large as a pea dissolved in a tea-spoonful of milk; also a little nutmeg and essence of lemon; stir in carefully a coffee-cup of flour. Bake in a quick oven.

A LIGHT CAKE.—Take a pint bowlful and a half of sugar, one and a half cups of butter rubbed in two pint bowls of flower, two cups of sour cream, a tea-spoonful of saleratus, table-spoonful of rose water, four eggs well beaten, and a little nutmeg.

INDIAN CORN CAKES.—Mix a quart of Indian meal with a handful of wheat flour, stir in a quart of warmed milk, a tea-spoonful of salt, and two spoonfuls of yeast; stir alternately into the milk the meal and three well-beaten eggs; when light, bake as buckwheat cakes, on a griddle; send them to the table hot. Should the batter sour, stir in a little saleratus dissolved in lukewarm water, letting it set half an hour before baking.

RICE PANCAKES.—To half a pound of rice put two-thirds of a pint of water, boil it to a jelly; when cold, add to it eight eggs, a pint of cream, a little salt and nutmeg, and half a pound of butter melted; mix well, adding the butter last, and working it only so much as will make the batter sufficiently thick. Fry them in lard, but employ as little as it is possible to fry them with.

MEAT PATTIES.—The patty-pans should not be too large; make a puff paste, put a layer at the bottom of the tins, put in forcemeat, and cover with puff paste, bake them a light brown, turn them out. If for a small dinner, five patties, or seven for a large dinner, will suffice for a side dish.

POUND CAKE.—One pound dried sifted flour, the same of loaf sugar, and the whites of twelve eggs and the yolks of seven. Beat the butter to a cream, add the sugar by degrees, then the eggs and flour; beat it all well together for an hour, mixing a tea-spoonful of rose water, a little nutmeg or cinnamon, two cups of cream, and a tea-spoonful of saleratus. To be baked in a quick oven.

COMMON PLUM CAKE.—Mix five cups of butter with ten cups of flour, five cups of sugar, add six cups stoned raisins, a little cinnamon and mace finely powdered, half a cup of good new yeast put into a pint of new milk, warm and mix the dough, let it stand till it is light.

INDIAN GRIDDLE CAKE.—Take one pint of Indian meal and one cup of flour, a little salt and ginger, a table-spoonful of molasses, a tea-spoonful of saleratus, sour milk enough to make a stiff batter. Bake them on a griddle like buckwheat cakes.

COMMON GINGERBREAD.—Take a quart bowlful of flour, and rub into a teacup of sweet butter, two cups of sugar, three of molasses, teacup of cream, tea-spoonful saleratus, ginger to your taste. Make it stiff batter, bake in a quick oven.

CURIOUS MATTERS.

A WONDERFUL PLANT.—The Victoria Regia, in the Botanic Garden at Ghent, has thriven to an unprecedented degree during the last summer. Several of the leaves attained a diameter of nine feet, and have supported a weight of two hundred and fifty pounds. Seven of the leaves completely covered the basin of 164 feet square. Every four or five days a fresh flower appeared, which lasted only two days, or rather two nights, opening in the morning of a perfectly white color, diffusing, about five or six P. M., a very powerful odor of vanilla, closing the next morning at eight or nine A. M., opening the same day towards evening, this time of a beautiful carmine, and finally closing the next morning. The magnificent leaves last through summer, the plant begins to dwindle in October, and dies towards December. About this time the seeds, which have been obtained by artificial fecundation, arrive at maturity. They are sown in January, and appear above the ground in about six weeks. Their infancy is very critical; but once past this period, the young plants grow with astonishing rapidity. The plant in the Ghent Botanic Gardens, unquestionably the finest that has ever been cultivated, arrived at its development in five months.

AN INTELLIGENT DRAKE.—The following is related by an eminent naturalist: "A young lady was sitting in a room adjoining a poultry yard, where chickens, ducks and geese were disporting themselves. A drake came in, approached the lady, seized the bottom of her dress with his beak, and pulled it vigorously. Feeling startled, she repulsed him with her hand. The bird still persisted. Somewhat astonished, she paid some attention to this unaccountable pantomime, and discovered that the drake wished to drag her out of doors. She got up, and he waddled out quietly before her. More and more surprised, she followed him, and he conducted her to the side of a pond where she perceived a duck with its head caught in the opening of a sluice. She hastened to release the poor creature and restored it to the drake, who by loud quackings and beating of his wings testified his joy at the deliverance of his companion."

A NEW IDEA.—It is generally supposed that the robins emigrate to the South during the winter months. From the following account it would appear that such is not always the case. Two gentlemen crossing the Sandwich mountains in New Hampshire discovered a deep valley, and approaching it found it clothed with hemlock, spruce, fir and tamarack, growing so near together that it was with difficulty they could make headway between them. Before they came to this growth the snow was over a foot in depth; after entering it was only six inches, the residue lying on the tops of the trees, making quite a roof, and excluding much of the light of day. After making their way a few rods they were surprised to find the place an extensive robin "roost," occupied by thousands, and so thickly were they congregated that they might have killed numbers with their walking sticks in crossing the premises from south to north—about thirty rods.

TREASURE TROVE.—In 1702 the English attacked a fleet of Spanish galleons near Vigo, when seven of them were sunk and nine burnt. The galleons contained the tribute of the Spanish colonies for the years 1700-1, amounting, it is stated, to £20,000,000. The greater part of this enormous sum is presumed to be still at the bottom of the sea, and a French society has been formed for the purpose of recovering the lost treasure. Operations have already begun, and the divers have hit upon ten of the galleons. They are thickly encrusted with marine growth, yet the chief engineer proposes to raise them up to the surface of the water. Several curious articles, oxydized armor and weapons, a silver vase, and numerous cannon balls, have been found by the divers on the decks of the vessels. The Spanish government has claimed forty-three per cent of the recovered treasure.

A PLAYFUL DOG.—There is a small greyhound at Greenfield Mass., who is very fond of dolls. The little girls in the family of his master sometimes allowed him to carry their dolls around the parlor in his mouth, and he went through the operation wagging his tail with great vigor. One day an older sister made a doll expressly for the greyhound, and made him understand it was his own property. At once he ran off and hid it where it could not be found. Several days after, seeing the children playing with their dolls, he begged to be let out of the house. He went directly to the yard where he had buried his doll like a bone, dug it up, shook it free from dirt, and rejoined the group with his pet in his mouth.

FACTS AND FANCIES.

WATCH AND PRAY.—Parson Buxby was an eccentric preacher located not a thousand miles from Rochester. The parson had a weakness; it was the love of Johnny-cake baked in Western fashion, on a board leaning at an angle of forty-five degrees from the fire. And of all Johnny-cake bakers, old Nancy Jeems, one of his flock, was the best.

One day the parson was making his round of calls, and of course proceeded to call on Nancy. On entering, the old lady gave him a friendly greeting in a hearty hand-shaking, saying as she did so:

"Well, now, Brother Buxby, 'peered to me all the morning as if you were a-coming; I've just put up a Johnny-cake, and ye'll stop and help me eat it up."

Of course he assented—but proposed, in the meanwhile, to have prayer, having as much an eye to Nancy's spiritual comfort as she had to his physical.

Accordingly they both knelt, he with his face towards the fire—she with her back towards it. Brother Buxby had an elegant out-pouring, but while under full headway the cake began to burn, and he saw it! He hurried over the remainder, bringing out the Amen like the crack of a whip, and then adding to it in the very same breath:

"Sister Nancy, your Johnny-cake's a burning up!"

She turned to remedy the evil, when he remarked:

"Sister Nancy, you should have watched the cake."

"But, Brother Buxby, I was attending to the prayer."

"Ay, ay!" said he; "but Scripture, you know, says you should both watch and pray."

COULDN'T FIND THE VERDICT.—At a recent session of one of the courts of South Carolina, an entire negro jury was empanelled. A case was brought before them, the witnesses examined, and the attorneys made their respective arguments.

The judge, after laying down the law and recapitulating the testimony, gave the papers into the hands of the foreman, a rather intelligent looking negro, with instructions as soon as they found a verdict to bring it without fail.

Thirty minutes more elapsed, when the jury returned headed by the foreman, and stood before the judge.

As the foreman appeared to hesitate, the judge inquired:

"Mr. Foreman, have you found a verdict?"

"No, Massa Judge, we haben't found 'em no how," replied the ebony jurymen.

"It's a very plain case," said the judge.

"Can't help it, massa, couldn't see it," replied ebony, again.

"On what grounds?" inquired the judge.

"We didn't look into de grounds, Massa Judge," replied the foreman; "de ossifer did not take us out into de grounds, but he took us into a room and locked us in, and tole us when we found de verdict he would let us out. So we began to find de verdict, and search ebory nook, corner, crevis, an ebory ting dere was in that room, but we found no verdict—no nuffin ob de kind dere."

A SOLEMN JOKE.—One of the clergymen of Peoria, Ill., has been put in a parsonage that did not come up to his idea of what a minister should enjoy. Recently he was called upon to announce that there would be a mite society at the ministerial dwelling. He said:

"There will be a mite society on Thursday evening next at the parsonage. The parsonage is a little, old, tumble-down building on — street."

Some of the older ones of the congregation took umbrage at this, while the younger ones laughed. In the evening the parson was called upon to make the same announcement. After saying the mite society would be held at the parsonage, he added:

"On the corner of the street near my residence, is a well. Said well is covered over and clapboarded. It is unpainted and weatherworn, but I wish to describe it so that none of you may make a mistake and take the well for the parsonage. The mite society will be held in the parsonage and not in the well."

A FRIEND AT COURT.—One Grant, a Scotchman was in the service of the great Frederick of Prussia, and was observed one day fondling the king's favorite dog. "Are you fond of dogs?" asked Frederick. "No, please your majesty," replied Grant, "but we Scotch have a saying that it is right to secure a friend at court." "You are a sly fellow," said the monarch, "recollect for the future that you have no occasion for any friend at court but myself." Grant rose afterwards to the command of the most important fortresses in the kingdom.

THE VALE OF CASHMERE.

A LADY OF CASHMERE.

The Vale of Cashmere is sung by many poets and its beauties quoted by many who never saw it, we venture to say. Everybody has read Lalla Rookh, and of course the "Light of the Harem" has shed her beams broadcast in the mind of the reader. All writers unite in pronouncing the country the grandest and most picturesque of any of the lands that the Eastern sun shines on, and its people—men and women—the handsomest. The women are especially charming, but like poor Eastman's Fanny—a physical creation of great beauty—they do not know a thing. The men are crafty and treacherous, and not models of moral excellence, though children of the Prophet. Of one of the fairer sex we herewith present the counterfeit presentment. We know not whether the fashion of the headdress has changed or not since our picture was made, but certainly it has no more grace than a two quart tin pail would have in a like position; however, the face it surmounts is interesting, and it is a type of those which have made poets rave, as stated above.

The Vale of Cashmere is ninety miles long, and through it flows the beautiful river Jylum, or Jhelum, the famed Hydaspes of early days. Surrounded by mountains of the boldest and grandest character, seen clearly in the purest atmosphere, the vale green and rich with the graces of a luxuriant cultivation, the traveller enjoys himself to the top of his bent, while passing through it, or sojourning in it. One, while passing down the Jylum, looks from the awning of his boat, that protects him from the summer sun, and describes what he sees of a Cashmir city, that bears the name of Sreenuggur:

"The houses on either side stand close to the water's edge, and some, supported by piles, project over it; every here and there a flight of steps leads down to the river, looking up which you see a vista of picturesque lanes, opening out into streets beyond—foul, dark and odoriferous; and as a foreground to the picture, sitting on the steps nearest the water, are groups of straw-colored women, with handsome features, and soft black eyes, clad in long wrappers of maroon-colored stuff, and engaged in the wholesome occupation of washing themselves, the somewhat arduous one of washing their children, and the pleasant and congenial one of talking scandal. While round and about you bubble up on the surface of the stream the little black heads and merry faces of urchins who, though they scarce can walk, can swim, and dive, and disport themselves in the water like so many water-kelpies."

Visitors find the boat an inexpensive addition to their conveniences on the river, costing but five shillings a month apiece, and always ready at order by night or day. This is enjoyed in the after part of the day, and at the close of one of those we catch another glimpse of Cashmerian life, through the eyes of the sojourner:

"But now the sun has sunk below the houses of the city to our left, and its slanting rays can no longer annoy you, so the boatmen stow away the awning, and permit your gaze to wander upwards, from the bathing machines, boats and landing-stairs to the trellised windows of the picturesque houses above you, some of which, perched on slender piles, leaning over the water, seem to have serious intentions of taking an evening stroll on stilts. Seen dimly through the delicately-carved woodwork of the half-open lattice, you will now and then, if you are lucky, catch a glimpse of the graceful form and face of some fair Cashmerian girl, with braided tresses and dark bright eyes, slyly peeping out on the crowded river below. And now, his day's work done, the pleasure-loving Cashmerian begins to enjoy himself; sounds of mirth and laughter, of music and merriment, are borne out to you from those mysterious casements, for there abide the queens of dance and song:

"Those songs that ne'er so sweetly sound,
As from a young Cashmerian's mouth," and boats freighted with bundles of dim drapery, whence peep little jewelled hands and slipped feet, glide past you—

"Youth at the helm and pleasure at the prow."

This description applies to one city—a type of the whole so far as surroundings admit. The gardens are beautiful, the lakes romantic, the fountains picturesque—everything is lovely, in nature and art, and, better than all, "the face that peeps playfully from under the white folds of a half-raised veil, fair enough to be that of Nourmahal, the Light of the Harem's self." The garden of Shalimar is of great age and retains all its pristine beauty, to the attractiveness of which are added appliances of dance and song that regale the modern visitor.

The Cashmerians are excellent manufacturers. Shawls, guns, leather, papier mache, jewelry, are made of the most elegant quality. The shawls, of course, have a world-wide celebrity, but their gun, pistol and matchlock barrels are equally deserving. The jewellers, shoemakers and tailors only want a pattern, and they will imitate it with the minutest accuracy. If a person's watch is out of order, it may be intrusted without compunction to the ill looking fellow in a greasy gaberdine, who will squat down in the corner of the room or tent, deliberately take it to pieces, and perform all necessary repairs therein in the presence of the owner.

From all this description turn back to the sweet Cashmerian of our illustration, whom we have had in mind, however, through it all, and give her the credit of grace maugre her costume.

THE YO SEMITE VALLEY.

Bierstadt and Hill have introduced to us, on this side of the Rocky Mountains and the Nevada, the great wonder of the world, the Yo Semite—not associated with the world's wonders of classical notoriety, but surpassing them all for beauty and sublimity. Until quite recently, it was not easy of access, but, with increase of visitation, the roads are made better, and the perils diminished, which, however severe, were all compensated for by the grandeur of the spectacle that ended the travellers' journey and made their leaving a source of the deepest regret. It is a matter for boasting with the Californians that no one who has ever seen the valley has returned dissatisfied. The completion of the Pacific railroad affords new facilities and inducements for visiting the scene, and to view it will become a grand object with tourists to seek the Pacific slope hereafter.

The valley is ten miles long and three wide. Its sides are granite walls, from 2000 feet to 4500 feet high. Great domes and pyramids rise above the deep hollow, at the bottom of which is a little lake and stream. A small river, 70 feet wide, tumbles over on one-side of the immense height, coming down in three falls, the first of them 1300 feet. In the valley are nooks and bits of scenery of rare beauty, contrasting almost strangely with the solemn grandeur of the surrounding walls and peaks. The spot is more than a place for a tour—it is one of the wonders of creation. And yet the first time a white man entered the valley was in 1848; till this time the magnificence and glory of the scene was involved in impenetrable wildness, and all its lavishness of beauty and sublimity bestowed upon eyes and ears that comprehended not.

An idea may be formed of the grandeur and magnitude of the scene from the fact that the rock of Tutucanula, or El Capitan, is an almost vertical cliff of naked smooth granite 3600 feet from the summit to its base in the valley, and that the trees, which are represented in our illustration on the top of the distant precipice on the right, are many of them over 200 feet high. These coniferous trees are one of the marvels of this extraordinary region, growing at an elevation of 6000 feet above the sea, and rivalling the gigantic precipices on which they grow, and by which they are surrounded. One tree measured 100 feet in circumference at the base, but it has been burned on one side, and therefore its original girth must have been nearly 120 feet; it was 276 feet high. Another tree, which lay prostrate on the plain, had had its interior hollowed out by burnings so as to form a tunnel sufficiently large to ride into it on horseback for a considerable distance, with room to turn round, being over 13 feet in the clear inside the bark.

From near the foot of the Sentinel rock, looking directly across the end of the valley, is seen the most stupendous feature of the Yo Semite, that is, the Yo Semite Fall, which is far beyond any other known to exist, both as regards its height and the wondrous character of the surrounding scenery. The fall is formed by a creek of the same name, in the west side of the Mount Hoffman group, about twenty miles north of the valley; and as the volume of water, of course, varies during the different periods of the year, it cannot always be seen under the same aspect. From the edge of the uppermost cliff to the bottom of the valley is, in round numbers, 2550 feet. The first fall is a vertical descent of 1500 feet, the second 650 feet, and the bottom one 400 feet. The cliff a little east of the edge of the fall is 3030 feet above the level of the valley.

Bowles, in his "Across the Continent," speaks of the entire inadequacy of words to convey an idea of the stupendous spectacle as first seen by the visitor:

"As well," he says, "interpret God in thirty-nine articles as portray it by word of mouth or pen. As well reproduce castle or cathedral by a stolen frieze, or broken column, as this assemblage of natural wonder and beauty by photograph or painting. The overpowering sense of the sublime, of awful desolation, of transcending marvellousness and unexpectedness, that swept over us, as we reined our horses sharply out of green forests, and stood upon a high jutting rock that overlooked this rolling, upheaving sea of granite mountains, holding far down its rough lap this vale of beauty of meadow, and grove, and river—such tide of feeling, such stoppage of ordinary emotions, comes at rare intervals in any life. It was the confrontal of God face to face, as in great danger, in solemn and sudden death. It was Niagara magnified. All that was mortal shrank back, all that was immortal swept to the front and bent down in awe. We sat till the rich elements of beauty came out of the majesty and desolation, and then, eager to get nearer, pressed tired horses down the steep rough path into the valley.....It is not too much to say that no so limited space in all the known world offers such majestic and impressive beauty. Niagara alone divides honors with it in America. Only the whole of Switzerland can surpass it—no one scene in all the Alps can match this....."

"The one distinguishing feature is a double wall of perpendicular granite, rising from a half mile to a mile in height, and inclosing a valley not more than half a mile in width on the average, and from ten to fifteen miles in length. It is a fissure, a chasm, rather than a valley, in solid rock mountains; there is not breadth enough in it for even one of the walls to lie down; and yet it offers all the fertility, all the beauties of a rich valley. There is meadow with thick grass; there are groves of pine and oak, the former exquisite in form and majestic in size; there are thickets of willow and birch, bay trees and dogwood, and various flowering shrubs; primrose, and cowslip, and golden rod, and violet and painted cup, more delicate than Eastern skies can welcome, make gay gardens of all the vacant fields; the aroma of mint, of pine and fir, of flower, loads the air; the fern family find a familiar home everywhere; and winding in and out among all flows the Merced River, so pure and transparent that you can hardly tell where the air leaves off and the water begins, rolling rapid over polished stones or soft sands, or staying in wide, deep pools that invite the bather and the boat, and holding trout only less rich and dainty than the brook trout of New England. The soil, the trees, the shrubs, the grasses, and the flowers of this little valley are much the same in general character and variety as those of the Connecticut river valleys; but they are richer in development and greater in numbers. They borrow of the mountain fecundity and sweetness, and they are fed by summer rains as those of other California valleys rarely are."

The author is equally enthusiastic regarding the several falls which give beauty and grace to the valley, already described. He says:

"In the main portion of the valley, the Bridal Veil is the first conspicuous fall—now a dainty rivulet starting over a precipice nine hundred feet high, but usually all lost at once in delicate spray that sways and scatters in the light breeze, and fastens upon the wall, as sign of its being and its beauty, the fabled rainbow of promise. The name of this fall is well chosen; it is a type of the delicate gauze, floating and illusory, by which brides delight to hide their blushes and give mystery to their charms. Further up, you see the Yo Semite Fall, perhaps thrice the size, in volume, of the Bridal Veil, but distinguished for its height—the greatest height of any waterfall yet discovered in the world. It is broken about two thirds the way down its high wall of rock by projecting masses of the mountain, giving it several hundred feet of cataract passage; but counting its whole fall from top to bottom, it is two thousand six hundred (2650) feet in height, which is fifteen times as high as Niagara Falls!"

As you ascend the several plateaux of this astounding mountain chain the aspects of nature gradually change. In the very depths of the valleys, by the watercourses and swamps, large numbers of birds of every color perch on the reeds and branches, and at sunset chant in the most monotonous tones a melancholy farewell to day. High over the mountain peaks soar white-headed eagles, falcons and black vultures, who eternally sail in circles, and seem to take no notice of such an insignificant object as man. There are many specimens of birds in the valley and its vicinity unknown to ornithologists, but it appears to be a very paradise for pigeons.

The route from San Francisco to the valley is by way of Stockton, a town 110 miles due east, and this part of the journey is done by river steamer, the next 100 miles by stages, and the last forty-three by saddle-horses, which in two days, the riders camping in the woods for the night, bring the travellers to Inspiration Point, where the whole magnificence of the Yo Semite bursts upon the view.

HEAD OF A CALIFORNIA MALE INDIAN.

The valley was discovered in 1848 by miners who were prospecting for gold, a class capable of appreciating its beauties; for though rough, there, they had but just come from civilization, and it broke upon their vision with the force of a new creation. Even the Digger Indians had given no hint of its existence, though it is to be supposed that it was not unknown to them. These explorers for gold would go far away from their camps into the wildest portions of the mountains, and beside every stream they came to they would dig for the surface gold, and wash the dirt, by the first process, the pan. Patient, industrious, persistent, fearlessly they explored the country, sometimes rewarded but oftener disappointed, in continual danger from the treacherous and malicious Diggers, and many dying in the wilderness, or betrayed, never returning to the camp they left. The scene of our illustration is on one of these small streams that penetrate the Nevadas, the men a type of the daring and hardy prospectors that have given the miner character and distinction. Not in appearance, one would think, persons to appreciate the Yo Semite were it to open its magazine of beauties before them, more than the other human specimen, the Digger himself, who is represented in a waterfall and headress that would make a fashionable belle beside herself to possess, or his "dusky mate" whose dark eyes flash upon us from the next page. We can fancy those rough people as they looked upon the scene for the first time, and the glory of rock, and river, and cascade and mountain unfolded before them. Like the old mathematician they may have shouted Eureka in their delight, and forgotten in the sublime spectacle the sting of disappointment. But their discovery has given to the world a satisfaction that will outlast the discovery of gold, the gratified visitor will find in its contemplation the "joy forever" that a "thing of beauty" imparts, and though the discoverers be nameless the grand fact lives to reward the seeker who pursues Nature into this delightful retreat.

We append from Dilke, an English traveller of keen observation, his remarks on California scenery, including this of which we have written, and introducing some with which we are familiar nearer home, that captured the eye of the Englishman and is still treasured in his memory to contrast with the grandest he has seen abroad:

"A few days were all that I could spend in the valleys that lie between the Sierra Contra Costa range, basking in a rich sunlight, and unsurpassed in the world for climate, scenery and soil. This single State has twice the area of Great Britain, the most fertile of known soils, and the sun and sea-breeze of Greece. Western rhapsodies are the expression of the intoxication produced by such a spectacle, but they are outdone by facts.

"For mere charm to the eye, it is hard to give the palm between the cracks and canons of the Sierra and the softer vales of the coast range, where the hot sun is tempered by the cool Pacific breeze, and thunder and lightning are unknown.

"Coming from the wilds of the Carson Desert and of Mirage Plains, the more sensuous beauty of the lower dells has for the eye the relief that travellers from the coast must seek in the loftier heights and precipices of the Yo Semite. The oak-filled valleys of the Contra Costa range have all the pensive repose of the sheltered vales that lie between the Apennines and the Adriatic from Rimini to Ancona; but California has the advantage in her skies. Italy has the blue, but not the golden haze.

"Nothing can be more singular than the variety of beauty that lies hid in these Pacific slopes; all that is best in Canada and the Eastern States finds more than its equal here. The terrible grandeur of Cape Trinite on the Saguenay, and the panorama of loveliness from the terrace at Quebec, are alike outdone.

"Americans need not go to Europe to find scenery; but neither need they go to California, nor even Colorado. Those who tell us that there is no such thing as natural beauty west of the Atlantic can scarcely know the Eastern, while they ignore the Western and Central States. The world can show few scenes more winning than Israel's River Valley, in the White Mountains of New Hampshire, or North Conway, in the southern slopes of the same range. Nothing can be more full of grandeur than the passage of the James at Balcony Falls, where the river rushes through a crack in the Appalachian chain; the wilderness of Northern New York is unequalled of its kind, and there are delicious landscapes in the Adirondacks. As for river scenery, the Hudson is grander than the Rhine; the Susquehanna is lovelier than the Meuse; the Schuylkill prettier than the Seine; the Mohawk more enchanting than the Dart. Of the rivers of North Europe, the Neckar alone is not beaten in the States.

"Americans admit that their scenery is fine, but pretend that it is wholly wanting in the interest that historic memories bestow. So-called republicans affect to find a charm in Bishop Hatto's Tower which is wanting in Irving's "Sunnyside;" the ten thousand virgins of Cologne live in their fancy, while Constitution Island and Fort Washington are forgotten names. Americans or Britishers, we Saxons are all alike—a wandering, discontented race; we go 4000 miles to find Sleepy Hollow, or Killian Van Rensselaer's Castle, or Hiawatha's great red pipe-stone quarry; and the Americans, who live in the castle picnic yearly in the Hollow, and flood the quarry for a skating-rink, come here to England to visit Burns's house or sit in Pope's armchair.

"Down South I saw clearly the truth of a thought that struck me before I had been ten minutes west of the Sierra Pass. California is Saxon only in the looks and language of the people of its towns. In Pennsylvania you may sometimes fancy yourself in Sussex; while in New England you seem only to be in some part of Europe that you have never happened to light upon before, in California you are at last in a new world. The hills are weirdly peaked or flattened, the skies are new, the birds and plants are new; the atmosphere, crisp though warm, is unlike any in the world but that of South Australia. It will be strange if the Pacific coast does not produce a new school of Saxon poets—painters it has already given

"A few hours' quiet steaming in the sunlight down the Sacramento River, past Rio Vista and Montezuma, through the gap in the Contra Costa range, at which the grand volcanic peak of Monte Diablo stands sentinel, watching over the Martinez Straits, and there opened to the south and west a vast mountain-surrounded bay. Volumes of cloud were rolling in unceasingly from the ocean through the Golden Gate, past the fortified island of Alcatraz, and spending themselves on the opposite shores."

SHEEP-WASHING AND SHEARING.

BY JAMES THOMSON.

From hill to dale,
Waking the breeze, resounds the blended voice

Of happy labor, love and social glee,
Or, rushing thence, in one diffusive band,
They drive the troubled flocks, by many a dog
Compelled, to where the mazy-running brook Forms a deep pool; this bank abrupt and high,
And that fair-spreading in a pebbled shore.

Their swelling treasures to the sunny ray,
Inly disturbed, and wondering what this wild Outrageous tumult means, their loud complaints

The country fill; and, tossed from rock to rock,
Incessant bleatings run around the hilla.
At last, of snowy white, the gathered flocks
Are in the wattled pen, innumerable, pressed,
Head above head; and ranged in lusty rows

Urged to the giddy brink, much is the toil,
The clamor much, of men, and boys and dogs,
Ere the soft, fearful people to the flood Commit their woolly sides. And oft the swain,
On some impatient seizing, hurls them in;
Emboldened then, nor hesitating more,
Fast, fast they plunge amid the flashing wave,
And, panting, labor to the furthest shore.
Repeated this, till deep the well-washed fleece
Has drunk the flood, and from his lively haunt
The trout is banished by the sordid stream;
Heavy, and dripping, to the breezy brow Slow move the harmless race; where, as they spread

The shepherds sit, and whet the sounding shears.

Behold where bound, and of its robe bereft,
By needy man, that all-depending lord,
How meek, how patient, the mild creature lies!
What softness in its melancholy face,
What dumb, complaining innocence appears!
Fear not, ye gentle tribes, 'tis not the knife
Of horrid slaughter that is o'er you waved;
No, 'tis the tender swain's well-guided shears,
Who, having now to pay his annual care,
Borrowed your fleece, to you a cumbrous load,
Will send you bounding to your hills again.

THE U. S. STEAMSHIP ONEIDA.

On this page we give our readers an excellent representation of the United States steamship Oneida, whose loss in the waters of Japan, on the evening of the 24th of January, created such a painful sensation all over the world. Only four officers and fifty-seven men were saved out of a crew of one hundred and sixty. The steamship that cut the Oneida down to the water's edge was the Bombay, a large vessel steaming at the rate of ten miles an hour. The master of the latter vessel did not stop to see what damage he had done, but continued on his all carried away, and in fifteen minutes she sunk in fourteen fathoms of water, and out of a personnel of twenty-five officers and 150 men, nine officers and fifty-four men are left to tell the tale. The wardroom dinner was just finishing at the time of the collision. It seemed to me as if the whole side of the ship was coming bodily in on the dinner table. We all rushed on deck, and immediately everything was in the greatest confusion. As I stepped over the hatch-combing I saw a large steamer just leaving us. She was hailed by our executive officer and requested course and anchored at Yokohama, Japan, in less than two hours after the accident, and did not even report the collision to those on shore. The Bombay is an English steamship and manned by Englishmen; yet English sailors and landmen condemn the leaving a vessel in distress.

An officer of the Oneida, one who escaped almost by an accident, has furnished the following account of the collision and sinking.

"We left Yokohama at 5 P. M., on the 24th, and at 6.45 were run in by the Bombay, on the starboard quarter, the whole of which was carried away. She struck us full with her sharp iron stem, and cut everything off as with a chisel. The wheel, steering gear, spanker boom, and gaff and poop cabin were to stay by us, but as far as I could judge they steamed away as fast as they could go. I walked aft on the quarter deck and saw that everything was smashed to pieces. I then looked over the quarter and saw the extent of the damage. I believed then that the ship would go down in two minutes, and rapidly concluded that every man must look out for himself. As I realized the position I noticed that the wardroom boat, which hung at the port quarter, was manned by twelve or fourteen men. I jumped on the rail and asked if an officer was in the boat. The men said 'no,' and seeing who I was, they said, 'Jump in, doctor,' and securing hold of me two or three of them dragged me into the boat. I at once took charge, ordering a man at each fall to lower when ordered, having first cut all the fastenings with knives. We staid there until within three or four minutes of the ship's going down. During this time the boatswain and two or three men got into the boat, making the whole number seventeen. We were still hanging at the davits, when the ship began to roll in that peculiar way which precedes foundering, and the boat was dashed against the side of the ship, threatening to stave her to pieces. I looked on the deck and saw no one abaft the main-mast, and gave the order to lower away and hang by the falls. The fall got jammed, and had to be cut away with a knife. Had we been three minutes longer on the davits it would have been too late, as the vessel went down like a shot after starting, and the suction would have carried our boat down with the wreck. I may mention here that when the boat was brought up to the Idaho, she nearly sunk alongside, and on examination it was found that seven pieces were broken on her starboard side, and one of the planks was knocked an inch out of place. This must have been done by striking the side of the ship, and convinces me that we could not have saved any more in our boat as she would have filled and gone down with a heavier load. As the coxswain cut the fall a junk was seen close by, under sail. We started for her, intending to bring her alongside if possible and save life. Being under sail, however, and going free, she rapidly left us in about two or three minutes. We gave it up, and on turning to go back to the ship found she had disappeared. We pulled to where we thought she had been, but seeing and hearing nothing, finally headed for the shore, and landed about 8.30 o'clock. I at once went up to a Japanese house, engaged three guides and started off for Yokohama, 25 or 30 miles distant. We crossed five mountains on the way and had the most fatiguing tramp you can imagine. We arrived all safe at four o'clock on the morning of the 25th, when I spread the news and sent down assistance to the wreck. The vessel was found yesterday but no bodies as yet. The English Consular Court is investigating the matter. All the officers of the Bombay have been examined. Our turn will come to-morrow. Mr. DeLong, American Minister, is conducting the proceedings on our behalf. You will know the result by the next Pacific mail, due at San Francisco March 17th. I landed on the shore in undress uniform, without a cap, and only saved my watch by having it on. I have been very much shattered by the occurrence and the subsequent fatigue, but am now much better and begin to feel like myself. All Yokohama has been extremely kind to the survivors. The feeling against the captain of the Bombay for not stopping is intense, and if the court attempts to whitewash him violence may be attempted. No vessel that has been in the Eastern waters was so popular as the Oneida. Even the English officers say they would rather the misfortune had happened to one of their own vessels. Of twelve officers eating dinner at the time of the collision, I am the only one left."

Captain Eyre, of the Bombay said, on arriving at Yokohama, that he had cut down a "d—d Yankee frigate." His cowardly conduct should condemn him to everlasting reproach and disgrace; yet his sentence was simply suspension from command for six months. He should have been suspended from a yardarm, with a rope around his neck for an hour or two. There would have been some justice in such a punishment.

BOSTON HARBOR IN SUMMER.

At this season of the year the most delightful recreation, as well as employment, is that which is derived from the water, and boating and fishing have great attractions when the sun is at the warm point of the solstice, and the land is sweltering beneath fervent heat. Then the water pleads in the secret mind, and "as pants the hart for cooling streams," we long for the running brook or the sea, and, throwing aside dusty toil, run like the rivers to the ocean, sailing upon its surface or bathing in its waters. Happy is he who has a yacht of his own, who can embark all his cares in his graceful ark and sail out like another Noah over the billows, refreshing soul and body in the invigorating breezes of the sea.

Yachting has long been encouraged, in England, as a noble pursuit, and the progress made in marine architecture there and throughout the world has proceeded from the ideals of the yacht-builders, that, beginning in little, grew to a triumph of art. In this country the improvements were most marked, and Sears, in his Young America, won a renown that has not yet been dimmed, though his ideal afterwards embodied in the steam frigate Niagara was not a success practically, or at least was not deemed so by those who do not believe that aught good can come

The growing interest in yachting is evident from the increasing number of clubs that are being formed, and in the feeling of enthusiasm among the general public regarding them. The clubs of New York and Boston have become national institutions, and their chronicled movements are of importance sufficient to attract the attention of the entire out of the Nazareths that are outside the naval constructor's office at Washington. The ocean race in midwinter between the Henrietta, Vesta and Fearnaught was an event in the history of American yachting that has no parallel for audacious daring, and the bold challenge thrown in the face of England by Capt. Bennett, exhibits a faith in American prowess that should be further tested.

community. And well they may, for they are friendly fleets; not cruising to destroy, but to unite men in bonds of better friendship and promote the growth of marine science.

The fisherman, though his bread depending upon his vocation lessens the romance of the sea, is nevertheless happy in his calling. It is a bold and free life, full of excitement, and yields, amid the lines of toil, the keenest relish. But more than the professional fishermen do those enjoy, who, as many do, charter vessels for the summer cruise, with the purpose of fishing. Free from the care of procuring a living, devoted singly to the pursuit of pleasure, roving at will o'er the sea to whatever point they choose, they ask no favors of any. The sea to them is the source of their main supply and they revel in its yield. It is their garden, their orchard, their dairy, their home, and there is no failure of crops for them; no outlays for doubtful results, but a harvest of health and pleasure.

The sea presents an inexhaustible subject, that we do not choose to grasp. Our object is simply to skim the shore and present two of the most graceful and romantic features of the ocean for the admiration of our readers, leaving them to explore the great beyond at their option, and con the lesson in their own way. There may be those who will say with the Henglish schoolmaster, "If Britannia rules the waves, I wish she'd rule 'em straighter;" but most people delight in the sea.

THE FISHING SMACKS.

MOUNT ARARAT.

This celebrated mountain, distinguished in holy writ as being the resting-place of the ark at the subsidence of the waters of the Flood, is situated in Armenia, Western Asia, at the point of contact of Russia with Turkey and Persia, to all of which it belongs. It is about seventy miles long and thirty-five broad. It is a singular mountain, isolated and apart, its highest point rising to the height of 17,323 feet above the level of the sea, and 14,520 above the plain of Arar in which it is situated. The mountain possesses two peaks, the great and little Ararat, the latter of which is 13,093 feet above the sea, and 10,140 above the plain. Great Ararat is covered with perpetual ice and snow, for about three miles from its summit downward, in an oblique direction. On the entire northerly half, from about 14,000 feet above the sea, it shoots up in one rigid crest to its summit, and then stretches downward on its southerly side to a level not quite so low, forming what is called the Silver Crest of Ararat. As it stands depicted in our illustration, a cloud dividing the icy region from the main, its peak elevated in cold grandeur far above, it presents a splendid spectacle to the traveller across the great plain. Little Ararat is free from snow in September and October. Its declivities are greater and steeper than those of the Great Ararat, and its almost conical form is marked with several delicate furrows that radiate downward from its summit.

The top of the Great Ararat was first reached October, 9, 1829, by Professor Parrot, who reports it to be a "gently vaulted, nearly cruciform surface, of about 200 paces in circuit, that at the margin sloped off precipitously on every side, but particularly towards the southeast and northeast. Formed of eternal ice, without rock or stone to interrupt its continuity, it was the austere silvery head of old Ararat." Towards the east this summit is connected, by means of a flatish depression, with a lower summit, distant 397 yards; and, in like manner, covered with ice. After remaining on the summit three-quarters of an hour, determining the height, and making various observations, Parrot descended, the third day after he left it. The observations of Parrot have been in every respect confirmed by another Russian traveller, named Abich, who reached the summit of the Great Ararat without difficulty, July 28, 1845. He, with six others, remained an hour on the top, without experiencing any inconvenience from cold, described by Parrot and his companions. Abich, previous to making the ascent, had his tent pitched on the upper slope of the mountain, in the valley between the two peaks, nearly 8000 feet above the sea. It would appear even that the ascent of Mount Ararat is easier than that of Mont Blanc; for the height of the latter, above the valley of Chamouni, is 12,000 feet; while that of the former, above the point where Abich pitched his tent, cannot be above 9000 feet; and the limit of perpetual snow is lower on the Swiss than on the Armenian mountain. The season most suitable for the ascent is the end of July or beginning of August, when the summer attains its greatest heat, and when there is annually a period of atmospheric quiet, accompanied by a clear, unclouded sky. So soon, however, as the fine days in the earlier part of August are over, the atmospheric war commences in the higher regions of the air, the strife being hottest between the two great peaks. Then there is no certainty of fine weather, for sudden thunderstorms, always on the highest parts of the mountains accompanied by hail and snow, endanger the life of the traveller.

The Ararat mountains are doubtless volcanic, evinced by stones on their sides evidently the product of a crater. This was in dispute, however, till July 2, 1840, when an eruption took place from the head of the great chasm of the bigger Ararat, which destroyed the monastery and chapel of St. James, and the village of Arguri and their inmates. Arguri, in Russian Armenia, was situated at the end of the great chasm on the northeast slope, about 5400 feet above the level of the sea. It was one of the largest and most beautiful villages in Armenia.

The inhabitants, 1600 Armenians, and a number of Kurds, lived by rearing horses and cattle, and by growing some corn, though at a distance from the village, the soil in the immediate neighborhood being very stony. They also cultivated the vine, which, according to very questionable tradition, was first planted here by Noah when he left the ark, whence the Armenian name of the village [argh, he planted, wrt, the vine]. Up the mountain, a short distance from Arguri was the monastery and chapel of St. James, 6375 feet above the sea. It stood on a grassy terrace, about twenty-five feet above the rivulet in the lower part of the chasm, which here has a depth of six hundred to eight hundred feet. In this monastery Parrot and his companions resided during their exploration of the outmain. On July 2, 1840, the eruption above alluded to overwhelmed, in one common destruction, the village and the monastery and chapel, with their inhabitants and inmates, consisting of fifteen hundred Armenians, four hundred Kurdish servants, and eight monks. Only one hundred and fourteen individuals escaped, who were engaged in the fields, and otherwise at a distance from the scene of the calamity. Since the eruption, the wells of the village have given forth discolored water of a sulphurous taste.

with immense force stones and earth over the slope of the mountain down into the plain. The vapor rose very quickly higher than the summit of Ararat, and seems to have been wholly of aqueous composition; for in the same night a heavy rain fell in the vicinity of the mountain—an unusual occurrence in this country during summer. The vapor at first was of various colors, in which blue and red prevailed. Whether flames burst forth could not be ascertained; but the pillars of vapor or smoke had a red tint, which, had the eruption taken place during the night, might possibly have exhibited flame.

“The blue and red tint of the vapor soon became dark black, and immediately the air was filled with a very disagreeable smell of sulphur. While the mountain continued

Dr. Wagner, an enterprising German traveler and naturalist, who visited the spot in 1843, gives in substance the following account of that event, as related by Sahatel Chotschaieff, brother to Stephen Aga, village elder of Arguri, honorable mentioned both by Parrot and Dubois, and confirmed by two other eyewitnesses:

“On July 2, 1840, half an hour before sunset, the atmosphere clear, the inhabitants of Armenia were frightened by a thundering noise, that rolled loudest and most fearfully in the vicinity of the Great Ararat. During an undulating motion of the earth, lasting about two seconds, which rolled from the mountain east-southeast and wrought destruction in the districts of Sharur and Nakhichevan, a rent was formed in the end of the great chasm, about three miles above Arguri, out of which rose gas and vapor, hurling to heave, and the earth to shake, with the unremitting thunder, along with the subterranean cracking and growling, might be heard the whiz, as of bombs, caused by the force with which stones and large masses of rock, some upwards of fifty tons weight, were hurled through the air. Likewise, the dash of the stones as they met in the air in their flight, could be distinguished from the thundering noise issuing from the interior of the mountain. Where these large stones fell, there in general they lay; for in consequence of the gentle declination of the ground at the foot of the mountain, to roll far was impossible. The eruption continued a full hour. When the vapor had cleared away, and the shower of stones and mud had ceased, the rich village of Arguri, the monastery and chapel of St. James, were not to be seen; all, along with their inmates, were buried under the mass of stones and mud that had been ejected. The earthquake which accompanied the eruption, destroyed 6000 houses in the neighboring districts of Nakhichevan, Sharur and Ardubad. Four days after a second catastrophe occurred, which spread still further the work of destruction at the foot of the mountain. After the rent in the chasm, whence issued the vapor and stones, had closed, there remained in the same place a deep basin filled with water by the melting of the snow, by the rain, and by a streamlet from above, so as to form a small lake. The mass of stone and clay, which formed a dam, and surrounded the lake like the edge of a crater, was burst by the weight of water, and poured down the declivity of the mountain with irresistible force a stream of thick mud, which spread into the plain, and partly stopped up the bed, and altered the course of the small river of Karasu. A part of the gardens of Arguri that had escaped the eruption, were destroyed by this stream of mud, which carried trees, rocks, and the bodies of the inhabitants of the village, down into the plain, and to the bed of the Karasu. This stream of mud was three times repeated, and was accompanied by subterranean noises."

The name Ararat is said to be derived from Aral, a king who lived 1750 years B. C. He fell in battle on the plain which was hence called Arac-Arat—the fall of Aral. That Noah's ark rested on the top of Mount Ararat is not to be credited; the difficulty of the descent, and the low temperature of the atmosphere, which must have killed many of the animals, alike preclude the supposition; and, moreover, Scripture does not say it rested on the top, but merely "on the mountains of Ararat."

A SUMMER RETREAT

Summer is with us, and its advent forces men and women to consider the best means for escaping heat. Wives are packed off to the country to look for eligible boarding-places for the season, while the rich, those who need not think of dollars and cents, telegraph to the proprietors of hotels in cosy watering-places, and secure rooms without making contracts for charges, although the prices are enough to compel an ordinary mortal to turn pale with apprehension. Some of our sensible citizens have removed to summer cottages, where they can enjoy a few of the comforts of home at a slight additional expense, while others contend that there is more comfort at home, even in the hottest weather, than at any hotel or cottage in the country. In this they are about half right, but children need change, and wives will have it or know the reason why, so policy compels our friends to leave the city on the first sweltering day, and they don't return, unless compelled to, until late in the season. They may drop in upon us once in a while, and complain that business brought them to town, but trade gets along very well without them, for the old clerks stick to their posts and do all that is necessary in the way of looking after things.

New York people are great for summer houses. They build palaces on the Hudson and call them cottages, and cottages on Staten Island and call them palaces. It all depends on a man's purse. If he is rich he can call his palace a cottage and no one will believe him, and if he is poor and calls his cottage a palace no one will place the slightest degree of credit on what he says. On page 520 we give our readers a view of a genuine summer retreat on the river Bronx, N. Y. It is suggestive of chills and fever, although we are informed that the disease is unknown in this locality.

It is a sylvan retreat of rare beauty and surroundings, and is of course the property of private taste and possession. One might imagine it to be a Chinese pagoda, on some Eastern river, for it has a foreign look about it that is not at all American. We rejoice to see such taste displayed in the construction of ornamental and beautiful resorts of this character; we like the spirit that leads the town-bred man to resort to the country, and there to build himself a home, and to beautify it. It is of service, too, not alone to ourselves, but to others, for us to cultivate and improve the soil; and a man, who, though closely engaged in business, does this, by devoting but a few hours of the day to the object, does well, and should be respected for it. The real benefactors of mankind, as St. Pierre has so beautifully said, are those who cause two blades of wheat to mature where one did before. The fields ought to be the morning and evening theme of all Americans who love their country. To fertilize and im-source. Commerce and manufactures are only subordinate results of the main spring. We consider agriculture as every way subordinate, not only to abundance, industry, com-prove his farm ought to be the prime temporal object of every owner of substantial soil. All national aggrandizement, power, and wealth may be traced to agriculture, as its ultimate fort and health, but to good morals, and, ultimately, even to religion. We shall always regard the American farmer as belonging to the first order of men.

THE STRUGGLE FOR MAVERICK.

A Dramatic Story....In Three Parts.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

PART SECOND.—XV.

NO one at the mansion was astir earlier than Mrs. Roesselle. By six o'clock she had aroused old Toby Small and sent him on the roan pony to the village to notify the lawyer to come to the house, according to his agreement. At half past seven she met the Mavericks at the breakfast-table. She was pale and quiet, but resolute at heart, and fully prepared to go through unflinchingly with the scene that was about to open. Both Oliver Maverick and Laura were reserved and haughty in their demeanor, and, in fact, declined any conversation with Mrs. Roesselle, her nephew and her foster-daughter. They seemed laboring under a constraint of impatience that they should be obliged to see these people sitting at this table again.

When the meal was finished the father and daughter withdrew to the rooms which they still occupied, and Mrs. Roesselle beckoned the others to follow her, and led them into the parlor. Seeing them seated there, she went to the front door to watch for arrivals, and presently descried two human figures approaching in the road, one appearing to walk by the help of the other. And while she was observing them, two horsemen came in sight, and presently the roan pony trotted up the avenue, accompanied by the lawyer's horse, with their riders.

An unusual opening and shutting of doors below, and the continued sound of voices reached Oliver Maverick, and he rung his bell to inquire the cause. The servant who answered the call announced that Mrs. Roesselle requested the presence of both Mr. and Miss Maverick in the parlor, upon the most urgent business.

"What now, I should like to know?" he exclaimed angrily. "That person knows she has no business with me until noon. What, in the fiend's name, is going on below?"

"I don't know, sir—except that the parlor is full of people, and madam asked me to deliver the message I have given you."

He sprang from his chair with a wrathful face and an imprecation as he heard her words, and followed by Laura he descended to the parlor. What he saw as they entered the room was not calculated to restore his composure. Mrs. Roesselle stood by the piano, in conversation with Mr. Jenks: Roecoe Grayle and Anna were near them; old Roger Brill and his guest sat together, and Toby Small and David Terry, the farm-manager, completed the number. The latter was a stout, shrewd-looking man, with a very red head and a very freckled face; a sturdy Scotchman of the middle class, who had managed this farm ever since he came to the country.

Oliver Maverick surveyed the occupants of the room, and turned with anger burning in his eyes to Mrs. Roesselle.

"A pretty company, indeed, madam, is this that you have assembled in my house!" he sneered. "May I inquire what the object of this is?"

She looked undauntedly at him, and then led Anna forward to the centre of the room.

"My object," she said, in a clear, firm voice, "is to make public that this young lady is the sole heir of Augustus Maverick, and entitled to all his property."

Laura looked with some alarm at her father, who actually trembled all over with rage.

"I have borne enough of your impertinence within the last twenty-four hours," he said, trying to speak slowly and calmly. "I will not be insulted any longer. Mr. Terry?"

"Eh, mon?"

"Will you call in some of your hands, and throw these people out of the house?"

"No sir; certainly not!" said David, dropping his dialect, and speaking briskly. "Mrs. Roesselle asked me to come in here to listen to something she has to say; and I'll see that she has fair play, in the bargain."

The seaman crossed the room with a swagger that he might have used on the deck of his ship in a storm, and slapped the Scotchman heartily on the back. "I'm with you there, Davy," he said, and he looked at Oliver Maverick in a way that made him feel quite uncomfortable.

"Well, well," said the latter doggedly, "if I must listen to your nonsense, pray make it as brief as possible. I tell you all candidly, I don't want you in this house longer than is absolutely necessary. As for those present who have been in the employment of the house, they may consider themselves discharged from this moment."

David Terry took a heavy pinch of snuff, and old Toby winked knowingly at him. Oliver Maverick looked uneasily about him, paying no heed to Laura's anxious whispers, while Mr. Jenks stood forward and addressed the company:

"I have attended here at the request of Mrs. Roesselle, like most of you," and he bowed to those seated around, "as a witness. This, it is true, is not a court of justice; but I believe that no statement will be made by those who are here called upon to speak, which any of them would refuse to verify under oath. The fact to be proved, and made public, is, that this young lady, who has long been known as Mrs. Roesselle's foster-daughter, is the only and rightful heir to the estate of the late Augustus Maverick. And after the astonishing developments that have been made to me this morning, I think that all parties concerned may safely regard all conflict about this estate as ended, and allow that it is unnecessary and useless to carry it into the courts.

"I am requested to make my own statement first. It will be very brief. On the night before his decease, I was sent for by Mr. Augustus Maverick to make his will. I attended him at his bedside, and there the will was duly drawn, subscribed and executed. That will gave all of his property to this young lady, by the name of Anna Maria May; stating as a reason for so doing that she had been very kind to him. The will was by his direction placed under his pillow for safe-keeping. That will, I am informed, was missing immediately after the death of Mr. Maverick, and has not been found. It is undoubtedly destroyed. But there were at that time in the house two persons who were related to the testator, and who expected to be his heirs, and who therefore had a strong motive for the destruction of the will. Moreover, a chain of the most formidable circumstances, which are not necessary to be repeated, connects those persons with this act. Their guilt is believed by all who know those circumstances."

"Do you refer to my daughter and myself?" Oliver Maverick demanded, masking his trepidation with anger.

"I am compelled to say that I do refer to your daughter and yourself," said the lawyer.

"I shall hold you personally responsible for the charge, sir! It is false—false as hell itself, sir! But I cannot justify myself here, and in such company. I only warn you that you shall smart for that alander."

"I am ready to reassert my belief, and prove the fact, anywhere," was the rejoinder. "But to proceed. The will being destroyed, and the brother and niece appearing to be his heirs, they have expected to take possession of his estate. They—"

"I am his heir—and I have taken possession," Oliver Maverick defiantly interrupted. "Who dares to dispute my right?"

The lawyer turned his eyes inquiringly toward Mrs. Roesselle. She placed her arm around Anna, and whispering a word in her ear, stood calmly before them, while she took up the thread of the narrative that was to be told out by different tongues.

"I was present at the deathbed of Augustus Maverick," she said, "with others who are here, and one, Mrs. Wadhams, who is sick and unable to be here. I appeal to those present who were there to say whether I state correctly what happened then and there. He said—and I repeat his exact words, for I have not forgotten one of them—'Where's Anna? I want her.' He signed that he wished her to come nearer and take his hands; and when she had done so, he said: 'My last words—bear witness! This girl is my own daughter; she's to have it all. Will—will—' Is this correct?"

"It is just as I heard and saw it," Mr. Grayle said; and Anna, too much agitated for speech, bowed her assent.

"Something of that kind did occur, I believe," Oliver Maverick bruskiy said. "What then? Do you propose, madam, to base your extraordinary and ridiculous pretensions in behalf of this girl upon the crazy maunderings of a weak old man in the very act of death? Or worse—if there is any foundation for their new claim of relationship," and the speaker sneered so that Roscoe Grayle felt his blood tingling hot in his veins, "if there is some truth in it, do you mean to bring forward one of Augustus Maverick's nameless children, unknown to the law, as his heir? Your meddling friend yonder, the lawyer, can teach you better than that."

Anna shuddered, and nestled closer to Mrs. Roesselle, as she heard the unfeeling taunts of the man. The lady drew her closer to her side, and with a firm voice and a flashing eye, spoke out bravely and boldly.

"I brand the imputation that your language conveys as false," she cried. "This girl is not only the daughter of Augustus Maverick, recognized as such by him on his deathbed, but she is his child and heir, born in lawful wedlock, and beyond dispute."

She spoke these words, that fell with startling effect on the circle of listeners, firmly and without hesitation. Anna raised her eyes, wet with tears, and thanked her with an eloquent look; while the sneer on Laura's lips disappeared, and her father uttered the passionate expression:

"It is a lie!"

"It is the truth, you lubber!" Edson Bayne thundered, and pounded his fist on the centre-table with emphatic force.

"I will quickly prove it to be the truth," she said. "First, let me say, that as for the dead men whose names I must mention, and whose acts I must unveil, they are now judged of God, with all their weakness, all their temptations, and every motive taken into account; and therefore I will not stop to justify or excuse anything that they have done. I will only speak of the facts as I know them."
